De Pasquale is a member of a noted musical family. Three brothers are leading members of other American orchestras. Francis is now a first cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Robert is a violinist with the New York Philharmonic, and William is concert master of the New Orleans Symphony.

All four got their original training from their father.

Perry said that auditions to seek replacements for the two would begin soon and continue through the present symphony season.

Eric Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and a jury of the orchestra's first desk men, will conduct the auditions.

Top posts in the Boston Symphony are highly prized in the musical world. It would not be unusual for leading men from the great European orchestras to compete for a first desk spot. First consideration is usually given to the present personnel of the orchestra.

Mayes began playing the cello when he was only four years old and at the age of eight appeared as soloist with the St. Louis Symphony.

DePasquale was appointed first violist of the Boston Symphony at the age of 27, the youngest man to earn such a post with a major American orchestra.

In 1945 he married Princess Maria De Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais in an impressive ceremony in Lenox, during the Berkshire Festival. The Princess is a niece of the late Serge Koussevitzky, then musical director of the Boston Symphony.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418
DEC 29 1963

MUSICAL CHAIRS: When it was learned that Lorne Munroe was leaving the Philadelphia Orchestra to become first cellist of the New York Philharmonic, the question immediately arose: Who would the Philadelphia get to replace Munroe? The answer is no less a cellist than Samuel Mayes, the solo cellist of the Boston Symphony. Not only this, the Philadelphia has also snaffled another first desk man from the Boston, Joseph de Pasquale, the Boston's first violist.

Mr. de Pasquale is taking the place of William Schoen, who is retiring after a single season in Philadelphia. There will be elements of a family reunion in Mr. de Pasquale's move to Philadelphia. His brothers, Francis and William, and his sister-in-law, Mrs. William de Pasquale, are already members of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf will fill the Mayes and de Pasquale vacancies only after auditions and the first musicians he will grant auditions to for the two first desks will be cellists and violists already in the orchestra.

Carl Stern is the first cellist of the New York Philharmonic whose retirement precipitated this particular game of musical chairs and before the game is over other orchestras will probably be affected, too.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
S. 687,065

211

Musical Chairs

SAMUEL MAYES, cellist with the Boston Symphony, will return next season to the Philadelphia Orchestra, with which he played from 1939 to 1948 before going North. He's changing places in the orchestra with . . .

. . . LORNE MUNROE, orchestra soloist, who's going to the New York Philharmonic in place of retiring soloist Carl Stern. With top string instrumentalists hard to come by, it's a switch usually played for keeps.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980

DEC 20 1963

De Pasquale, Mayes Named

Filled Two Orchestra Posts

Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violinist, principals in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were named Thursday to first desk posts with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Both men will take up their positions at the start of the 1964-65 season.

SUCCEEDS MUNROE

Mayes, 46, replaces Lorne Munroe who will become cellist of the New York Philharmonic next season.

De Pasquale, 44, replaces William Schoen whose contract has not been renewed. An Orchestra spokesman said Schoen had resigned.

For both men, the appointments mean a return to Philadelphia. They are graduates of the Curtis Institute and Mayes is a former cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

NATIVE OF ST. LOUIS

Mayes, born in St. Louis, left there when he was 12 to enter Curtis and at 18 he joined the Philadelphia Orchestra. At 22 he was named a principal cellist, a post he held for nine years. In 1948 he left to become first cellist in the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky.

He has been soloist with that orchestra on several occasions and played the American premiere of the Kabalevsky cello concerto with the composer conducting in 1953. He made his

His brother Francis is a cellist, his brother William and William's wife, Barbara are violinists with the Orchestra. A fourth brother, Robert, is a violinist with the New York Philharmonic.

Born in Philadelphia, de Pasquale studied with his father and entered Curtis at 17 where he studied with Louis Bailly, Max Aronoff and later with William Primrose.

He played in the Marine Band Orchestra from 1941-45 and with the American Broadcasting Company Orchestra for two years before being appointed principal violinist of the Boston Symphony in 1947.

PREMIERE PLAYER

He played the world premiere of the Walter Piston viola concerto and has played American premieres of concertos by Walton and Milhaud.

He is married to a niece of Mrs. Koussevitsky, the former Princess Marie de Beauharnais von Leuchtenberg. They have four children.

De Pasquale said he welcomed the chance to return to his home town and that he and his brothers plan "to go at the de Pasquale String Quartet with a vengeance."

With his brothers, he plans to start a series of concerts. "We think we have something unique here, and we can't make work when we live so far apart," he said.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483

MAY 28 1964

Honors for Louis Speyer On Symphony Retirement

Persons prominent in the field of music, as well as close personal friends, will gather Sunday afternoon, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Dean Coriat Wyman, to pay tribute to Boston's Louis Speyer, who is retiring from the Boston Symphony Orchestra after 46 years of continuous performance.

Mr. Speyer, who is one of the most renowned woodwind players in the world, has achieved the unusual record of having never missed a concert since joining the orchestra under the French conductor, Henri Rabaud, in 1918.

Among the many honors he has received in his long and celebrated career, are two from the French Government: the Medal of "Reconnaissance Francaise" for his services during World War II; and the Cross of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, for his contributions in the field of culture. Mr. Speyer has also been awarded the Medal of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress.

The "au revoir" reception will begin at 3 o'clock with champagne and hors d'oeuvres served on the lawn, and will continue indoors, where guests will be served crepes suzettes from flaming chafing dishes.

Among those invited to honor Mr. Speyer are Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, Attorney General and Mrs. Edward Brooke, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Piston, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ehrich, Mr. and Mrs. Louis I. Kane, Mrs. Julian Rogers, and Asa S. Knowles, president of Northeastern University, and Mrs. Knowles.

6 MUSICIANS LEAVING BOSTON SYMPHONY

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are retiring this season and three others are leaving the orchestra for other posts.

All of them were honored recently at the traditional retirement luncheon at Tanglewood.

Of those retiring, Louis Speyer, English horn, has given the longest service. He joined the orchestra in 1918 when Karl Muck was conductor. Jean de Vergie, oboe, who had been with the orchestra since 1925, was not present because illness had dictated that he retire from active duty at the end of the recent Esplanade concerts in Boston.

Vladimir Resnikoff, of the first violin section, became a member of the orchestra in 1932, under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky.

The orchestra also expressed appreciation to Samuel Mayes, principal cello; and his wife Winifred Winograd Mayes, cello; and Joseph dePasquale, principal viola. All three will join the Philadelphia Orchestra in the coming season.

DePasquale became a member of the orchestra in 1947; Mr. Mayes, in 1948; and Mrs. Mayes, in 1957.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500

MAY 7 1964

Louis Speyer Retires From Boston Symphony

PAGE ONE

A man who has devoted nearly half a century of his artistry to the Boston Symphony Orchestra has retired. This was the last season for Louis Speyer, who distinguished the orchestra with his playing of the French Horn and Oboe and who never missed a concert since joining the orchestra under the French conductor Henri Rabaud in 1918.

"Yours has been a splendid record. . . .' Senator Leverett Saltonstall wrote to the Brookline musician. And on the occasion of his retirement, Mr. Speyer was presented with a flag that has flown over the United Capitol by Mr. Nicholas Zekopoulos.

"The past season marks the departure from the Boston Symphony Orchestra of two first men, in addition to Mr. Speyer, and though this, too, represents a loss to the orchestra, these men are going at their own choosing for a better position. Mr. Speyer is leaving after long years of service to the orchestra.

The retired musician came to this country in May, 1918, with a French military band invited by the U.S. Government for a three-week Liberty Loan Tour. He remained to play in military camps and hospitals and, after receiving an honorable discharge in this country, accepted a position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As one of the most prominent members of the orchestra, Mr. Speyer appeared as soloist both on the French Horn and Oboe. Founder of the Berkshire Woodwind Ensemble, Mr. Speyer has also been active as a conductor in and around Boston and at Tanglewood.

Coming himself from a family of musicians, Louis Speyer is married to an artist in her own right, Camille Torno, a native of Boston. Mrs. Speyer's paintings and sculptures have been in various exhibitions. The Speyers' two children, Jacqueline Speyer Foure, living in Paris, and Andre Speyer, former Musical Director of the Twin Cities Concert Station KWFM in Minneapolis and now with WXHR, Fine Arts Station of Boston, have both inherited their parents' artistic abilities.

BSO Oboist Bows Out After Faithful 46 Years

By Lisa Lansing

LOUIS SPEYER, oboe and English horn player with the Boston Symphony, hasn't missed a concert in his 46 years with the orchestra.

"And I'm not proud of it," he says. "When one is sick one ought to stay at home."

But Speyer has not stayed home in bed. He came to this country from Paris in 1918 after graduating from the Paris Conservatory with top honors and appearing with Pierre Monteux in the Monteux concerts. He also played in the pit at the Theatre du Champs Elysee and with the Colonne Orchestra. He has been with the BSO through the successive reigns of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch and, at present, Erich Leinsdorf.

As the Leinsdorf rule is just getting started, the Speyer era with the BSO draws to a close. The oboist retires Aug. 23 as the orchestra completes its summer season at Tanglewood.

Speyer points out that he is probably "like Longines watches, the most highly decorated" oboe player in the world. The oboist has been decorated twice by the French government and by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress for "eminent services to chamber music."

He is noted for the beauty of his tone and the extraordinary breadth of his phrasing. Composers Hindemith, Honneger, Sowerby and, most recently, Piston have written works especially for Speyer.

A winter resident of Brookline, Speyer has divided his time between the BSO and the New England Conservatory of Music where he gives lessons. He also teaches at the Boston Conservatory.

Whitestone

Louis Speyer retires from the BSO this week after 4 conductors and 46 years.

After his retirement, Speyer will continue to teach both in Boston and at the Berkshire Music Center. At Tanglewood, he works at three jobs. He coordinates the school's rehearsal, seminar and concert activities, teaches several classes and plays three concerts each week with the BSO.

To teach in a music school, Speyer says, one has to understand the vagaries of musicians, of both the teaching and learning varieties. First, the teachers are often more difficult to handle than the students and, second, the students who are frightened are often better than those who are a little too sure of themselves and their skill.

Speyer's afternoons this summer have been filled with the lessons, rehearsals and seminars that crowd a faculty member's day at the Berkshire Music Center. One afternoon this summer as he sat in his sunlit office on the second floor of the faculty center on the Tanglewood grounds, the building was filled with sounds produced by chamber musicians, vocalizing sopranos and students clattering up the stairs to their 1:30 class assignments. The narrow halls bounced the sounds back and forth and Speyer shouted across the office to his secretary that he was off to his chamber music rehearsal down the hall.

A student rushed in to say that she couldn't find her classroom and after starting her off in the right direction, Speyer wound his way into the rear of the old house, opened a door and found five students looking expectantly at him. As the sun streamed into the small light room through its long, old windows, Mr. Speyer opened a pocket-sized score of Elliot Carter's 1948 Woodwind Quartet and gave a downbeat with a pencil stub he had carried with him from the office.

Speyer helped the five-member group along through the modernistic piece. His running commentary included, to the English horn player, "Just play what's solo, take it easy;" to the whole group, "That's too noisy;" and, "You skipped a line, go back to 81." The bassoon player complained that he could not be sure of his entrances because he could not hear the meter of a fluid passage. "Well, that's the mystery of chamber music," said Speyer. "Start again at 81."

An hour later, back in his office, he said that there were too few oboists and bassoon players in this country. "We get very few at auditions for the Center. Everyone wants to play the flute, the clarinet or a brass instrument."

Speyer does not give private lessons at the Center because he feels, "It would be unfair to those who cannot afford them." The Center's purpose is to "get players we can help musically" and the emphasis is on group and concert playing.

After the season's final concert at Tanglewood, Speyer expects to get the traditional watch presented to retiring players at an annual lawn-party luncheon for the orchestra musicians.

"Then I might go to Paris. They want me to play there. I may do it."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 22 1964

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

FEB 1964

FORTY-FIVE YEARS WITHOUT AN ABSENCE

Louis Speyer – His a Unique Achievement

by Sanford R. Sistare

Louis Speyer
Credit: John Brook

The clouds of World War I had not yet cleared in that Spring of 1918, but for one young man—a member of the French Military Band—the days were bright. For the band had been invited to the United States for a three-week Liberty Loan Tour with subsequent performances in military camps, hospitals and factories, and he felt particularly happy about the possibility of performing an oboe concerto in Symphony Hall, Boston. His anticipation was well founded, because it was this latter performance which led to his getting a position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Louis Speyer, who joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January of 1919, will close his distinguished career with that orchestra at the conclusion of the 1964 Berkshire Festival. At the December 20 concert of the current winter season he was invited by Pierre Monteux, the guest conductor of the evening, to play his "swan song," The Swan of Tuonela. It was the twelfth time he had been soloist with the Boston Symphony. The occasion was doubly impressive since fifty years before he had played under Pierre Monteux at world premiere of Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps, in Paris.

Speyer's tone and breadth of phrasing are legendary among his colleagues, and composers have been prompted to write music giving full opportunity for his playing. Among these are the composers Louis Speyer calls "the three H's"—Hill, Hindemith and Honegger. Others who have composed especially for him are: Sowerby, Mabel, Daniels, Kauder, Freed and Walter Piston.

Louis Speyer's honors are many, including two decorations from the French Government—the medal of "Reconnaissance Francais" for services rendered during the Second World War, and, more recently, the Cross of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, given in recognition of his services in the cultural field. From the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress in 1947 he received a medal for distinguished service in the field of chamber music.

He is founder of the Berkshire Woodwind Ensemble, for a decade was conductor of a youth orchestra in Quincy, Massachusetts, has on several occasions guest conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra, and has been an eminent teacher at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center since its founding in 1940.

A unique distinction for Louis Speyer is an incredible record of attendance for services required by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is an achievement unmatched within the Boston Symphony Orchestra and may well be unparalleled among all orchestral musicians. Since his first concerts as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1919, he has been on hand for hundreds and hundreds of concerts in Boston, at Tanglewood, on tour in this country and abroad. He has also played for the concerts of the Boston Pops Orchestra. During his long tenure encompassing a vast number of performances, he has never missed a program.

His retirement as an active player in the Boston Symphony does not mean Louis Speyer's complete severance with the orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf has invited him to take on the important administrative position of Music Coordinator in the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. All who are associated with him there wish him many years of active career in this capacity.

BSO Oboist Bows Out After Faithful 46 Years

By Lisa Lansing

LOUIS SPEYER, oboe and English horn player with the Boston Symphony, hasn't missed a concert in his 46 years with the orchestra.

"And I'm not proud of it," he says. "When one is sick one ought to stay at home."

But Speyer has not stayed home in bed. He came to this country from Paris in 1918 after graduating from the Paris Conservatory with top honors and appearing with Pierre Monteux in the Monteux concerts. He also played in the pit at the Theatre du Champs Elysee and with the Colonne Orchestra. He has been with the BSO through the successive reigns of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch and, at present, Erich Leinsdorf.

As the Leinsdorf rule is just getting started, the Speyer era with the BSO draws to a close. The oboist retires Aug. 23 as the orchestra completes its summer season at Tanglewood.

Speyer points out that he is probably "like Longines watches, the most highly decorated" oboe player in the world. The oboist has been decorated twice by the French government and by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress for "eminent services to chamber music."

He is noted for the beauty of his tone and the extraordinary breadth of his phrasing. Composers Hindemith, Honneger, Sowerby and, most recently, Piston have written works especially for Speyer.

Louis Speyer retires from the BSO this week after 4 conductors and 46 years.

A winter resident of Brookline, Speyer has divided his time between the BSO and the New England Conservatory of Music where he gives lessons. He also teaches at the Boston Conservatory.

After his retirement, Speyer will continue to teach both in Boston and at the Berkshire Music Center. At Tanglewood, he works at three jobs. He coordinates the school's rehearsal, seminar and concert activities, teaches several classes and plays three concerts each week with the BSO.

To teach in a music school, Speyer says, one has to understand the vagaries of musicians, of both the teaching and learning varieties. First, the teachers are often more difficult to handle than the students and, second, the students who are frightened are often better than those who are a little too sure of themselves and their skill.

Speyer's afternoons this summer have been filled with the lessons, rehearsals and seminars that crowd a faculty member's day at the Berkshire Music Center. One afternoon this summer as he sat in his sunlit office on the second floor of the faculty center on the Tanglewood grounds, the building was filled with sounds produced by chamber musicians, vocalizing sopranos and students clattering up the stairs to their 1:30 class assignments. The narrow halls bounced the sounds back and forth and Speyer shouted across the office to his secretary that he was off to his chamber music rehearsal down the hall.

A student rushed in to say that she couldn't find her classroom and after starting her off in the right direction, Speyer wound his way into the rear of the old house, opened a door and found five students looking expectantly at him. As the sun streamed into the small light room through its long, old windows, Mr. Speyer opened a pocket-sized score of Elliot Carter's 1948 Woodwind Quartet and gave a downbeat with a pencil stub he had carried with him from the office.

Speyer helped the five-member group along through the modernistic piece. His running commentary included, to the English horn player, "Just play what's solo, take it easy;" to the whole group, "That's too noisy;" and, "You skipped a line, go back to 81." The bassoon player complained that he could not be sure of his entrances because he could not hear the meter of a fluid passage. "Well, that's the mystery of chamber music," said Speyer. "Start again at 81."

An hour later, back in his office, he said that there were too few oboists and bassoon players in this country. "We get very few at auditions for the Center. Everyone wants to play the flute, the clarinet or a brass instrument."

Speyer does not give private lessons at the Center because he feels, "It would be unfair to those who cannot afford them." The Center's purpose is to "get players we can help musically" and the emphasis is on group and concert playing.

After the season's final concert at Tanglewood, Speyer expects to get the traditional watch presented to retiring players at an annual lawn-party luncheon for the orchestra musicians.

"Then I might go to Paris. They want me to play there. I may do it."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-6200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 22 1964

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

FEB 1964

FORTY-FIVE YEARS WITHOUT AN ABSENCE

Louis Speyer – His a Unique Achievement

by Sanford R. Sistare

Louis Speyer
Credit: John Brook

The clouds of World War I had not yet cleared in that Spring of 1918, but for one young man—a member of the French Military Band—the days were bright. For the band had been invited to the United States for a three-week Liberty Loan Tour with subsequent performances in military camps, hospitals and factories, and he felt particularly happy about the possibility of performing an oboe concerto in Symphony Hall, Boston. His anticipation was well founded, because it was this latter performance which led to his getting a position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Louis Speyer, who joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January of 1919, will close his distinguished career with that orchestra at the conclusion of the 1964 Berkshire Festival. At the December 20 concert of the current winter season he was invited by Pierre Monteux, the guest conductor of the evening, to play his "swan song," The Swan of Tuonela. It was the twelfth time he had been soloist with the Boston Symphony. The occasion was doubly impressive since fifty years before he had played under Pierre Monteux at world premiere of Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps, in Paris.

Speyer's tone and breadth of phrasing are legendary among his colleagues, and composers have been prompted to write music giving full opportunity for his playing. Among these are the composers Louis Speyer calls "the three H's"—Hill, Hindemith and Honegger. Others who have composed especially for him are: Sowerby, Mabel, Daniels, Kauder, Freed and Walter Piston.

Louis Speyer's honors are many, including two decorations from the French Government—the medal of "Reconnaissance Francais" for services rendered during the Second World War, and, more recently, the Cross of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, given in recognition of his services in the cultural field. From the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress in 1947 he received a medal for distinguished service in the field of chamber music.

He is founder of the Berkshire Woodwind Ensemble, for a decade was conductor of a youth orchestra in Quincy, Massachusetts, has on several occasions guest-conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra, and has been an eminent teacher at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center since its founding in 1940.

A unique distinction for Louis Speyer is an incredible record of attendance for services required by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is an achievement unmatched within the Boston Symphony Orchestra and may well be unparalleled among all orchestral musicians. Since his first concerts as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1919, he has been on hand for hundreds and hundreds of concerts in Boston, at Tanglewood, on tour in this country and abroad. He has also played for the concerts of the Boston Pops Orchestra. During his long tenure encompassing a vast number of performances, he has never missed a program.

His retirement as an active player in the Boston Symphony does not mean Louis Speyer's complete severance with the orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf has invited him to take on the important administrative position of Music Coordinator in the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. All who are associated with him there wish him [illegible] active career in this capacity.

OBITUARIES.

213

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855

JUL 1 1964

Pierre Monteux, 89, Dies in Sleep; Son Conducts Hudson Valley Philharmonic

Pierre Monteux, world famed symphony conductor, died early today in his sleep at his home in Hancock, Me.

Mr. Monteux, father of Claude Monteux, conductor of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic Orchestra, had been in failing health for several months. He was 89 last April 4.

At his death, he was principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

The elder Mr. Monteux canceled two benefit appearances in the Poughkeepsie area as conductor of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic last January because of illness. Last month, he canceled two appearances at the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival to rest for fall and winter season engagements. Previously, he had suffered a heart seizure while on a Scandinavian tour.

Native of France

Mr. Monteux, a native of France, began to conduct in France in 1910 with the Ballet Russe. The company toured the United States in 1916, and he stayed on in this country to become conductor of the French Repertory of the Metropolitan Opera for three years.

PIERRE MONTEUX

He then took over as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years and was concentgebouw of Amsterdam's Symphony for nine years.

In 1934 Mr. Monteux returned to the United States and picked up the pieces of the faltering San Francisco Symphony, directing it for 17 years.

Was in French Army

Mr. Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. He was a violinist before becoming a conductor and served as a private in the French Army in World War I.

He and his wife, Mrs. Doris Hodgkins Monteux, had lived on an estate in Hancock for several summers. They moved there permanently in 1952, when Mr. Monteux stepped down as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

The younger Mr. Monteux and his wife, who reside in 30 Garfield Place, left here today for Hancock. In addition to his son, a daughter, Mrs. Thomas Lanese, survives, as do two sisters, Mrs. David Michlin and Mrs. Meyer Davis.

Funeral services and burial will be in Hancock on Saturday morning, with a Mass of Requiem at St. Joseph's Church in nearby Ellsworth. (Further story on page 17)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUL 5 1964

PIERRE MONTEUX, foremost among the world's orchestral conductors and a former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at Hancock, Me., at the age of 89.

During his long career which started with the Ballet Russe in France in 1910, Monteux has conducted more than 65 of the world's famous orchestras. He served as leader of the Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924 and in recent years has appeared as a guest conductor.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855

JUL 1 1964

Monteux 'A Happy Hub Choice'—Cabot

On the death of Pierre Monteux, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said:

"Pierre Monteux is gone, but his contributions and accomplishments for the world of music will live on as long as music is played. For more than a half-century he brought his conductnig genius to many of the world's great orchestras; for five of those years he was music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and on many, many occasions the happy choice as guest conductor.

"He had, and will continue to have, a prominent place in the hearts of all of those connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

JUL 5 1964

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux was to have conducted two Music Shed concerts this summer at Tanglewood, where he had so often appeared as guest conductor. But his strength gave out, and following a fall from the podium during a concert in Rome last April these engagements had to be canceled. So, too, since then, did all his plans for next season, including guest appearances with several leading American orchestras and a tour of this country and Japan with his own London Symphony.

Despite his advanced age, such a schedule did not seem to him too much to undertake. For him, conducting the world's great orchestras involved no strain or tension. He knew the music by heart, and musicians and audiences marveled at the effortless ease with which he evoked it and controlled the sound. Because, for him, the familiar masterworks, old and modern, never palled, they emerged under his hand ever fresh, and rich, and spontaneous.

Mr. Monteux was as much in his element with German and Russian music as with that of his native France, and with that of Strauss and Stravinsky as of Haydn and Mozart; he also encouraged the efforts of young composers, and directed ballet and opera as well as symphony. Knowing interpretation to be his forte, he founded a summer school for conductors at Hancock, Me., where he made his home and where he died. There he stressed not only the technique of leading a full orchestra, but of performing the music as the composer intended.

Music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919 to 1924, he rebuilt it after World War I, and in recent years returned frequently for guest appearances at Boston and Lenox. Never the aloof or haughty maestro, the kindly Mr. Monteux, with his stocky figure and white mustache, was held in high esteem and regarded with fond affection by players and patrons alike.

Pierre Monteux was one of the diminishing company of elderly conductors through whom revered musical traditions have been handed on to a younger generation. He was of the musical elite.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
[illegible]

JUL 2 1964

Pierre Monteux

Many residents of the capital community will be personally moved by the death of Pierre Monteux, the French-born conductor who brought them such pleasure at Tanglewood summer concerts.

The great Monteux had an incredible career that spanned more than 60 active years in which he led nearly every one of the worlds outstanding orchestras. Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf said of him that he was "a true blessing for music and all who love music."

There was more to be remembered, however, than the Brahms, Beethoven and Wagner that came real under his baton. For Americans there was an indefinable appeal in the stocky little man with the walrus mustache that made him a compelling figure as he stepped to the podium.

Rest peacefully, "Papa" Monteux. Your contribution was indeed great.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

JUL 3 1964

Dedication To Music

Symphonic conductors are often the objects of idolatrous attention, especially if they are good showmen, but Pierre Monteux, who has just died in Maine at the age of 89, was something else. He held the affection of three generations of American and European concert-goers. In his last years, when he appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was always hailed as a dear old friend. Admiration for his continuing musical alertness was linked with pride, a sort of family pride.

The Boston Symphony is one of several great orchestras which could boast having had Monteux as director. The contact was maintained through guest appearances, which were made convenient by his summer, and eventual permanent, residence in Maine. Then illness forced him to cancel his classes in conducting at the Domaine School in Hancock, Maine, Monteux was honored by the decision at Tanglewood to run a three-week course in conducting at the Berkshire Music Center in his name. Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, and a half dozen other conductors and composers will now carry on in his memory what was designed originally as a friendly compliment.

Pierre Monteux' small rotund figure and his general air of benevolence covered a formidable professional mastery. His gestures on the podium were minimal, his results superb. He loved Brahms. He loved to lead the great Beethoven Ninth. But he was most famous for his understanding of the French composers of the early 20th Century, whose music, he sometimes pointed out, was predated by his own musical education. He could bring out the color of the romantic innovators.

Perhaps it is hard to imagine, remembering the octogenarian leading Brahms in the calm of a Lenox evening, that Monteux created a near-riot when he led Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" with the Ballet Russe in Paris in 1913. It was after that, that he came to this country and was conductor for the Metropolitan Opera, then moved to the Boston Orchestra, then back to Europe, again to the U. S. A., this time to rebuild the San Francisco orchestra; and finally in 1960 he slowed down a busy pace of guest conducting around the world to become conductor of the London Symphony. There was hardly a major orchestra in the world that he had not led, and until a bad fall this past spring, he carried a heavy schedule of travel and work astounding for a man of his age.

Surely there is testimony here to the successful interplay of a vigorous life and a vigorous dedication to art. It is said that Monteux was disappointed in ambitions to be a composer and taught conducting as the alternative means of leaving a musical heritage. However, few composers will be remembered as long, as none as warmly, as the great conductors who have managed to touch the imaginations of thousands of listeners with their art. Monteux was one of these.

BLOOMY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Thursday, July 2, 1964

Death of 'Papa' Dims Tanglewood Season

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

The regrettable but not unexpected passing of Pierre Monteux at Hancock, Me. during his sleep yesterday morning brought to a close a remarkable conducting career which was identified with every major orchestra in the civilized world.

He will be particularly missed by the patrons of Tanglewood where he was scheduled to conduct a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the festival which opens tomorrow night.

Like Hayden, he was referred to by his admirers as "Papa," since he brought to the podion, and to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a friendly, paternal personality. His conductorial colleagues at Tanglewood have agreed to institute a new conducting course as a tribute to the genius of the mestro. Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Orchestra will be chairman.

AROUND THE TOWN

Pierre Monteux

His status symbol during his later life was his jet black hair and his white, walrus - like mustache. He was 89 years of age, alhough his approach to nonogenerianism, is rested lightly on his broad shoulders. It was my privilege to have had luncheon with "Papa" Monteux a few years ago when he was appearing in concert in the local area. Quiet and unassuming in his approach to strangers, he was fully cognizant of what was taking place, and interjected humorous answers to the serious questions he was asked.

It was only last summer during an intermission in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the occupant of an adjoining seat turned to Mrs. VanOlinda and in a spirit of friendliness, struck up an acquaintance, in which she said to the lady who goes to the theatre and concerts with me:

"Do you like Mr. Monteux?"

"Indeed I do," was my wife's reply.

"I just love him, too" said our newly found neighbor, "And do you know why? He's just my age and weighs exactly as much as I do!"

On the nights and Sunday afternoons that Mr. Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was accorded a rousing reception at his entrance to his railed music stand, not only by the members of the audience, but with a rising gesture by the members of the orchestra, many of whom had played under him when he was the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1917 to 1919.

His musical taste was most catholic in his interpretative gifts. However, it was in the French repertory that he attained his greatest triumphs. He also revelled on the music of the Russian Ballet dating back to 1911, when Serge Diaghilev invited him to conduct the performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. His musical career began when he was a student of violin at the Paris Conservatory where he won the first prize and an engagement with the Paris Colonne Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. One daughter, conducts an authentic French restaurant, near Manchester, Vt., called L'Auberge. His son, Claude, is the present conductor of the Poughkeepsie Symphony Orchestra.

Thousands of Tanglewood music lovers will miss his friendly presence this summer. When he made his theatrical entrance from the right side of the stage and waddled to the podiom, assisted by Mr. Pasquale, first violist of the Boston Symphony, there was an almost audible sigh of envy from the audience members in his age group in the large shed, that they could not match the physical vigor of little rotund, "Mr. Five-by-Five" who was endowed with such youthful joie de vivre.

Atlantic City Press
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
D. 53,525 SUN. 41,130
JUL 5 1964

Conductors' Course At Tanglewood In August

Eric Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, announces the addition of a course for orchestral conductors at Tanglewood this summer.

Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will be the chairman of this program which will last for three weeks, from Sunday, August 2 to Sunday, August 23.

The course will be open to all applicants and will include seminars and discussions with Eric Leinsdorf, Richard Burgin, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Max Rudolf, and Gunther Schuller; classes in solfeg and baton technique; observation at Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals and concerts. Other activities will depend on the size and skills of the enrollment.

The fee for the three-week course is $310, which include tuition, dormitory, and miscellaneous fees. Those interested in attending should write immediately to the Registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
JUL 17 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,680
JUL 6 1964

Rites Held For Monteux

ELLSWORTH — Pierre Monteux, 89, was laid to rest Saturday in the family lot at Hancock following funeral services here at St. Joseph's Catholic Church.

The world-known musical conductor died Wednesday at his home in Hancock. Although born in France, he had made his permanent home in Maine for many years.

Musical figures in all parts of the world sent condolences to the family and numerous personages attended the services. Included were many who had been his students or who had worked under him during his half century of conducting symphony orchestras.

Figures such as conductor Max Rudolph of the Cincinnati Symphony, Barry Tuckwell representing the London Symphony Orchestra, Louis Speyer who is considered the world's greatest English horn player, Harry Dickson who is assistant to Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Pops Orchestra, and many others, attended.

An old friend of Montieux' Maurice Chevalier, sent a telegram of condolence.

The Requiem Mass was celebrated by the Rev. Daniel Honan of Brewer and the Rev. Henry Lappin, pastor.

Bearers were Emery Davis, Theodore Leavitt and Leonard dePaur of New York City, James Sample of Erie, Pa., Barry Tuckwell and Maurice Kaplow of Philadelphia.

SALAMANCA, N.Y.
REPUBLICAN-PRESS
D. 4,100
JUL 9 1964

As Others See It

Pierre Monteux

"Retire? Is that an English word I have not yet learned?"

Thus Pierre Monteux quipped with a reporter when asked what he intended to do after leaving his post as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, a position he held for 16 years.

And that was 13 years ago.

Monteux never retired. He conducted his last concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last December. He had agreed to conduct—his 90th anniversary concert in Boston on April 4, 1965. He conducted the final concert of his career in Rome last April.

Musically his place in 20th-century music will be preserved through his many excellent recordings. Historically, however, he will remain one of the giants of our time. It was he who conducted the unforgettable world premiere of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" back in 1913. He was also on hand to guide the first performances of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Though his name will be linked forever with these masterworks, Monteux's greatest triumph was his joyous activity through his fruitful career. The word retire was just not in his vocabulary. — Christian Science Monitor

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,565
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 9,808
JUL 2 1964

Leinsdorf calls Monteux great

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Pierre Monteux was "a true blessing for music and all who love music."

Monteux, formerly the conductor of symphony orchestras in Boston and San Francisco and several European countries, died Tuesday night at his home in Hancock, Maine.

"In my sadness over his passing is mixed profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any other conductor and that his lucid mind stayed with him all the way," Leinsdorf said.

Monteux, who was 89 last April 4, was still conducting symphony orchestras this spring. He appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last December.

"Like all who are great, he knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. With him, all composers, whoever they were, could be certain that their music would be heard undistorted and in its own glory. Pierre Monteux himself was made of music and thus an irreplaceable element of music has left us."

Born in Paris, Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. He was a violinist before becoming a conductor and served as a private in the French army during World War 1.

Monteux formerly was regular conductor of symphony orchestras in Boston and San Francisco in the United States and Amsterdam, Berlin, London, Paris and Vienna in Europe. He also had been conductor of the Ballet Russe, Metropolitan Opera and National Broadcasting Co. symphony orchestras.

Last month Monteux cancelled two scheduled appearances at the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival to rest for fall and winter season engagements.

Two days before his 89th birthday, Monteux collapsed while conducting a concert at the St. Cecilia Academy in Rome. After a 20-minute rest he continued the program. The collapse was attributed to the heated auditorium.

Pierre Monteux 1875-1964

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

When the papers of April 2 carried the news that Pierre Monteux had collapsed and fallen from the stage during a concert in Rome the night before, most of us experienced a pang of something like a sobering fright. To be sure, he was able to finish the concert 20 minutes later and the account spoke of sightseeing around Rome and an impending trip to Assisi, but still, it was hard to pass lightly over the sentence which mentioned that Monteux, on April 4, would be 89 years old.

Later we heard that his two concerts at Tanglewood had been canceled. The optimism of the account was characteristic: it was stressed that Monteux would omit the concerts only because he wished to reserve his strength for his classes at "Le Domain" at Hancock, Me., and for his many engagements during the coming Winter.

In Boston there were rumors a a special Pension Fund performance of the Beethoven Ninth to be conducted by Monteux on his 90th birthday. Many recalled how his 80th and 85th birthday had been celebrated here in glory by what the passing of years had turned once again into his orchestra. But 90 has a different ring from 80. There is a point when the numbers attached to birthdays mix fear into jubilee. There was the knowledge, inescapable now, that some day the news from Hancock would be graver.

Now that news has come. We must learn to live with the idea that some part of Beethoven, of Schumann, Brahms, Debussy, Strauss, Stravinsky has died with Pierre Monteux, whose figure, so unforgettable an amalgam of dignity and humor, we shall not see again.

The grand figures among the conductors of his generation are almost all gone now. He stood apart from his contemporaries because his era was one essentially of eccentrics, often inspired ones. It was an age of a distinctly idiosyncratic approach to performance: Stokowski, Koussevitzky, Mengelberg are the archetypes. Pierre Monteux gave the music straight, as straight, at least, as he knew how. That, to many, was his limitation, but to many it was his glory.

It took me a long time to understand Monteux. My inclination always ran toward the conductors who did some violence to music, Toscanini for many years, and later Furtwaengler. I do not know when I came to be able to hear what Monteux was doing, but I know that now there are some pieces about which I almost feel that I shall never really hear them again. "Death and Transfiguration" is one that comes to mind, and the "Tragic Overture." I think I have never spoken with anyone about Monteux without hearing about one of these unsurpassed performances, a Ninth Symphony at Tanglewood, "Mathis der Maler" in Philadelphia, the "Enigma Variations" in Symphony Hall. There are not many performers to whom we could render the tribute of saying about even one interpretation, "this was the best I ever heard." But by sheer directness and honesty Monteux could sometimes lead us to the essence of a piece so that it stood revealed, it seemed, as never before nor since.

Stravinsky, not a man given to sympathy for performers, once wrote, "Let me say here that Monteux, almost alone among conductors, never cheapened 'Le Sacre' or looked for his own glory in it, and that he continued to play it all his life with the greatest fidelity."

The refusal to look for his own glory made slow Monteux's rise to the eminence he enjoyed at the end of his career. Someone has said that longevity is genius. For Monteux it was at least a blessing that enough years were granted him to overcome the discouragement of some of his American experiences in the '20s. The reunion with Boston, which had treated him shabbily after more than ordinary service rendered by him to its orchestra between 1918 and 1924, was an especially happy thing.

Monteux was fond of attributing the course of his career to indolence. He switched from violin to viola, he insisted, because it was easier, and the violist became a conductor for the same reason. And what was he planning to do when he retired from conducting? "Music criticism, of course." I am glad it never came to that point. It was, after all, so good to have Monteux conducting.

Pierre Monteux

1875-1964

NewEngland Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

1964

Pierre Monteux: Musician's Musician

There was an air of agelessness about Pierre Monteux, at least from the audience's side of the podium. Perhaps it was his consciously quiet, unassuming manner with an orchestra that made him appear the same at 88 last summer at Tanglewood as he had appeared years earlier to countless other crowds of music lovers.

His death means more than that his stocky frame will not be seen again. His longevity was due to no sparing of himself in the career that made him a respected dean among the world's symphonic conductors.

Mr. Monteux was a dedicated and deep student of music. He worked at it, even if it was a labor of love, and in his senior years he could find much in it that eluded his juniors with the baton. Yet he was not an innovator with established works; his colleagues credited him with excellent but undistorted readings of what the composer meant. It was only with new compositions, Stravinsky's among them, that he pioneered and cast the mold.

The authority of years doubtless enhanced his mastery over music and musicians. That, along with his professional integrity and perfectionism, is what is lost. A musician's musician, his peers called him in high tribute. Erich Leinsdorf said Mr. Monteux was "made of music." He made music unforgettably meaningful.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 283,075 SUN. 339,766

JUL 1 1964

Pierre Monteux Dies, Orchestra Conductor

By HERMAN SCHADEN
Star Staff Writer

Pierre Monteux, the rotund little conductor whose benign demeanor made him "Papa" Monteux to millions of music lovers, died in his sleep early today at his home in Hancock, Me.

Mr. Monteux was 89 years old, but it was a part of his almost legendary-in-life career that his years weighed on him no more heavily than a baton. Until a few months ago, he was moving through an international schedule that would have broken down many younger men.

Several generations of Americans can claim the stocky figure with the walrus moustach—an exact prototype of a French chef—as a memorable part of their musical experience.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Used No Score

This, of course, includes Washington where he appeared many times—most recently two years ago—to lead such orchestras as the Boston, the Philadelphia or the National, always with the economy of gestures which made him the inconspicuous master of the orchestra; and almost invariably without a score in front of him.

Dr. Howard Mitchell, conductor of the National, spoke for this community today when he said: "We have lost one of the great musical masters of our time, who literally died in action while continuing to serve music. His was a unique and personal art."

Led Pioneer Works

Papa Monteux made music for nearly three-quarters of a century. Born in Paris in April of 1875, he was destined to this life from the beginning, was a prize-winning violinist at the Paris Conservatory, and by 1910 was conducting the Colonne Orchestra.

Amazingly, it was he who conducted the premiere performances of such controversial and knotty works as Stravinsky's Rite of Spring and Petrouchka and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe, more than 50 years ago.

The wild dissonances of the Rite of Spring set the Paris audience to fighting among themselves, and sent Stravinsky fleeing through a window. But Mr. Monteux lived to play a triumphal encore half a century later. No one has ever mastered the jagged rhythms and harmonies so effectively.

Little known is the two-year interlude the conductor spent fighting as a French Army private in World War I, at Verdun, Rheims, Soissons and the Argonne.

In 1916, he came to this country with the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, had a brief stint with the Metropolitan Opera and was asked by the Boston Symphony to fill in between conductors.

Admired in Boston

Boston would not let him go. He remained from 1919 to 1924, rebuilding the orchestra to the fine ensemble he turned over to Serge Koussevitzky. Returning to Europe, he was associated with the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam for nearly 10 years.

But at 53, his career was barely launched, or so it seemed as time went on. Before its completion, he was to have conducted more than 100 orchestras, building several of them in his own image. For 17 years, he was the toast of San Francisco. When he left, then in his 70s, it was not to retire, but to continue an exacting schedule as guest conductor, and finally to become principal conductor of the London Symphony only four years ago, a post he held at his death.

In 1942, he became an American citizen, and, in time, lived with his wife, the former Doris Hodgkins, whom he married in 1928, on a farm near her Maine birthplace.

Funeral services will be Saturday morning at 9 a.m. with mass of requiem at St. Joseph's church in nearby Ellsworth. Burial will be in Hancock.

His sister, Mrs. David Michlin, said Mr. Monteux had been confined to bed for nine weeks. He had returned in May from a European tour suffering from exhuastion.

In addition to his wife and Mrs. Michlin, Mr. Monteux is survived by a sister-in-law, Mrs. Meyer Davis of New York, wife of the society orchestra leader, and by two children—a son, Claude, now conductor of the Poughkeepsie (N. Y.) Symphony, and a daughter, Mrs. Thomas Lanese. Both have summer homes near the Monteux year-round residence at Hancock.

To say that he had settled down at Hancock would be in error. For as long as he could mount the podium and lift his baton, Pierre Monteux made music. Erich Leinsdorf, present conductor of the Boston Symphony said it best:

"He knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. Any composer could be sure that his music would be heard undisturbed and in its own glory. Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUL 2 1964

Death of 'Papa' Dims Tanglewood Season

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

The regrettable but not unexpected passing of Pierre Monteux at Hancock, Me. during his sleep yesterday morning brought to a close a remarkable conducting career which was identified with every major orchestra in the civilized world.

He will be particularly missed by the patrons of Tanglewood where he was scheduled to conduct a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the festival which opens tomorrow night.

Like Hayden, he was referred to by his admirers as "Papa," since he brought to the podion, and to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a friendly, paternal personality. His conductorial colleagues at Tanglewood have agreed to institute a new conducting course as a tribute to the genius of the mestro. Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Orchestra will be chairman.

AROUND THE TOWN

Pierre Monteux

His status symbol during his later life was his jet black hair and his white, walrus - like mustache. He was 89 years of age, alhough his approach to nonogenerianism, is rested lightly on his broad shoulders. It was my privilege to have had luncheon with "Papa" Monteux a few years ago when he was appearing in concert in the local area. Quiet and unassuming in his approach to strangers, he was fully cognizant of what was taking place, and interjected humorous answers to the serious questions he was asked.

It was only last summer during an intermission in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the occupant of an adjoining seat turned to Mrs. VanOlinda and in a spirit of friendliness, struck up an acquaintance, in which she said to the lady who goes to the theatre and concerts with me:

"Do you like Mr. Monteux?"

"Indeed I do," was my wife's reply.

"I just love him, too" said our newly found neighbor, "And do you know why? He's just my age and weighs exactly as much as I do!"

On the nights and Sunday afternoons that Mr. Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was accorded a rousing reception at his entrance to his railed music stand, not only by the members of the audience, but with a rising gesture by the members of the orchestra, many of whom had played under him when he was the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1917 to 1919.

His musical taste was most catholic in his interpretative gifts. However, it was in the French repertory that he attained his greatest triumphs. He also revelled on the music of the Russian Ballet dating back to 1911, when Serge Diaghilev invited him to conduct the performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. His musical career began when he was a student of violin at the Paris Conservatory where he won the first prize and an engagement with the Paris Colonne Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. One daughter, conducts an authentic French restaurant, near Manchester, Vt., called L'Auberge. His son, Claude, is the present conductor of the Poughkeepsie Symphony Orchestra.

Thousands of Tanglewood music lovers will miss his friendly presence this summer. When he made his theatrical entrance from the right side of the stage and waddled to the podiom, assisted by Mr. Pasquale, first violist of the Boston Symphony, there was an almost audible sigh of envy from the audience [illegible] group in the large [illegible] they could [illegible] physical vigo[illegible] tund. "Mr. [illegible] who was endow[illegible] youthful joie de vivre.

ewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
ox 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

JUL 9 1964

Monteux Led 3 Generations Of BSO Horn Player's Family

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Louis Speyer, veteran English horn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had associations with the late Pierre Monteux which reach back farther than the memory of any other musicians in the United States.

Three Speyers

After Monteux won a first prize in violin at the Paris Conservatoire in 1896, he played in music halls in his native Paris. He moved on, in time, to the post of first viola in the Cologne Orchestra where Louis' father was a fellow-member of the viola section. Then Monteux became the violin teacher of Louis' brother. When he mounted the podium, he became the conductor of the orchestra in which Louis was English horn. To jump forward a half-century, when Monteux was guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony a few years ago, he found Andre, the son of Louis, in the French horn section, making three generations of Speyers for whom he conducted.

Diaghileff and Ballet

When Serge Diaghileff, the Russian ballet impresario, came to Paris, his principal conductor was the famous Gabriel Pierne. Because of conflicting engagements which would require a trip to Spain, Pierne had to be absent for a time. Diaghileff looked for an interim rehearsal conductor and chose Monteux who at that time was organizing "Les Concerts Monteux." Stravinsky's "Firebird" had already been produced and the Russian composer himself was in constant attendance at rehearsals for "Petrouchka." After three or four rehearsals Stravinsky said to Diaghileff: "This is our man," and Monteux was hired. Monteux conducted the first "Rites of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees in 1913 when it was played as ballet music with Nijinsky in a solo role. He also conducted the first performance in 1914 of the score as a concert piece.

In the orchestra in 1913 were the elder Speyer, his son Louis, and also Henri Girard, double bass, also now of the Boston Orchestra.

Monteux With BSO

Louis Speyer first came to the United States in 1918 as a member of a French military band sent over for propaganda purposes. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra at that time was Henri Rabaud who stayed only a year. He had been engaged following the episode in which the German Karl Muck had been asked to leave. That happened in the days when we in America went to lengths, which now appear so infantile, when we joked about "Hock the Kaiser" and other uproarious epithets.

When everyone was speculating about who would succeed Muck, the name of every eligible musician was suggested whenever two musicians got together. One man suggested Ernest Bloch. "No," said the other man, "we don't want anyone whose name ends in 'och'." "How about Foch?" asked the second fellow.

Rabaud felt he wanted to devote his time fully to composing and so a successor was sought. Monteux was then at the Metropolitan Opera; he was engaged as musical director for Boston and remained with the orchestra for five years.

Missed the Funeral

In the orchestra right now are several men who were there when Monteux was in command directly after World War I. In addition to Speyer, they are Girard and another bass player Irving Frankel. [illegible] Samuel Diamond [illegible] Knudson and Robert [illegible]

On the morning [illegible] Monteux funeral at Hancock, Maine, the orchestra was represented by three men, Manager Thomas D. Perry, Mr. Speyer, and the violinist and intimate friend of the veteran conductor, Harry Dickson. They planned to charter a plane early Saturday morning, since the presence of [illegible] chestra members was necessary for the Friday evening [illegible] but fog prevented a [illegible] Hancock and in circling around looking for a haven on the ground they arrived [illegible] ceremony was over. [illegible] able to call upon the [illegible] ow and express the sentiments of their colleagues.

Monteux was given a [illegible] service in a Roman Catholic church. He was born [illegible] parents and abandoned [illegible] tive faith when his third wife, a Parisian, embraced the Catholic [illegible] Monteux and Mr. [illegible]

Those of the orchestra [illegible] portunity of working only in the Boston [illegible] life sometimes wonder his lack of [illegible] on stage were [illegible] and the [illegible] profession, but [illegible] bers that Monteux was [illegible] ing and quiet a leader as a young man as a veteran. He [illegible] the motto which [illegible] teux was a [illegible] Schweitzer's [illegible] life." Monteux [illegible] for music.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 315,522 SUN. 350,121

JUL 2 1964

'We Loved Him Dearly'

Musicians Praise Monteux

The musical world was plunged in grief yesterday over the death of Pierre Monteux, the famed conductor who directed San Francisco's Symphony Orchestra from 1935 until 1952.

Here in San Francisco, where an aura of indestructibility surrounded the small, bright-eyed Monteux, initial reaction to the news from Hancock, Maine, was one of disbelief and then came expressions of sorrow.

Howard Skinner, longtime manager of the Symphony, was near tears when he said: "He was great—one of the greatest. What we remember was his humility and his utter devotion to music and the public. We loved him dearly. We'll never forget him."

Maoum Blinder, Mr. Monteux' concertmaster and intimate friend, said: "He was the most wonderful man. He was a wonderful musician We all knew how sick he was. We knew we had to expect this. But this is a great blow."

Albert White, personnel manager for the orchestra said: "He was the last of the great conductors of his tradition. He was originally a playing conductor—one of the world's great violists of his time."

Members of the London Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Monteux was permanent conductor, were equally shocked at the news.

Sir Arthur Bliss, honorary president of the orchestra said: "Pierre Monteux was a great musician who devoted his whole life to music. Contemporary composers especially owe him a deep debt of gratitude for his magnificent support of their music."

Mr. Monteux was once permanent conductor and often guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its present musical director, Erich Leinsdorf said of him:

"He was a true blessing for music and all who love music. In my sadness over his passing is mixed a profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any conductor . . . Like all who are great, he knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. With him all composers . . . could be certain their music would be heard undistorted and in its own glory."

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of both the Boston and San Francisco summer concerts, said: "The entire world will mourn the passing of this conductor and gentleman.

New Role

HOLLYWOOD (UPI) — Bob Conrad, of the defunct "Hawaiian Eye" television series, will star in a new hour-long show titled "The Spy."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUL 2 1964

Death of 'Papa' Dims Tanglewood Season

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

The regrettable but not unexpected passing of Pierre Monteux at Hancock, Me. during his sleep yesterday morning brought to a close a remarkable conducting career which was identified with every major orchestra in the civilized world.

He will be particularly missed by the patrons of Tanglewood where he was scheduled to conduct a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the festival which opens tomorrow night.

Like Hayden, he was referred to by his admirers as "Papa," since he brought to the podion, and to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a friendly, paternal personality. His conductorial colleagues at Tanglewood have agreed to institute a new conducting course as a tribute to the genius of the mestro. Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Orchestra will be chairman.

AROUND THE TOWN

Pierre Monteux

His status symbol during his later life was his jet black hair and his white, walrus - like mustache. He was 89 years of age, alhough his approach to nonogenerianism, is rested lightly on his broad shoulders. It was my privilege to have had luncheon with "Papa" Monteux a few years ago when he was appearing in concert in the local area. Quiet and unassuming in his approach to strangers, he was fully cognizant of what was taking place, and interjected humorous answers to the serious questions he was asked.

It was only last summer during an intermission in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the occupant of an adjoining seat turned to Mrs. VanOlinda and in a spirit of friendliness, struck up an acquaintance, in which she said to the lady who goes to the theatre and concerts with me:

"Do you like Mr. Monteux?"

"Indeed I do," was my wife's reply.

"I just love him, too" said our newly found neighbor, "And do you know why? He's just my age and weighs exactly as much as I do!"

On the nights and Sunday afternoons that Mr. Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was accorded a rousing reception at his entrance to his railed music stand, not only by the members of the audience, but with a rising gesture by the members of the orchestra, many of whom had played under him when he was the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1917 to 1919.

His musical taste was most catholic in his interpretative gifts. However, it was in the French repertory that he attained his greatest triumphs. He also revelled on the music of the Russian Ballet dating back to 1911, when Serge Diaghilev invited him to conduct the performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. His musical career began when he was a student of violin at the Paris Conservatory where he won the first prize and an engagement with the Paris Colonne Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. One daughter, conducts an authentic French restaurant, near Manchester, Vt., called L'Auberge. His son, Claude, is the present conductor of the Poughkeepsie Symphony Orchestra.

Thousands of Tanglewood music lovers will miss his friendly presence this summer. When he made his theatrical entrance from the right side of the stage and waddled to the podiom, assisted by Mr. Pasquale, first violist of the Boston Symphony, there was an almost audible sigh of envy from the audience members in his age group in the large shed, that they could not match the physical vigor of little Mr. Fundy, "Mr. Five-by-Five" who was endowed with such youthful joie de vivre.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 315,522 SUN. 350,121

JUL 2 1964

'We Loved Him Dearly'

Musicians Praise Monteux

The musical world was plunged in grief yesterday over the death of Pierre Monteux, the famed conductor who directed San Francisco's Symphony Orchestra from 1935 until 1952.

Here in San Francisco, where an aura of indestructibility surrounded the small, bright-eyed Monteux, initial reaction to the news from Hancock, Maine, was one of disbelief and then came expressions of sorrow.

Howard Skinner, longtime manager of the Symphony, was near tears when he said: "He was great—one of the greatest. What we remember was his humility and his utter devotion to music and the public. We loved him dearly. We'll never forget him."

Maxum Blinder, Mr. Monteux' concertmaster and intimate friend, said: "He was the most wonderful man. He was a wonderful musician We all knew how sick he was. We knew we had to expect this. But this is a great blow."

Albert White, personnel manager for the orchestra said: "He was the last of the great conductors of his tradition. He was originally a playing conductor—one of the world's great violists of his time."

Members of the London Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Monteux was permanent conductor, were equally shocked at the news.

Sir Arthur Bliss, honorary president of the orchestra said: "Pierre Monteux was a great musician who devoted his whole life to music. Contemporary composers especially owe him a deep debt of gratitude for his magnificent support of their music."

Mr. Monteux was once permanent conductor and often guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its present musical director, Erich Leinsdorf said of him:

"He was a true blessing for music and all who love music. In my sadness over his passing is mixed a profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any conductor . . . Like all who are great, he knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. With him all composers . . . could be certain their music would be heard undistorted and in its own glory."

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of both the Boston and San Francisco summer concerts, said: "The entire world will mourn the passing of this conductor and gentleman.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

JUL 9 1964

Monteux Led 3 Generations Of BSO Horn Player's Family

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Louis Speyer, veteran English horn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had associations with the late Pierre Monteux which reach back farther than the memory of any other musicians in the United States.

Three Speyers

After Monteux won a first prize in violin at the Paris Conservatoire in 1896, he played in music halls in his native Paris. He moved on, in time, to the post of first viola in the Cologne Orchestra where Louis' father was a fellow-member of the viola section. Then Monteux became the violin teacher of Louis' brother. When he mounted the podium, he became the conductor of the orchestra in which Louis was English horn. To jump forward a half-century, when Monteux was guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony a few years ago, he found Andre, the son of Louis, in the French horn section, making three generations of Speyers for whom he conducted.

Diaghileff and Ballet

When Serge Diaghileff, the Russian ballet impresario, came to Paris, his principal conductor was the famous Gabriel Pierne. Because of conflicting engagements which would require a trip to Spain, Pierne had to be absent for a time. Diaghileff looked for an interim rehearsal conductor and chose Monteux who at that time was organizing "Les Concerts Monteux." Stravinsky's "Firebird" had already been produced and the Russian composer himself was in constant attendance at rehearsals for "Petrouchka." After three or four rehearsals Stravinsky said to Diaghileff: "This is our man," and Monteux was hired. Monteux conducted the first "Rites of Spring" in the Theatre des Champs Elysees in 1913 when it was played as ballet music with Nijinsky in a solo role. He also conducted the first performance in 1914 of the score as a concert piece.

In the orchestra in 1913 were the elder Speyer, his son Louis, and also Henri Girard, double bass, also now of the Boston Orchestra.

Monteux With BSO

Louis Speyer first came to the United States in 1918 as a member of a French military band sent over for propaganda purposes. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra at that time was Henri Rabaud who stayed only a year. He had been engaged following the episode in which the German Karl Muck had been asked to leave. That happened in the days when we in America went to lengths, which now appear so infantile, when we joked about "Hock the Kaiser" and other uproarious epithets.

When everyone was speculating about who would succeed Muck, the name of every eligible musician was suggested whenever two musicians got together. One man suggested Ernest Bloch. "No," said the other man, "we don't want anyone whose name ends in 'och'." "How about Foch?" asked the second fellow.

Rabaud felt he wanted to devote his time fully to composing and so a successor was sought. Monteux was then at the Metropolitan Opera; he was engaged as musical director for Boston and remained with the orchestra for five years.

Missed the Funeral

In the orchestra right now are several men who were there when Monteux was in command directly after World War I. In addition to Speyer, they are Girard and another bass player, Irving Frankel, and violinists Samuel Diamond, Clarence Knudson and Roland Tapley.

On the morning of the Monteux funeral at Hancock, Maine, the orchestra was represented by three men, Manager Thomas D. Perry, Mr. Speyer, and the violinist and intimate friend of the veteran conductor, Harry Dickson. They planned to charter a plane early Saturday morning, since the presence of the orchestra members was necessary for the Friday evening concert, but fog prevented a landing near Hancock and in circling around looking for a haven on the ground they arrived after the ceremony was over. They were able to call upon Monteux's widow and express the sentiments of their colleagues.

Monteux was given a burial service in a Roman Catholic church. He was born of Jewish parents and abandoned his native faith when his wife, his third wife, a Protestant, also embraced the Catholic faith.

Monteux and Music

Those of us who [illegible] portunity of watching only in the last decade [illegible] life sometimes wondered [illegible] er his lack of energetic [illegible] on stage were the result of [illegible] and the longtime exercise [illegible] profession, but Speyer remembers that Monteux was a [illegible] ing and quiet a baton-wielder as a young man as he was [illegible] veteran. He further believes that the motto which best fitted Monteux was a paraphrase of Schweitzer's "reverence for life." Monteux had a reverence for music.

New Role

HOLLYWOOD (UPI) — Bob Conrad, of the defunct "Hawaiian Eye" television series, will star in a new hour-long show titled "The Spy."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2879, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

JUL 2 1964

Music World Mourns Monteux, Dead at 89

The music world joined Wednesday in tribute to Pierre Monteux, who over half a century conducted more than 65 of the world's great orchestras.

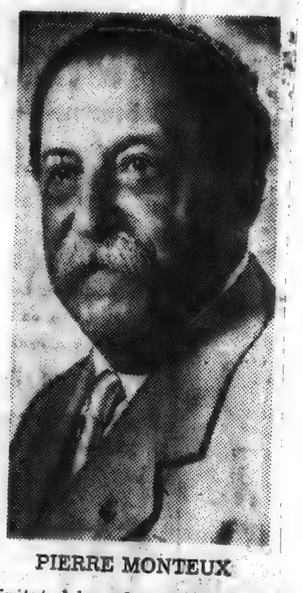
Monteux, 89, died in his sleep early in the day at his home in Hancock, Me. He had lived there since 1952 when he stepped down as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

He was music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919 to 1924, and returned many times as guest conductor in later years.

The personal manager of composer Igor Stravinsky said the composer was "deeply saddened and deeply affected by the death of his old friend."

"Monteux performed most of his major works in premieres—'Le Sacre du Printemps' and 'Petrouchka'," he said.

Erich Leinsdorf, present director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass in memory of Monteux, at the opening Berkshire Festival concert Friday evening at Tanglewood, Lenox.



PIERRE MONTEUX

Leinsdorf Sad

Leinsdorf said: "Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music. In my sadness over his passing, is mixed profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any conductor and that his lucid mind stayed with him all the way.

"Like all who are great, he knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. With him, all composers wherever they were could be certain that their music would be heard undistorted and in its own glory.

"Pierre Monteux was himself made of music and thus an irreplaceable element of music has left us."

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, who had played in the Boston Symphony under Monteux, characterized the maestro as "a real musician's musician."

President of the orchestra's Board of Trustees, Henry B. Cabot, noted how often Monteux was the "happy choice as guest conductor."

Munch Tribute

Monteux returned to lead the orchestra 61 times in Boston, and 31 times in Tanglewood.

In British Columbia, where he is conducting at the Vancouver International Festival, Charles Munch, music director-emeritus of the Boston Symphony, will direct Poulenc's Gloria, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society there on tour.

Munch was largely responsible for the return to Boston of Monteux, who was not invited as guest conductor during the 25-year tenure of Serge Koussevitzky, his successor.

Munch's tribute noted "the beautiful memories (which) united us with the Boston Symphony. I am also sorry for the young students who are now deprived of his advice and his help, and his example must always live with us."

Monteux's fame preceded him to Boston; followed him when he left.

Born in Paris Apr. 4, 1875, a graduate with honors in violin of the Paris Conservatory, he began his conducting career in 1911 in the French capital, and was that year appointed chief conductor of the Ballet Russe.

Several world premieres of enormous importance fell to his lot. Among them were Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" in 1911, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in 1912, Debussy's "Jeux" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913, and "Le Rossignol," also by Stravinsky, in 1914.

Following his release from French military service, he rejoined the Ballet Russe for an American tour as part of the propaganda effort on behalf of the French and Allied cause.

Came to Hub in '18

It was then that Monteux' long association with the musical life of this country began. He conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and for two seasons he led French repertory at the Metropolitan Opera.

On Oct. 25, 1918, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time. Henri Rabaud, the newly appointed music director, was delayed in France, and Monteux filled in for two weeks at the beginning of the season. Rabaud, as it turned out, remained for one season only, and Pierre Monteux was appointed his successor, and for five seasons, from 1919 to 1924, he was in charge of the musical fortunes of the Boston Symphony.

His task was not easy. The war itself, but especially the attendant hysteria, had worked havoc with the orchestra, its personnel and its morale, and the whole series of events had culminated in the catastrophe of the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck on Mar. 26, 1918.

Monteux had a considerable job of rebuilding to do, but by about 1920 it was generally recognized that the Boston Symphony was again the superb virtuoso ensemble that it had once been.

Rebuilt Orchestra

In February, 1920, however, the orchestra was once more imperiled by a strike, precipitated by what were clearly justified demands for salary increases. These brought in their train the question of the orchestra's unionization. At a concert in March, 1920, the concertmaster refused to stand to acknowledge the applause and was dismissed that evening. By the next day, the number of players willing to perform had dwindled to 56.

Of the 47 who left, only five returned; thus Monteux once more had to rebuild the ensemble, yet he was able in 1924 to leave to his successor, Dr. Koussevitzky, a first-rate orchestra in first-rate condition.

Monteux had already become known as a champion of new music.

The list of works he introduced to Boston, not always to the pleasure of the subscribers, includes among many others "La Valse," by Ravel; "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," by Debussy; Stravinsky's "Firebird," "Petrouchka," "Rite of Spring," and "Pulcinella," Scriabin's "Divine Poem," Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," and Respighi's "Fountains of Rome."

Hit Hub Audiences

After Boston, Monteux returned to Europe. Disaffected with America.

In 1936 he returned to American musical life in order to take up the directorship of the newly reorganized San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, a post from which Monteux retired in 1952.

In all, he was guest conductor of 70 orchestras.

He has also been active as a teacher, in early times at the Ecole Monteux in Paris, and more recently at "Le Domain," his Summer home in Hancock, Me.

Was Looking to '65

Two years ago, Monteux accepted the musical directorship of the London Symphony Orchestra, part of whose American tour he had hoped to conduct next season.

He accompanied the Boston Symphony on its European tours in 1952 and 1956, as well as on the transcontinental tour in 1953.

Became U.S. Citizen

Monteux's 80th and 85th birthdays were celebrated by special gala concerts with the Boston Symphony. His last appearances here were on Dec. 20 and 21.

Monteux leaves a considerable legacy of recordings, some of them with the Boston Symphony. He was married in 1927 to Doris Hodgkins, and he is in addition survived by three children from a previous marriage.

Born into a Jewish family, Monteux joined the Union Church (Congregational) in Hancock, and most recently was converted to the Catholic faith. He became a United States citizen in 1942, was interested in the political life of the country and was a convinced and Liberal Democrat.

He was an officer of the Legion of Honor, the Dutch order of Orange-Nassau, and the Romanian order of the Crown. In 1941 he received the degree of Doctor of Music from Mills College.

A Mass of requiem will be celebrated Saturday morning at 9 in St. Joseph's Church in nearby Ellsworth, with burial in Hancock.

A spokesman said the family wants no flowers, and asked that any contributions go to Monteux's favorite charity, the Boy's Opportunity Farm at Gray, Me.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

JUL 2 1964

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR, DIES

Continued From Page 1, Col. 2

in 1943, was one of his dearest projects. Originally he wanted to leave something to posterity as a composer, but when he found this was not possible he decided to transmit to the new generation what he could about conducting. Once he confided, however, that technique was all he could pass on.

"Music," he said, "must be second nature. That's something you don't learn."

It certainly seemed second nature to Mr. Monteux. To some observers, his conducting semmed almost effortless. His beat was small. He never indulged in histrionics. And yet, when in front of an orchestra, his authority was absolute. The music unfolded with the utmost subtlety of nuance. One orchestral section was always transparent to another. And the music always seemed as fresh as on the day of its creation.

Makes His Point

An instance of his way with musicians came the day before his 85th birthday, when he was starting to rehearse the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which was the orchestra's birthday present to him. He was rosy-cheeked and in good humor and he found the men less alert than himself. After they had played a passage sluggishly—by his standards—he stopped and said, "I don't want to follow you, so you have to follow me." And thereafter they did.

He was an unforgettable figure on the podium, for though he was short, he was chunky. His hair remained black to the end, but his walrus-like mustache long ago turned white. He wore glasses only when conducting, and his wise, kindly eyes were so dark a green that unless one looked very closely they appeared brown.

The choice of Beethoven's Ninth as a birthday present was characteristic. He led it as his farewell with the Boston Symphony at the end of his period as its musical director (1919-24) and he always closed his San Francisco Symphony season with it. Besides, he liked to emphasize that he was not exclusively, as some tended to think, a "French" conductor.

"After all," he said, "Debussy didn't exist when I was educated. Neither did Ravel. I was brought up on Haydn, Mozart and a little Brahms. I have learned the French since." He added that Brahms, of all the composers he had been associated with, was the one with whom he felt the most rapport.

But perhaps his best-known association was with Igor Stravinsky. One of the stormiest and most exciting evenings of Mr. Monteux's life — and indeed in the life of contemporary music — took place in 1913 when Mr. Monteux led the Ballet Russe de Diaghilev in Paris in the premiere of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Last year in London when Mr. Monteux led his last orchestra, the London Symphony, in the same work to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the premiere, Mr. Stravinsky was in the audience to join in the tumultuous applause.

Mr. Stravinsky said yesterday:

"I am deeply sad and deeply affected. It is very difficult to sit and watch the passing of many fine friends. Poulenc and Cocteau and Aldous Huxley—and now Monteux.

Introduced Many Works

Despite his association with Mr. Stravinsky, though, Mr. Monteux was not personally very interested in postimpressionist music. But in his years as leader of the San Francisco Symphony (1934-52) he performed a number of new works, including pieces by young Americans. He also insisted that his students conduct contemporary works as part of their obligation to musical culture.

Mr. Monteux was known chiefly as a symphonic conductor, but he also led opera. He was at the Metropolitan Opera from 1917 to 1919, and he returned there for two more seasons from 1954 to 1956, leading notable performances of "Faust," "Manon," "Carmen," "Pelléas et Mélisande," and perhaps most notable of all, Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice."

Mr. Monteux was born in Paris on April 4, 1875. He attended the Paris Conservatoire and studied theory and composition. His instrument was the violin and he won the first violin prize in 1896. But when he began his career as a professional musician he turned to the viola. He played that instrument with the Colonne Orchestra of Paris and also in the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique.

Later he organized his own "Concerts Berlioz" at the Casino de Paris. In 1911 he became the conductor for Diaghilev's Ballet Russe and in 1913 and 1914 he also conducted at the Paris Opera and founded the Société de Concerts Populaires.

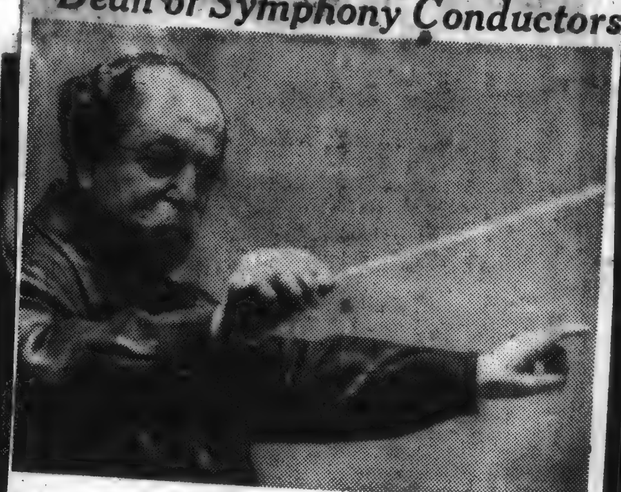
He entered the army at the start of World War I, but he was relieved from his military duties by the French Government so that he could tour the United States in 1916-17 with the Russian Ballet. This led to his first engagement with the Metropolitan Opera.

Built Up Orchestra

From the Metropolitan he went to the Boston Symphony, where he served for five years as musical director. He was replaced by Serge Koussevitzky. After leaving Boston, Mr. Monteux returned to France and in 1929 he founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, which he led until his return to this country. His return was to succeed Issay Dobrowen as head of the rehabilitated San Francisco Symphony. While in San Francisco, Mr. Monteux built up the little-known organization into one of the country's major orchestras.

He often returned to Europe

Pierre Monteux Is Dead at 89; Dean of Symphony Conductors



Adrian Siegel

Pierre Monteux conducting a rehearsal in spring of 1960

By The Associated Press

HANCOCK, Me., July 1 — Pierre Monteux, a commanding figure among orchestra conductors for half a century, died at his home early today. He was 89 years old.

As one of the great musical figures of the century, Pierre Monteux set a record for continuous service to music by remaining an active conductor beyond his 89th birthday.

He went beyond Arturo Toscanini, who also lived to be 89, but who retired as a conductor 10 days after his 87th birthday.

Mr. Monteux, however, had not planned to retire when he canceled his summer engagements recently. He had hoped to save his diminished strength so he could devote it wholly to the student conductors who were to gather at Hancock for his annual summer school.

The school, which he founded

Continued on Page 28, Column 1 st April. Between couple the Monteux vacationed.

Associated Press Cablephoto

echnician

esh Responses In Leading Familiar Symphonies

By ROSS PARMENTER

When Pierre Monteux lifted his hands before an orchestra, peace seemed to descend on the hall—peace and silence. And out of the silence the music seemed to rise as if it were a multi-voiced song, but with the singers being instrumentalists capable of a purity of line, a control and tonal subtety, and a variety of color that human voices could never match.

It was one of Mr. Monteux's great gifts, too, that he could give the illusion that his orchestra was playing, not on a comparatively shallow stage, but in a great open courtyard from which the sounds could come at will from various distances. He could create the sense that the listener was simultaneously hearing some sounds from far off and others from up close.

Technically, all this was amazing. But as he conducted one was never conscious of technique as an end in itself. Rather, the impression one gained was of being admitted into the creative mind of the composer. And not only did one feel that it was the composer, rather than the conductor, that one was hearing, but one felt one was hearing the composer in a double way.

'A Kind of Suggestion'

One heard him both as man of meaning and as an instrumental master. That is, besides hearing the message of his music one also heard the instruments he entrusted it to. Mr. Monteux's understanding of what he performed always seemed so profound that he seemed to reveal why his composers chose the particular instruments they did in order to give the shade of expression they wanted.

Once when he was asked how he managed to give so many instructions to his instrumentalists to get the effects he wanted, he replied, "It's a kind of suggestion. You take the minds of the musicians in your hands, and they will understand you."

Because of his feeling for orchestral color, it was a particular pleasure to hear him lead the music of Debussy and Ravel, who were master colorists. But Mr. Monteux also had extraordinary feeling for structure and balance, which meant that he could conduct the great Germans, like Beethoven and Brahms. This it was always also a pleasure to hear him in the Germanic repertory. Not only were his readings convincing but because they were not quite so heavy-handed as others they also lent fresh illumination to sometimes over-played symphonies.

He was good with Wagner, Richard Strauss and Tchaikovsky, too. With Tchaikovsky he always seemed to drain away the element of self-pity so that one heard the music in all its shapeliness and sweetness, and with a new respect for the skill and imaginativeness of its orchestration.

Mr. Monteux was a most lovable man, who somehow seemed to ride free of the tensions of our age. Thus he was always a refreshing presence and because music never seemed to grow stale for him, it always emerged from his leadership with a sort of dawnlike freshness.

Farewell to Tanglewood

Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione" was the last work this listener heard Mr. Monteux conduct. That was at Tanglewood last summer. As it turned out, it was his farewell to Tanglewood and probably it was no accident that he chose this particular work for what he must have known was one of his closing programs. It is a work about St. Francis and it is a dignified and poignant evocation of the saint's feeling for life and all its creatures.

Mr. Monteux led it as a sort of benediction after an uncommonly long life in music. Beyond the girders of the shed there were birds singing, and there was afternoon sunlight to match the blessings of the sun that Hindemith was praising and that Mr. Monteux, in conducting Hindemith, was also praising.

Mr. Monteux's death reduces still further the ranks of the grand old men of conducting. In fact, the 82-year-old Leopold Stokowski, the 80-year-old Ernest Ansermet and the 79-year-old Otto Klemperer are almost the only giants left. The thinning of the ranks began in 1951 when Serge Koussevitzky died at the age of 76. In 1957 Arturo Toscanini died at the age of 89. Sir Thomas Beecham went in 1961, age 82, Bruno Walter in 1962, at 86, and last fall Fritz Reiner died at the age of 74.

On his 85th birthday Mr. Monteux specifically instructed the Boston Symphony to give him a party. It was, he said, too small an occasion for so large a fuss.

"They can give me a party on my 90th birthday," he said with a benevolent smile.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

JUL 2 1964

Music World Mourns Monteux, Dead at 89

The music world joined Wednesday in tribute to Pierre Monteux, who over half a century conducted more than 65 of the world's great orchestras.

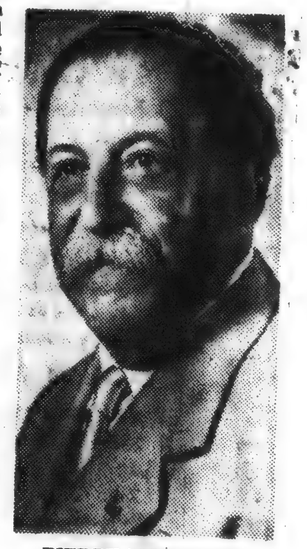
Monteux, 89, died in his sleep early in the day at his home in Hancock, Me. He had lived there since 1952 when he stepped down as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

He was music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919 to 1924, and returned many times as guest conductor in later years.

The personal manager of composer Igor Stravinsky said the composer was "deeply saddened and deeply affected by the death of his old friend."

Monteux performed most of his major works in premieres—'Le Sacre du Printemps' and 'Petrouchka'," he said.

Erich Leinsdorf, present director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass in memory of Monteux, at the opening Berkshire Festival concert Friday evening at Tanglewood, Lenox.



PIERRE MONTEUX

Leinsdorf Sad

Leinsdorf said: "Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music. In my sadness over his passing, is mixed profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any conductor and that his lucid mind stayed with him all the way.

"Like all who are great, he knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. With him, all composers wherever they were could be certain that their music would be heard undistorted and in its own glory.

"Pierre Monteux was himself made of music and thus an irreplaceable element of music has left us."

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, who had played in the Boston Symphony under Monteux, characterized the maestro as "a real musician's musician."

President of the orchestra's Board of Trustees, Henry B. Cabot, noted how often Monteux was the "happy choice as guest conductor."

Munch Tribute

Monteux returned to lead the orchestra 61 times in Boston, and 31 times in Tanglewood.

In British Columbia, where he is conducting at the Vancouver International Festival, Charles Munch, music director-emeritus of the Boston Symphony, will direct Poulenc's Gloria, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society there on tour.

Munch was largely responsible for the return to Boston of Monteux, who was not invited as guest conductor during the 25-year tenure of Serge Koussevitzky, his successor.

Munch's tribute noted "the beautiful memories (which) united us with the Boston Symphony. I am also sorry for the young students who are now deprived of his advice and his help, and his example must always live with us."

Monteux's fame preceded him to Boston; followed him when he left.

Born in Paris Apr. 4, 1875, a graduate with honors in violin of the Paris Conservatory, he began his conducting career in 1911 in the French capital, and was that year appointed chief conductor of the Balet Russe.

Several world premieres of enormous importance fell to his lot. Among them were Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" in 1911, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in 1912, Debussy's "Jeux" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913, and "Le Rossignol," also by Stravinsky, in 1914.

Following his release from French military service, he rejoined the Ballet Russe for an American tour as part of the propaganda effort on behalf of the French and Allied cause.

Came to Hub in '18

It was then that Monteux' long association with the musical life of this country began. He conducted the Civic Orchestra in New York, and for two seasons he led French repertory at the Metropolitan Opera.

On Oct. 25, 1918, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time. Henri Rabaud, the newly appointed music director, was delayed in France, and Monteux filled in for two weeks at the beginning of the season. Rabaud, as it turned out, remained for one season only, and Pierre Monteux was appointed his successor, and for five seasons, from 1919 to 1924, he was in charge of the musical fortunes of the Boston Symphony.

His task was not easy. The war itself, but especially the attendant hysteria, had worked havoc with the orchestra, its personnel and its morale, and the whole series of events had culminated in the catastrophe of the arrest of Dr. Karl Muck on Mar. 26, 1918.

Monteux had a considerable job of rebuilding to do, but by about 1920 it was generally recognized that the Boston Symphony was again the superb virtuoso ensemble that it had once been.

Rebuilt Orchestra

In February, 1920, however, the orchestra was once more imperiled by a strike, precipitated by what were clearly justified demands for salary increases. These brought in their train the question of the orchestra's unionization. At a concert in March, 1920, the concertmaster refused to stand to acknowledge the applause and was dismissed that evening. By the next day, the number of players willing to perform had dwindled to 56.

Of the 47 who left, only five returned; thus Monteux once more, had to rebuild the ensemble, yet he was able in 1924 to leave to his successor, Dr. Koussevitzky, a first-rate orchestra in first-rate condition.

Monteux had already become known as a champion of new music.

The list of works he introduced to Boston, not always to the pleasure of the subscribers, includes among many others "La Valse," by Ravel; "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," by Debussy; Stravinsky's "Firebird," "Petrouchka," "Rite of Spring," and "Pulcinella," Scriabin's "Divine Poem," Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," and Respighi's "Fountains of Rome."

Hit Hub Audiences

After Boston, Monteux returned to Europe. Disaffected with America,

In 1936 he returned to American musical life in order to take up the directorship of the newly reorganized San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, a post from which Monteux retired in 1952.

In all, he was guest conductor of 70 orchestras.

He has also been active as a teacher, in early times at the Ecole Monteux in Paris, and more recently at "Le Domain," his Summer home in Hancock, Me.

Was Looking to '65

Two years ago, Monteux accepted the musical directorship of the London Symphony Orchestra, part of whose American tour he had hoped to conduct next season.

He accompanied the Boston Symphony on its European tours in 1952 and 1956, as well as on the transcontinental tour in 1953.

Became U.S. Citizen

Monteux's 80th and 85th birthdays were celebrated by special gala concerts with the Boston Symphony. His last appearances here were on Dec. 20 and 21.

Monteux leaves a considerable legacy of recordings, some of them with the Boston Symphony. He was married in 1927 to Doris Hodgkins, and he is in addition survived by three children from a previous marriage.

Born into a Jewish family, Monteux joined the Union Church (Congregational) in Hancock, and most recently was converted to the Catholic faith. He became a United States citizen in 1942, was interested in the political life of the country and was a convinced and Liberal Democrat.

He was an officer of the Legion of Honor, the Dutch order of Orange-Nassau, and the Romanian order of the Crown. In 1941 he received the degree of Doctor of Music from Mills College.

A Mass of requiem will be celebrated Saturday morning at 9 in St. Joseph's Church in nearby Ellsworth, with burial in Hancock.

A spokesman said the family wants no flowers, and asked that any contributions go to Monteux's favorite charity, the Boy's Opportunity Farm at Gray, Me.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

JUL 2 1964

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR, DIES

Continued From Page 1, Col. 3

in 1943, was one of his dearest projects. Originally he wanted to leave something to posterity as a composer, but when he found this was not possible he decided to transmit to the new generation what he could about conducting. Once he confided, however, that technique was all he could pass on.

"Music," he said, "must be second nature. That's something you don't learn."

It certainly seemed second nature to Mr. Monteux. To some observers, his conducting semmed almost effortless. His beat was small. He never indulged in histrionics. And yet, when in front of an orchestra, his authority was absolute. The music unfolded with the utmost subtlety of nuance. One orchestral section was always transparent to another. And the music always seemed as fresh as on the day of its creation.

Makes His Point

An instance of his way with musicians came the day before his 85th birthday, when he was starting to rehearse the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which was the orchestra's birthday present to him. He was rosy-cheeked and in good humor and he found the men less alert than himself. After they had played a passage sluggishly—by his standards—he stopped and said, "I don't want to follow you, so you have to follow me." And thereafter they did.

He was an unforgettable figure on the podium, for though he was short, he was chunky. His hair remained black to the end, but his walrus-like mustache long ago turned white. He wore glasses only when conducting, and his wise, kindly eyes were so dark a green that unless one looked very closely they appeared brown.

The choice of Beethoven's Ninth as a birthday present was characteristic. He led it as his farewell with the Boston Symphony at the end of his period as its musical director (1919-24) and he always closed his San Francisco Symphony season with it. Besides, he liked to emphasize that he was not exclusively, as some tended to think, a "French" conductor.

"After all," he said, "Debussy didn't exist when I was educated. Neither did Ravel. I was brought up on Haydn, Mozart and a little Brahms. I have learned the French since." He added that Brahms, of all the composers he had been associated with, was the one with whom he felt the most rapport.

But perhaps his best-known association was with Igor Stravinsky. One of the stormiest and most exciting evenings of Mr. Monteux's life — and indeed in the life of contemporary music — took place in 1913 when Mr. Monteux led the Ballet Russe de Diaghilev in Paris in the premiere of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Last year in London when Mr. Monteux led his last orchestra, the London Symphony, in the same work to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the premiere, Mr. Stravinsky was in the audience to join in the tumultuous applause.

Mr. Stravinsky said yesterday:

"I am deeply sad and deeply affected. It is very difficult to sit and watch the passing of many fine friends. Poulenc and Cocteau and Aldous Huxley—and now Monteux.

Introduced Many Works

Despite his association with Mr. Stravinsky, though, Mr. Monteux was not personally very interested in postimpressionist music. But in his years as leader of the San Francisco Symphony (1934-52) he performed a number of new works, including pieces by young Americans. He also insisted that his students conduct contemporary works as part of their obligation to musical culture.

Mr. Monteux was known chiefly as a symphonic conductor, but he also led opera. He was at the Metropolitan Opera from 1917 to 1919, and he returned there for two more seasons from 1954 to 1956, leading notable performances of "Faust," "Manon," "Carmen," "Pelléas et Mélisande," and perhaps most notable of all, Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice."

Mr. Monteux was born in Paris on April 4, 1875. He attended the Paris Conservatoire and studied theory and composition. His instrument was the violin and he won the first violin prize in 1896. But when he began his career as a professional musician he turned to the viola. He played that instrument with the Colonne Orchestra of Paris and also in the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique.

Later he organized his own "Concerts Berlioz" at the Casino de Paris. In 1911 he became the conductor for Diaghilev's Ballet Russe and in 1913 and 1914 he also conducted at the Paris Opera and founded the Société de Concerts Populaires.

He entered the army at the start of World War I, but he was relieved from his military duties by the French Government so that he could tour the United States in 1916-17 with the Russian Ballet. This led to his first engagement with the Metropolitan Opera.

Built Up Orchestra

From the Metropolitan he went to the Boston Symphony, where he served for five years as musical director. He was replaced by Serge Koussevitzky. After leaving Boston, Mr. Monteux returned to France and in 1929 he founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, which he led until his return to this country. His return was to succeed Issay Dobrowen as head of the rehabilitated San Francisco Symphony. While in San Francisco, Mr. Monteux built up the little-known organization into one of the country's major orchestras.

He often returned to Europe for guest engagements, but thereafter his association was chiefly with the American scene. He married an American, Doris Hodgkins, and he himself became an American citizen in 1942. They made their permanent home on Mrs. Monteux's family estate at Hancock.

Mr. Monteux was also a great fire buff. Only last year the London Fire Brigade gave him a helmet and enrolled him as an honorary member. Earlier, this interest helped endear him to his fellow citizens of Hancock. Not only did he buy the town its fire engine but he also donated a station to house it.

Mrs. Monteux, a cheerful, friendly, bustling woman, always accompanied her husband and took care of him, seeing that he ate nourishing food and took the proper rest. She loved to sit in on interviews and often answered questions on her husband's behalf.

Fifi, a poodle, was also often part of the family traveling entourage. Two years ago Mrs. Monteux wrote an amusing book about their travels called "Everyone Is Someone." The author was listed as Fifi Monteux. It was told through her eyes.

Traveled in East

Once he left San Francisco, Mr. Monteux was free to accept many more guest engagements in the East. He became a regular guest at Lewisohn Stadium. Charles Munch invited him back to Boston, and he frequently led the Boston Symphony both in its home city and at its summer home at Tanglewood.

He also led the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic. Leonard Bernstein, the musical director of the Philharmonic, paid this tribute yesterday to Mr. Monteux:

"The whole world is poorer for the passing of a great man. Pierre Monteux was a monument to music and to everything positive in the art. He lived out his long and luminous musical life without rancor, fuss, competitiveness or pretentiousness.

"His humility was almost a passion. Perhaps most passionately he taught and guided the young artists who sought him out, and through them he will survive the passing of generations."

Just as Mr. Monteux was becoming a fixture as a touring guest conductor, he surprised the music world in 1960 by becoming the permanent conductor of another orchestra, the London Symphony. This limited his American appearances.

Fell Into Orchestra Pit

He had been scheduled to take the orchestra to Japan this fall and to lead it in a gala program in New York during its United States tour next season. But all these plans had to be canceled when Mr. Monteux over-taxed himself in the spring. Part of his trouble was a nasty fall on April 1 at the Santa Cecilia Academy in Rome, when he slipped from the podium and fell into the pit.

He pulled himself together, though, and insisted on finishing the concert. He also continued the rest of his European engagements, including concerts in Amsterdam, Israel and London. While in London there was a power failure that knocked out the elevators in his hotel. He walked up eight flights of stairs to his room. When Mrs. Monteux brought him back to this country last month, he was exhausted.

The conducting students were quietly told that he would not be able to hold his classes this summer. Then it was announced that he would give up his summer engagements at Tanglewood, Mass., and at Ravinia in Chicago. When he went into a coma, it was also announced that he would cancel his plans for next season. They included appearances with the Philadelphia, Cleveland, Pittsburgh and New Orleans orchestras.

Mr. Monteux married three times. In addition to his widow, he is survived by two children by his second wife, Mrs. Germaine Monteux, a son, Claude Monteux, a well-known flutist and conductor of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic; a daughter, Mrs. Thomas Lanese, and 12 grandchildren.

A mass of requiem will be offered Saturday at 9 A.M. at St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church in Ellsworth, Me., near Hancock. Burial will be in Hancock.

Pierre Monteux and his wife as they toasted his 89th birthday last April. Between couple are Mr. and Mrs. Bottari, owners of hotel in Assisi, Italy, where the Monteux vacationed.

Associated Press Cablephoto

Talented Technician

Monteux Evoked Fresh Responses In Leading Familiar Symphonies

By ROSS PARMENTER

When Pierre Monteux lifted his hands before an orchestra, peace seemed to descend on the hall—peace and silence. And out of the silence the music seemed to rise as if it were a multi-voiced song, but with the singers being instrumentalists capable of a purity of line, a control and tonal subtety, and a variety of color that human voices could never match.

"It was one of Mr. Monteux's great gifts, too, that he could give the illusion that his orchestra was playing, not on a comparatively shallow stage, but in a great open courtyard from which the sounds could come at will from various distances. He could create the sense that the listener was simultaneously hearing some sounds from far off and others from up close.

Technically, all this was amazing. But as he conducted one was never conscious of technique as an end in itself. Rather, the impression one gained was of being admitted into the creative mind of the composer. And not only did one feel that it was the composer, rather than the conductor, that one was hearing, but one felt one was hearing the composer in a double way.

'A Kind of Suggestion'

One heard him both as man of meaning and as an instrumental master. That is, besides hearing the message of his music one also heard the instruments he entrusted it to. Mr. Monteux's understanding of what he performed always seemed so profound that he seemed to reveal why his composers chose the particular instruments they did in order to give the shade of expression they wanted.

Once when he was asked how he managed to give so many instructions to his instrumentalists to get the effects he wanted, he replied, "It's a kind of suggestion. You take the minds of the musicians in your hands, and they will understand you."

Because of his feeling for orchestral color, it was a particular pleasure to hear him lead the music of Debussy and Ravel, who were master colorists. But Mr. Monteux also had extraordinary feeling for structure and balance, which meant that he could conduct the great Germans, like Beethoven and Brahms. This it was always also a pleasure to hear him in the German repertory. Not only were his readings convincing but because they were not quite so heavy-handed as others they also lent fresh illumination to sometimes over-played symphonies.

He was good with Wagner, Richard Strauss and Tchaikovsky, too. With Tchaikovsky he always seemed to drain away the element of self-pity so that one heard the music in all its shapeliness and sweetness, and with a new respect for the skill and imaginativeness of its orchestration.

Mr. Monteux was a most lovable man, who somehow seemed to ride free of the tensions of our age. Thus he was always a refreshing presence and because music never seemed to grow stale for him, it always emerged from his leadership with a sort of dawnlike freshness.

Farewell to Tanglewood

Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione" was the last work this listener heard Mr. Monteux conduct. That was at Tanglewood last summer. As it turned out, it was his farewell to Tanglewood and probably it was no accident that he chose this particular work for what he must have known was one of his closing programs. It is a work about St. Francis and it is a dignified and poignant evocation of the saint's feeling for life and all its creatures.

Mr. Monteux led it as a sort of benediction after an uncommonly long life in music. Beyond the girders of the shed there were birds singing, and there was afternoon sunlight to match the blessings of the sun that Hindemith was praising and that Mr. Monteux, in conducting Hindemith, was also praising.

Mr. Monteux's death reduces still further the ranks of the grand old men of conducting. In fact, the 82-year-old Leopold Stokowski, the 80-year-old Ernest Ansermet and the 79-year-old Otto Klemperer are almost the only giants left. The thinning of the ranks began in 1951 when Serge Koussevitzky died at the age of 76. In 1957 Arturo Toscanini died at the age of 89. Sir Thomas Beecham went in 1961, age 82, Bruno Walter in 1962, at 86, and last fall Fritz Reiner died at the age of 74.

On his 85th birthday Mr. Monteux specifically forbade the Boston Symphony to give him a party. It was, he said, too small an occasion for so large a fuss.

"They can give me a party on my 90th birthday," he said with a benevolent smile.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

SEP 1964

1875—PIERRE MONTEUX—1964

With the death of Pierre Monteux the music world on July 1 lost one of its important links with the past as well as an interpretive musician of the first magnitude. Born in 1875 he made his conducting debut at the age of 12, and the following 77 years of his career brought him in contact with all the great musicians of this century as interpreter, collaborator and friend.

Monteux entered the Paris Conservatoire when he was nine and received premiere prix du violon in 1896. It was as first violist, however, that he participated in the premiere of "Pelléas et Mélisande" in 1902. Shortly thereafter he organized the Concerts Berlioz et concerts d'avant garde conducting the majority of the programs himself. International fame arrived with his appointment as principal conductor of Sergei Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. It was in this capacity that Monteux conducted the now legendary first performance of Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps." Other 20th century musical masterpieces that were heard initially under Monteux's baton were Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," Debussy's "Jeux," and Stravinsky's "Le rossignol" and "Petrushka."

At the outbreak of World War I Monteux served with the French army, but when the Ballet Russe made its American tour in 1916, he was allowed to resume his post with the troupe. This began his long association with the musical life of our country and his contributions to our culture were of incalculable importance both in opera and concert. His first appearance with the Metropolitan Opera was on November 17, 1917, the opera being "Faust" with Farrar, Martinelli and Rothier. The following season Monteux was given the opening night performance of "Samson et Dalila" with a cast that included Homer and Caruso. During the seasons of 1917-1919 he conducted "Carmen," Rabaud's "Marouf," "Thais," "Le coq d'or," Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," Leroux's "La reine fiamette," "La Traviata" and "Mireille." The present generation of opera goers will remember Monteux's return to the company in the middle 50's when he gave Met audiences a rare taste of the true French operatic style in the memorable performances of "Pelléas et Mélisande," "Carmen," "Les contes d'Hoffmann," "Faust" and "Orfeo." In 1919 Monteux became permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony where he remained until 1924.

He then left America for 10 years to assume a joint conducting post with Willem Mengelberg at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam. In 1936 he returned to America to take charge of the San Francisco Symphony, a tenure which lasted until 1952. Monteux's arrival in San Francisco could not have been more opportune, for he both solved that city's orchestral crisis and proceeded to mold the orchestra into one of the world's great ensembles. The grateful city awarded him the honorary title of "Ambassador Extraordinary for the City of San Francisco." It was a reciprocal relationship for here Monteux had the opportunity to completely master the orchestral repertoire, most of which he could now conduct from memory.

Monteux became an American citizen in 1942, and when he left California, he remained in America as a guest conductor, appearing with all our major orchestras. He made his home in Hancock, Maine, where every summer he accepted a few select pupils who were instructed in the famous "Ecole Monteux" style of conducting, his deceptively simple credo being: "To communicate with the orchestra and to bring out the conception of the composer."

In 1961 at the age of 86 Monteux became principal conductor of the London Symphony. "The contract was for 25 years but I insisted on an option for another 25," he remarked with characteristic impishness. One of the most moving performances with that orchestra was of "Le sacre" in May of 1963, exactly 50 years after the premiere.

To an observer from this generation Monteux's dismissal of most new music after the 1930's presents something of a disconcerting anomaly. It is difficult to reconcile the man who was in the forefront of the avant-garde, the first to master the intricate and revolutionary scores of Stravinsky, Ravel and Debussy with the man who recently stated: "The music that is being written now will not endure." For those who are not tempted to agree with Monteux one may find the answer in the nature of the music with which he dealt in those exciting years. Monteux's sympathies lay exclusively in the French impressionist and neo-classic school, which at the time was deadly opposed to the German expressionism of Schoenberg and his disciples. Monteux was unwilling to accept the gradual breakdown and fusion of the two styles, a fusion made official by Stravinsky's adoption of serial techniques 10 years ago.

What contemporary music lost, the classics won, for Monteux defied the theory that Latin musicians had little comprehension of the German symphonic style. His interpretations of Brahms and Beethoven showed the same authority and understanding that illuminated his French repertoire. His miniscule baton technique was famous and he could communicate a point made earlier in rehearsal by a quick movement of his little finger. Watching him conduct "Le sacre" only proved that behind the brilliant performance lay the shrewd lucid mind of an extraordinary and practical musician.

Monteux's sunny personality and human warmth endeared him to musicians and audiences alike. Anecdotes about the man are plentiful. In Monteux's case each one seems to accentuate his innate kindliness and puckish sense of humor. A statement made by Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, provides a moving epitaph for his famous predecessor: "Pierre Monteux himself was made of music and thus an irreplaceable element of music has left us."

P. D.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

AUG 22 1964

The Monteux Leg

Boston

PIERRE MONTEUX would have celebrated his ninetieth anniversary next April, probably by conducting a gala concert of his favorite music. Everyone in whose life music plays a part must have felt his passing as a personal loss, but few could be so mistaken as to lament that the man so blessed with vigor and fulfilment as well as years failed to "slow down" because of what the editorialists would call "selfless devotion to his art." Though his devotion was indeed intense, there was, happily, nothing of sacrifice in Monteux's attachment to music. The genial Maître simply enjoyed making music, as he relished a good meal, and it kept him incredibly young for nearly ninety years.

Just two years ago, Mme. Monteux wrote to the Westminster people of her husband's wish to record Carmen, a particular favorite of his. The project never got beyond an initial discussion, however, and only Manon and Gluck's Orfeo remain in the Schwann Catalog as mementoes of the Maître's eminence in the opera house. However, another orchestra and another record label will be added to the Monteux discography when Tono (which, unfortunately, has no U.S. outlet) releases nearly a dozen discs recorded in Hamburg last winter with the NDR Orchestra. The new recordings involved include Wagner (Dutchman Overture, Tannhäuser Overture and Venusberg Music, Tristan Prelude and Liebestod), Beethoven (Symphonies 2 and 4, dances from Prometheus), Tchaikovsky (Symphony 5, Romeo and Juliet), an early Mozart symphony, and the dances from Prince Igor, among other material. Details of these records were not available for the listing offered here, but will be found in the exhaustive discography appended to The Monteux Story, by Doris Gerald Monteux, to be published by Farrar, Strauss, in October.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

OCT 1964

Pierre Monteux (1875-1964)

In Memoriam

When on July 1 Pierre Monteux passed away at his home in Hancock, Maine, after an illness of several months, not only did the musical world suffer a great loss but all the civilized world felt the shock. His was a rare personality, yet one so human, so natural and sane, that it took the public a long time to appreciate what they had in their midst. Knowing the bounds of his profession, Monteux could step outside them with perfect ease. The rotund little man, with black curly hair brushed straight back and enormous walrus mustaches, could crack jokes and appreciate jokes others made about him. His wife would say, "It amuses Pierre to see younger conductors eye him appraisingly, saying to themselves, 'When is he going to give up?'" But he would insist, "I shall conduct till I'm ninety. I shall die holding a baton."

Pierre Monteux was almost literally correct when he made this prophecy. He last conducted in Rome, on April 1, 1964, just three days before his eighty-ninth birthday. There a dizzy spell, brought on by the over-heated hall, caused him to fall six feet from the podium into the orchestra pit.

Monteux's close identification with America began in 1916 when he toured this country, conducting the Ballet Russe. In America he was first a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, and then, in 1919, became conductor of the Boston Symphony.

In Boston he established his reputation as a builder of orchestras. He found the orchestra disorganized and about half size. He left it a distinguished body of some eighty fine musicians. In 1924, Koussevitzky took over the Boston Symphony and, the same fall, Monteux began an annual guest conducting series with the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam. In 1929, along with his Concertgebouw work, Monteux became conductor of the Paris Symphony, and it was then he began teaching orchestra conducting. Until his death he directed during the summer a school of conductors at Hancock, Maine.

In the fall of 1935 Monteux was called to San Francisco to rebuild the orchestra there. The orchestra was in a bad way and would probably have succumbed had not Monteux stirred the citizens' affections as well as their pride. "Our Pierre" became to them the symbol for musical achievement in that city. When in 1952 he resigned his conductorship of the orchestra, five gala farewell parties were held in his honor.

After leaving the San Francisco area, Monteux became the dean of conductors for the whole United States as well as its emissary abroad. But, though he was the guest conductor par excellence, he was also very much the small-town American. One summer day in Hancock, Maine, the whole village turned out to paint and dedicate a new flagpole erected in front of his house. Each resident gave one stroke of the paint brush so that all could say they had a part in the gift. In a speech on that day, when it was mentioned he might like to return to his native land, France, he emphatically vetoed the idea. He was going to stay right in Hancock. This was his home, he said. This was where he wanted to live and to die, among his friends.

This is where he did die, and this is where he is buried, in his home town, Hancock, Maine.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

SEP 1964

1875—PIERRE MONTEUX—1964

With the death of Pierre Monteux the music world on July 1 lost one of its important links with the past as well as an interpretive musician of the first magnitude. Born in 1875 he made his conducting debut at the age of 12, and the following 77 years of his career brought him in contact with all the great musicians of this century as interpreter, collaborator and friend.

Monteux entered the Paris Conservatoire when he was nine and received premiere prix du violon in 1896. It was as first violist, however, that he participated in the premiere of "Pelléas et Mélisande" in 1902. Shortly thereafter he organized the Concerts Berlioz et concerts d'avant garde conducting the majority of the programs himself. International fame arrived with his appointment as principal conductor of Sergei Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. It was in this capacity that Monteux conducted the now legendary first performance of Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps." Other 20th century musical masterpieces that were heard initially under Monteux's baton were Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," Debussy's "Jeux," and Stravinsky's "Le rossignol" and "Petrushka."

At the outbreak of World War I Monteux served with the French army, but when the Ballet Russe made its American tour in 1916, he was allowed to resume his post with the troupe. This began his long association with the musical life of our country and his contributions to our culture were of incalculable importance both in opera and concert. His first appearance with the Metropolitan Opera was on November 17, 1917, the opera being "Faust" with Farrar, Martinelli and Rothier. The following season Monteux was given the opening night performance of "Samson et Dalila" with a cast that included Homer and Caruso. During the seasons of 1917-1919 he conducted "Carmen," Rabaud's "Marouf," "Thais," "Le coq d'or," Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," Leroux's "La reine fiamette," "La Traviata" and "Mireille." The present generation of opera goers will remember Monteux's return to the company in the middle 50's when he gave Met audiences a rare taste of the true French operatic style in the memorable performances of "Pelléas et Mélisande," "Carmen," "Les contes d'Hoffmann," "Faust" and "Orfeo." In 1919 Monteux became permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony where he remained until 1924.

He then left America for 10 years to assume a joint conducting post with Willem Mengelberg at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam. In 1936 he returned to America to take charge of the San Francisco Symphony, a tenure which lasted until 1952. Monteux's arrival in San Francisco could not have been more opportune, for he both solved that city's orchestral crisis and proceeded to mold the orchestra into one of the world's great ensembles. The grateful city awarded him the honorary title of "Ambassador Extraordinary for the City of San Francisco." It was a reciprocal relationship for here Monteux had the opportunity to completely master the orchestral repertoire, most of which he could now conduct from memory.

Monteux became an American citizen in 1942, and when he left California, he remained in America as a guest conductory, appearing with all our major orchestras. He made his home in Hancock, Maine, where every summer he accepted a few select pupils who were instructed in the famous "Ecole Monteux" style of conducting, his deceptively simple credo being: "To communicate with the orchestra and to bring out the conception of the composer."

In 1961 at the age of 86 Monteux became principal conductor of the London Symphony. The contract was for 25 years but I understand an option for another 25," he remarked with characteristic impishness. One of the most moving performances with that orchestra was of "Le sacre" in May of 1963, exactly 55 years after the premiere.

To an observer from this generation Monteux's dismissal of most new music after the 1930's presents something of a disconcerting anomaly. It is difficult to reconcile the man who was in the forefront of the avant-garde, the first to master the strictest and revolutionary scores of Stravinsky, Ravel and Debussy with the man who recently stated: "The music that is being written now will not endure." For those who are not tempted to agree with Monteux outright, the answer is in the nature of the music with which he dealt in those exciting years. Monteux's sympathies lay exclusively in the French impressionist and neo-classic school, which at the time was deadly opposed to the German expressionism of Schoenberg and his disciples. Monteux was unwilling to accept the gradual breakdown and fusion of the two styles, a fusion made official by Stravinsky's adoption of serial techniques 10 years ago.

What contemporary music lost, the classics won, for Monteux defied the theory that Latin musicians had little comprehension of the German symphonic style. His interpretations of Brahms and Beethoven showed the same authority and understanding that illuminated his French repertoire. His miniscule baton technique was famous and he could communicate a point made earlier in rehearsal by a quick movement of his little finger. Watching him conduct "Le sacre" only proved that behind the brilliant performance lay the shrewd lucid mind of an extraordinary and practical musician.

Monteux's sunny personality and human warmth endeared him to musicians and audiences alike. Anecdotes about the man are plentiful. In Monteux's case each one seems to accentuate his innate kindliness and puckish sense of humor. A statement made by Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, provides a moving epitaph for his famous predecessor: "Pierre Monteux himself was made of music and thus an irreplaceable element of music has left us."

P. D.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

AUG 22 1964

The Monteux Legacy

Boston Symphony

PIERRE MONTEUX would have celebrated his ninetieth anniversary next April, probably by conducting a gala concert of his favorite music. Everyone in whose life music plays a part must have felt his passing as a personal loss, but few could be so mistaken as to lament that the man so blessed with vigor and fulfilment as well as years failed to "slow down" because of what the editorialists would call "selfless devotion to his art." Though his devotion was indeed intense, there was, happily, nothing of sacrifice in Monteux's attachment to music. The genial Maitre simply enjoyed making music, as he relished a good meal, and it kept him incredibly young for nearly ninety years.

Just two years ago, Mme. Monteux wrote to the Westminster people of her husband's wish to record Carmen, a particular favorite of his. The project never got beyond an initial discussion, however, and only Manon and Gluck's Orfeo remain in the Schwann Catalog as mementoes of the Maître's eminence in the opera house. However, another orchestra and another record label will be added to the Monteux discography when Tono (which, unfortunately, has no U.S. outlet) releases nearly a dozen discs recorded in Hamburg last winter with the NDR Orchestra. The new recordings involved include Wagner (Dutchman Overture, Tannhäuser Overture and Venusberg Music, Tristan Prelude and Liebestod), Beethoven (Symphonies 2 and 4, dances from Prometheus), Tchaikovsky (Symphony 5, Romeo and Juliet), an early Mozart symphony, and the dances from Prince Igor, among other material. Details of these records were not available for the listing offered here, but will be found in the exhaustive discography appended to The Monteux Story, by Doris Gerald Monteux, to be published by Farrar, Strauss, in October.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

OCT 1964

Pierre Monteux (1875-1964)

In Memoriam

When on July 1 Pierre Monteux passed away at his home in Hancock, Maine, after an illness of several months, not only did the musical world suffer a great loss but all the civilized world felt the shock. His was a rare personality, yet one so human, so natural and sane, that it took the public a long time to appreciate what they had in their midst. Knowing the bounds of his profession, Monteux could step outside them with perfect ease. The rotund little man, with black curly hair brushed straight back and enormous walrus mustaches, could crack jokes and appreciate jokes others made about him. His wife would say, "It amuses Pierre to see younger conductors eye him appraisingly, saying to themselves, 'When is he going to give up?'" But he would insist, "I shall conduct till I'm ninety. I shall die holding a baton."

Pierre Monteux was almost literally correct when he made this prophecy. He last conducted in Rome, on April 1, 1964, just three days before his eighty-ninth birthday. There a dizzy spell, brought on by the over-heated hall, caused him to fall six feet from the podium into the orchestra pit.

Monteux's close identification with America began in 1916 when he toured this country, conducting the Ballet Russe. In America he was first a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, and then, in 1919, became conductor of the Boston Symphony.

In Boston he established his reputation as a builder of orchestras. He found the orchestra disorganized and about half size. He left it a distinguished body of some eighty fine musicians. In 1924, Koussevitzky took over the Boston Symphony and the same fall, Monteux began an annual guest conducting series with the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam. In 1929, along with his Concertgebouw work, Monteux became conductor of the Paris Symphony, and it was then he began teaching orchestra conducting. Until his death he directed during the summer a school of conductors at Hancock, Maine.

In the fall of 1935 Monteux was called to San Francisco to rebuild the orchestra there. The orchestra was in a bad way and would probably have succumbed had not Monteux stirred the citizens' affections as well as their pride. "Our Pierre" became to them the symbol for musical achievement in that city. When in 1952 he resigned his conductorship of the orchestra, five gala farewell parties were held in his honor.

After leaving the San Francisco area, Monteux became the dean of conductors for the whole United States as well as its emissary abroad. But, though he was the guest conductor par excellence, he was also very much the small-town American. One summer day in Hancock, Maine, the whole village turned out to paint and dedicate a new flagpole erected in front of his house. Each resident gave one stroke of the paint brush so that all could say they had a part in the gift. In a speech on that day, when it was mentioned he might like to return to his native land, France, he emphatically vetoed the idea. He was going to stay right in Hancock. This was his home, he said. This was where he wanted to live and to die, among his friends.

This is where he did die, and this is where he is buried, in his home town, Hancock, Maine.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Thursday, July 2, 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Reformer & Vermont Phoenix (e)
BRATTLEBORO, Vt.
Circ. 7,503
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 98,547
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 28,844
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bulletin (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 144,784
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,868
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times-Argus (e)
BARRE, Vermont
Circ. 11,577
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 54,986
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605
JUL 5 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 161,453
1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 103,073
JUL 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Foster's Democrat (e)
DOVER, N. H.
Circ. 9,947
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 1 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Call
Eve. Circ. 27,550
JUL 1 1964

Pierre Monteux, 89, Dies; Dean Of World Conductors

HANCOCK, Maine (AP) — French - born Pierre Monteux, a commanding figure among orchestra conductors for half a century, died early today at his home after a long illness. He was 89.

Monteux's sister, Mrs. David Michlin, said he had been confined to his bed for several months and died in his sleep.

Monteux's first conductorship was of the Ballet Russe in France in 1910. The company toured the United States in 1916 and Monteux stayed on in this country to become conductor of the French repertory of the Metropolitan Opera for three years.

He then took over as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years and was concertgebouw of Amsterdam's symphony for nine years.

In 1934, he returned to the United States and picked up the pieces of the faltering San Francisco Symphony, directing it for 17 years.

Monteux and his wife, Doris Hodgkins Monteux, lived on an estate near her birthplace here for many summers. They moved here permanently in 1952, when Monteux stepped down at San Francisco.

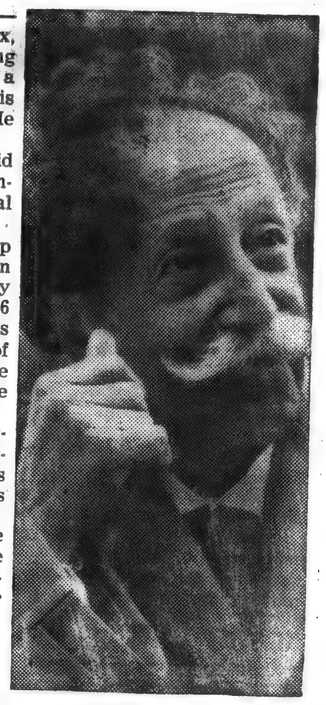
Even in retirement he had made many guest conducting appearances.

Monteux once said he liked Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann and Wagner — "in that order."

"I don't like abstract music," he said. "Or abstract painting either. Modern is all right, but not abstract."

The roly-poly conductor — who stood 5-feet-5 and weighed 180 pounds — was noted for his ability to get the most from an orchestra with a minimum of gesticulations.

"He could create a storm in an orchestra with a flick of his wrist," one of his musicians once said of him.



PIERRE MONTEUX

Monteux conducted the first performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913 when it was considered revolutionary in the music world. The performance touched off riots in Paris but Monteux insisted on introduce it.

He also introduced Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in Paris in 1912.

Monteux began his musical career in 1894 as a viola player in a Paris string quarter. He served as a "poilu," or private, in the French Army during World War I and fought in the battles of Verdun, Rheims, Soissons and the Argonne.

Monteux came to the United States with the Ballet Russe after being discharged to make the trip — which was considered a propaganda tour to raise U. S. sympathy with the Allies.

Until the time of his illness last winter, Monteux was considered the dean of the world's active conductors.

He led more than 65 symphony orchestras in both Europe and the United States.

Erich Leinsdorf, present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Monteux "knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. Any composer could be sure that his music would be heard undisturbed and in its own glory."

"Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music," Leinsdorf said.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Union Leader
MANCHESTER, N. H.
Comb. Circ. 52,021
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Valley News (e)
LEBANON, N. H.
Circ. 6,911
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,889
JUL 1 1964

said.

Pierre Monteux, Noted Conductor, Succumbs at 89

HANCOCK, MAINE (UPI)— Pierre Monteux, world-famed symphony conductor, died today in his sleep at his home. He was 89 last April 4.

Born in Paris, Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. He was a violinist before becoming a conductor and served as a private in the French army during World War 1.

Monteux formerly was regular conductor of symphony orchestras in Boston and San Francisco in the United States and Amsterdam, Berlin, London, Paris and Vienna in Europe. He also had been conductor of the Ballet Russe, Metropolitan Opera and National Broadcasting Co. symphony orchestras.

Last month Monteux cancelled two scheduled appearances at the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival to rest for fall and winter season engagements.

Two days before his 89th birthday, Monteux collapsed while conducting a concert at the St. Cecilia Academy in Rome. After a 20-minute rest he continued the program. The collapse was attributed to the heated auditorium. Previously he had been stricken with a heart attack while on a Scandinavian tour.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
N. H. Sunday News
MANCHESTER, N. H.
Circ. 44,203
NOV 17 1963

'Intensely Sad' By Reiner Death

BOSTON, Nov. 16 — UPI — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, expressed grief today at the death in New York of conductor Fritz Reiner.

"One of the great figures in music has passed away to my intense sadness," Leinsdorf said.

He recalled they formerly were neighbors when Leinsdorf lived in Larchmont, N. Y., and Reiner at Bridgeport, Conn.

Leinsdorf said he had been associated with Reiner for many years, having met him first in Vienna when asked to be piano accompanist for singers Reiner was auditioning for concerts in Philadelphia.

Leinsdorf sad he and Reiner served for a time as co-conductors of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 19 1964

Boaz Piller, Symphony Cellist, 77

GENOA, Italy — Boaz Piller, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died of a lung ailment last Tuesday in the hospital at the nearby Riviera resort of Sestri Levante. He was 77.

His body was brought to Genoa and will be flown to the United States for burial.

The Dutch - born U. S. citizen spent long vacations in Bordighera, on the Italian Riviera, over the past 12 years.

He and his wife, Therese, were on a brief visit to Sestri Levante when he suddenly became ill. Doctors said a lung edema (swelling) was the cause of death.

Piller became a U. S. citizen in 1939.

He first came to the United States in 1910 in the orchestra of a Paris opera company which began its tour in New Orleans.

After returning to his native Holland for a few months he returned and joined the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1916, playing third bassoon.

One of the concerts in which he played was heard by only a few people, and yet it was fabulous in its way. That was when he played cello in a quartet whose first violin was Albert Einstein.

For many years Piller played at the Women's Reformatory in Sherborn and the State prison in Charlestown to give the people in prison a glimpse of a better life through music.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen (e)
LACONIA, N. H.
Circ. 5,933
MAR 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
MAR 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 28,962
MAR 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710
MAR 19 1964

Boston Symphony First Cellist Dead

BOSTON (AP) — Boaz Piller, 77, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died on vacation in Sestri Levante, Italy.

Piller, Dutch - born U.S. citizen, was stricken Tuesday while visiting Sestri Levante with his wife. The body will be flown to the United States for burial.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
DEC 31 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
DEC 31 1963

Symphony to Do Hindemith Opus In His Memory

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play composer Paul Hindemith's "Trauer Musik" (Mourning Music) at its concert tonight in honor of the famous musician who died Saturday in Frankfurt, Germany.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf added the piece to the program. It was composed in 1936 at the time of the death of King George V.

The Boston group has supported Hindemith in the past, sometimes playing his compositions for the first time anywhere. For many years his style was considered radical, although he is now recognized as a great master.

Hindemith taught at Yale University, Harvard University, and for several years at the orchestra's Summer training school, the Berkshire Music Center.

Boston Globe
3/19/64
42

Obituaries
Boaz Piller, Ex-Symphony Musician, 77

Funeral arrangements were being made Wednesday in Bordighera, Italy, for Boaz Piller, 77, retired contra-bassoonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died late Tuesday of a lung ailment in a hospital in Sestri Levante near Genoa.

The body will be brought to the United States for burial.

The Dutch-born musician, a U.S. citizen, spent long vacations in Bordighera, on the Italian Riviera, during the past 12 years.

He and his wife, Therese, were on a brief visit to Sestri Levante when he became ill.

Educated in The Hague, the Netherlands, he first played professionally with the Royal Orchestra in The Hague, coming shortly thereafter to the United States.

He joined the Boston Symphony in 1916 and remained with the group until the Summer of 1952, when he retired. Shortly after retirement he left Boston for Hyere, France, where he joined his wife for a vacation.

Mr. Piller, who spoke and wrote French, German, Dutch and English, and spoke Italian and Spanish, became a United States citizen in 1933.

Known as the unofficial greeter of the Boston Symphony for more than 30 years, Mr. Piller would turn up at the Back Bay train station or the ship docks in New York to welcome visiting composers, players or singers whose English and experience in this country were either limited or non-existent.

Although the bassoon was his prime instrument, Mr. Piller also was proficient on the cello.

One of the concerts in which he participated was heard by only a few persons. That was when he played cello in a quartet whose first violin was famed mathematician Albert Einstein, who wanted to play quartets and other chamber music during a visit to Harvard.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 5 1964

Composer Remembered By Boston Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

MILLER

Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony paid tribute to one of the world's finest contemporary composers and an old friend of the orchestra.

Paul Hindemith was dead at 68. His Trauermusik for solo viola and strings recalled a happier occasion for many. The Summer of 1940 the composer had been soloist in his own Viola Concerto at Tanglewood.

Hindemith was a short stocky man and balding above his bright blue eyes; his ear-to-ear grin was infectious as he paraded to the soloist's spot. The critics were not entirely persuaded of his manner of playing, one characterizing the viola tone as "rough and fibrous, big but not sensuous, meat in it but also rasp." Few could deny, however, that the Concerto was played with complete authority by an exceptionally practiced and expert performer.

Hindemith and Aaron Copland had that Summer inaugurated the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center. Serge Koussevitzky's dream made reality, the center opened with 125 advanced students in what was called "the Institute" and hundreds more in "the Academy." Hindemith taught in both.

Fundamentals First

As a teacher he was noted for insisting his students should have thorough grounding in the fundamentals of music. His own works reflected this philosophy, being clear, logical and masterfully organized. A modernist in harmony and style, a classicist in form, he wrote objective music based on sonata, concerto, symphony, quartet, fugue.

Hindemith was an organized man himself. "He came to Lenox like a general," a B.S.O. player recalls. "He had something planned for every hour of the day. Koussevitzky was more the big improviser. And perhaps that difference began the strain of relations between them." Hindemith was not invited back for the Summer of 1942.

But in those two seasons at Tanglewood Hindemith instituted ensemble classes to the delight of their participants. Orchestra men and students alike gathered, Hindemith reminding all of the traditional church sign, "Everybody is welcome." He would give out music, sometimes old motets and chorales for which he had written new parts. Then everyone joined in with instrument or voice. And during Hindemith's lectureship at Harvard, he used to ring in the audience at concerts.

Waving Some Papers

Hindemith's Cello Concerto received a Tanglewood performance in 1941. Louis Speyer, oboist and English horn of the orchestra, has the composer's sketchbooks for the work. Wrapped in an envelope which Hindemith crafted from a sheet of music paper and affectionately inscribed in the composer's neat hand, the package is but one souvenir.

Speyer tells of receiving a Sonata for English Horn. After Tanglewood, Hindemith confessed he was tired and would have no more of music for a while. He and his wife, Gertrud, would go into seclusion somewhere in the Berkshires. One day the Speyers were out walking a picnic site in mind. An open car could be seen speeding toward them; a woman was driving, a man was waving white papers. It was Hindemith, the Sonata in hand. The party then proceeded to the nearest piano, found in Lenox's stately Congregational Church-on-the-Hill.

"I wanted him to write something in the music," said Speyer. A dedication was penned immediately—in German, though Hindemith was fluent in English, had once punned "inspeyeringly" on his friend's name. "To Louis Speyer," it reads, "at last he must indeed have a sonata for his instrument."

Writing for a friend or for an occasion was one of Hindemith's delights. He coined the German term, "Gebrauchmusik," or "music for use." Baroque in the utility of music, he brought a fantastic technical knowledge of instruments to the composition of modern concerts. He was a violinist and violist by training, but could play just about anything else. The Speyers well remember Hindemith serenading the newly-wed Richard Burgin and Ruth Posselt upon Andre Speyer's French horn.

The last new Hindemith work to be heard in Boston was his "Pittsburgh" Symphony. William Steinberg, conductor of that orchestra, introduced it at Boston Symphony concerts in 1960. Composed for the Pittsburgh Bicentennial in 1959, the Symphony was full of "useful" allusions. One was an old Pennsylvania Dutch tune, loosely translate as "My Little Rag Doll Is Running Me Ragged," and the finale capitalized on a popular song, 'Pittsburgh is a great old town." And listeners found in the score lots of noisy passages which they at least thought were tonal depictions of steel mills.

Even the famous Hindemith Christmas cards were a kind of "Gebrauchmusik." Thousands of tiny notes, accidentals, markings were penned to form festive patterns. The prettiest is a fir tree, each needle an eighth note and hung with clefs. And needless to note, the sad[illegible] of "Gebrauchmusik" [illegible] Tuesday's "Trauermusik."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eag
PITTSFIELD,
Circ. 29,0
DEC 30 196

Paul H... Noted ...

Paul Hindemith, world's leading com... the first resident ... the Berkshire Musi... Tanglewood in 1940, ... initial year, died Sa... at a Frankfurt, Ge... pital at the age of ...

Mr. Hindemith ha... fering from a circ... ment for several ye... still kept up a stea... of composing and ... ducting.

While at Tanglew... Mr. Hindemith comp... certo for violoncello ... tra that received its ... miere at Symphony ... ton in February 194... baton of the late Se... vitsky. Each of the ... ments of the piece ... "Lenox, Mass." The ... ment is dated June ... second, July 4, an... Sept. 9.

Repeated at Tangle...

The work was r... summer at Tangle... Gregor Piatigorsky ... and Mr. Koussevits... ing. Mr. Hindemith ... from his home in ... for the performanc... ceived the plaudits ... dience.

Erich Leinsdorf, c... the Boston Sym... nounced today ... night's BSO concert ... with a performance ... mith's "Trauermusik" ... of the orchestra's de... loss in the death o... poser.

The composer be... his publisher's home ... while on his way ... zerland after having ... some of his works ...

His wife, Gertrud ... him when he died. ... children.

Hindemith, a natu... ed States citizen, ... 20's when he reache...

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • HIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

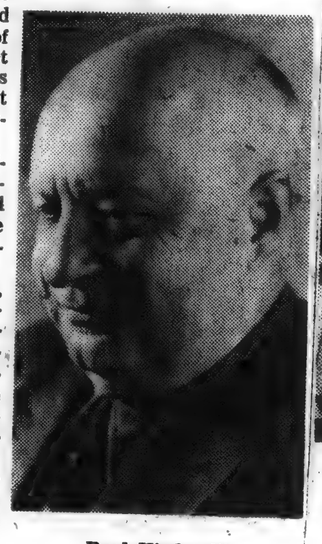
DEC 30 1963

Paul Hindemith Dies; Noted Composer Was 68

Paul Hindemith, one of the world's leading composers and the first resident composer of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in 1940, the BMC's initial year, died Saturday night at a Frankfurt, Germany, hospital at the age of 68.

Mr. Hindemith had been suffering from a circulatory ailment for several years, but had still kept up a steady schedule of composing and guest conducting.

While at Tanglewood in 1940, Mr. Hindemith composed a concerto for violoncello and orchestra that received its world premiere at Symphony Hall in Boston in February 1941, under the baton of the late Serge Koussevitsky. Each of the three movements of the piece is inscribed: "Lenox, Mass." The first movement is dated June 30, 1940, the second, July 4, and the third Sept. 9.



Paul Hindemith

COMPOSER Paul Hindemith received the applause of Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky as well as that of the crowd in the summer of 1941 when the BSO performed Hindemith's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which had been composed at the Berkshire Music Center in the summer of 1940 when Hindemith was resident composer for initial session of teaching arm of Berkshire Center.

Repeated at Tanglewood

The work was repeated that summer at Tanglewood with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist and Mr. Koussevitsky conducting. Mr. Hindemith came up from his home in New Haven for the performance and received the plaudits of the audience.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, announced today that tomorrow night's BSO concert will start with a performance of Hindemith's "Trauermusik" as a token of the orchestra's deep sense of loss in the death of the composer.

The composer became ill at his publisher's home in Mainz while on his way home to Switzerland after having conducted some of his works in Berlin.

His wife, Gertrud, was with him when he died. They had no children.

Hindemith, a naturalized United States citizen, was in his 20's when he reached the forefront of modern music with his operas, symphonies, concertos and chamber works.

Among his best-known works are the operas "Mathis der Maler" and "Harmony of the World," the "Pittsburgh Symphony," the requiem "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," after poems of Walt Whitman, and the ballet "Nobilissima Visione."

Hindemith, who was criticized by the Nazis as a "Cultural Bolshevist," left his native Germany in 1934. He spent some time in Turkey before going to the United States, where he became a citizen in 1946.

Paul Hindemith was a stocky man about 5 foot 3 inches tall. Those who met him remember his gleaming bald head, his intense blue eyes, his assurance of manner and, if he had been in a friendly mood, his humor and sense of fun.

All his music shows that his feelings ran deep, yet he was not one to wear his heart on his sleeve.

Nazi Ban

In 1934, when the Nazis banned performances of his work, the composer, then 39 years old, was already well known to those interested in contemporary music, and he was considered Germany's most gifted composer of his generation. But at that time he was hardly more than a name to most Americans. Ironically, what brought him so much personal suffering greatly increased his fame.

The storm over the banning of his music in his homeland reached a climax in December, 1934, when the conductor Wilhelm Furtwaengler resigned in protest from his posts as director of the Berlin State Opera and deputy president of the Reich Chamber of Music.

Furtwaengler acknowledged that Mrs. Hindemith was Jewish, but in his now famous letter to the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, he contended that the composer was pure Aryan.

Hindemith found refuge in a country not ordinarily associated with Western music, Turkey, because of his long association with a Turkish violinist, Licco Amar.

In Angora, Hindemith helped to organize Turkey's musical life along Western lines. Before coming to the United States he also lived at times in Switzerland, where, after 14 years in the United States, he made his home in 1953.

Mastered Violin

Hindemith was born on Nov. 16, 1895, in Hanau, a town about 75 miles from Frankfurt. He was the first child of Robert Rudolf Emil Hindemith, a painter and decorator. His mother was the former Sophie Warnecke. There were two other children, a sister, Toni Hindemith, who survives him, and his brother, Rudolf, who lives in Munich.

By the time Paul was 13 he had mastered the violin and played in all sorts of orchestras, including dance bands, movie-house orchestras and musical-comedy and theater-pit bands. By 1915, when he was 20, he was the concertmaster of the Frankfurt Opera, a position he held for eight years.

By that time he had entered Hoch's Conservatorium in Frankfurt. His first composition teacher there was Arnold Mendelssohn, a musician of the old German school with an affinity for Romantic music. Brahms and Reger were composers who influenced Hindemith greatly at this stage. But Bernhard Sekles, Hindemith's other leading teacher, was more modern in his outlook.

After his first 10 works with opus numbers, Hindemith turned away from the Romantics, discarding pathos and rich instrumentation for the type of linear writing he developed. His works of the early 1920s showed that like others of his generation, he tried to overcome his despair, with works of negation, scorn and somewhat hectic merriment.

Teaching Career

By 1927 Hindemith had moved to Berlin. There he began a side of his career that grew increasingly important — teaching. He taught at the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik and laid the groundwork for what was to be his first theoretical work "Unterweisung im Tonsatz" ("The Craft of Musical Composition").

Hindemith acquired a technical knowledge of many instruments and it was said that he was so proficient that he probably could have performed creditably any of the solo parts of any of the works he wrote for different instruments. At this time, too, Hindemith became interested in "Gebrauchsmusik," or music for use.

By 1934, the year of the Nazi storm, he had completed "Mathis der Maler," which is generally considered his finest opera.

"Mathis," however, had to wait until May 1938, to have its world premiere in Zurich. Meanwhile, Hindemith made two visits to the United States. He came here in the spring of 1937 to play his viola concerto "Der Schwanendreher," at a festival of contemporary music given at the Library of Congress by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation.

Hindemith's third visit in 1939, because of World War II lengthened out into a prolonged stay. The first year he had several invitations to visit Yale University in New Haven, and in the fall of 1940 he joined the faculty. Not only did he give courses in advanced theory and composition, but he also took an active part in matters of educational policy.

In 1946 Mr. Hindemith became a United States citizen and it was not until 1949, three years after the close of World War II, that Hindemith made a visit back to Germany. When he returned here in March, he reported, "Fifteen years are missing." Germany's receptivity to modern music, he said, had been set back beyond the point it had reached in the twenties.

Until 1953 he taught at both Zurich and Yale, but that spring he finally left New Haven to make his home once again in Europe. Zurich was the place he chose. But he made many visits back to his country. One of those at which he was most honored was his visit last spring.

In the early part of his career, Hindemith exerted great influence on young composers. After World War II, however, he found himself somewhat in the backwash. The younger generation had flocked to the 12-tone music of Arnold Schoenberg and Anton von Webern.

Anachoronistic

Hindemith, who in his youth had been a revolutionary, began to be considered somewhat anachronistic by the new revolutionaries. They termed him merely an academician. But it is safe to say that much of his music will survive today's temporary fashions and will always be admired by listeners responsive to form, logic and workmanship.

Among Hindemith's gifts was cartooning, and it was his custom each year to make his own Christmas cards, many of which caricatured animals as well as humans. One of the signs for close friends that there might be something wrong with the composer this year was that a number of them, for the first time, failed to get cards.

222

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

DEC 30 1963

Feats At Symphony Hall Here Recalled

Hindemith Was Versatile Musician

Composer-musician Paul Hindemith, dead at age 68, was one of the ultra-modern composers of his time.

But he once delighted onlookers at Symphony Hall with his ability to play instruments hundreds of years old.

PIONEER IN MODERN WORKS

Hindemith, one of the most versatile musicians of the century and a pioneer of modern composition, died in a hospital in Frankfurt, Germany, of a circulatory ailment Saturday.

Laning Humphrey, a member of the Boston Symphony's press department, recalls Hindemith's visits here and at Tanglewood.

Hindemith came to Symphony Hall in 1938 to perform as soloist in his composition Kammermusik No. 5 for viola and chamber orchestra.

"His attention was attracted by the Symphony's Casadesus Collection of ancient musical instruments, some of them hundreds of years old," Humphrey recalls.

"You can imagine our delight when Hindemith—one of the most modern of composers then—asked to see some of the old instruments, and then played several."

FACULTY MEMBER AT BERKSHIRE

Hindemith also was a guest faculty member of the Berkshire Music Festival of the Boston Symphony.

"I remember once at Tanglewood he had some students go up in the tower of the old Tanglewood House," Humphrey said. "He had found some old music, hundreds of years old. The music had been played by brass insrument players in the towers of castles and the sounds would float down to those listening below.

"Hindemith wanted to recreate that—and he did, with the aid of the students."

Humphrey remembers Hindemith as a jolly and friendly man who was tremendously interested in helping people to enjoy music.

Although famed as a composer, Hindemuth was equally known in Germany as one of the best viola players of his time.

Concert master at the Frankfurt Opera House at the age of 20, Hindemith weathered a Nazi ban on his works, eventually became a U.S. citizen, and taught at Yale.

WAS BANNED BY HITLER

A prolific writer, his works included operas, symphonies, ballets, string quartets, trios for piano, violin and cello, sonatas for violin, viola and cello, violin concertos and organ compositions.

The Nazis banned his works in 1933 as un-German. Adolf Hitler violently disliked Hindemith's music. The composer left for Switzerland and Turkey where he set up conservatories, secured hundreds of orders for German music firms and forced the Nazis to tone down their criticism of him.

PAUL HINDEMITH

International fame came more through his operas, especially "Cardillac," "News of the Day," "Lindbergh's Flight" written with Kurt Weill, and "Sancta Susanna."

Perhaps best known, however, was his symphonic poem "Mathis der Maler"—Matthis the Painter, heralded as the most successful work of the 1935-36 concert season.

MISCELLANEOUS

223

ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK, N.Y.
MANHATTAN EAST
W. 11,500

JAN 16 1964

IBM Gallery Rings In Reprise on Old Orchestra

The first New York exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection of Old Musical Instruments opened last Monday at the IBM Gallery, 16 East 57th Street, and remains through Feb. 7.

String, wind, brass, and percussion instruments dating from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century are on display. Many are unique by virtue of their use, previous owners, or artistic decoration.

Supplementing the Casadesus Collection are a harpischord and a clavichord lent by the Yale Collection of Musical Instruments, some primitive musical devices lent by the Museum of Natural History, and several paintings of musical subjects.

Recordings of music played on some of the instruments illustrate the steps in their development and demonstrate the immense variety of musical sounds. An explanatory narrative accompanies the recordings.

Ranking high in human and historical interest are a combined flute and walking stick that belonged to Frederick the Great of Prussia and then to Voltaire; an 18th cenutry French lyre that is reputed to have belonged to Mme. de Maintenon, who became the second wife of Louis XIV; and an English horn with an inscription commemorating the first performance of "Tristan and Isolde," in which it is said to have been used.

Instruments most unusual to contemporary eyes and ears include the pochette, a 17-inch stringed instrument with a 14-inch bow; the church serpent, a bass wind instrument in the form of a snake-like tube seven feet long; a tromba marina, an ungainly seven-foot pyramid-shaped instrument with a single string; a hurdy-gurdy, a stringed instrument which is hand cranked like the street organ; and a bull roarer, a carved stick that is whirled rapidly at the end of a cord to produce a sound that is more frightening than melodious.

Outstanding as fine musical instruments are three 18th century viols. They are a quinton—an obsolete five-string treble viol—made by Louis Guersan, a noted instrument maker who flourished in Paris in the 1760's; a viola d'amore signed "Paulus Alletsche, Munchen, 1713," and a bass viol, an extremely rare instrument because many early viols were cut over by lute makers to make violincellos.

The paintings in the exhibition include "Man With Violin," by George Luks, "Two Welsh Girls With a Harp," by Arthur B. Davies, and "Evening Hymn," by Washington Allston, lent by the Montclair Art Museum.

The Casadesus Collection originally belonged to Henri Casadesus, a distinguished French musician and connoiseur of old instruments. In 1926 it was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by a group of the orchestra's friends, and since then it has been housed in Symphony Hall.

The IBM Gallery is open to the public, without charge, Monday through Friday from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Wednesday, January 15, 1964

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

FEB 1964

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,006,983 S. 3,147,219

JAN 19 1964

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1964

From January 13 to February 7 a large portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's CASADESUS COLLECTION OF ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS will be on loan to the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences, 16 East 57th Street, New York.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 17 1964

Bury Street, Boston 10, Mass.

Instruments displayed

"The Shape of Sound—Form in Musical Instruments" is the title of an exhibition on view from March 24 to May 1 at the Carpenter Center for the Visual Arts, Harvard University. The exhibition is arranged to define the relationship between the shape of the instrument and the sound it emits.

The Metropolitan Museum, Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Yale University, Peabody Museum, Music Department at Harvard, New England Conservatory, Casadesus Collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pan Orient Arts Foundation, and private collectors, have joined in loaning examples.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1964

From January 13 to February 7 a large portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's CASADESUS COLLECTION OF ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS will be on loan to the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences, 16 East 57th Street, New York. . . . Under a grant of $150,000 from the RODGERS AND HAMMERSTEIN FOUNDATION, the New York Public Library will for the first time be able to make available to the public its comprehensive collection of more than 90,000 recordings now in dead storage. The collection will be prepared for use in the Performing Arts Library and Museum now being constructed at Lincoln Center, and will be known as the RODGERS AND HAMMERSTEIN RECORD ARCHIVES.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

JAN 14 1964

BSO'S ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS IN N.Y.

Visitors to Symphony Hall will note the absence of a majority of the instruments normally on display in the Ancient Instrument Room. A selection of instruments from the Casadesus Collection, which was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for permanent view in Symphony Hall, has been loaned for exhibition in New York at the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences through Feb. 7.

LISTEN—
A MUSIC MONTHLY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
10 TI. a YR.-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

DEC 1963

Ancient Instruments on Display

The first New York exhibition of antique musical instruments from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection will be held at the IBM Gallery (16 East 57th Street) from January 13 to February 7. Fifty-six pieces (including the 18th century cavalry serpent seen above) dating from the 16th to the 19th centuries will be shown.

A pocket viol, dated 1612, a lyre belonging to the second wife of Louis XIV, a horn that was used in the first performance of Tristan und Isolde, an assortment of other string, brass and percussion instruments, and a musical clock used by three generations of the Casadesus family are among those items which will be displayed.

The collection originally belonged to Henri Casadesus, a distinguished French musician and connoisseur of old instruments. In 1926, it was presented to the Boston Symphony, and since then it has been housed in a specially constructed room in Symphony Hall.

The IBM Gallery is open to the public, without charge, Mondays through Fridays, from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WHITE PLAINS HERALD
Thursday, January 16, 1964

IBM Shows Collection of Old Instruments

The first New York exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection of Old Musical Instruments at the IBM Gallery, 16 East 57th St., will continue through Feb. 7.

String, wind, brass and percussion instruments dating from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century are on display. Many are unique by virtue of their use, previous owners, or artistic decoration.

Supplementing the Casadesus Collection are a harpsichord and a clavichord lent by the Yale Collection of Musical Instruments, some primitive musical devices lent by the Museum of Natural History, and several paintings of musical subjects.

MISCELLANEOUS

ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Wednesday, January 15, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT KISCO TRADER
Sunday, January 12, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK NEWS
Sunday, January 19, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Wednesday, January 15, 1964

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

FEB 1964

DAILY NEWS
D. 2,006,983 S. 3,147,219

JAN 19 1964

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1964

From January 13 to February 7 a large portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's CASADESUS COLLECTION OF ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS will be on loan to the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences, 16 East 57th Street, New York.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
MANHATTAN EAST
W. 11,500

JAN 16 1964

IBM Gallery Rings In Reprise on Old Orchestra

The first New York exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection of Old Musical Instruments opened last Monday at the IBM Gallery, 16 East 57th Street, and remains through Feb. 7.

String, wind, brass, and percussion instruments dating from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century are on display. Many are unique by virtue of their use, previous owners, or artistic decoration.

Supplementing the Casadesus Collection are a harpischord and a clavichord lent by the Yale Collection of Musical Instruments, some primitive musical devices lent by the Museum of Natural History, and several paintings of musical subjects.

Recordings of music played on some of the instruments illustrate the steps in their development and demonstrate the immense variety of musical sounds. An explanatory narrative accompanies the recordings.

Ranking high in human and historical interest are a combined flute and walking stick that belonged to Frederick the Great of Prussia and then to Voltaire; an 18th cenutry French lyre that is reputed to have belonged to Mme. de Maintenon, who became the second wife of Louis XIV; and an English horn with an inscription commemorating the first performance of "Tristan and Isolde," in which it is said to have been used.

Instruments most unusual to contemporary eyes and ears include the pochette, a 17-inch stringed instrument with a 14-inch bow; the church serpent, a bass wind instrument in the form of a snake-like tube seven feet long; a tromba marina, an ungainly seven-foot pyramid-shaped instrument with a single string; a hurdy-gurdy, a stringed instrument which is hand cranked like the street organ; and a bull roarer, a carved stick that is whirled rapidly at the end of a cord to produce a sound that is more frightening than melodious.

Outstanding as fine musical instruments are three 16th century viols. They are a quinton — an obsolete five-string treble viol — made by Louis Guersan, a noted instrument maker who flourished in Paris in the 1760's; a viola d'amore signed "Paulus Alletsche, Munchen, 1713," and a bass viol, an extremely rare instrument because many early viols were cut over by lute makers to make violincellos.

The paintings in the exhibition include "Man With Violin," by George Luks, "Two Welsh Girls With a Harp," by Arthur B. Davies, and "Evening Hymn," by Washington Allston, lent by the Montclair Art Museum.

The Casadesus Collection originally belonged to Henri Casadesus, a distinguished French musician and connoisseur of old instruments. In 1926 it was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by a group of the orchestra's friends, and since then it has been housed in Symphony Hall.

The IBM Gallery is open to the public, without charge, Monday through Friday from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 17 1964

Instruments displayed

"The Shape of Sound—Form in Musical Instruments" is the title of an exhibition on view from March 24 to May 1 at the Carpenter Center for the Visual Arts, Harvard University. The exhibition is arranged to define the relationship between the shape of the instrument and the sound it emits.

The Metropolitan Museum, Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Yale University, Peabody Museum, Music Department at Harvard, New England Conservatory, Casadesus Collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pan Orient Arts Foundation, and private collectors have joined in loaning examples.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1964

From January 13 to February 7 a large portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's CASADESUS COLLECTION OF ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS will be on loan to the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences, 16 East 57th Street, New York. . . . Under a grant of $150,000 from the RODGERS AND HAMMERSTEIN FOUNDATION, the New York Public Library will for the first time be able to make available to the public its comprehensive collection of more than 90,000 recordings now in dead storage. The collection will be prepared for use in the Performing Arts Library and Museum now being constructed at Lincoln Center, and will be known as the RODGERS AND HAMMERSTEIN RECORD ARCHIVES.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

JAN 14 1964

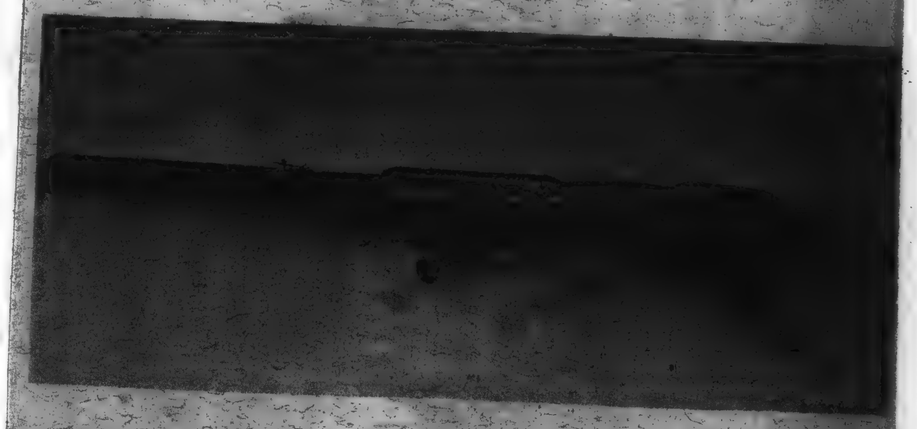
BSO'S ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS IN N.Y.

Visitors to Symphony Hall will note the absence of a majority of the instruments normally on display in the Ancient Instrument Room. A selection of instruments from the Casadesus Collection, which was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for permanent view in Symphony Hall, has been loaned for exhibition in New York at the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences through Feb. 7.

LISTEN—
A MUSIC MONTHLY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
10 TI. a YR.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 1963

Ancient Instruments on Display



The first New York exhibition of antique musical instruments from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection will be held at the IBM Gallery (16 East 57th Street) from January 13 to February 7. Fifty-six pieces (including the 18th century cavalry serpent seen above) dating from the 16th to the 19th centuries will be shown.

A pocket viol, dated 1612, a lyre belonging to the second wife of Louis XIV, a horn that was used in the first performance of Tristan und Isolde, an assortment of other string, brass and percussion instruments, and a musical clock used by three generations of the Casadesus family are among those items which will be displayed.

The collection originally belonged to Henri Casadesus, a distinguished French musician and connoisseur of old instruments. In 1926, it was presented to the Boston Symphony, and since then it has been housed in a specially constructed room in Symphony Hall.

The IBM Gallery is open to the public, without charge, Mondays through Fridays, from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WHITE PLAINS HERALD
Thursday, January 16, 1964

IBM Shows Collection of Old Instruments

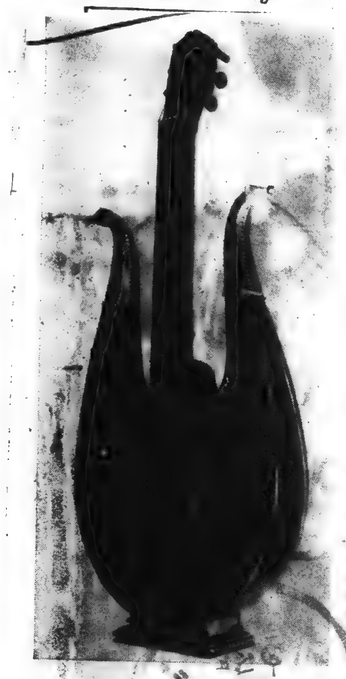
The first New York exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection of Old Musical Instruments at the IBM Gallery, 16 East 57th St., will continue through Feb. 7.

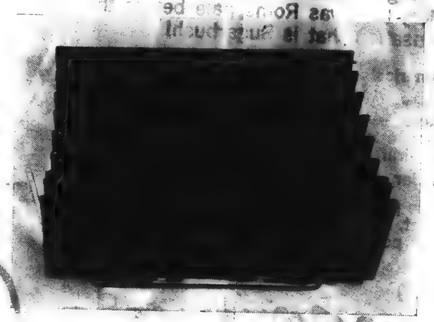
String, wind, brass and percussion instruments dating from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century are on display. Many are unique by virtue of their use, previous owners, or artistic decoration.

Supplementing the Casadesus Collection are a harpsichord and a clavichord lent by the Yale Collection of Musical Instruments, some primitive musical devices lent by the Museum of Natural History, and several paintings of musical subjects.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 167,032

JAN 11 1964





ELABORATELY DECORATED eighteenth-century lyre (left), among the early instruments from the Casadesus collection going on display at the IBM Gallery, was bought from an elderly French woman whose grandfather had purchased it during the French Revoution. It is said to have been once owned by the second wife of Louis XIV. The accordion with mother-of-pearl keyboard (below) was manufactured in Bayonne in 1823

GILDED brass horn (above) was found over sixty years ago in the home of a French bandmaster who willingly exchanged it for a modern valve horn he needed for his band

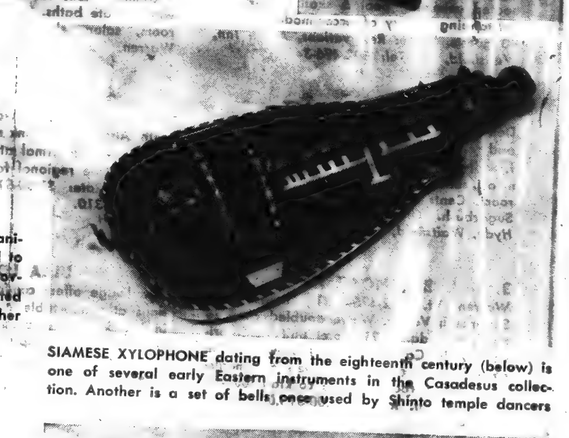
MUSICAL ANTIQUES

Lyres, lutes and serpents on loan to IBM

OVER fifty pieces from the Boston Symphony collection of old musical instruments, until now housed in a special room in Symphony Hall and never permitted outside the Hub City, will go on view next Monday (January 13) at the IBM Gallery. Originally collected by Henri Casadesus, a French violist with an abiding interest in early instruments, these now-silent antiques offer a vivid reminder of European craftsmanship as applied to the "machines" that enable man to manipulate sound louder or sweeter or more pungent than his own voice. A few are shown here; others include a dragon-headed cavalry trumpet, a pair of 18th-century military kettle drums, and a horn used in the first performance of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." The Boston Symphony, playing their modern equivalents, is also due for a local visit toward the end of the month—a visit extended to four days to include a concert at Carnegie Hall on January 24.

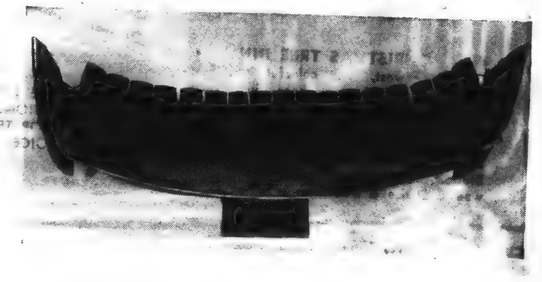
—C.B.

CHURCH SERPENT (right) is an instrument of the Italian Renaissance bearing the arms of the Venetian Republic. Casadesus obtained it in 1923 from the then Duchess of Grammont, who was herself an equally avid collector



HURDY-GURDY, or mechanical violin (right), belonged to a fiddler in the French province of Bresse who inherited it from his great grandfather

FIRST EMPIRE DRUM, bearing the arms of the City of Paris, was owned by Casadesus' father, a drummer during the Commune of 1871



SIAMESE XYLOPHONE dating from the eighteenth century (below) is one of several early Eastern instruments in the Casadesus collection. Another is a set of bells once used by Shinto temple dancers

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5,500

JUN 1964

Old Instruments Exhibit At Music Trades Show

Exhibit of a unique collection of old musical instruments from the 16th to the 19th century will be featured at the 1964 Music Trades Show.

The collection of music-making instruments of the past will be shown by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has the exhibit as part of its permanent display at Symphony Hall. More than 60 of the music antiques will be displayed at the 63rd annual show sponsored by the National Association of Music Merchants. The Music Trades Show display at Chicago's Conrad Hilton Hotel June 28 to July 2 will mark only the second time that the collection has been lent outside of Boston since the collection was started more than 25 years ago.

Plans are to set up the unusual exhibit in a conveniently-located, easily-accessible display area in the 8th Street lobby of the Conrad Hilton Hotel, where the more than 13,000 music men expected at the show will be able to view the string, brass, wind and percussion instruments of other eras.

The collection once belonged to Henri Casadesus, a French musician who was the uncle of famed pianist Robert Casadesus. Obtained by the Boston Symphony in 1926 at the suggestion of conductor Serge Koussevitzsky by friends of the orchestra in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, the collection represents the finest of old world craftsmanship as well as a number of instruments with historical interest.

"We are indeed delighted to have the opportunity to display this remarkable collection of musical instruments at the Music Trades Show. In a sense it represents a first for the industry—a chance to view at a trade show the forebears of today's musical products, and to see in an exhibit the rich tradition of our industry's past," observed William R. Gard, NAMM executive secretary. "We are grateful to the Boston Symphony for their courtesy and cooperation in making this exhibit available for display at the Music Trades Show. We know that every music merchant will find viewing these instruments an exciting experience in turning back the pages of musical history."

Among the instruments with historical backgrounds which will be shown in the exhibit will be a combined flute and walking stick which once belonged to Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, who was presented the flute by Voltaire.

Some of the instruments in the collection, such as a hurdy-gurdy, date back to the 10th Century. Unusual music-makers are a serpent, a bass wind instrument of the century; a pochette, a tiny violin used dancing masters; a bull roarer, a carved whirled at the end of a cord; and a marina, a seven-foot-tall single-string strument.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 11 1964

Exhibit Of Old Instruments Set For 1964 Music Show

NEW YORK—An exhibit of an unusual collection of old music instruments from the 16th to the 19th century will be featured at the 1964 Music Show in Chicago. The collection of music-making instruments of the past will be shown by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has the exhibit as part of its permanent display at Symphony Hall. More than 60 of the musical antiques will be displayed at the 63rd annual show sponsored by the National Association of Music Merchants. The Music Show display at Chicago's Conrad Hilton Hotel (July 2-28) will mark only the second time that the collection has been lent outside of Boston since the collection was started more than 25 years ago.

Chicago's AMERICAN
Always on Top of the News
D. 433,422 S. 540,180

APR 12 1964

YOU'RE IN THE KNOW IF YOU KNOW . . . Free Lance Photographer Arthur Shay wrote the play, "A Clock for Nikita," now in the Stagelight theater, and took his own pictures for promotion. . . . When the American Civil Liberties union hosts its Thursday premiere of "Point of Order" film documentary of the Army-McCarthy hearings, it'll be almost 10 years to the date of the opening of the sessions in Washington.

The nation's largest and most elaborate lighting showroom, the new Design Galleries, is at 325 N. Wells st. . . . Horse racing is still the king of spectator sports, followed by auto racing, baseball, football, and basketball, all in that order. . . . The Boston Symphony will lend its rare collection of old musical instruments for a special display the end of June for the annual music show in the Hilton. Included: a combination flute and walking stick owned by Voltaire.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 167,032

JAN 11 1964

ELABORATELY DECORATED eighteenth-century lyre (left), among the early instruments from the Casadesus collection going on display at the IBM Gallery, was bought from an elderly French woman whose grandfather had purchased it during the French Revolution. It is said to have been once owned by the second wife of Louis XIV. The accordion with mother-of-pearl keyboard (below) was manufactured in Germany in 1828.

GILDED brass horn (above) was found over sixty years ago in the home of a French bandmaster who willingly exchanged it for a modern valve horn he needed for his band.

MUSICAL ANTIQUES

Lyres, lutes and serpents on loan to IBM

Over fifty pieces from the Boston Symphony collection of old musical instruments, until now housed in a special room in Symphony Hall and never permitted outside the Hub City, will go on view next Monday (January 13) at the IBM Gallery. Originally collected by Henri Casadesus, a French violist with an abiding interest in early instruments, the silent antiques offer a visual museum of European craftsmanship as applied to the "machines" that enable man to manipulate sound—louder or sweeter or more pungent than his own voice. A few are shown here; others include a dragon-headed cavalry trumpet, a pair of 18th-century military kettle drums, and a horn used in the first performance of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." The Boston Symphony, playing their modern equivalents, is also due for a local visit toward the end of the month—a visit extended to four days to include a concert at Carnegie Hall on January 24.

—C.B.

CHURCH SERPENT (right) is an instrument of the Italian Renaissance bearing the arms of the Venetian Republic. Casadesus obtained it in 1923 from the then Duchesse de Clermont-Tonnerre (Natalie Barney) who was herself an adequately avid collector of musical antiques.

HURDY-GURDY, or mechanical violin (right), belonged to a fiddler in the French province of Brasse who inherited it from his great grandfather.

SIAMESE XYLOPHONE dating from the eighteenth century (below) is one of several early Eastern instruments in the Casadesus collection. Another is a set of bells possessed by Shinto temple dancers.

FIRST EMPIRE DRUM, bearing the arms of the City of Paris, was obtained by Casadesus' father, a drummer during the Commune of 1871.

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5.500

JUN 1964

Old Instruments Exhibit At Music Trades Show

Exhibit of a unique collection of old musical instruments from the 16th to the 19th century will be featured at the 1964 Music Trades Show.

The collection of music-making instruments of the past will be shown by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has the exhibit as part of its permanent display at Symphony Hall. More than 60 of the music antiques will be displayed at the 63rd annual show sponsored by the National Association of Music Merchants. The Music Trades Show display at Chicago's Conrad Hilton Hotel June 28 to July 2 will mark only the second time that the collection has been lent outside of Boston since the collection was started more than 25 years ago.

Plans are to set up the unusual exhibit in a conveniently-located, easily-accessible display area in the 8th Street lobby of the Conrad Hilton Hotel, where the more than 13,000 music men expected at the show will be able to view the string, brass, wind and percussion instruments of other eras.

The collection once belonged to Henri Casadesus, a French musician who was the uncle of famed pianist Robert Casadesus. Obtained by the Boston Symphony in 1926 at the suggestion of conductor Serge Koussevitzsky by friends of the orchestra in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, the collection represents the finest of old world craftsmanship as well as a number of instruments with historical interest.

"We are indeed delighted to have the opportunity to display this remarkable collection of musical instruments at the Music Trades Show. In a sense it represents a first for the industry—a chance to view at a trade show the forebears of today's musical products, and to see in an exhibit the rich tradition of our industry's past," observed William R. Gard, NAMM executive secretary. "We are grateful to the Boston Symphony for their courtesy and cooperation in making this exhibit available for display at the Music Trades Show. We know that every music merchant will find viewing these instruments an exciting experience in turning back the pages of musical history."

Among the instruments with historical backgrounds which will be shown in the exhibit will be a combined flute and walking stick which once belonged to Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, who was presented the flute by Voltaire.

Some of the instruments in the collection, such as a hurdy-gurdy, date back to the 10th Century. Unusual music-makers are a serpent, a bass wind instrument of the 16th century; a pochette, a tiny violin used by dancing masters; a bull roarer, a carved stick whirled at the end of a cord; and a trombe marina, a seven-foot-tall single-stringed instrument.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 11 1964

Exhibit Of Old Instruments Set For 1964 Music Show

NEW YORK—An exhibit of an unusual collection of old music instruments from the 16th to the 19th century will be featured at the 1964 Music Show in Chicago. The collection of music-making instruments of the past will be shown by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has the exhibit as part of its permanent display at Symphony Hall. More than 60 of the musical antiques will be displayed at the 63rd annual show sponsored by the National Association of Music Merchants. The Music Show display at Chicago's Conrad Hilton Hotel (July 2-28) will mark only the second time that the collection has been lent outside of Boston since the collection was started more than 25 years ago.

Chicago's AMERICAN
Always on Top of the News
D. 438,422 S. 540,180

APR 12 1964

"YOU'RE IN THE KNOW IF YOU KNOW . . . Free Lance Photographer Arthur Shay wrote the play, "A Clock for Nikita," now in the Stagelight theater, and took his own pictures for promotion. . . . When the American Civil Liberties union hosts its Thursday premiere of "Point of Order" film documentary of the Army-McCarthy hearings, it'll be almost 10 years to the date of the opening of the sessions in Washington. . . .

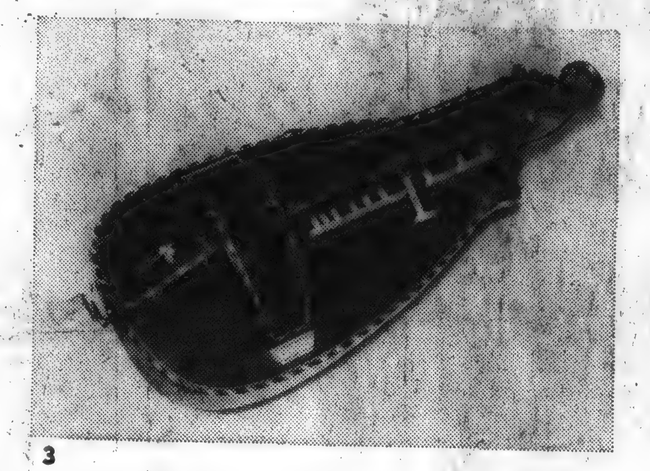
The nation's largest and most elaborate lighting showroom, the new Design Galleries, is at 325 N. Wells st. . . . Horse racing is still the king of spectator sports, followed by auto racing, baseball, football, and basketball, all in that order. . . . The Boston Symphony will lend its rare collection of old musical instruments for a special display the end of June for the annual music show in the Hilton. Included: a combination flute and walking stick owned by Voltaire.

The New York Times. TUESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1964.

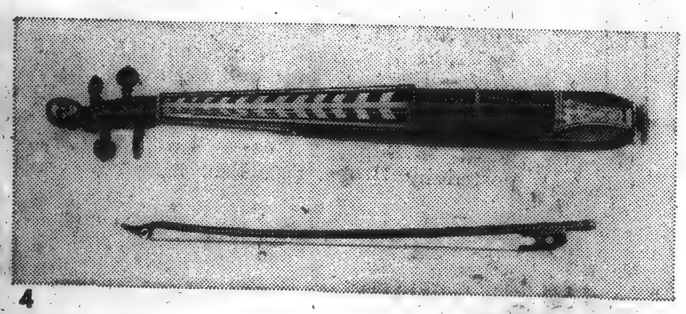
Instruments From Old World Have Odd Names and Strange Appearance

1

2

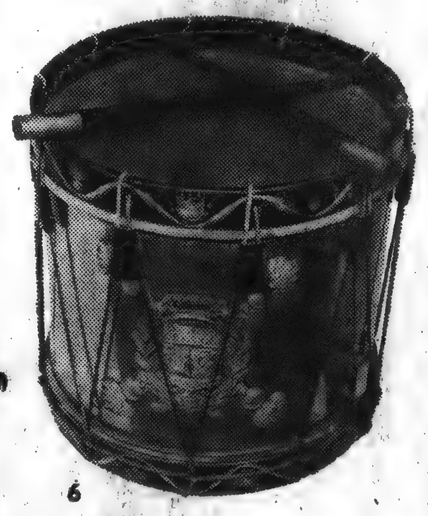


3



4

5



6

(1) The serpent, bass wind instrument of 16th century, in Boston Symphony Orchestra collection at I.B.M. Gallery. (2) Tambourine à cordes, a string drum used to accompany a pipe. Strings are tuned alternately to tones of pipe. (3) Hurdy-gurdy, or mechanical violin, originated in the 10th century. It was later favorite of French courtesans. (4) A small stringed instrument, the pochette was used by European dancing masters of 17th and 18th centuries. (5) This 18th-century cavalry bass wind serpent was used to accompany military bands. It has 16th-century origin. (6) First Empire drum belonged to father of Henri Casadesus, for whom the Boston Symphony collection is named.

Musicmaking of Other Eras Is Displayed at Gallery

By THEODORE STRONGIN

Even though it is not a play-it-yourself show, the ear as well as the eye can participate in musicmaking of past eras at the I.B.M. Gallery, 16 East 57th Street, where the Boston Symphony's Casadesus Collection of Old Musical Instruments went on exhibition yesterday.

String, brass, wind and percussion instruments from the 16th century to the 19th century can be heard on tape recordings, accompanied by explanatory narrative.

In addition to the instruments there are also music items of historical interest. For example, there is a combined flute and walking stick that once belonged to Frederick the Great and later to Voltaire. And there is an 18th-century French lyre that is supposed to have belonged to Françoise de Maintenon, second wife of Louis XIV.

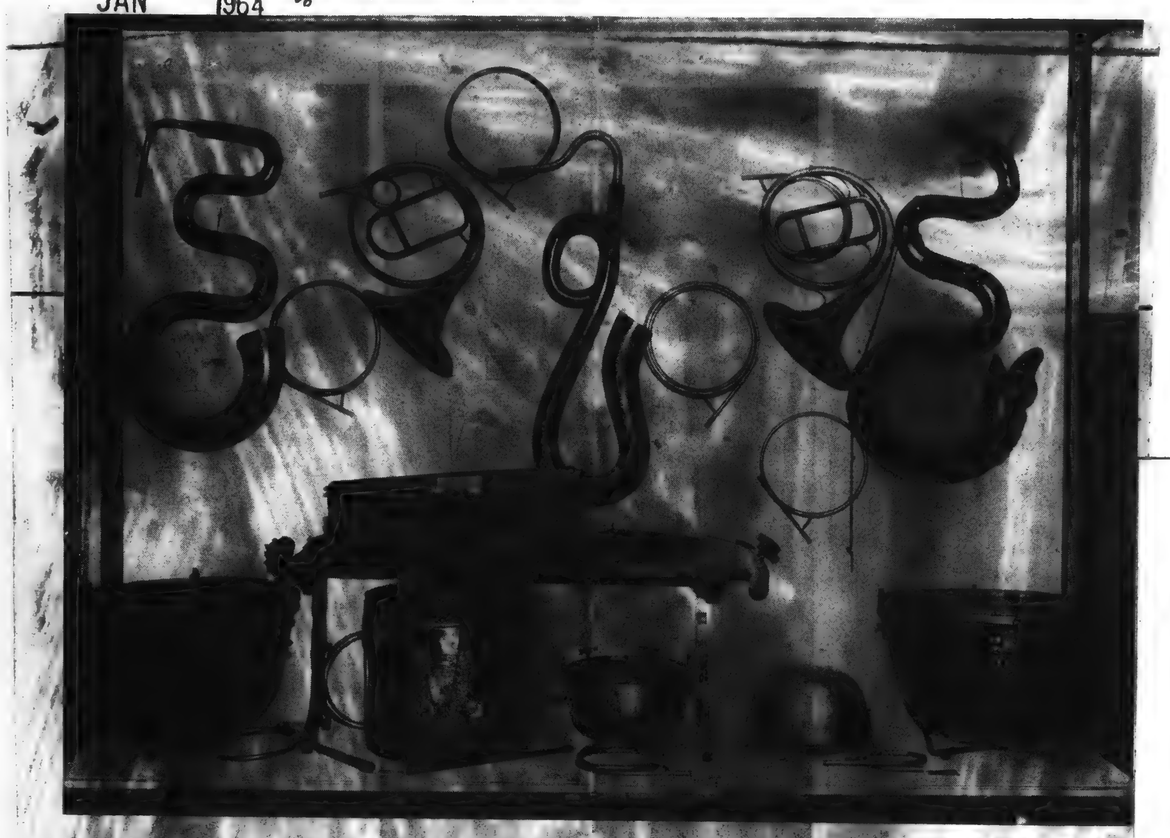
Ancient instruments known today, such as the harpsichord and viola de gamba, are displayed with material that is unusual to contemporary eyes and ears. Among these are the pochette, a tiny violin used by dancing masters; two kinds of serpents, a bass brass instrument; a hurdy-gurdy, which in the 17th century meant a mechanical violin; an ungainly, seven-foot tall, single-stringed instrument called a tromba marina and a bull-roarer, a carved stick meant to be whirled rapidly at the end of a cord. All these curiosities are heard on the tapes.

The collection which will be on view through Feb. 7, belonged to Henri Casadesus, a French musician and uncle of the pianist Robert Casadesus. It was purchased for the Boston Symphony in 1926, at the recommendation of Serge Koussevitzky, by a group of friends of the symphony, in honor of the orchestra's founder, Henry Lee Higginson. This is the first time the collection has ever been lent outside of Boston.

336

PROMENADE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 140,315

JAN 1964



Fantastic shapes, fine woods, distinctive decoration distinguish instruments—of Oriental and European origin—in collection given to and maintained, in memory of Henry L. Higginson, its founder, by Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Above) bottom row, second from left: First Empire Drum bears arms of City of Paris; in company with Early Church Serpents, one with Kehetien Republic's arms; French Bassoons—double-reed bass, woodwind class; 18th Century Kettle Drums. Chinese Oboes. (Below) hanging, second from left: among French, English, German bass viols, mandolins, banjos, old violin bows, a 17-inch pocket vial signed "Andre Vinatte, 1612," purchased for the Casadesus Collection in 1897.

Ancient musical instruments

Courtesy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra/IBM

First New York exhibition of Antique Musical Instruments from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Casadesus Collection will be held in the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences, 16 East 57th Street, from January 13th to February 7th. Fifty-six pieces, including examples of old instruments from the major instrumental families of the orchestra —strings, woodwinds, brasses and percussion instruments dating from the 16th to the 19th century—and several used only for chamber music, will be seen.

Interesting features of the collection are the fine wood work coupled with distinctive decoration; many unique because of their use and previous owners. Instruments were once owned by crowned heads of European nations, renowned nobles, musicians, and humble citizens.

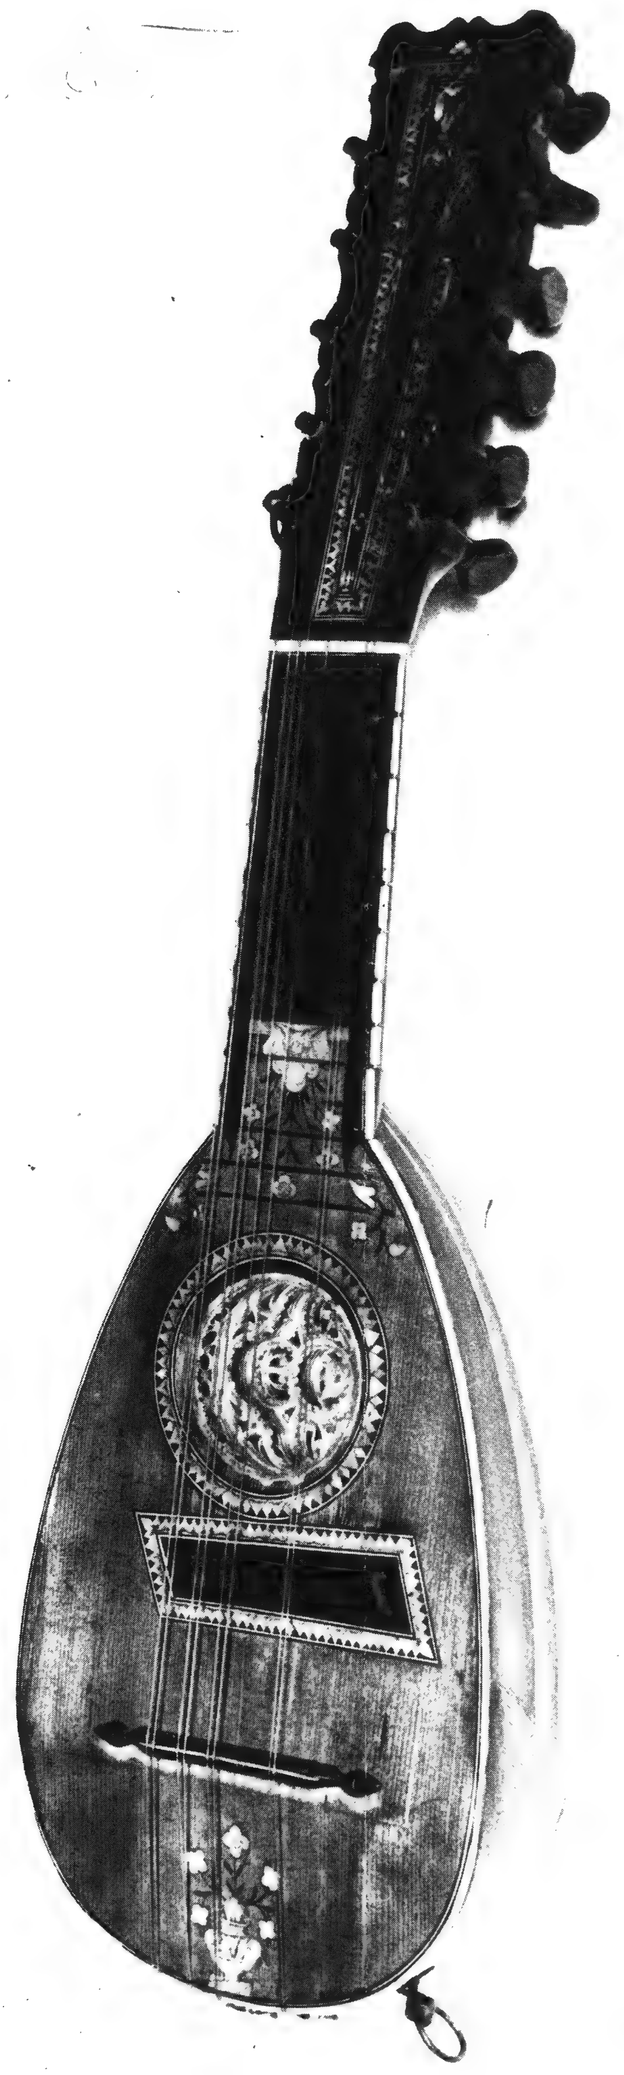
The entire collection was assembled by Henri Casadesus, a distinguished French musician—a violist —and connoisseur of old instruments and their music. This New York exhibition is the first time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has loaned the Casadesus Collection for display away from Symphony Hall.

The IBM Gallery is open to the public, without charge, Monday through Friday 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.

327

INDUSTRIAL DESIGN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 10,400

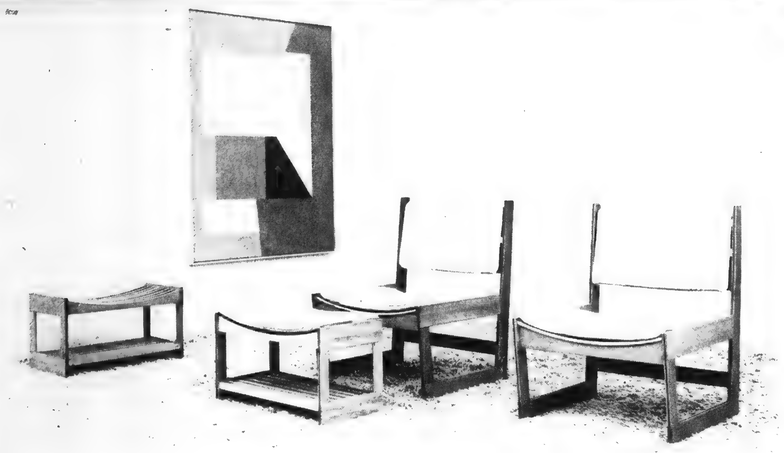
APR 1964

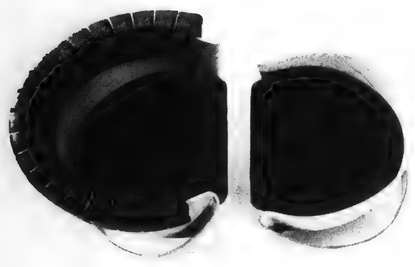


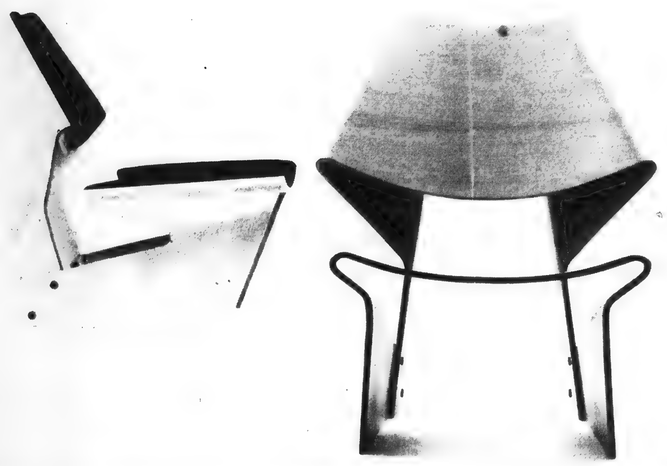
227

INDUSTRIAL DESIGN
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 10,400

APR 1964







Grete Jalk, Danish designer, has added some exciting new forms to her well-established lines of furniture. Chairs and footstools (left) are manufactured in Oregon pine by Cabinetmaker Henning Jensen. Group at center, she-chair, footstool, and he-chair (finished he-chair is shown at far right center), of molded Oregon pine, won first prize in the Daily Mirror Furniture Competition. The two-piece easy chair (bottom) of molded plywood, is bolted at the rear. Both groups are manufactured by P. Jeppesen.

CHURCH SERPENTS AND POCKET VIOLS

Part of a collection of musical instruments from the past, these instruments reflect more than just sound design. They reflect an era in which design was gilt and relief.

Looking like works of art, which they are, these musical instruments are, of course, more than that. Each had its period of musical use and popularity sometime between the 16th and the 19th centuries. But what seems striking today is not only that their form is an expression of their function, but also that their decoration is an expression of their form. After the death of Henri Casadesus, the French musician who collected them, they were turned over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra along with the rest of his collection. Early this year they appeared as part of an exhibit at the IBM Gallery in New York City. Unfamiliar largely because many of them have been superceded by technically improved models, these instruments range from the esoteric (the Italian Renaissance church serpent) to the romantic (the hurdy-gurdy). Others seem unfamiliar because like the pocket viol, they have gone out of style. Unfortunately, also out of style is the fine, intricate inlay and carved decoration, which is so much a part of each instrument that each would look, if not sound, barren without it.—E. C.

1. 18th century, ivory backed mandolin
2. Hurdy-gurdy, a mechanical violin

2

227

INDUSTRIAL DESIGN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 10,400

APR 1964

Grete Jalk, Danish designer, has added some exciting new forms to her well-established lines of furniture. Chairs and footstools (left) are manufactured in Oregon pine by Cabinetmaker Henning Jensen. Group at center, she-chair, footstool, and he-chair (finished he-chair is shown at far right center), of molded Oregon pine, won first prize in the Daily Mirror Furniture Competition. The two-piece easy chair (bottom) of molded plywood, is bolted at the rear. Both groups are manufactured by P. Jeppesen.

CHURCH SERPENTS AND POCKET VIOLS

Part of a collection of musical instruments from the past, these instruments reflect more than just sound design. They reflect an era in which design was gilt and relief.

Looking like works of art, which they are, these musical instruments are, of course, more than that. Each had its period of musical use and popularity sometime between the 16th and the 19th centuries. But what seems striking today is not only that their form is an expression of their function, but also that their decoration is an expression of their form. After the death of Henri Casadesus, the French musician who collected them, they were turned over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra along with the rest of his collection. Early this year they appeared as part of an exhibit at the IBM Gallery in New York City. Unfamiliar largely because many of them have been superceded by technically improved models, these instruments range from the esoteric (the Italian Renaissance church serpent) to the romantic (the hurdy-gurdy). Others seem unfamiliar because like the pocket viol, they have gone out of style. Unfortunately, also out of style is the fine, intricate inlay and carved decoration, which is so much a part of each instrument that each would look, if not sound, barren without it.—E. C.

1. 18th century, ivory backed mandolin
2. Hurdy-gurdy, a mechanical violin

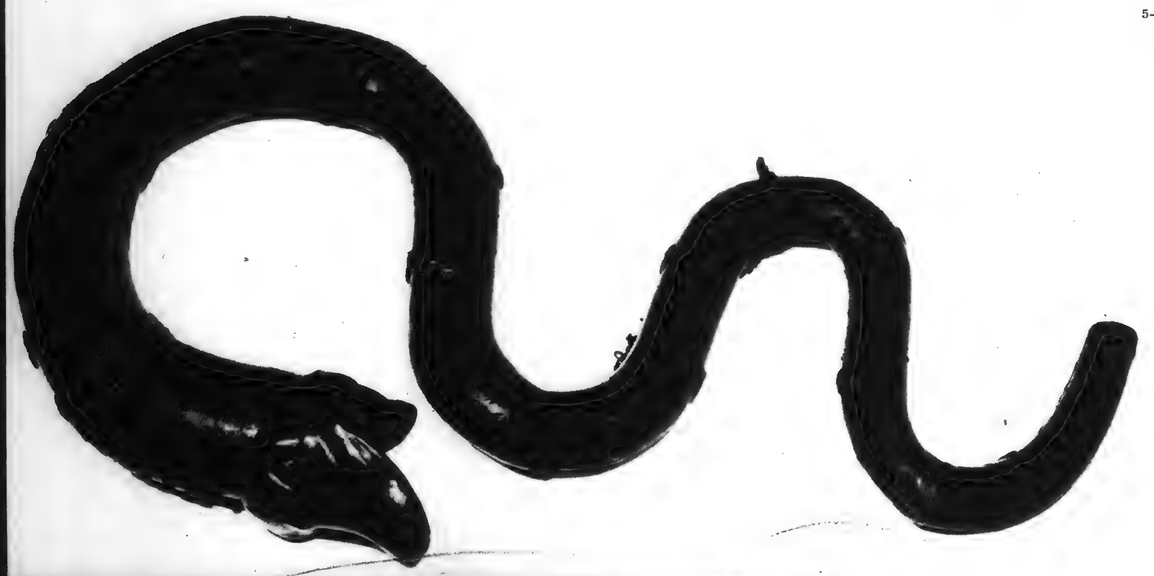
INDUSTRIAL DESIGN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 10,400

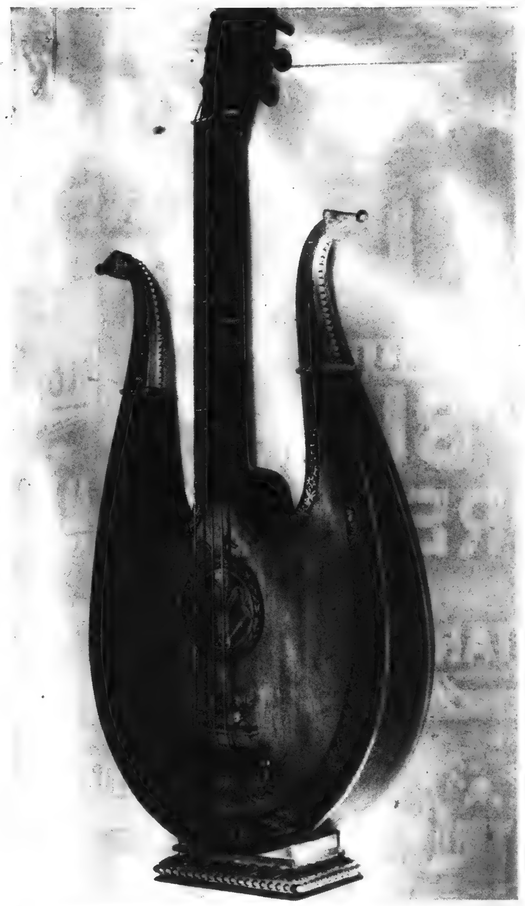
APR 1964

3

4

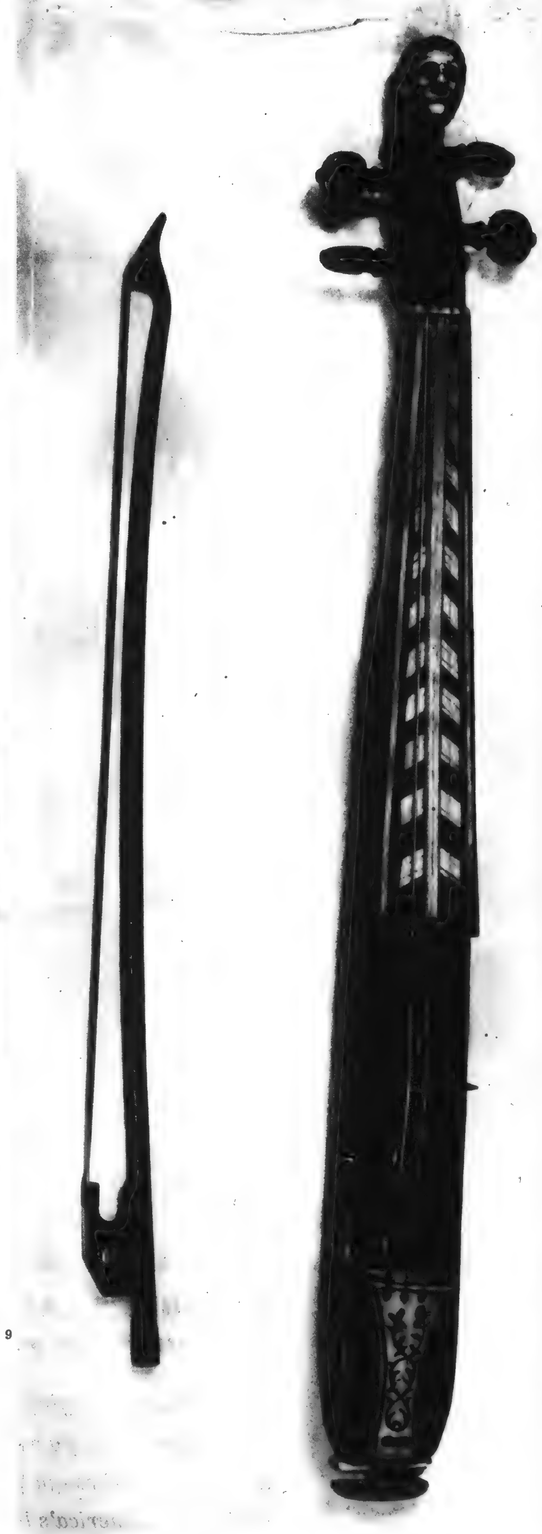
5-6





7

8



9

3. 18th century Cavalry Serpent has gilt and lacquered dragon's head
4. 18th century Siamese xylophone, called a roneat ek
5. Japanese lute, or biwa, inlaid with mother of pearl
6. Church Serpent, a bass wind instrument from the Italian Renaissance
7. 18th century lyre of polished Martin, once owned by wife of Louis XIV
8. Brass horn with intricately decorated bell
9. 17th century pocket viol, a 17-inch instrument with 14-inch bow.

228

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
SEP 10 1963

Symphony Orchestras Held Neglected by State Dept.

Washington — (UPI) — A Boston Symphony Orchestra official claimed yesterday that America's great orchestras are playing second fiddle to jazz bands sent overseas by the State Department.

Rosario Mazzeo, the symphony's personnel director, had nothing unkind to say about jazz musicians during a House foreign affairs subcommittee. But he wondered why the United States was not tooting its horns for symphony orchestras.

He said the United States is doing "almost nothing" in the way of letting other countries hear U.S. symphony orchestras.

"There is no possible debating the fact that the very best makes a far greater impression than any number of second or third bests," Mr. Mazzeo said.

"I have been continually disturbed with the trend in the last years, watching the new stream of musical ambassadors we are sending forth," he said. "While all of them are fine exponents of their particular parts of our musical life, it seems almost incomprehensible to me that we have been sending abroad these various musical forces almost to the exclusion of our great orchestras."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
SEP 10 1963

U.S Exports Too Much Jazz?

WASHINGTON — Is the United States exporting too much hot and cool and not enough long hair?

Yes claimed a Boston Symphony Orchestra official here on Monday.

Rosario Mazzeo, testifying before a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee, said he had nothing against jazz. But he felt that the top American symphony orchestras were not getting their share of overseas tours in the cultural exchange program as compared to jazz outfits.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 50,000
SEP 21 1963

Only Best Acts for O'seas, AFM Head Tells Committee

WASHINGTON — Nothing but the best and the pros in performing arts should be sent overseas in the cultural exchange program. This was the tenor of testimony last week by Herman Kenin, president of the American Federation of Musicians, and a roster of leaders in the performance field before a House subcommittee studying the effectiveness of U. S. entries in the exchange program.

Kenin's testimony did not disparge the talented amateur groups participating, but said the hard facts are that America is in competition with the best Europe has to offer in the way of performing artistry. The cultural exchange is a part of a greater competition between the free and the non-free world. The professional, by the vary nature of his experience, is most suited to the needs of the program, Kenin pointed out.

This country should also raise the "meager annual appropriation" for the talent tours to where fine orchestras, dance and drama companies can perform at their best. This idea was fervently seconded by Angus Duncan, of Actors' Equity Association, and Hal Holbrook, who has toured with his one-man "Evening With Mark Twain."

Members of the International Organizations Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee were told that while U. S. spends a measly $2.5 million a year on its whole program, England has spent $65 million, France $50 million, and West Germany $13 million. Soviet figures are under wraps, but they send nothing but the best, indicating a good-sized budget for their ballet and other dance and orchestral groups.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's personnel manager, Rosario Mazzeo, said America's great orchestras play too small a role in the program as compared to other musical specialty groups. Mazzeo said the various nationalities represented in every symphony orchestra make close liaison with fellow nationals in European countries visited.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 342,056 S. 394,039
SEP 12 1963

'Professionals Boost Cultural Image More'

Performances by professionals in the arts have the greatest impact on the most people when it comes to the United States' cultural image abroad, the House Foreign Relations subcommittee heard recently.

Testifying at a session chaired by Florida Rep. Dante B. Fascell were Herman Kenin, president, and Stanley Ballard, secretary of the American Federation of Musicians. Also heard was Rosario Mazzeo, long-time personnel director of the Boston Symphony.

All deplored the State Department's trend toward greater use of college units in its programming and urged that money be made available to send more professional groups and individual performers.

Kenin pointed that "we still are spending but two and a half million a year on cultural relations, with no increase of appropriation since 1954." He emphasized that "only the best is good enough" for American image-making abroad.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267
OCT 17 1963

AT EXHIBIT — Photographs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taken by Milton Feinberg of the Boris and Milton Studios, are currently on exhibit at the Boston Public Library in Copley Square. Discussing the exhibit, which will continue through the month are (left to right) Laning Humphrey, Boston Pops Program annotator; Milton Feinberg, photographer and Thomas J. Manning, Chief of the Exhibit Office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
MALDEN, Mass.
Circ. 10,537

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Mercury (e)
MEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 7,611
OCT 8 1963

Panel to Discuss Cultural Support

BOSTON — Management's responsibility to Boston culture will be discussed by a panel of distinguished Bostonians at a special luncheon sponsored by the Executives Club of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce Tuesday, Oct. 15, at the Sheraton Plaza Hotel, it was announced by George L. Rohrbough, Club president and president of the Chandler School for Women.

Program participants will be Erich Leinsdorf, music director, The Boston Symphony Orchestra; Nelson W. Aldrich, partner, Campbell and Aldrich Architects and Erwin D. Canham, editor, The Christian Science Monitor. Alan A. Smith of Arthur D. Little, Inc., Executives Club program chairman, will introduce the speakers.

Mr. Leinsdorf will provide the artist's viewpoint on culture. Mr. Canhm will respond to the question "Why support culture?" Mr. Aldrich will outline how culture is supported.

228

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
SEP 10 1963

Symphony Orchestras Held Neglected by State Dept.

Washington — (UPI) — A Boston Symphony Orchestra official claimed yesterday that America's great orchestras are playing second fiddle to jazz bands sent overseas by the State Department.

Rosario Mazzeo, the symphony's personnel director, had nothing unkind to say about jazz musicians during a House foreign affairs subcommittee. But he wondered why the United States was not tooting its horns for symphony orchestras.

He said the United States is doing "almost nothing" in the way of letting other countries hear U.S. symphony orchestras.

"There is no possible debating the fact that the very best makes a far greater impression than any number of second or third bests," Mr. Mazzeo said.

"I have been continually disturbed with the trend in the last years, watching the new stream of musical ambassadors we are sending forth," he said. "While all of them are fine exponents of their particular parts of our musical life, it seems almost incomprehensible to me that we have been sending abroad these various musical forces almost to the exclusion of our great orchestras."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
SEP 10 1963

U.S Exports Too Much Jazz?

WASHINGTON — Is the United States exporting too much hot and cool and not enough long hair?

Yes claimed a Boston Symphony Orchestra official here on Monday.

Rosario Mazzeo, testifying before a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee, said he had nothing against jazz. But he felt that the top American symphony orchestras were not getting their share of overseas tours in the cultural exchange program as compared to jazz outfits.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 50,000
SEP 21 1963

Only Best Acts for O'seas, AFM Head Tells Committee

WASHINGTON — Nothing but the best and the pros in performing arts should be sent overseas in the cultural exchange program. This was the tenor of testimony last week by Herman Kenin, president of the American Federation of Musicians, and a roster of leaders in the performance field before a House subcommittee studying the effectiveness of U. S. entries in the exchange program.

Kenin's testimony did not disparge the talented amateur groups participating, but said the hard facts are that America is in competition with the best Europe has to offer in the way of performing artistry. The cultural exchange is a part of a greater competition between the free and the non-free world. The professional, by the vary nature of his experience, is most suited to the needs of the program, Kenin pointed out.

This country should also raise the "meager annual appropriation" for the talent tours to where fine orchestras, dance and drama companies can perform at their best. This idea was vehemently seconded by Angus Duncan, of Actors' Equity Association, and Hal Holbrook, who has toured with his one-man "Evening With Mark Twain."

Members of the International Organizations Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee were told that while U. S. spends a measly $2.5 million a year on its whole program, England has spent $65 million, France $50 million, and West Germany $13 million. Soviet figures are under wraps, but they send nothing but the best, indicating a good-sized budget for their ballet and other dance and orchestral groups.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's personnel manager, Rosario Mazzeo, said America's great orchestras play too small a role in the program as compared to other musical specialty groups. Mazzeo said the various nationalities represented in every symphony orchestra make close liaison with fellow nationals in European countries visited.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 342,056 S. 394,039
SEP 12 1963

'Professionals Boost Cultural Image More'

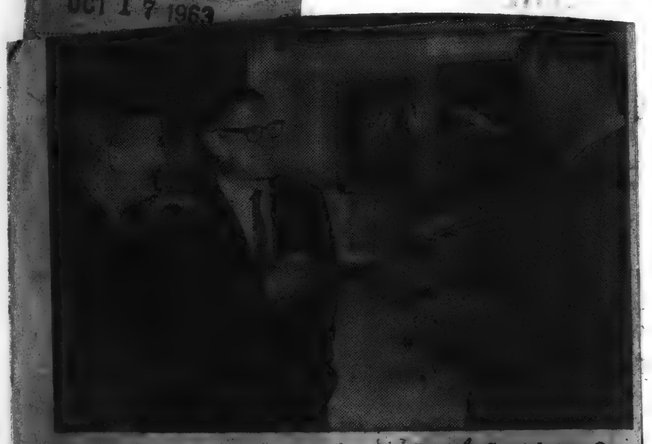
Performances by professionals in the arts have the greatest impact on the most people when it comes to the United States' cultural image abroad, the House Foreign Relations subcommittee heard recently.

Testifying at a session chaired by Florida Rep. Dante B. Fascell were Herman Kenin, president, and Stanley Ballard, secretary of the American Federation of Musicians. Also heard was Rosario Mazzeo, long-time personnel director of the Boston Symphony.

All deplored the State Department's trend toward greater use of college units in its programming and urged that money be made available to send more professional groups and individual performers.

Kenin pointed that "we still are spending but two and a half million a year on cultural relations, with no increase of appropriation since 1954." He emphasized that "only the best is good enough" for American image-making abroad.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267
OCT 17 1963



AT EXHIBIT — Photographs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taken by Milton Feinberg of the Boris and Milton Studios, are currently on exhibit at the Boston Public Library in Copley Square. Discussing the exhibit, which will continue through the month are (left to right) Laning Humphrey, Boston Pops Program annotator; Milton Feinberg, photographer and Thomas J. Manning, Chief of the Exhibit Office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
MALDEN, Mass.
Circ. 10,537
OCT 8 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Mercury (e)
MEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 7,611
OCT 8 1963

Panel to Discuss Cultural Support

BOSTON — Management's responsibility to Boston culture will be discussed by a panel of distinguished Bostonians at a special luncheon sponsored by the Executives Club of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce Tuesday, Oct. 15, at the Sheraton Plaza Hotel, it was announced by George I. Rohrbough, Club president and president of the Chandler School for Women.

Program participants will be Erich Leinsdorf, music director, The Boston Symphony Orchestra; Nelson W. Aldrich, partner, Campbell and Aldrich Architects and Erwin D. Canham, editor, The Christian Science Monitor. Alan A. Smith of Arthur D. Little, Inc., Executives Club program chairman, will introduce the speakers.

Mr. Leinsdorf will provide the artist's viewpoint on culture. Mr. Canhm will respond to the question "Why support culture?" Mr. Aldrich will outline how culture is supported.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

Invest in Culture, Businessmen Urged

By EDGAR J. DRISCOLL JR.

It is time that Boston business and industry assume more responsibility for the cultural life of the community, Erich Leinsdorf told a group of businessmen in the Sheraton-Plaza Tuesday.

The occasion was a luncheon meeting of the Executives Club of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, attended by contributors to the artistic life of Greater Boston as special guests.

"It is perfectly evident that the sources of wealth in this country are shifting from individuals to corporations, and it is time for business to look to its responsibilities," the Boston Symphony conductor said.

"Directors and shareholders alike must recognize their obligation to the arts and become familiar with the cultural necessity of deficits."

He said the deficits of leading cultural organizations are "a necessary by-product of the good life. Our great concert halls should welcome music lovers for moderate prices, museums also, but the cost has to be borne by someone.

"Here, in a city that earned the reputation of being the 'Athens of America,' it should be the concern of community pride to keep it in most excellent condition, for the gap between earned income and expenses continues to grow."

Nelson Aldrich, chairman of the Board of the Boston Arts Festival and president of Metropolitan Boston Arts Center, said it "is within the power of the civic and business leaders in this audience to make or break the cultural life of this community."

Criticizing the "tremendous imbalance in the proportion of the dollar donated to our cultural organizations" compared with other causes, Aldrich cited figures from the just-released annual report of one of the city's largest charitable foundations. It showed he said "that out of a total of $1,800,000, only 0.7 percent, or $13,000, was given to the arts."

Of this, he said, "it is interesting to note that the Museum of Fine Arts received $37.04 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra $2000 for Youth Concerts."

He called for the organization and establishment of "charitbale foundation under the laws of the State of Massachusetts, to which all business and industry would be urged to contribute.

The third panel speaker, Erwin D. Canham, editor of The Christian Science Monitor and former national president of the Chamber of Commerce, said "An investment in culture is a direct investment in the kind of people we must have if our community is to continue and survive . . . Here we have a strong blend of many cultural heritages . . . Ours can and must be a better community."

Dr. George I. Rhorbough presided, Allen H. Smith of Arthur D. Little Co., was chairman.

Smith announced formation of an ad hoc cultural committee of the Chamber of Commerce to provide active cooperation between the Boston business and cultural world. At its first meeting in November it will consider ways of supplying the managerial talents of chamber members to cultural organizations in need of assistance. It will not engage in the raising of money or applying it, Smith said.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 20 1963

IT'S ALWAYS MUSIC as Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, enjoys quiet interlude in Brookline home between rehearsals and concerts of 83d season, which opened Sept. 27. At left, Daughter Jennifer practices pizzicato on violin as Mrs. Leinsdorf and her husband listen. Daughter Hester ponders school homework assignment.

EnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 27 1963

Robert Taylor's Notes

Some Symphony Patrons Irked by Intrusion of TV

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The practice of televising 'live' symphonc concerts is certainly not to be deplored. Its advantages are obvious from a standpoint of education and general cultural exposure. Lately, however, several correspondents to this department have complained about the mechanics involved.

These critics seem to us valid, just as valid as the televised concert, and they present a dilemma. The are subscribers and patrons who feel their enjoyment is circumscribed by the presence of cameras and lights. For the sake of the mass audience, they consider themselves penalized.

The ubiquitous television camera has made itself evident at many concerts during the past year or so. The opening of Philharmonic Hall at The Lincoln Center offered the picture of technicians in tail coats dollying their cameras across the stage.

The free concert of The Harvard School Chorus at Sanders Theater last August was also televised, and to make room for the necessary equipment part of a large and eager crowd of students had to be turned away.

This season has already witnessed the filming of a concert by London's Royal Philharmonic and the former Cambridge series of The Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony Hall balcony is now adorned by shaded lamps for video purposes.

MUSIC ★ ★ ★
DRAMA ★ ★ ★ FILMS

Patron's Choice

One would hail this development were it not for the discomfiture to the musicians and the public sensitive toward intrusion. Many people have paid, after all, five or six dollars a seat; and with this outlay, it seems to us, they have a reasonable expectation of comfortable surroundings. They are willing to subsidize the first-hand experience when, indeed, they might be more relaxed during the free concert at home.

Television lights are hot and blinding. At times the equipment blocks sight lines. One woman, occupying a relatively good position in the first balcony now states with understandable rancor that she can't see a thing. Another says the lights make her perspire like a sun-bitten Eskimo. And report has it that a not infrequent sight on Tuesday evenings is the flutter of balcony seat programs used as fans.

There is enough substance to pause. The audience of the future deserves consideration, but what about the actual orchestral supporters? Television has long since become integral to our culture. Nevertheless, there wouldn't be any culture to televise without the paying customer. The development of resources of technique might help: the low-key bulb, the miniature camera. Otherwise we can see no easy solution. Television is here to stay, let us hope the subscribers are tolerant.

230

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 28,717
NOV 15 1963

Sanford Sistare Named Head of BSO Press Office

Sanford R. Sistare

Sanford R. Sistare, formerly of Pittsfield, has been named head of the Boston Symphony press office to succeed Harry Beall, who is joining a talent management firm in New York.

Mr. Sistare is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Willard Sistare of Storrs, Conn., former Pittsfield residents. He graduated from Berkshire School in 1946 and received an M.A. in American Civilization from the University of Pennsylvania in 1957. After service in the Air Force, Mr. Sistare taught in private schools before joining the press department of the BSO.

Mr. Sistare is married to the former Mary Anne Littleton of Ardmore, Pa. They and their five children live in Boston.

Mr. Beall resigned to become a vice president of Judson, O'Neill, Beall and Steinway. The firm was formed shortly after Arthur Judson, who is now in his 82nd year, left Columbia Artists management, which he formed in 1932.

William Judd, son of former Boston Symphony manager, George E. Judd, is now one of the owners of Columbia Artists.

The parting between Mr. Judson and the men who now control Columbia Artists was reported in the New York press as less than amicable. In his new firm, Mr. Judson will be associated with Ruth O'Neill, one of his associates at Columbia, Mr. Beall and Frederick Steinway, a member of the piano family.

Leonard Bernstein is among the artists Mr. Judson's new company will manage. Mr. Bernstein has been under Judson management since the beginning of his conducting career. The new company will announce its complete roster of new artists in the near future.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Monitor & New Hampshire Patriot (e)
CONCORD, N. H.
Circ. 13,613
NOV 6 1963

NOT SYMPHONY'S BEST

Editor, Monitor-Patriot: It is not the fault of the Gile Fund Committee that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should come to Concord and give a careless, callous, cavalier performance such as the one given in the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon.

In spite of Mr. Gagliuso's well-intentioned review in the November 4 issue of your newspaper I think certain things need to be said. And I know that I am not one voice in the saying.

Over the years I have been a regular attendant at the Boston concerts. I have heard the orchestra on tour, and many times at Tanglewood. I have heard performances that brought the audience to its feet. I have been moved to tears. But deeply moving or not, the music has always come through with the purest brilliance, and was what one could expect from the epitome of personal technique, exceptional discipline and superlative leadership.

The half-hearted accolade at the conclusion of yesterday's concert was a pathetic tribute to what the orchestra means to the music public. It was not a tribute to anything heard during the afternoon's concert.

Trying to excuse the performance to myself, I reviewed in my mind the poor accommodations, the crowding of the players, the bare brick walls. Even if these were detrimental there was no excuse for the thinly disguised horseplay that was going on between the three first desks; Samuel Mayes, cello, di Pasquale, first violist, and first violin Silverstein. This was visible even in the balcony, as well as to persons in the first row seats. It's a far cry from the dedicated orchestra of other years. It compares badly with the Warsaw Orchestra which played on the same stage under the same conditions. It is the first concert I have attended in Concord where the performing artists seemed totally indifferent to the audience reaction.

Some years ago one of the Boston Symphony violinists, shrugging off a concert played under a guest conductor to whom the orchestra was antagonistic said "We are so good ...we play anyway". This was one of the Russian coterie, a great personal egotist, speaking off the record. But it was true at the time... that time is obviously past.

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as advertised, is to play, then it should play at full strength, under its regular conductor. Surely the amount of money available in the Gile Fund to hire it, merits us a first class performance.

DOROTHY WYMAN

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
NOV 15 1963

Most Happy Music Lover

Wishes And Receives

By STANLEY CARR

Music-lover John Tapper, 78, admires nothing more than the skill of an orchestra conductor.

He has often dreamed of watching a top conductor perfecting the performance of a symphony orchestra at a final rehearsal.

So he put his longfelt wish into words by sending this message to the Traveler's "My Secret Ambition" column: "To witness a rehearsal of Boston Symphony and see how a conductor builds up a composition with the instruments."

He achieved his ambition last night, thanks to officials at Symphony Hall.

The grey-haired piano technician from 14 Aberdeen St., Newton Highlands, watched music director Erich Leinsdorf's baton guide Boston Symphony Orchestra and violinist George Zazofsky at one of the orchestra's famed "open" rehearsals.

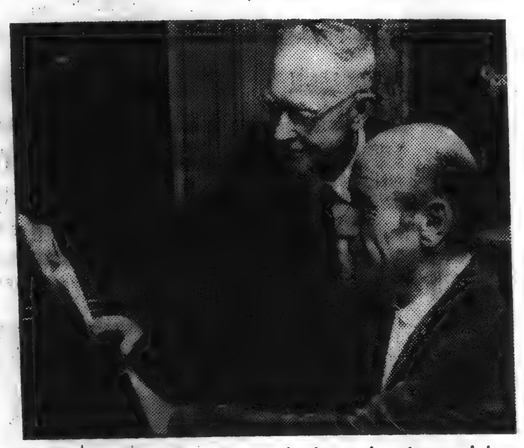
Tapper saw Leinsdorf advise the strings, woodwind or other section on how an alteration would improve the performance. The conductor called for softer notes here, smoother playing there . . . or more attack in another passage.

"It was a wonderful experience, very exciting," said Tapper, a former accountant who began his piano tuning business 35 years ago. "It was fascinating to me because I used to conduct amateur orchestras and know all the instruments."

The BSO'S open rehearsals began 13 years ago when students complained that subscribers snapped up all concert tickets. So eight rehearsals a season were opened to them.

Popularity of the rehearsals spread rapidly, and now they are sold out well in advance.

Tapper, a former president of the old Boston Piano Tuners Assn., was given a special ticket so he could join the 2,600 other music-lovers packing the hall.



THANKS TO 'My Secret Ambition' column John Tapper, left, of Newton Highlands goes over a score with Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director. The pair met last night during rehearsal break.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
DEC 2 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 18 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810
NOV 17 1963

HENRY B. CABOT, president of the Symphony Orchestra trustees, receives scroll from George Zazofsky, orchestra chairman (right), announcing his donation of scholarship for study at the Berkshire Music Center. Scene is at dinner honoring the donor at the Hotel Somerset.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
NOV 16 1963

Service to Symphony

Henry B. Cabot was presented a scroll honoring his 0 years as a trustee of Boston Symphony Orchestra y George Zazofsky, symphony chairman, at Somerset Hotel dinner last night, given in Cabot's honor y orchestra members.

230

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 28,717
NOV 15 1963

Sanford Sistare Named Head of BSO Press Office

Sanford R. Sistare

Sanford R. Sistare, formerly of Pittsfield, has been named head of the Boston Symphony press office to succeed Harry Beall, who is joining a talent management firm in New York.

Mr. Sistare is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Willard Sistare of Storrs, Conn., former Pittsfield residents. He graduated from Berkshire School in 1946 and received an M.A. in American Civilization from the University of Pennsylvania in 1957. After service in the Air Force, Mr. Sistare taught in private schools before joining the press department of the BSO.

Mr. Sistare is married to the former Mary Anne Littleton of Ardmore, Pa. They and their five children live in Boston.

Mr. Beall resigned to become a vice president of Judson, O'Neill, Beall and Steinway. The firm was formed shortly after Arthur Judson, who is now in his 82nd year, left Columbia Artists management, which he formed in 1932.

William Judd, son of former Boston Symphony manager, George E. Judd, is now one of the owners of Columbia Artists.

The parting between Mr. Judson and the men who now control Columbia Artists was reported in the New York press as less than amicable. In his new firm, Mr. Judson will be associated with Ruth O'Neill, one of his associates at Columbia, Mr. Beall and Frederick Steinway, a member of the piano family.

Leonard Bernstein is among the artists Mr. Judson's new company will manage. Mr. Bernstein has been under Judson management since the beginning of his conducting career. The new company will announce its complete roster of new artists in the near future.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Monitor & New Hampshire Patriot (e)
CONCORD, N. H.
Circ. 13,613
NOV 6 1963

NOT SYMPHONY'S BEST

Editor, Monitor-Patriot: It is not the fault of the Gile Fund Committee that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should come to Concord and give a careless, callous, cavalier performance such as the one given in the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon.

In spite of Mr. Gagliuso's well-intentioned review in the November 4 issue of your newspaper I think certain things need to be said. And I know that I am not one voice in the saying.

Over the years I have been a regular attendant at the Boston concerts. I have heard the orchestra on tour, and many times at Tanglewood. I have heard performances that brought the audience to its feet. I have been moved to tears. But deeply moving or not, the music has always come through with the purest brilliance, and was what one could expect from the epitome of personal technique, exceptional discipline and superlative leadership.

The half-hearted accolade at the conclusion of yesterday's concert was a pathetic tribute to what the orchestra means to the music public. It was not a tribute to anything heard during the afternoon's concert.

Trying to excuse the performance to myself, I reviewed in my mind the poor accommodations, the crowding of the players, the bare brick walls. Even if these were detrimental there was no excuse for the thinly disguised horseplay that was going on between the three first desks; Samuel Mayes, cello, di Pasquale, first violist, and first violin Silverstein. This was visible even in the balcony, as well as to persons in the first row seats. It's a far cry from the dedicated orchestra of other years. It compares badly with the Warsaw Orchestra which played on the same stage under the same conditions. It is the first concert I have attended in Concord where the performing artists seemed totally indifferent to the audience reaction.

Some years ago one of the Boston Symphony violinists, shrugging off a concert played under a guest conductor to whom the orchestra was antagonistic said "We are so good ...we play anyway". This was one of the Russian coterie, a great personal egotist, speaking off the record. But it was true at the time... that time is obviously past.

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as advertised, is to play, then it should play at full strength, under its regular conductor. Surely the amount of money available in the Gile Fund to hire it, merits us a first class performance.

DOROTHY WYMAN

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
NOV 15 1963

Most Happy Music Lover

Wishes And Receives

By STANLEY CARR

Music-lover John Tapper, 78, admires nothing more than the skill of an orchestra conductor.

He has often dreamed of watching a top conductor perfecting the performance of a symphony orchestra at a final rehearsal.

So he put his longfelt wish into words by sending this message to the Traveler's "My Secret Ambition" column: "To witness a rehearsal of Boston Symphony and see how a conductor builds up a composition with the instruments."

He achieved his ambition last night, thanks to officials at Symphony Hall.

The grey-haired piano technician from 14 Aberdeen St., Newton Highlands, watched music director Erich Leinsdorf's baton guide Boston Symphony Orchestra and violinist George Zazofsky at one of the orchestra's famed "open" rehearsals.

Tapper saw Leinsdorf advise the strings, woodwind or other section on how an alteration would improve the performance. The conductor called for softer notes here, smoother playing there . . . or more attack in another passage.

"It was a wonderful experience, very exciting," said Tapper, a former accountant who began his piano tuning business 35 years ago. "It was fascinating to me because I used to conduct amateur orchestras and know all the instruments."

The BSO'S open rehearsals began 13 years ago when students complained that subscribers snapped up all concert tickets. So eight rehearsals a season were opened to them.

Popularity of the rehearsals spread rapidly, and now they are sold out well in advance.

Tapper, a former president of the old Boston Piano Tuners Assn., was given a special ticket so he could join the 2,600 other music-lovers packing the hall.

THANKS TO 'My Secret Ambition' column John Tapper, left, of Newton Highlands goes over a score with Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director. The pair met last night during rehearsal break.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
NOV 16 1963

Service to Symphony

Henry B. Cabot was presented a scroll honoring his 0 years as a trustee of Boston Symphony Orchestra y George Zazofsky, symphony chairman, at Somerset Hotel dinner last night, given in Cabot's honor y orchestra members.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
DEC 2 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 18 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810
NOV 17 1963

HENRY B. CABOT, president of the Symphony Orchestra trustees, receives scroll from George Zazofsky, orchestra chairman (right), announcing his donation of scholarship for study at the Berkshire Music Center. Scene is at dinner honoring the donor at the Hotel Somerset.

MUSIC

The Ultra-Rational Maestro

by Eric Salzman

RECOMMENDED RECORDINGS BY ERICH LEINSDORF

BARTOK: Concerto for Orchestra with the Boston Symphony Orchestra
STRAUSS: "Ein Heldenleben" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra
TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1 with Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra
MENDELSSOHN: Incidental Music from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra
WAGNER: "Die Walküre" (complete) with Birgit Nilsson, Jon Vickers, Rita Gorr, George London
PUCCINI: "Madame Butterfly" (complete) with Leontyne Price and Richard Tucker
All the above were released by RCA Victor.

The arrival of Erich Leinsdorf in Boston last year constituted a major artistic upheaval. For years the Symphony was oriented toward French style and tradition. Conductors like Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Serge Koussevitzky (who had a typical Russian affinity for French style) gave the orchestra a glowing richness of sound and, in the case of the latter two, a warm, romantic approach often set forth in terms of great interpretive flexibility and an almost improvisatory freedom. Nothing could be more remote from the Leinsdorf leanness and classicism. If Munch represents the conductor as hypnotist, Leinsdorf is simply the ultra-rational man.

A Leinsdorf rehearsal is a superb demonstration of musical efficiency. Physical motion is simple and perhaps a little angular; it is designed to inform and clarify everything for the musicians. Quickly and effortlessly, Leinsdorf will stop the orchestra, smooth out a detail, explain a fine point, adjust a balance, peel off a musical layer for examination and then put it back in place. Sometimes, especially at a recording session, where time is exceptionally valuable, he will stop the men, call out a measure number and pull everyone back for a retake with hardly a moment's pause. The sheer mastery of the technique can be breathtaking.

But things have not always been that easy. Leinsdorf can be the most charming man in the world, but when all does not go well and his mood turns, a perfectionist anger and despair rises to the surface. The pressure from the podium can become unbearable, and the players literally go in fear for their jobs. Some of his artistic battles have been fought with famous soloists and singers, most notably with Flagstad and Melchior, in the days when he first conducted at the Metropolitan Opera in the late Thirties and early Forties. The great Lotte Lehmann, who was famous for her interpretation of the Marschallin in "Der Rosenkavalier," was once standing with a group of friends and admirers after a performance of the opera when Leinsdorf came up. "Well, Lotte," he said, "when are you going to learn the Marschallin?"

When the Boston Symphony job opened up, few observers thought of Leinsdorf as a candidate for the position; the announcement of his appointment was greeted with incredulity. Yet the Boston public has been taken with the man and his style, and they like the cut of the new, crisp orchestral sound that he produces. Even the most critical observers have been impressed with the orchestra's new discipline and with a new pride of accomplishment that animates some really remarkable musical results.

In one important respect, Boston is perfect for the Leinsdorf approach. Here is a great orchestra, exceptional even among fine American symphonic organizations for its extraordinary esprit de corps; the players take really great pride in the high quality of the musical results they have achieved with Leinsdorf. Some players and some orchestras will test a conductor with wrong notes, with lazy, muddy playing of inner parts and sly, skillful faking of difficult passages. Some conductors do not know the difference or do not care; Leinsdorf does. It is doubtful whether any orchestral musician in his right mind would even dream of trying such stunts on him; certainly the Boston musicians are overwhelmingly impressed by a musical mind and ear that knows and controls every aspect of a score and its realization.

Some of the players do admit that a great deal of the real excitement in the orchestra comes during rehearsal. By concert time, everything is prepared so magnificently and to such perfection that the actual performance sometimes proves to be a letdown. But many of the players and other observers insist that this is due, at least partly, to the lack of visual extravagance in the conducting. With all the real work done at rehearsal, the concert technique is limited to cues and reminders of previous decisions.

Leinsdorf's career is an incredible story of a man who started at the top and then, literally, had to fight his way back up. His first really major engagement was at the Metropolitan Opera conducting Flagstad in Wagner; he was 25. The year was 1937 and he had just arrived in this country, a fabulously gifted, self-confident young man who was almost without credentials. He had virtually none of the formal traditional academic training; his studies in Vienna consisted mainly of private lessons in piano and composition. Leinsdorf got his start through his association with Schönberg's ultra-avant-garde pupil, Anton Webern, who conducted a chorus for which Leinsdorf served as assistant conductor and rehearsal pianist. One day Toscanini came to town to conduct a choral work by the Hungarian modern, Zoltan Kodaly. A rehearsal pianist who knew the work was needed on very short notice and there was only one man in town who filled the bill: Leinsdorf. He had studied and performed the work with Webern and was thus able to step in without difficulty. Toscanini was impressed and engaged the young man as a rehearsal pianist and assistant conductor for the Salzburg Festival. In 1936, he left Austria for a tour of Italian opera houses, his first real experience as a professional conductor. One year later he was at the Met.

Exactly how Leinsdorf managed this enormous leap from obscurity to one of the great podiums of the world is not completely clear, but two considerations seem to have been decisive: the Met was desperately in need of a Wagner conductor in a hurry, and Leinsdorf had Toscanini's recommendation. The Met, for many years an Italian opera house with a small German wing, suddenly discovered that, thanks to the great successes of Flagstad and Melchior, Wagner was a popular composer. Artur Bodanzky, then director of the company's German repertoire, was ill and unable to handle the great increase in Wagnerian performances. Leinsdorf came in, once again, as a rehearsal pianist and assistant conductor, but was soon rushed into the pit. Two years later Bodanzky died, and the young conductor, now all of 27, fell heir to the entire German repertory: ten long operas, 70 grueling performances and an endless round of rehearsals, run-throughs and changes of cast.

It was probably inevitable that the coincidence of a brilliant young conductor and two great and established vocal stars would produce fireworks. There were countless artistic clashes, and Leinsdorf now admits that he lacked the tact and diplomacy to handle the situations. With a wry smile, he tells of an exchange with Melchior about a tempo that the singer thought was too slow. After several relentless rounds of Leinsdorf logic, the tenor finally broke in: "All right, all right, I won't argue with you about artistic rightness, but at that tempo no one can sing this music three times a week."

Leinsdorf talks about his problems at the Met with surprising objectivity. "Very frankly," he now says, "I think that, with more maturity, (Continued on page 52)

Leinsdorf: How to cause a major upheaval

I would have handled the situation differently. This is not a matter of giving in on basic questions of artistic integrity and policy; it's simply that if I'd been less stubborn, something could have been worked out."

In 1943, Leinsdorf left the Met for the Cleveland Orchestra—and another controversy. The conductor, now an American citizen, was called up by a local draft board shortly after his arrival in Cleveland. A story appeared in one of the Cleveland papers stating that he would, of course, never be inducted into the army; Leinsdorf supporters claim that this was an intentional maneuver to embarrass the draft board and force their hand. Whatever the truth of the matter, Leinsdorf was inducted into the U.S. Army and served an unhappy hitch as a draftee (the mere idea of Buck Private Leinsdorf taking orders from some tough, crude top sergeant boggles the imagination). He was discharged in 1944 and was soon back in Cleveland for a brief and stormy return engagement. Then, after a short stay at the Met again and a period of guest conducting, he went back to Rochester where he directed the orchestra for nine years, building it into a major ensemble before the parting of the ways in 1956. Leinsdorf looks back on the Rochester experience with a great deal of pleasure, and he regards the city as one of the most musical throughout the country.

He then accepted the directorship of the New York City Opera Company and conducted a season there that was artistically successful but a financial disaster. The company was already in a state of economic crisis when Leinsdorf took over; even before his arrival, the spring season of 1957 had been canceled. The one season he did direct included the New York premiere of Carlisle Floyd's "Susannah" as well as other modern works by Stravinsky, Carl Orff and Frank Martin. The critics were all in favor of this kind of pioneering, and the policy set in that season put the company on the path that was to lead to its American opera seasons of recent years and to the Ford Foundation American opera program. But 1956 was apparently too early for this kind of effort; at any rate, the public did not support it; a bad financial situation turned into a near-disaster, and Leinsdorf and the New York City Opera parted company with recriminations on both sides.

Even while Leinsdorf was briefly manning the shaky helm of the City Center, he had again resumed his relationship with the Met, now under the direction of a fellow Viennese, Rudolf Bing. In 1957, Bing asked him to become the company's "Musical Consultant," and he continued to hold this position and conduct a varied Met repertoire until the move to Boston this year.

It was during this last period that Leinsdorf began his notable series of operatic recordings for RCA Victor, a group of discs now being supplemented by his new symphonic recordings with the Boston Symphony. Leinsdorf succeeded in persuading the company to revise their whole technique of stereophonic recordings in Symphony Hall. The engineers had been pulling out all the main-floor seats and putting the orchestra in the orchestra—that is, where the audience usually sits. Leinsdorf was horrified. Symphony Hall is almost unanimously regarded as one of the great halls of the world and the conductor insisted that a more faithful sound and better musical results could be achieved with the orchestra onstage in something like its normal concert position. Incredibly enough, RCA agreed to give the conductor a special experimental test session with the orchestra and with every possible engineering technique and facility; the joke making the rounds at the time was that all other recording sessions in the East had to be canceled because every available microphone was in Boston. The results of the session convinced company officials that Leinsdorf was right, and the recordings that followed seem to have been equally convincing to the critics and the public.

There seems to be little question the Orchestra's board, in looking for a new conductor, was conscious of the importance of finding someone who would revitalize Tanglewood. Obviously there were other considerations — Leinsdorf's enormous success as a guest conductor in Boston was undoubtedly a deciding factor—but Tanglewood loomed large from the start. And there is little doubt that from the moment Leinsdorf was approached about the job, he was mentally taking the measure of the Festival. His idea is to give Tanglewood the character of a real Festival and a major musical center. He envisions the training activities of the Berkshire Music Center, not as a "school"—he has abolished the word from the catalogues—but as a kind of post-graduate artistic community where young musicians of professional standing can gain badly needed artistic experience working with older colleagues in a serious musical atmosphere free from the professional hurly-burly that catches up with the young artist today at an increasingly early age. With the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation, more modern music is being studied and performed. The whole field of chamber music, old and new, has been expanded, with the aim of broadening and deepening the artistic experience of the young musician. Musically, Leinsdorf's first season this past summer at Tanglewood was one of the Festival's most rewarding, and, certainly, it was the best-attended of them all.

All of Leinsdorf's innovations have been carefully planned and introduced with all deliberate speed; an avant-gardist would not find his programing extraordinary, but there has already been some grumbling from old-line Boston subscribers (they seem to have forgotten what a great center of modern ideas Boston was in the days of Koussevitzky who, in fact, founded Tanglewood in a spirit of vitality and forward-looking enterprise). A typical letter of complaint was printed in a Symphony Hall program last season together with Leinsdorf's reply. "While some of the greatest and most appealing composers have been omitted or barely represented," wrote the disgruntled subscriber, "there has been an overbalance of long-winded cerebral works of composers who have nothing to say to the lay music lover . . . the raspingly cacophonous Bartok, the abstruse and abstract Stravinsky, the tortured and prolix Shostakovich."

"Every generation," Leinsdorf wrote in reply, "produces a number of minor composers whose importance is more or less limited. I am not quite as certain in my quick recognition of the composer's importance or lack of importance as you are. . . . Be assured that the clamor from the other side of the fence for more contemporary music is possibly stronger than your protest. About the composers you mentioned, I beg to differ. . . . These are vast subjects of esthetics, but I repeat that by the end of 24 programs you will have found a very, very large representation of the classic and romantic repertoire . . ."

Leinsdorf's policies in this respect are clear; the classics are rotated with care, and new works of all schools, as well as lesser known and more specialized corners of the past, are introduced with careful attention to value, variety and proportion. "In an extensive season," he says, "people should get a 360-degree view of music. Some areas that do not particularly interest me will be worked in through the choice of guest conductors. The basic classical repertory remains the backbone; at the same time it should be handled with great economy so that it preserves its freshness and meaningfulness."

As to the other criticisms, Leinsdorf merely shrugs his shoulders. "The basic parts of music," he insists, "the fundamental phrasing and rhythm which affect every aspect of the sound—these must come from conscious, planned, firm authority. This does not mean that there is only one way to play every kind of music; of course there is not one sound required but many sounds, according to the work. But it is the care and authority of the conductor who must establish this. Everything must be determined and established, first of all in the conductor's mind through his study of the music, and then in rehearsal . . . even a great, free, expressive phrase

SHOW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 130,000
NOV 1963

231

MUSIC

The Ultra-Rational Maestro

by Eric Salzman

RECOMMENDED RECORDINGS
BY ERICH LEINSDORF
RAFF: Concerto for Orchestra with the Boston Symphony Orchestra
STRAUSS: "Ein Heldenleben" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra
TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1 with Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra
MENDELSSOHN: Incidental Music from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra
WAGNER: "Die Walküre" (complete) with Birgit Nilsson, Jon Vickers, Rita Gorr, George London
PUCCINI: "Madame Butterfly" (complete) with Leontyne Price and Richard Tucker
All the above were released by RCA Victor.

The arrival of Erich Leinsdorf in Boston last year constituted a major artistic upheaval. For years the Symphony was oriented toward French style and tradition. Conductors like Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Serge Koussevitzky (who had a typical Russian affinity for French style) gave the orchestra a glowing richness of sound and, in the case of the latter two, a warm, romantic approach often set forth in terms of great interpretive flexibility and an almost improvisatory freedom. Nothing could be more remote from the Leinsdorf leanness and classicism. If Munch represents the conductor as hypnotist, Leinsdorf is simply the ultra-rational man.

A Leinsdorf rehearsal is a superb demonstration of musical efficiency. Physical motion is simple and perhaps a little angular; it is designed to inform and clarify everything for the musicians. Quickly and effortlessly, Leinsdorf will stop the orchestra, smooth out a detail, explain a fine point, adjust a balance, peel off a musical layer for examination and then put it back in place. Sometimes, especially at a recording session, where time is exceptionally valuable, he will stop the men, call out a measure number and pull everyone back for a retake with hardly a moment's pause. The sheer mastery of the technique can be breathtaking.

But things have not always been that easy. Leinsdorf can be the most charming man in the world, but when all does not go well and his mood turns, a perfectionist anger and despair rises to the surface. The pressure from the podium can become unbearable, and the players literally go in fear for their jobs. Some of his artistic battles have been fought with famous soloists and singers, most notably with Flagstad and Melchior, in the days when he first conducted at the Metropolitan Opera in the late Thirties and early Forties. The great Lotte Lehmann, who was famous for her interpretation of the Marschallin in "Der Rosenkavalier," was once standing with a group of friends and admirers after a performance of the opera when Leinsdorf came up. "Well, Lotte," he said, "when are you going to learn the Marschallin?"

When the Boston Symphony job opened up, few observers thought of Leinsdorf as a candidate for the position; the announcement of his appointment was greeted with incredulity. Yet the Boston public has been taken with the man and his style, and they like the cut of the new, crisp orchestral sound that he produces. Even the most critical observers have been impressed with the orchestra's new discipline and with a new pride of accomplishment that animates some really remarkable musical results.

In one important respect, Boston is perfect for the Leinsdorf approach. Here is a great orchestra, exceptional even among fine American symphonic organizations for its extraordinary esprit de corps; the players take really great pride in the high quality of the musical results they have achieved with Leinsdorf. Some players and some orchestras will test a conductor with wrong notes, with lazy, muddy playing of inner parts and sly, skillful faking of difficult passages. Some conductors do not know the difference or do not care; Leinsdorf does. It is doubtful whether any orchestral musician in his right mind would even dream of trying such stunts on him; certainly the Boston musicians are overwhelmingly impressed by a musical mind and ear that knows and controls every aspect of a score and its realization.

Some of the players do admit that a great deal of the real excitement in the orchestra comes during rehearsal. By concert time, everything is prepared so magnificently and to such perfection that the actual performance sometimes proves to be a letdown. But many of the players and other observers insist that this is due, at least partly, to the lack of visual extravagance in the conducting. With all the real work done at rehearsal, the concert technique is limited to cues and reminders of previous decisions.

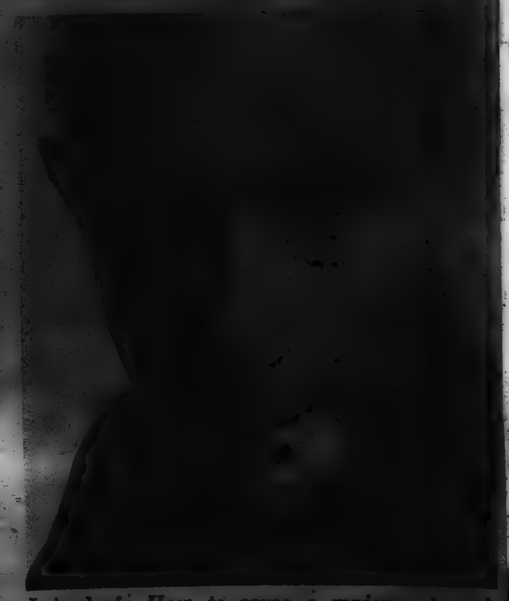
Leinsdorf's career is an incredible story of a man who started at the top and then, literally, had to fight his way back up. His first really major engagement was at the Metropolitan Opera conducting Flagstad in Wagner; he was 25. The year was 1937 and he had just arrived in this country, a fabulously gifted, self-confident young man who was almost without credentials. He had virtually none of the formal traditional academic training; his studies in Vienna consisted mainly of private lessons in piano and composition. Leinsdorf got his start through his association with Schönberg's ultra-avant-garde pupil, Anton Webern, who conducted a chorus for which Leinsdorf served as assistant conductor and rehearsal pianist. One day Toscanini came to town to conduct a choral work by the Hungarian modern, Zoltan Kodaly. A rehearsal pianist who knew the work was needed on very short notice and there was only one man in town who filled the bill: Leinsdorf. He had studied and performed the work with Webern and was thus able to step in without difficulty. Toscanini was impressed and engaged the young man as a rehearsal pianist and assistant conductor for the Salzburg Festival. In 1936, he left Austria for a tour of Italian opera houses, his first real experience as a professional conductor. One year later he was at the Met.

Exactly how Leinsdorf managed this enormous leap from obscurity to one of the great podiums of the world is not completely clear, but two considerations seem to have been decisive: the Met was desperately in need of a Wagner conductor in a hurry, and Leinsdorf had Toscanini's recommendation. The Met, for many years an Italian opera house with a small German wing, suddenly discovered that, thanks to the great successes of Flagstad and Melchior, Wagner was a popular composer. Artur Bodanzky, then director of the company's German repertoire, was ill and unable to handle the great increase in Wagnerian performances. Leinsdorf came in, once again, as a rehearsal pianist and assistant conductor, but was soon rushed into the pit. Two years later Bodanzky died, and the young conductor, now all of 27, fell heir to the entire German repertory: ten long operas, 70 grueling performances and an endless round of rehearsals, run-throughs and changes of cast.

It was probably inevitable that the coincidence of a brilliant young conductor and two great and established vocal stars would produce fireworks. There were countless artistic clashes, and Leinsdorf now admits that he lacked the tact and diplomacy to handle the situations. With a wry smile, he tells of an exchange with Melchior about a tempo that the singer thought was too slow. After several relentless rounds of Leinsdorf logic, the tenor finally broke in: "All right, all right, I won't argue with you about artistic rightness, but at that tempo no one can sing this music three times a week."

Leinsdorf talks about his problems at the Met with surprising objectivity. "Very frankly," he now says, "I think that, with more maturity, I would have handled the situation differently. This is not a matter of giving in on basic questions of artistic integrity and policy; it's simply that if I'd been less stubborn, something could have been worked out."

(Continued on page 52)



Leinsdorf: How to cause a major upheaval

In 1943, Leinsdorf left the Met for the Cleveland Orchestra—and another controversy. The conductor, now an American citizen, was called up by a local draft board shortly after his arrival in Cleveland. A story appeared in one of the Cleveland papers stating that he would, of course, never be inducted into the army; Leinsdorf supporters claim that this was an intentional maneuver to embarrass the draft board and force their hand. Whatever the truth of the matter, Leinsdorf was inducted into the U.S. Army and served an unhappy hitch as a draftee (the mere idea of Buck Private Leinsdorf taking orders from some tough, crude top sergeant boggles the imagination). He was discharged in 1944 and was soon back in Cleveland for a brief and stormy return engagement. Then, after a short stay at the Met again and a period of guest conducting, he went back to Rochester where he directed the orchestra for nine years, building it into a major ensemble before the parting of the ways in 1956. Leinsdorf looks back on the Rochester experience with a great deal of pleasure, and he regards the city as one of the most musical throughout the country.

He then accepted the directorship of the New York City Opera Company and conducted a season there that was artistically successful but a financial disaster. The company was already in a state of economic crisis when Leinsdorf took over, even before his arrival, the spring season of 1957 had been canceled. The one season he did direct included the New York premiere of Carlisle Floyd's "Susannah" as well as other modern works by Stravinsky, Carl Orff and Frank Martin. The critics were all in favor of this kind of pioneering, and the policy set in that season put the company on the path that was to lead to its American opera seasons of recent years and to the Ford Foundation American opera program. But 1956 was apparently too early for this kind of effort; at any rate, the public did not support it; a bad financial situation turned into a near-disaster, and Leinsdorf and the New York City Opera parted company with recriminations on both sides.

Even while Leinsdorf was briefly manning the shaky helm of the City Center, he had again resumed his relationship with the Met, now under the direction of a fellow Viennese, Rudolf Bing. In 1957, Bing asked him to become the company's "Musical Consultant," and he continued to hold this position and conduct a varied Met repertoire until the move to Boston this year.

It was during this last period that Leinsdorf began his notable series of operatic recordings for RCA Victor, a group of discs now being supplemented by his new symphonic recordings with the Boston Symphony. Leinsdorf succeeded in persuading the company to revise their whole technique of stereophonic recordings in Symphony Hall. The engineers had been pulling out all the main-floor seats and putting the orchestra in the orchestra—that is, where the audience usually sits. Leinsdorf was horrified. Symphony Hall is almost unanimously regarded as one of the great halls of the world and the conductor insisted that a more faithful sound and better musical results could be achieved with the orchestra onstage in something like its normal concert position. Incredibly enough, RCA agreed to give the conductor a special experimental test session with the orchestra and with every possible engineering technique and facility; the joke making the rounds at the time was that all other recording sessions in the East had to be canceled because every available microphone was in Boston. The results of the session convinced company officials that Leinsdorf was right, and the recordings that followed seem to have been equally convincing to the critics and the public.

There seems to be little question the Orchestra's board, in looking for a new conductor, was conscious of the importance of finding someone who would revitalize Tanglewood. Obviously there were other considerations — Leinsdorf's enormous success as a guest conductor in Boston was undoubtedly a deciding factor—but Tanglewood loomed large from the start. And there is little doubt that from the moment Leinsdorf was approached about the job, he was mentally taking the measure of the Festival. His idea is to give Tanglewood the character of a real Festival and a major musical center. He envisions the training activities of the Berkshire Music Center, not as a "school"—he has abolished the word from the catalogues—but as a kind of post-graduate artistic community where young musicians of professional standing can gain badly needed artistic experience working with older colleagues in a serious musical atmosphere free from the professional hurly-burly that catches up with the young artist today at an increasingly early age. With the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation, more modern music is being studied and performed. The whole field of chamber music, old and new, has been expanded, with the aim of broadening and deepening the artistic experience of the young musician. Musically, Leinsdorf's first season this past summer at Tanglewood was one of the Festival's most rewarding, and, certainly, it was the best-attended of them all.

All of Leinsdorf's innovations have been carefully planned and introduced with all deliberate speed; an avant-gardist would not find his programing extraordinary, but there has already been some grumbling from old-line Boston subscribers (they seem to have forgotten what a great center of modern ideas Boston was in the days of Koussevitzky who, in fact, founded Tanglewood in a spirit of vitality and forward-looking enterprise). A typical letter of complaint was printed in a Symphony Hall program last season together with Leinsdorf's reply. "While some of the greatest and most appealing composers have been omitted or barely represented," wrote the disgruntled subscriber, "there has been an overbalance of long-winded cerebral works of composers who have nothing to say to the lay music lover . . . the raspingly cacophonous Bartok, the abstruse and abstract Stravinsky, the tortured and prolix Shostakovich."

"Every generation," Leinsdorf wrote in reply, "produces a number of minor composers whose importance is more or less limited. I am not quite as certain in my quick recognition of the composer's importance or lack of importance as you are. . . . Be assured that the clamor from the other side of the fence for more contemporary music is possibly stronger than your protest. About the composers you mentioned, I beg to differ. . . . These are vast subjects of esthetics, but I repeat that by the end of 24 programs you will have found a very, very large representation of the classic and romantic repertoire . . ."

Leinsdorf's policies in this respect are clear; the classics are rotated with care, and new works of all schools, as well as lesser known and more specialized corners of the past, are introduced with careful attention to value, variety and proportion. "In an extensive season," he says, "people should get a 360-degree view of music. Some areas that do not particularly interest me will be worked in through the choice of guest conductors. The basic classical repertory remains the backbone; at the same time it should be handled with great economy so that it preserves its freshness and meaningfulness."

As to the other criticisms, Leinsdorf merely shrugs his shoulders. "The basic parts of music," he insists, "the fundamental phrasing and rhythm which affect every aspect of the sound—these must come from conscious, planned, firm authority. This does not mean that there is only one way to play every kind of music; of course there is not one sound required but many sounds, according to the work. But it is the care and authority of the conductor who must establish this. Everything must be determined and established, first of all in the conductor's mind through his study of the music, and then in rehearsal . . . even a great, free, expressive phrase

SHOW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 130,000
NOV 1963

232

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,319

NOV 18 1963

Iva Dee Hiat, guest conductor of the University of California Chrous this year, is shown with [illegible] conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible], while Miss Hiatt and conductor [illegible] together this summer at Tanglewood [illegible] of the Boston Symphony. Miss Hiatt will [illegible] the University Chorus in concerts Wednesday and Thursday at 8:30 p.m. at Hertz Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

DEC 10 1963

SMART SET

By ROSE WALSH

Frank Hatch Guest Speaker

People who know popular, good-looking, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Frank Hatch, do laugh when he sits down at the piano because they have enjoyed his wit and talent on many previous occasions. That he is to be guest speaker at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon open to the public at the Midtown Motor Inn has his host of friends making early reservations for the event, sponsored by the Boston Community Music Center. His topic will be "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Beethoven."

A graduate of Harvard University, where he wrote and acted in the Hasty Pudding Theater, Mr. Hatch is past president of the Harvard Alumni Ass'n, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Mass. General Hospital. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly and has written and produced several musical shows.

Since this program promises to be an exceptional one, it is suggested that reservations be made as soon as possible by calling CO 2-1000.

Guests at the head table will include Mrs. Francis W. Hatch, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Marjorie Mills, the Elliot Nortons, Mrs. Gordon Thayer, the Harry Ellis Dicksons, Cyril H. Jones, David Ives, Raymond Donnell, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, and the John C. Vosoffs (she is chairmen of the four luncheons sponsored by the Boston Community Center).

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

DEC 1963

Karsh, Ottawa

AUTHORitatively Speaking

John M. Conly (the "M" is for Marsland) makes entirely too infrequent appearances in these pages, and we always congratulate ourselves when he does. We don't think it's that J. M. C. doesn't like us; he's just otherwise occupied. Mr. Conly, in fact, has always struck us as rather a Baconian figure, if not taking all knowledge for his province at least mastering a goodly share. A historian by training (received at Amherst, the University of Rochester, and Columbia), he pursued also graduate studies in the sciences and for a time was science editor of a national news magazine. (He once interviewed Einstein, but didn't publish the results; it seems they spent all afternoon arguing about David Hume and the nature of causality.) Later, Mr. Conly became Music Editor of the Atlantic and was for some years Editor of HIGH FIDELITY (our switchboard lady says he was the most courtly mannered character ever to grace the premises). Most of his time is now spent professionally in writing on music and audio electronics; otherwise he continues to cultivate the whole humanistic garden. In short, we present a man of parts—for evidence of which see his analysis of Erich Leinsdorf in Boston, p. 44.

Leinsdorf in Boston

"Perhaps never did a man so need an orchestra, nor such an orchestra such a man."

BY JOHN M. CONLY

WHEN TWO FORCES are about to collide and combine, their converging energy paths are called, in the language of physics, vectors, and are pictured by lines graphing their direction and velocity. The path of the newborn force projected from their meeting is called the sum of the vectors. Its career line can be predicted, as to course and potency, from the vectors that informed its creation.

The imagery of physics is often useful, and indeed appealing, to observers of human happenings—John Donne, for instance, once used polar magnetism, rather provocatively, to describe love—and it is particularly congenial to observers of history. Erich Leinsdorf, an inveterate observer of history, finds a special fascination in its vectorial events: the converging of Napoleon's personal thrust on the explosive turbulence of revolutionary Europe; Sir Francis Drake piratically clarifying to the world the huge concept of global sea power; in general, the interaction between the puissant individual and the broad force.

The last phrase is Leinsdorf's, and to observers of Erich Leinsdorf himself, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the vectorial analogy is most apt. The fifty-one years of Erich Leinsdorf comprise plainly the energy path of a puissant individual, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is nothing if not a broad force. Their joint careers have been congruent for a year now, and the sum of the vectors has lengthened enough to give evidence of clear and exciting significance.

The significance is enormously enhanced, of

DEC 1963

and enjoy it, and even now, this season, to let us play!"

to him so — had — end- — ians' — my ys Rosario — ing. — even manager. — ally — he e Trustees, — ning — sical me." This — evi- — urge rival, when — nini — f the to become — hey — cant. ditions to — own — smic the orches- — that — they elves good — ird — atic:
stening in — ture — rt is greed with — ving — lis-job. — , or — him.
as a moun- — y, a — oach nithologist, — tely — eed-d such an — e it — ayed nan." — ave — hms
— tion — ture
— who — Bos-
To begin — out — nna, le in the — ttle — egor, ning. Were — vay. — quiet
e helpful, — orth — life, nce bought — ive. — eve-it dyed a — the — ersadroom. Or — the — stonay shrewd- — her — ldly, ce delicacy — bly — I are a vegetable — isy — that uch details — nce — him-ssence and — pos — ican; ghly sensi- — lorf — his ellectuality, — fact — what ships, pro- — int. — is a tems from — stra — and g it would — 116 — feel, essive good — -the lled for a — Or-ave dulled — ople
— ering
— orllectuals is — how kinetics of — not.
ration for — That in mind, —). a nality like — in much as — only him; the — was r., the or- — port, very per- — nest-ego there. — , to pride and — use s, most of — then held in the — vor.
had them. — ally, ay whether — have hever it is. — t in what hap- — the Leinsdorf's
a brilliant ct matter."
ough felici-

You

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,318
NOV 18 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

SMART SET

By ROSE WALSH

Frank Hatch Guest Speaker

People who know popular, good-looking, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Frank Hatch, do laugh when he sits down at the piano because they have enjoyed his wit and talent on many previous occasions. That he is to be guest speaker at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon open to the public at the Midtown Motor Inn has his host of friends making early reservations for the event, sponsored by the Boston Community Music Center. His topic will be "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Beethoven."

A graduate of Harvard University, where he wrote and acted in the Hasty Pudding Theater, Mr. Hatch is past president of the Harvard Alumni Ass'n, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Mass. General Hospital. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly and has written and produced several musical shows.

Since the program promises to be an exceptional one, it is suggested that reservations be made as soon as possible by calling CO 2-1000.

Guests at the head table will include Mrs. Francis W. Hatch, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Marjorie Mills, the Elliot Nortons, Mrs. Gordon Thayer, the Harry Ellis Dicksons, Cyril H. Jones, David Ives, Raymond Donnell, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, and the John C. Vosoffs (she is chairman of the four luncheons sponsored by the Boston Community Center).

Iva Dee Hiatt, guest conductor of the [illegible] University of California Chrous this year, is shown with [illegible] conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] while Miss Hiatt and conductor [illegible] together this summer at Tanglewood [illegible] of the Boston Symphony. Miss Hiatt [illegible] Chorus in concerts Wednesday and [illegible]

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
DEC 1963

Karsh, Ottawa

AUTHORitatively Speaking

J. M. Conly (the "M" is for Marsland) is entirely too infrequent appearer in these pages, and we always tulate ourselves when he does. on't think it's that J. M. C. doesn't ; he's just otherwise occupied. Mr. Conly, in fact, has always struck us as rather a Baconian figure, if not taking all knowledge for his province at least mastering a goodly share. A historian by training (received at Amherst, the University of Rochester, and Columbia), he pursued also graduate studies in the sciences and for a time was science editor of a national news magazine. (He once interviewed Einstein, but didn't publish the results; it seems they spent all afternoon arguing about David Hume and the nature of causality.) Later, Mr. Conly became Music Editor of the Atlantic and was for some years Editor of HIGH FIDELITY (switchboard lady says he was the most courtly mannered character ever to grace the premises). Most of his time is now spent professionally in writing on music and audio electronics; otherwise he continues to cultivate the whole humanistic garden. In short, we present a man of parts—for evidence of which see his analysis of Erich Leinsdorf in Boston, below.

einsdorf in Boston

erhaps never did a man so need an orchestra, nor such an orchestra such a man."

BY JOHN M. CONLY

WHEN TWO FORCES are about to collide and combine, their converging energy paths are called, in the language of physics, vectors, and are pictured by lines graphing their direction and velocity. The path of the newborn force projected from their meeting is called the sum of the vectors. Its career line can be predicted, as to course and potency, from the vectors that informed its creation.

The imagery of physics is often useful, and indeed appealing, to observers of human happenings. John Donne, for instance, once used polar magnetism, rather provocatively, to describe love—and history particularly congenial to observers of history. Erich Leinsdorf, an inveterate observer of history, finds a special fascination in its vectorial events: the converging of Napoleon's personal thrust on the explosive turbulence of revolutionary Europe; Sir Francis Drake piratically clarifying to the world the huge concept of global sea power; in general, the interaction between the puissant individual and the broad force.

The last phrase is Leinsdorf's, and to observers of Erich Leinsdorf himself, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the vectorial analogy is most apt. The fifty-one years of Erich Leinsdorf comprise plainly the energy path of a puissant individual, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is nothing if not a broad force. Their joint careers have been congruent for a year now, and the sum of the vectors has lengthened enough to give evidence of clear and exciting significance.

The significance is enormously enhanced, of

and enjoy it, and even now, this season, to let us play!"

to him so had ing. ally ning evi- nini hey own that ird ture ving , or y, a tely e it ave tion who ys Rosario manager. e Trustees, me." This rival, when to become ditions to the orches- elves good istening in greed with job.

as a moun- nithologist, d such an an."

To begin le in the ing. Were e helpful, nce bought it dyed a droom. Or ay shrewd- e delicacy a vegetable uch details sence and ghly sensi- llectuality, ships, pro- tems from it would esive good lled for a ave dulled llectuals is kinetics of ration for in mind, nality like much as him; the r., the or- very per- ego there, pride and , most of held in the had them. y whether never it is, what hap- Leinsdorf's a brilliant ct matter." ough feliciend- ians' my even e he sical urge f the dant, smic they atic; rt is lis- him. oach eed- ayed thms tury

Bos- nna, egor, quiet life, eve- ersa- ston- ldly, are that him- ican; his what is a and feel, —the Or- ople ring or-how not, That), a in only was ort, est- to ouse hen vog, lly, ave t in the

You

837

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,318
NOV 18 1963

Iva Dee Hiatt, guest conductor of the ... of California Chorus this year, is shown with ... conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ... while Miss Hiatt and conductor ... together this summer at Tanglewood ... of the Boston Symphony. Miss Hiatt ... Chorus in concerts Wednesday and ... at Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

SMART SET

By ROSE WALSH

Frank Hatch Guest Speaker

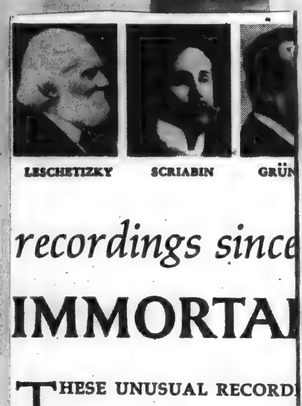
People who know popular, good-looking, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Frank Hatch, do laugh when he sits down at the piano because they have enjoyed his wit and talent on many previous occasions. That he is to be guest speaker at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon open to the public at the Midtown Motor Inn has his host of friends making early reservations for the event, sponsored by the Boston Community Music Center. His topic will be "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Beethoven."

A graduate of Harvard University, where he wrote and acted in the Hasty Pudding Theater, Mr. Hatch is past president of the Harvard Alumni Ass'n, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Mass. General Hospital. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly and has written and produced several musical shows.

Since the program promises to be an exceptional one, it is suggested that reservations be made as soon as possible by calling CO 2-1000.

Guests at the head table will include Mrs. Francis W. Hatch, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Marjorie Mills, the Elliot Nortons, Mrs. Gordon Thayer, the Harry Ellis Dicksons, Cyril H. Jones, David Ives, Raymond Donnell, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, and the John C. Vosoffs (she is chairman of the four luncheons sponsored by the Boston Community Center).

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
DEC 1963



LESCHETIZKY SCRIABIN GRÜN

recordings since IMMORTA
THESE UNUSUAL RECORD
1963 by the most ac esses known, and the pi Concert Grand No. 261– serv whe corc
Yet

Karsh, Ottawa

Leinsdorf in Boston

"Perhaps never did a man so need an orchestra, nor such an orchestra such a man."

BY JOHN M. CONLY

WHEN TWO FORCES are about to collide and combine, their converging energy paths are called, in the language of physics, vectors, and are pictured by lines graphing their direction and velocity. The path of the newborn force projected from their meeting is called the sum of the vectors. Its career line can be predicted, as to course and potency, from the vectors that informed its creation.

The imagery of physics is often useful, and indeed appealing, to observers of human happenings. John Donne, for instance, once used polar magnetism, rather provocatively, to describe love—and physics particularly congenial to observers of history. Erich Leinsdorf, an inveterate observer of history, finds a special fascination in its vectorial events: the converging of Napoleon's personal thrust on the explosive turbulence of revolutionary Europe; Sir Francis Drake piratically clarifying to the world the huge concept of global sea power; in general, the interaction between the puissant individual and the broad force.

The last phrase is Leinsdorf's, and to observers of Erich Leinsdorf himself, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the vectorial analogy is most apt. The fifty-one years of Erich Leinsdorf comprise plainly the energy path of a puissant individual, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is nothing if not a broad force. Their joint careers have been congruent for a year now, and the sum of the vectors has lengthened enough to give evidence of clear and exciting significance.

The significance is enormously enhanced, of

and enjoy it, and even now, this season, to let us play!"

to him so ys Rosario manager.
e Trustees, me." This rival, when to become ditions to the orcheselves good istening in greed with job.
as a moun-thologist, d such an an."

To begin le in the ning. Were e helpful, nce bought it dyed a droom. Or ay shrewd-e delicacy a vegetable uch details ssence and ghly sensi-
llectuality, ships, pro-tems from g it would ssive good lled for a ave dulled llectuals is kinetics of ration for in mind, nality like much as him; the t., the or-very per-ego there.

pride and , most of held in the had them.
y whether hever it is, what hap-
Leinsdorf's
a brilliant ct matter."
ough felici-

endians' my even he sical urge f the dant, smic they atic;
rt is lis-
him.
oach eed-ayed thms ntury

Bos-nna, gor, quiet life, eveersastonldly, are that him-ican; his what is a and feel,
—the
Orople ring or-how not,

That ), a in only was ort, est-to ouse hen vor, ally, ave t in the

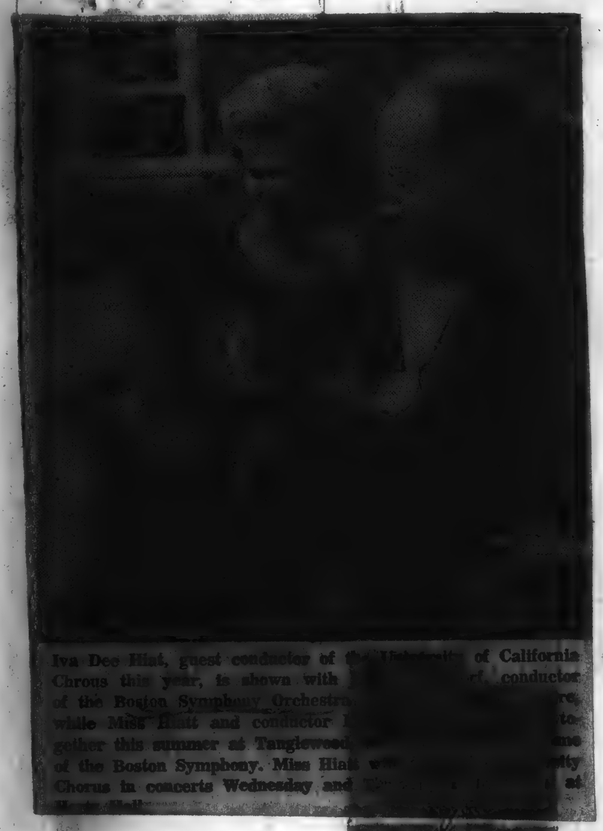
You

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
DEC 1963
116

237

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,318
NOV 18 1963



Iva Dee Hiat, guest conductor of the University of California Chorus this year, is shown with [illegible] conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, while Miss Hiatt and conductor [illegible] together this summer at Tanglewood [illegible] of the Boston Symphony. Miss Hiatt will [illegible] Chorus in concerts Wednesday and [illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

SMART SET

By ROSE WALSH

Frank Hatch Guest Speaker

People who know popular, good-looking, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Frank Hatch, do laugh when he sits down at the piano because they have enjoyed his wit and talent on many previous occasions. That he is to be guest speaker at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon open to the public at the Midtown Motor Inn has his host of friends making early reservations for the event, sponsored by the Boston Community Music Center. His topic will be "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Beethoven."

A graduate of Harvard University, where he wrote and acted in the Hasty Pudding Theater, Mr. Hatch is past president of the Harvard Alumni Ass'n, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Mass. General Hospital. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly and has written and produced several musical shows.

Since the program promises to be an exceptional one, it is suggested that reservations be made as soon as possible by calling CO 2-1000.

Guests at the head table will include Mrs. Francis W. Hatch, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Marjorie Mills, the Elliot Nortons, Mrs. Gordon Thayer, the Harry Ellis Dicksons, Cyril H. Jones, David Ives, Raymond Donnell, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, and the John C. Vosoffs (she is chairman of the four luncheons sponsored by the Boston Community Center).

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
DEC 1963

...the Excerpting of Operas

...ING THIS PAST YEAR it seems to us that we ...been favored with an unusually large number ...ngle-disc operatic highlight recordings (the ...ty of them abbreviated versions of previously ...ed complete sets), and the inundation has led ... some general reflections on the subject of ...d" versions of operas.

...e readily acknowledge the advantages of such ...ings. Multidisc albums are expensive, and ...e music lover whose interest in many operas ...ls only to their chief arias and ensembles, a ...entative series of excerpts is undoubtedly a ...le purchase. And for the passionate operaphile ...ights" records fulfill a double purpose: they ...fford good cross sections of seldom heard ..., or scores otherwise inadequately recorded— ...'s excerpts from Iphigénie en Tauride come to ...—and they permit a collector to hear the heart ...particular artist's interpretation without invest- ...a second version of an opera he already owns. ... some instances, however, such releases have ... evidenced slapdash selection and editing. ... are items in the catalogue consisting merely ...tring of unrelated snippets from complete opera ... Often a disc of this kind will perpetuate the ...dmirable aspects of a performance, and often ...urther disfigured by fade-out where selections ...t end on a handy cadence.

...dmittedly, the problems involved can be severe. ...recalls, for example, Deutsche Grammophon's ...e of excerpts from its four-disc set of Don ... Inasmuch as this is an opera of set numbers, ...uld seem, at first glance, fairly amenable to the ...lights" treatment, and DGG proceeded, logi- ...enough, to present as many of the big arias ...uld be contained on a single LP. But unfor- ...ely, the really remarkable things about Don ...—the Auto-da-fé scene, the tremendous dia- ... between Philip and the Inquisitor, the progress ...e relationship between Carlo and Elisabetta— ... hardly touched on. Moreover, in some of the ...ers internal cuts had to be made: in the case ...e baritone aria, "Io morro," the structure of ...ria was thus shattered, and the whole scene ...red. The general effect was of a series of unrelated excerpts, leaving the listener with no feeling for the opera as a whole.

Don Carlo, in fact, turns out to be an opera that is not easily susceptible to excerpt treatment, and there are of course many others. In these instances only surpassingly brilliant execution could justify the "highlights" approach. On the other hand, when one considers that DGG's complete Don Carlo is the only recording of the opera's original first act, one sees an opportunity missed. Would it not have made commercial as well as artistic sense to have produced an excerpts disc including this first act entire? Here would have been something to have attracted even those who owned a competitive version of the complete (i. e., shorter edition) opera, and here would have been a further documentation of DGG's unique contribution to the Verdi discography.

The point is that in the excerpting of operas discretion is all. Sometimes a complete recording shows a happy confluence of an opera's well-known arias, its dramatic essence, and a performance's high points, as in the Beecham Bohème with De los Angeles and Bjoerling; RCA Victor's disc of excerpts from that set demonstrates what can be achieved from such original material. Few complete sets will boil down as efficaciously as this, however, and the run-of-the-mill "highlights" release suggests an urgent need for closer appraisal of just what it is that distinguishes a particular recording, and deeper thought as to just how the essence of an opera can be effectively presented on a single LP.

Finally, we would like to cast a vote for further releases consisting of excerpts from the less familiar operas, planned from the beginning as "highlight" versions. To indulge in a bit of armchair a & r: a single-disc edition of Macbeth, embracing all the important music from the two leading roles and starring Callas and Gobbi; a condensed version of Mignon, built around Callas or Gorr; a release comprised of highlights of a Meyerbeer opera—perhaps L'Africaine, or Les Huguenots; or the great scene from Donizetti's Anna Bolena, with Sutherland and Simionato.

Address no orders to us, if you please.

high fidelity SEES IT

...course, by the accident of historical timeliness. In ... William Blake composed a plaint grievously ... for all Man's generations until ours: "The Sold...er, arm'd with Sword & Gun, Palsied strikes the Summer's Sun." Not only the summer's sun was palsied, but all humane endeavor. That is ...ined. Within our lifetimes, the soldier is becoming an obsolescence on the face of the earth, and ...med violence relegated to the status of mere criminality. This may herald no Elysium, but it is an immense change. Really freed for the first time from fear and futility, ideas, with their essence in the arts and sciences, may now contest directly, the world around, for their parts in human growth. They have begun to do so already, and the process will quicken and spread.

...into this scene let us project the Leinsdorf-...on phenomenon. Music is the art raised highest by the Western world, and the one peculiarly its own. The grandest device of musical expression, in ...most potent purity, is the symphony orchestra. ... these superlatives temptingly invite one more, perhaps best posed in a question: is there, can there be chosen, a greatest symphony orchestra?

The query may cause winces, but it is neither ...ous nor needless. For one thing, people will, if ... can, elect some orchestra best whether it is ...inated or not, because that is the way people ... For another, it is not bad for a standard to be ... with artistic responsibility now so urgent. It is ... contention here, in summary answer, that a ...atest symphony orchestra does now exist, and ... it is headquartered in Boston, Massachusetts.

For many years it has been impossible to accord ... orchestra general primacy. We have had decades of splendor, to be sure, with Toscanini, Koussevitzky, ...kowski, and Beecham—but notice how natural it ...o name the men without even identifying their ...hestras! The latter were images of their leaders, ...idiosyncrasy as well as inspiration. Better true ...aboration probably was demonstrated by Felix ...ingartner and the Vienna Philharmonic, but ...stria in those days was a ghostly little country, ...d to hear from.

Some folk will say that the Boston has been the ...ld's best orchestra all along, which is a loyalism ... a half-truth. Handsome is as handsome does, ... there was rather more being than doing in the ...ton's excellence during the relaxed period after ...ssevitzky. The being, however, was real enough, ... that was largely Charles Munch's doing. The ...hestra still loves Munch; he was actively benign, ...ecially in such concrete matters as vacations, ...ries, and pensions. As to his musical contribu...s, hornist Harry Shapiro says: "He released us ...n the Koussevitzky strait jacket." The orchestra ... its drilled-in mannerisms, and learned to watch ...rder to play. Munch filled staff vacancies expert... And, by fondly expecting instrumental virtuosity, ...got it, but each player was responsible for his ... In other words, he was a much better training ...h than teacher. When Leinsdorf succeeded Munch, he thanked him for turning over to him so glorious an instrument.

"We were in optimum condition," says Rosario Mazzeo, bass clarinetist and personnel manager. "Leinsdorf was an inspired choice by the Trustees, but he couldn't have come at a happier time." This was borne out shortly after Leinsdorf's arrival, when Richard Burgin retired as concertmaster to become associate conductor. Leinsdorf held auditions to pick his successor. No fewer than ten of the orchestra's thirty-three violinists thought themselves good enough to try out. Leinsdorf, after listening in pleased wonderment, told them he quite agreed with them. Young Joseph Silverstein got the job.

Mazzeo, who is a philosopher as well as a mountaineer, photographer, and amateur ornithologist, adds: "Perhaps never did a man so need such an orchestra, nor such an orchestra such a man."

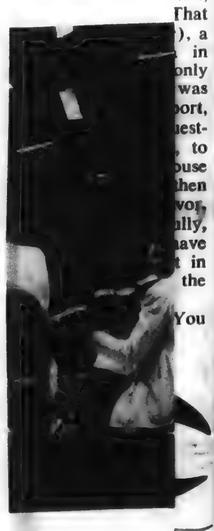
SUCH A MAN, then. What sort of man? To begin with, a man not accurately describable in the ordinary bright vein of personality-sketching. Were Leinsdorf somebody else, it might be helpful, synthesizing his portrait, to know that he once bought a very big white fleece rug and had it dyed a brilliant Janissary red, for use in his bedroom. Or that when he lunches with associates he may shrewdly help each to select an especially choice delicacy from the menu, and then opt for yogurt or a vegetable plate himself. Leinsdorf being Leinsdorf, such details mean practically nothing. The whole essence and governance of the man is a driving, highly sensitized, integrated, and clear-focused intellectuality, whose chief working abstracts are relationships, proportion, and harmony. Everything else stems from this, and perhaps another way of putting it would be to say that Leinsdorf suffers from obsessive good taste. So, the bedroom's atmosphere called for a deep red rug, and sole amandine would have dulled his midday alertness.

The thing to remember about intellectuals is that ideas are their central facts; the kinetics of daily living are simply fieldwork: exploration for ideas, application of ideas. Without this in mind, even a tentative unriddling of a personality like Leinsdorf's is impossible. One cannot so much as impute a degree of egoism or egotism to him; the suffixes won't work. Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the orchestra's general manager, says of him, very perceptively: "God knows, there's plenty of ego there, but . . . !" Undoubtedly, Leinsdorf takes pride and faith in that his mind is prolific of ideas, most of them viably good. However, the pride is held in the ideas themselves, rather than in his having had them. Indeed, he probably would hesitate to say whether he has the ideas or they have him. Whichever it is, the result comes forth with spirit. "It is what happens," says Perry (we were speaking of Leinsdorf's scintillant effectiveness as teacher), "when a brilliant mind has rapt conviction with its subject matter."

The words rapt conviction, at that, though felici-

...and enjoy it, and even now, this season, to let us play!"

...had ...ing. ...ally ...ning evi- ...nini ...hey ...own that ...ird ...ture ...ving , or ...y, a ...tely e it ...ave ...tion ...who ...bout ...ttle ...way. ...orth ive. the the her ...bly ...isy nce pos ...lorf ...act int, ...stra 116



...end- ...ians' my even he sical urge f the dant, smic they ...atic; urt is lis- him. oach ...eed- ayed ...hms ...tury Bos- ...nna, ...egor, quiet life, eve- ersa- ston- ldly, are that him- ican; his what is a and feel, —the Or- ople ...ring or- how not, That), a in only was ...ort, ...uest- to ...ouse then ...vor, ...lly, ...ave t in the You

237

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,319
NOV 18 1963

Iva Dee Hiatt, guest conductor of [illegible] of California Chorus this year, is shown with [illegible] conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible], while Miss Hiatt and conductor [illegible] together this summer at Tanglewood [illegible] of the Boston Symphony. Miss Hiatt [illegible] Chorus in concerts Wednesday and [illegible] at Hunter Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

SMART SET

By ROSE WALSH

Frank Hatch Guest Speaker

People who know popular, good-looking, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Frank Hatch, do laugh when he sits down at the piano because they have enjoyed his wit and talent on many previous occasions. That he is to be guest speaker at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon open to the public at the Midtown Motor Inn has his host of friends making early reservations for the event, sponsored by the Boston Community Music Center. His topic will be "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Beethoven."

A graduate of Harvard University, where he wrote and acted in the Hasty Pudding Theater, Mr. Hatch is past president of the Harvard Alumni Ass'n, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Mass. General Hospital. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly and has written and produced several musical shows.

Since this program promises to be an exceptional one, it is suggested that reservations be made as soon as possible by calling CO 2-1000.

Guests at the head table will include Mrs. Francis W. Hatch, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Marjorie Mills, the Elliot Nortons, Mrs. Gordon Thayer, the Harry Ellis Dicksons, Cyril H. Jones, David Ives, Raymond Donnell, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, and the John C. Vosoffs (she is chairman of the four luncheons sponsored by the Boston Community Center).

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
DEC 1963

In talk with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein.

tous, do not quite tell the whole story. Music is the most organic, the most independently alive, of the arts. In simultaneity it has more impact than painting or sculpture, and at least as much as architecture, and it uses time more vitally than does drama. In consequence, a consummate musician like Leinsdorf must almost of necessity be philosophically holistic. This is a term coined by biologists, and it denotes simply the viewing of an organism or a process as a whole, as the continuing sum of all its active parts. For organism or process, read historical event, man, orchestra, oneself—but centrally, here, music.

This attitude's aspects are manifold. Leinsdorf reads history avidly, but only if it be well narrated, yielding always the whole sense of a happening. He won't waste the Boston Symphony Orchestra's time on Chopin concertos, since Chopin was indifferent to good orchestra idiom, i.e., the whole use of the expressive device. A Tanglewood listener last summer, seeing Leinsdorf conduct, whispered: "You know, from the back he reminds you of Fred Astaire!" He does. He does not gyrate, of course, but his whole body seems somehow to radiate physical awareness. (Apropos of this, the orchestra can read his motions unerringly. Joseph Silverstein explains: "He has the technique. By altering gestures, he actually can get out of us in performance more than went in at rehearsal, devastating as the rehearsals are.") When preparing for the American premiere of Britten's War Requiem, Leinsdorf and Alfred Robison, the stage manager, held a "dry rehearsal." The latter arranged the chairs for the monumental work; Leinsdorf then conducted the empty seats, so as to know instinctively, in advance, the whole instrumental-choral geography of the performance. For like reasons he memorizes all scores he conducts; complete attention must be free for the music's total communication.

MUSICAL COMMUNICATION naturally has to be, in some degree, holistically conceived, presented, and received. There is a stray dogma still among us, left over from the drearier years of the last century, to the effect that music can be connotative but not denotative; it cannot be explicit in its meaning. What the Victorians probably meant was that what music says best cannot be translated into words. Which is true but pointless; the same thing applies to much mathematics and theoretical physics. As a matter of fact, in the finale of the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven assigns most of the denotative work to the orchestra, adding words only for connotative effect. Music, although it bypasses verbal symbolism on its way to the brain and heart, is a highly specific language with its own many-voiced grammar, idiom, and rhetoric. It must be learned, and mainly and most thoroughly, by its makers.

Not all its performers have learned it thoroughly. What distinguishes Erich Leinsdorf is how complete his mastery of it is, and with what sure and effortless facility he uses it. And, of course, not least, the breadth, power, and balance of the intellect wherewith he comprehends and interprets it, from paper to sound. When he plays a symphony, he unifies it as very few other conductors can or do. In depth all instruments become, in purpose, a balanced whole. In time: the very first bar aims logically at the very last; he gives the work what writers are in the habit of calling a story line.

This ease at reading musical content naturally gives him likes and dislikes. And some mixed feelings: he was criticized, in his performance of the Mahler First, for emphasizing the structural continuity at the expense of the seductive songfulness. His reply to this was: "I do believe there is a difference between a symphony and a rhapsody." He dislikes, in composers, cuteness, runaway sentimentality, sententiousness, and exhibitionism. So he prefers late to early Prokofiev, and early to late Stravinsky, and Glazunov and Saint-Saëns he hardly likes at all. When he thoroughly dislikes what he reads, he won't play it. This sometimes produces late program changes, but, under what he calls "the blessed setup of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," no one seems to mind. What he does like to uncover is noble sentiment. He is so taken with humanity's high stature that he has stopped reading modern fiction, since it so often depicts Homo sapiens meanly, as the product purely of genetics and childhood frustrations. "I would like to think of man in terms more broad," he says, "and possibly more mysterious . . ."

Like any good holistic, he distrusts words, although he uses them well. Objectively, he is eloquent. Subjectively, he is uncontrollably reticent. This is illustrated, perhaps illuminatingly, by how this article had to be prepared. Shortly after his Boston appointment, I interviewed him in New York, and found myself on the receiving end of several brilliant short oral essays, on the proper placement of trumpets in orchestras (to make them support chords, not blast down hearers' throats), on the nationwide shortage of string players, and on several other subjects equally useless to my purposes. I decided the story had best wait until Leinsdorf actually had put in a season with the orchestra, and with Boston. When the orchestra moved across Massachusetts to Tanglewood for the summertime Berkshire Festival, I tried again. This time I gave him a list of questions, rather philosophically couched, to prepare him for an interview and preclude verbal detours. At the same time I enlisted eight orchestra people, for their opinions and observations, in case the maestro drew a blank again. These were, besides the Messrs. Perry, Silverstein, Mazzeo, and Shapiro, already mentioned: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flute; James Stagliano, first horn; Fredy Ostrovsky, violin; and Sherman Walt, first bassoon.

All were perceptive and articulate, and would be quoted at more length here but for a very engaging outcome: they all told the same story. This was: they now had as leader a surely great man, of extraordinary strength, skill, and understanding, whom they liked (almost fiercely) and who (very touchingly) they were sure liked them. They seemed amazed at Leinsdorf, as if he were too good to be true. Two of them used the word "Olympian," which I am sure is not much bandied about in Boston. I may point out that I assured each of them that any adverse criticism they wanted to voice would be weighed seriously and could be used anonymously. Silverstein laughed and said: "If it's subversion you're looking for, I'm almost sure you won't find any." Walt was more colloquial: "In Chicago, in '48, he [Leinsdorf] wasn't a hundred per cent loved, but here, now, I don't know anyone who isn't flipping!" Perry said the year had started almost like a young love affair, but would probably steady down. He isn't a cynic, just a manager.

Leinsdorf's reaction to my list of queries was gratifyingly Leinsdorfian. In the mail came a bulging envelope whose contents began: ". . . I am very reticent in talking about myself, and, therefore, I shall write about myself. Maybe then my reticence will disappear." It so happens that our fairly long acquaintance had consisted mainly, and necessarily, of a very thoughtful correspondence. Now, thus, we were back in familiar roles. And he was as good as his—by my rough count—2,548 words.

LEINSDORF COMES from Vienna, a place which always has rather irked him. "The smugness of the Viennese is unequaled," he wryly explains, "because it is they, including the generations of the 1900s and the 1920s, etc., who are responsible for the greatness of Mozart and Beethoven. That Mozart died destitute was, of course, his own doing."

Vienna managed to teach him the piano; music he learned himself. The distinction he once—vainly—tried to explain to a teacher who had dismissed him, at seventeen, for not practicing. When he could understand a Chopin etude musically in a couple of hours, why spend months teaching it to his stupid fingers? Conducting came inevitably. At twenty-two he began assisting Toscanini and Bruno Walter, mainly at Salzburg. They could see the brilliance and holistic breadth. His own countrymen could or would not, blinded by "that cursed discrimination coming in from the Third Reich." There was no possible professional future for him in his own country. "There is no denying how grave uprooting is," he says. "I swallowed, or was made to swallow, around the age of twenty, a very poisonous pill, and it took me approximately one quarter of a century to digest and eliminate it from my system." He adds now: "I think I have come to terms with the pain that the dislocation caused." But he still cannot forgive colleagues who came to terms with Nazism.

The youthful history explains two things about Erich Leinsdorf. One is the almost defiant mettle with which he invaded America and made his way. The other is his passionate concern for human worth and dignity. He landed in New York at twenty-five. He conducted—apart from guest conducting—at the Metropolitan, at Cleveland, at Rochester, and at the New York City Opera. In each place he neither gave nor asked quarter, battled for his ideas, probably demanded too much, and made fast friends and noisy enemies. At Boston there is no strain at all, since there needn't be. Fredy Ostrovsky said to me, apropos of some people having commented that Leinsdorf played coldly: "I hope you won't say that. The fact is, he requires perfection first, as a starting point, before he or anyone else tries liberties. This orchestra can give him perfection. Continued on page 116 and enjoy it, and even now, this season, he's beginning to let us play!"

At Tanglewood: the BSO in summer session.

232

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,318
NOV 18 1963

Iva Dee Hiat, guest conductor of [illegible] of California Chrous this year, is shown with [illegible] conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible], while Miss Hiatt and conductor [illegible] together this summer at Tanglewood [illegible] of the Boston Symphony. Miss Hiatt [illegible] University Chorus in concerts Wednesday and [illegible] p.m. at [illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

SMART SET

By ROSE WALSH

Frank Hatch Guest Speaker

People who know popular, good-looking, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Frank Hatch, do laugh when he sits down at the piano because they have enjoyed his wit and talent on many previous occasions. That he is to be guest speaker at Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon open to the public at the Midtown Motor Inn has his host of friends making early reservations for the event, sponsored by the Boston Community Music Center. His topic will be "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Beethoven."

A graduate of Harvard University, where he wrote and acted in the Hasty Pudding Theater, Mr. Hatch is past president of the Harvard Alumni Ass'n, a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Mass. General Hospital. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly and has written and produced several musical shows.

Since the program promises to be an exceptional one, it is suggested that reservations be made as soon as possible by calling CO 2-1000.

Guests at the head table will include Mrs. Francis W. Hatch, Mrs. A. Clement Titcomb, Marjorie Mills, the Elliot Nortons, Mrs. Gordon Thayer, the Harry Ellis Dicksons, Cyril H. Jones, David Ives, Raymond Bonnell, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, and the John C. Vosoffs (she is chairman of the four luncheons sponsored by the Boston Community Center).

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
DEC 1963

In talk with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein.

tous, do not quite tell the whole story. Music is the most organic, the most independently alive, of the arts. In simultaneity it has more impact than painting or sculpture, and at least as much as architecture, and it uses time more vitally than does drama. In consequence, a consummate musician like Leinsdorf must almost of necessity be philosophically holistic. This is a term coined by biologists, and it denotes simply the viewing of an organism or a process as a whole, as the continuing sum of all its active parts. For organism or process, read historical event, man, orchestra, oneself—but centrally, here, music.

This attitude's aspects are manifold. Leinsdorf reads history avidly, but only if it be well narrated, yielding always the whole sense of a happening. He won't waste the Boston Symphony Orchestra's time on Chopin concertos, since Chopin was indifferent to good orchestra idiom, i.e., the whole use of the expressive device. A Tanglewood listener last summer, seeing Leinsdorf conduct, whispered: "You know, from the back he reminds you of Fred Astaire!" He does. He does not gyrate, of course, but his whole body seems somehow to radiate physical awareness. (Apropos of this, the orchestra can read his motions unerringly. Joseph Silverstein explains: "He has the technique. By altering gestures, he actually can get out of us in performance more than went in at rehearsal, devastating as the rehearsals are.") When preparing for the American premiere of Britten's War Requiem, Leinsdorf and Alfred Robison, the stage manager, held a "dry rehearsal." The latter arranged the chairs for the monumental work; Leinsdorf then conducted the empty seats, so as to know instinctively, in advance, the whole instrumental-choral geography of the performance. For like reasons he memorizes all scores he conducts; complete attention must be free for the music's total communication.

MUSICAL COMMUNICATION naturally has to be, in some degree, holistically conceived, presented, and received. There is a stray dogma still among us, left over from the drearier years of the last century, to the effect that music can be connotative but not denotative; it cannot be explicit in its meaning. What the Victorians probably meant was that what music says best cannot be translated into words. Which is true but pointless; the same thing applies to much mathematics and theoretical physics. As a matter of fact, in the finale of the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven assigns most of the denotative work to the orchestra, adding words only for connotative effect. Music, although it bypasses verbal symbolism on its way to the brain and heart, is a highly specific language with its own many-voiced grammar, idiom, and rhetoric. It must be learned, and mainly and most thoroughly, by its makers.

Not all its performers have learned it thoroughly. What distinguishes Erich Leinsdorf is how complete his mastery of it is, and with what sure and effortless facility he uses it. And, of course, not least, the breadth, power, and balance of the intellect where with he comprehends and interprets it, from paper to sound. When he plays a symphony, he unifies it as very few other conductors can or do. In depth all instruments become, in purpose, a balanced whole. In time: the very first bar aims logically at the very last; he gives the work what writers are in the habit of calling a story line.

This ease at reading musical content naturally gives him likes and dislikes. And some mixed feelings: he was criticized, in his performance of the Mahler First, for emphasizing the structural continuity at the expense of the seductive songfulness. His reply to this was: "I do believe there is a difference between a symphony and a rhapsody." He dislikes, in composers, cuteness, runaway sentimentality, sententiousness, and exhibitionism. So he prefers late to early Prokofiev, and early to late Stravinsky, and Glazunov and Saint-Saëns he hardly likes at all. When he thoroughly dislikes what he reads, he won't play it. This sometimes produces late program changes, but, under what he calls "the blessed setup of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," no one seems to mind. What he does like to uncover is noble sentiment. He is so taken with humanity's high stature that he has stopped reading modern fiction, since it so often depicts Homo sapiens meanly, as the product purely of genetics and childhood frustrations. "I would like to think of man in terms more broad," he says, "and possibly more mysterious . . . ."

Like any good holistic, he distrusts words, although he uses them well. Objectively, he is eloquent. Subjectively, he is uncontrollably reticent. This is illustrated, perhaps illuminatingly, by how this article had to be prepared. Shortly after his Boston appointment, I interviewed him in New [illegible] found myself on the receiving end of sever[al] short oral essays, on the proper placement [of] in orchestras (to make them support [the] blast down hearers' throats), on the nation[al] age of string players, and on several oth[er] equally useless to my purposes. I decide[d] had best wait until Leinsdorf actually ha[d] season with the orchestra, and with Boston orchestra moved across Massachusetts wood for the summertime Berkshire Festi[val] again. This time I gave him a list of quest[ions] philosophically couched, to prepare him terview and preclude verbal detours. A[t] time I enlisted eight orchestra people, for ions and observations, in case the maes[tro] blank again. These were, besides the Me[ssrs.] Silverstein, Mazzeo, and Shapiro, already Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flute; Jame[s] first horn; Fredy Ostrovsky, violin; ar[d] Walt, first bassoon.

All were perceptive and articulate, a[nd] quoted at more length here but for a ve[ry] outcome: they all told the same story they now had as leader a surely great traordinary strength, skill, and understar[ding] they liked (almost fiercely) and who (ve[ry] ly) they were sure liked them. They see at Leinsdorf, as if he were too good to [be] of them used the word "Olympian," sure is not much bandied about in Bo[ston] point out that I assured each of them verse criticism they wanted to voic[e] weighed seriously and could be used Silverstein laughed and said: "If it's subv looking for, I'm almost sure you won Walt was more colloquial: "In Chicag [Leinsdorf] wasn't a hundred per cen here, now, I don't know anyone who i[s] Perry said the year had started almost love affair, but would probably stea[d] isn't a cynic, just a manager.

Leinsdorf's reaction to my list o[f] gratifyingly Leinsdorfian. In the mail ing envelope whose contents began: "[I'm] reticent in talking about myself, and shall write about myself. Maybe then will disappear." It so happens that [our] acquaintance had consisted mainly, a[s] of a very thoughtful correspondence. were back in familiar roles. And he his—by my rough count—2,548 wo[rds]

LEINSDORF COMES from Vienna, always has rather irked him. "The s Viennese is unequaled," he wryly cause it is they, including the gen[ius] 1900s and the 1920s, etc., who are the greatness of Mozart and Beethove[n] died destitute was, of course, his ov[n] Vienna managed to teach him t[o]

What y

and

AMONG THE thousand[s] available, the small, s[o] as the "test record," usefulness—which merit listeners of every taste. requiring the use of pro[fes] sold at record shops (and in the catalogue), an in can be used to advantag[e] or technical expertise, and they do, in sum, is allow tem to use his own ears deterioration in his rig.

A really serious defe[ct] fessional servicing, and tended to supplant the aud and oscilloscopes. Howe serves to reveal symptoms rectly phased speakers to times permits curing min least, the use of test reco the need for professional functions, test records ca setting up a new system, ponent to an existing syste speaker locations, pickup-and enjoy it, and even now, this season, he's beginning to let us play!"

His high humanism shows in his endless cordial patience with his musicians' problems, unanimously attested by my reportorial pickets, but probably even better in his playing of the music he loves best, the tall and radiant classical symphonies. One need only cite, or urge hearing, the poignant golden glory of the Eroica funeral march, or the coruscant, swelling surge of Schubert's cosmic paean, the C major Symphony, as they awake at his hands. Call it dramatic; whatever it is, it is power. His Mozart is like spring grass. This, we—record listeners—have long known about him. There's been wonder about his approach to romanticism. Seemingly this is needless. James Stagliano, who has played horn to Leinsdorf's piano in Brahms trios, says the lofty nineteenth-century touch is at his fingertips.

Leinsdorf has become an ardent Bostonian in a year. He and his wife Anna, and their children (David, Gregor, Joshua, Hester, and Jenny) live in quiet elegance in Brookline. Their social life, not at all sportif, consists chiefly of evenings out (or in) in thoughtful conversation, a commodity in which the Boston-Cambridge area, to put it mildly, abounds. Leinsdorf says the children are totally American except, perhaps, in that they prefer wine to liquor. (He himself, musically, is just as American; there is no trace of Teutonism in his crisp, metrical style.) Probably what Leinsdorf likes best about Boston is a group of eighteen leading business and professional men who still firmly feel, in its finest sense, noblesse oblige—the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is they who guide the people of Boston in supporting, and offering to the world as a boon, the best orchestra anywhere.

Did Leinsdorf's vectorial view show him Boston as destination? Perhaps not, but someone else may have seen it. That was Doriot Anthony (not yet Dwyer), a very youthful flutist in California in the late 1940s. Convinced that the only sure way to a first-flute chair was through a conductor's direct support, she coaxed Leinsdorf, who was guest-conducting at the Hollywood Bowl, to audition her. He did, at a friend's house nearby. She passed brilliantly, and then explained why she had asked the favor.

Leinsdorf laughed, a little ruefully, and said: "Why me? I don't even have an orchestra." Whereupon the flutist in her twenties very seriously said to the conductor ten years her senior:

"Never mind, Mr. Leinsdorf. You will."

Herald Tribune NEW YORK
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

DEC 8 1963

Music

A Tale of Three Cities

by Alan Rich

Who said New York was a one-orchestra town?

In the last two months there has been a deluge of orchestral playing all over the city like nothing since time began. The Philharmonic, American Symphony, Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Royal Philharmonic—regular concerts, special extra concerts, pre-opening opening concerts, what have you. Even the Brooklyn Philharmonia had to come over to Manhattan. Did they think we needed help or something?

Help we don't need, except perhaps from a traffic cop. One night a couple of weeks ago two major orchestras were both having a whack at Schubert's C major Symphony. Earlier in the season the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia both performed "Iberia" and the "Italian" Symphony within the same week. Heaven only knows how many Beethoven Sevenths are scheduled for New York this season; there have only been two so far, but the season is young.

This sort of duplication goes on and on, of course, and ought not to concern very much of the musical public. After all, it is only the poor benighted critic who usually gets the brunt of it; the public is free to pick and choose. And I wasn't really planning to talk about repertory this time, anyhow.

Let's think, instead, about some of the orchestras themselves, particularly the city's three "regulars": the Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia. After all, the Philadelphia gives about 12 concerts here a season, and the Boston gives 12, plus five in Brooklyn. That means that they have a longer season in New York than all but a handful of orchestras have at home.

These ensembles are, as everybody knows, among the top in the field. Their members are as well paid as orchestral musicians anywhere, and they enjoy almost full-time employment. As a matter of fact, the recent 52-weeks-a-year contract awarded to the Philadelphia by its management can be expected to create quite an uproar when the Boston and New York contracts come up for renewal.

Of the three, the New York Philharmonic makes the most news, partly because it is based in this very newsworthy city, and partly because of the enormous newsmaking potential of its famous conductor. No other regularly employed symphonic conductor in the world makes news the way Mr. Bernstein does; his deeds, his misdeeds, even his non-deeds (like next year's sabbatical) are the stuff of which headlines are made.

None of this seems to have had a particularly bad effect on the orchestra, however. From all reports, the Philharmonic is a happy orchestra when its conductor is in town, and it usually plays like one. It has developed one particular quality over the years which does make it unique among orchestras, a quality it shares with the chameleon.

The Philharmonic has always been, of all major orchestras, the one with the most changes in leadership and the most guest conductors. The effect has been both good and bad.

It is good, because it enables a guest conductor to establish his own personality almost instantly. In the first week of Josef Krips' guest conductorship here this season, the orchestra had already become a far different ensemble than it had been under Bernstein a week before. It had a sound that was somehow lighter, more glowing, with an inner balance that made one think of an idealized chamber ensemble. Under Bernstein the sound is far different. The string players dig down harder, and the brass cuts loose. When this sound is marshaled to proper use, as it was in the Bernstein performances of the Mahler Second Symphony or the Stravinsky Symphony in Three Movements, it can lift a listener right out of his seat. This Krips never did, because it isn't his way.

New York: Bernstein

Philadelphia: Ormandy

Boston: Leinsdorf

It would be impossible, however, to recognize the sound of the New York Philharmonic from a recording and this, in some ways, is too bad. In Boston or Philadelphia the orchestra itself is a legitimate public attraction; in New York one goes to Philharmonic Hall, or to Bernstein, but seldom to the Philharmonic. It's an excellent orchestra, don't get me wrong, but one that is strangely lacking in its own personality.

This is not the case with the Philadelphia. One can shut one's eyes and recognize the sound of the orchestra, no matter who is on the podium. It has been making that kind of sound now for nearly half a century. Stokowski set the ideals during his conductorship, and Ormandy has carried them on virtually intact. The orchestra's tone is warm, plushy and sensuous. Under Stokowski it had an almost oozing quality, like a warm mudbath. Ormandy did throw out some of his predecessor's innovations, particularly the idea of having the string players bow out of unison, but the Philadelphia sound hasn't changed very much at all.

It is a hard sort of sound to control, however, and Ormandy doesn't do it very well. When the orchestra played a Prokofiev program here last month, it smothered the hard, clean lines of the music with a thick and undifferentiated kind of orchestral tone that worked against the music. The playing that night seemed to be about the Philadelphia Orchestra, not about Prokofiev. This, it would seem, is the fault of the conductor, who is a superb technician but an interpreter of decidedly limited imagination. The Philadelphia, unlike any other major orchestra in the league today, seems to make its best music under guest conductors.

Guest conductors do not seem able to make much difference in the tone the orchestra makes, however. When William Steinberg appeared as guest there was no difference at all in the sound of the orchestra, although there were splendid differences in the musicianship.

The most interesting case of all these days is what is happening in Boston. Heads wagged when Erich Leinsdorf was engaged to succeed Charles Munch a year ago; how could an orchestra with four decades of solid orientation toward French-Russian music-making with a French-Russian sound suddenly give itself into the hands of a Germanic leader?

As it turned out, however, Leinsdorf's ascendancy was exactly what this fine old orchestra needed. Under Serge Koussevitzky it had reached the pinnacle; it was the romantic orchestra par excellence, with a shimmer and a soft golden glow that one could feel even before it could be heard. It had become, like the Philadelphia is today, an orchestra where tone is everything.

But tastes have changed in orchestral repertory, slowly but surely. We now have a public far more educated in the pre-Beethoven and post-Brahms repertory than it was at Koussevitzky's time. Leinsdorf's job has been to clarify the Boston tone, which had begun to get a little muddy under Charles Munch. He has done a remarkable piece of work, because he has managed to keep the best qualities of the old Boston sound while changing focus. Under Leinsdorf's direction, the Boston Symphony can play Haydn, Mozart and Stravinsky as it never could before. And it can still produce its old glorious mellow roar for Brahms.

Of the three orchestras, the Boston has regained its position as the most interesting. It has the personality that the Philharmonic lacks, the strength that is lacking from the Philadelphia, and the leadership that those orchestras possess only sporadically.

334

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JAN 31 1964

By Jim Hughes, Staff Photographer

Friday at the Boston Symphony—Etude No. 2

One of a series of photographs of scenes at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon concerts that attempt to evoke the flavor of the famous musical occasions.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350
JAN 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 14 1964

Pre-Symphony Lunch Honors Walter Piston

An important event evoking great enthusiasm is in store for music - loving Bostonians on Friday, January 31, when they will meet Walter Piston, one of the leading composers of the United States with an international reputation, who will be guest of honor at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon a the Midtown Motor Inn.

It is not generally known that Walter Piston started out as an art student. His musical abilities served as a source of income to support him while at art school. Fortunately, he selected music rather than art as his career and entered Harvard College as a special music student who took his degree summa cum laude. He is the recipient of numerous awards, has four honorary degrees as doctor of music, a long tenure as professor at Harvard University and a most creative career as a composer.

One of the first organizations to recognize Piston's distinction as a composer was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has continued to perform his works so frequently that he has been called the orchestra's "court composer." Appropriately, Harry Ellis Dickson's talk will feature "Walter Piston — Inside the B.S.O."

Among the musical organizations that will join in paying tribute to Mr. Piston are: The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham is co-chairman; the Harvard - Radcliffe Orchestra, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, the Boston Opera Group, the Handel and Haydn Choral Society, the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund committee, the South End Music school, the Young Audiences, the Friends of the New England Conservatory of Music, the Committee of the Weston Country Evening Concert Series and the Boston Community Music Center.

The public is invited to this informal celebration in honor of Walter Piston, of whom Bostonians are rightly proud for his unique contribution and outstanding excellence in the field of music.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Wednesday, Jandary 22, 1964

Pianist Wears Special Tailcoat

NEW YORK (UPI)—It is a bit embarrassing for Lorin Hollander to play Prokofiev's 5th Piano Concerto, but he hopes to overcome the problem Friday when he performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center here.

Hollander, 19, is small but he performs the difficult piece with such verve that he rips the shoulders in his tailcoat.

For the performance this week, he had a special stretch tailcoat made, the first ever produced. Hollander said if it works, he plans to perform the concerto again in March.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald
BELMONT, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 5,052
JAN 30 1964

World Of Music Honors Composer Walter Piston

Bostonians will have an opportunity to meet Walter Piston of 127 Somerset St., Belmont one of the leading composers in the United States, Friday. He has accepted the invitation to be the guest of honor at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon at the Middletown Motor Inn.

One of the first organizations to recognize Piston's distinction as a composer was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has continued to perform his works so frequently that he has been called the orchestra's 'Court Composer." Appropriately, Harry Ellis Dickson's talk will feature 'Walter Piston - Inside the BSO."

Among the musical organizations that will join in paying tribute to Mr. Piston are: The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony, The Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, The Koussevitsky Music Foundation, The Boston Opera Group, The Handel and Haydn Choral Society, The Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Committee, The South End Music School, The Young Audiences, The Friends of the New England Conservatory of Music, The Committee of the Weston Country Evening Concert Series, and the Boston Community Music Center.

The public is invited to take part in this informal celebration in honor of Walter Piston, of whom Bostonians are rightly proud for his unique contribution and outstanding excellence in the field of music. He is the winner of Pulitzer Prize in Music.

Invited to join Mr. Piston at the head table are Mrs. Endicott Peabody, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, (coming expecially for this occasion from New York), Mr. Talcott M. Banks, vice-president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Banks, Dr. George E. Geyer, Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, Miss Winifred Johnstone, Mrs. Hogarth H.W. Swann, Mr. Benjamin H. Lacy, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Forbes, Mrs. Ross A. McFarland, Mrs. Albert B. Hunt, Prof. and Mrs. David G. Hughes and Mrs. Gordon B. Thayer.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

MUSICAL ARCHIVE BEING GATHERED

Toscanini Memorial Slated on Microfilm by Library

An enormous microfilm collection of original music manuscripts and other materials is being gathered from all over the world to be placed in a library here.

The collection, to be called the Toscanini Memorial Archive, in honor of the late conductor, will be placed in the new Lincoln Center home of the music division of the New York Public Library, which is now under construction.

The archive will have the following purposes:

¶To make available in a central location in New York copies of materials now scattered over Europe and the United States.

¶To allow libraries to obtain microfilms of material in the archive that are missing from their own collections.

¶To create a master microfilm file of the world's great music materials, now buried for safekeeping in a mountain vault.

A committee of sponsors is being formed, headed by Mrs. Lionello Perera as chairman pro tem. Those who have already agreed to serve on the committee include Samuel Barber, Leonard Bernstein, Marcia Davenport, Erich Leinsdorf, Eugene Ormandy and George Szell; also Walter Toscanini, Wally Toscanini and Wanda Horowitz Toscanini, son and daughter of the conductor, respectively, and Walfredo Toscanini, his grandson.

Walter Toscanini has offered the Villa Pauline, the Toscanini home in Riverdale, for a special concert in the spring to inaugurate the project.

Sydney Beck, head of the Rare Book and Manuscript Division of the library's music division, is in charge of establishing the archive, with the help of an advisory committee of musicologists and librarians, which is now being formed.

Mr. Beck recently visited libraries and private collectors in 23 European cities on behalf of the archive. He met with enthusiastic response and pledges of cooperation. In Budapest, he was promised copies of the entire Haydn Esterhazy collection, a major acquisition.

The library reports that $25,000 is needed for the initial stages of setting up the archive. Mr. Beck estimates that it will take at least five years to gather.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
JAN 14 1964

All in a Lifetime . . .

"People say 'What a lovely, comfortable job he has, conducting music written by the master.' They know nothing of what goes into every performance. The over and over and over again at rehearsals to reach the right note . . . the right tempo . . . the balance.

"It's a never-ending effort to make the music say exactly what you believe its composer wants it to say. It's arranging and rearranging. It's the delicate battle to win acoustics onto your side. It's short tempers, frayed nerves. It's a struggle in which every musician under your baton must join as you drive to create the perfect performance."

Erich Leinsdorf

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 29 1964

N.E. Conservatory Will Honor Munch

Dr. Charles Munch, former conductor of the Bostony Symphony, will be awarded an honorary doctor of music degree by the New England Conservatory of Music Feb. 5 at a 4 p.m. convocation in Jordan Hall.

The public is invited and tickets are not required. The degree will be conferred by Chester W. Williams, Conservatory president.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 28 1964

A FAMOUS man of music, Walter Piston, will be honored Friday at luncheon before Symphony at the M... town.

Mrs. Serge Kouusevitzky will come from New York to sit at the head table with the renowned composer. The vice president of the Boston Symphony, Talcott M. Banks, Elliott Forbes of Harvard, and Mrs. Endicott Peabody will also be among the special guests. So will the Council of Friends of the Symphony, and members representing the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, the Boston Opera Group, the Handel and Haydn Society, the Lili Boulanger Memorial Committee, the Young Audiences, the Weston Country Evening Concert committee, the Boston Community Music Center, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and the South End Music School.

Composer Piston, who studied art in his early student days, using his musical talents to support himself, took his music degree at Harvard, summa cum laude, and he has received many awards and four honorary degrees.

His friends and admirers are invited to share the tribute to him Friday, along with the roster of honor guests.

Los Angeles Times
CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
Sun. 439 S. 1,120,153

1964

The New Life, Freedom of Charles Munch

BY ALBERT GOLDBERG

Los Angeles will always occupy a special place in the affection of Charles Munch. Not so much for the warmth and enthusiasm with which he invariably has been received here when he conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra in 1946, 1947 and earlier this month, the French National Radio Orchestra in 1948 and the Boston Symphony in 1953. That means something to him, of course, and he is grateful, but he takes it in stride; he is a modest and retiring man and not one to gloat over his laurels.

The thing that particularly endears our city to Mr. Munch is the fact that it was the scene of a historic event in his life—and one might say in American music. For it was in his room at the Biltmore Hotel, while he was appearing as guest conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic in 1947, that he signed the contract to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That was two years before Serge Koussevitzky retired after a quarter of a century in the post, and Boston was taking no chances on securing the services of the man who seemed best equipped to succeed him.

A Boston critic once told us that when Mr. Munch took over the Boston Symphony in 1949 it was generally felt that this was an interim appointment; Koussevitzky had made the orchestra his personal instrument to an extent that many people believed any successor would have an impossible time in attempting to fill his shoes. They expected a recurrence of the situation when Frederick Stock died after 37 years as conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra: a period of turmoil and dissatisfaction when the conductors succeeding Stock did not measure up to his standard.

But Munch confounded the doubters; he remained as conductor of the Boston Symphony until his retirement at the close of the 1961-62 season, and his regime added another brilliant chapter to the history of the famous organization. Now Mr. Munch keeps almost as busy guest conducting around the world. He likes the freedom of his new life.

Beautiful Cities Seen

"Yes—I am glad," he said with a smile. "In a job like Boston there are so many other things besides the music. I no longer have the enormous responsibility. In Boston I conducted from 22 to 25 weeks each season, and I was always at Tanglewood for six weeks every summer. My contract did not permit me to conduct other orchestras. When I conducted the Toscanini memorial concert in New York with Pierre Monteux and Bruno Walter I had to have special permission. And in Boston I played a new work at almost every concert, which meant frequent all-night study.

"Now I can see beautiful cities I never saw before. Since this season began, I have already conducted in Holland, Belgium, Italy, Spain and Portugal. In Spain I got to see the Prado, the Escorial, and other famous museums I had never had the chance to visit. Next summer I will tour the Scandinavian countries with the French National Radio Orchestra, conduct for two weeks at the Israel Festival and at Edinburgh and Montreux. I have been invited to Hollywood Bowl, Ravinia, and Lewisohn Stadium—but I think not. I do not like concerts in the open very well."

Mr. Munch also finds guest conducting challenging for another reason. "Each orchestra I conduct is like putting myself through a new examination," he said. "Orchestral musicians feel immediately what the man on the podium is like. They sense his abilities at once, and we have to be on the alert and give our best."

"Does that work in reverse?" we asked. "Is the conductor immediately aware of the quality of an orchestra?"

Masterpiece of Understatement

His reply was a masterpiece of understatement. "We have a certain experience" was the way he put it. Then he added, "I find your orchestra is greatly improved. Zubin Mehta is a first-class man. I have known and watched him since he was a student at Tanglewood.

"But the quantity of music in this country makes me anxious. Quantity is always a danger as opposed to quality. That is why I like my liberty. In Europe things are different. In Madrid I conduct a program twice, in Paris once. How can you play the Cesar Franck Symphony five times in succession with intensity? And each concert must be exciting. You cannot do it. You are not a machine."

Mr. Munch spoke longingly of his beautiful home outside Paris, between Versailles and St. Germain, which contains his collection of art objects, including two highly prized Rembrandt drawings. "As a young man whenever I had a few extra pennies I would spend them on some work of art," he said.

Unlike many young musicians who think all they need is to get a baton in their hand and stand up in front of an orchestra to become a conductor, Mr. Munch served a long apprenticeship in his art. He was, in fact, 42 years old when in 1932, disturbed by the rise of Hitler, he left his position as concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig under Wilhelm Furtwängler and set out for Paris to realize his long nursed ambition to become a conductor.

"I was a concertmaster for nearly 20 years," he said. "Nine years in Strasbourg, one year in Cologne, and nine in Leipzig. I played as soloist once every year with Furtwängler, all the big concertos. Actually I had started conducting as a young student with Hans Pfitzner in Strasbourg. And all the time I was a concertmaster I was studying scores, preparing myself."

"How did you feel playing under so many conductors, when you wanted to conduct yourself?" we asked. "Often I was unhappy!" he replied with a cryptic smile.

But he does not feel that his playing experience was wasted. "A conductor must be able to play," he said. "I learned to play the violin, viola, organ and trumpet when I was young. I have always been sorry that I could not play the clarinet. It was too expensive. I could not afford to buy one."

Furtwangler and Toscanini

Of the conductors he played under he thinks that Furtwängler and Toscanini had the greatest influence upon him. "From Furtwängler I learned the way to take the right lines in music," he said. "But it was difficult to play with him. I often discussed with him his wavering beat that made things so hard for the orchestra. 'I do it because it sounds different,' he would say. This system of playing after the beat started with Nikisch. But when I conduct I want an orchestra to play precisely on the beat."

In his book Mr. Munch relates an interesting experience with Toscanini: "I was already conducting when he came to Paris for a series of concerts. Thinking nothing could be more instructive, I asked the orchestra's manager for permission to play with the first violins. An extra chair was put on the stage for me behind the usual last stand, but my extra violin part did not have the same bowings as the others. Toscanini noticed immediately that my bow went down when the others went up and told me so. I felt that his eyes never left me throughout the rest of the session. Imagine my surprise, on meeting him again in New York many years later, at his perfect recollection of the incident."

Throughout his career Mr. Munch has been an advocate of the contemporary composer. "It is our responsibility to play modern music," he said. "Music is not like a picture that can be hung in a gallery where people can see it at their leisure. There are so many talents—they must hear their music. My idea has been to find four or five promising talents and to play their music consistently.

"Yes, I play serial music. Why not? This music exists and is important in the development of the art. Whether anything will come of it remains to be seen. I find that it goes against a wall. I cannot go behind it."

At the moment the conductor is engrossed in preparing Leonard Bernstein's new symphony "Kaddish," for speaker, soprano, boys' chorus, mixed chorus and large orchestra, dedicated to the memory of President Kennedy. Munch commisioned the work for the 75th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony in 1956.

"Rhythmically it is the most difficult work I have ever played," he said.

The conductor was happy that the Los Angeles public took to his performance of Walter Piston's Symphony No. 6: "It is one of the best of American symphonies. It has a construction, an organism. So often modern composers have no architecture. They build a nice house but not the kind one wants to live in. In every town on my tour I play an American composition. I made this promise to President Kennedy at the time we both received honorary degrees from Harvard University. After my last concert in Boston he wrote me a beautiful letter of appreciation."

Classes in Conducting

Since Mr. Munch has often taught classes in conducting, we asked him what preparation he considered necessary for a conductor.

"First of all he must have the faculty in his personality that gives the musicians the feeling of the music," he replied. "Then he must learn the metier and be able to analyze the music. A conductor must be at home in all kinds of music. When I hear of a conductor who has a specialty—Mozart, let us say—then my feeling is that something is wrong.

"And when people say a man is a good conductor for opera but not for concert, I begin to wonder. Opera is music, after all. I feel fortunate that I was born in Alsace. My music came from two sides—the French and the German. All art has its own climate. A conductor's life is a perpetual renewal of learning."

CHARLES MUNCH: QUANTITY IS ALWAYS A DANGER

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 97,672
JAN 22 1964

At The Symphony

Reviewer 'Lobbied' By Edict; Pens Open Letter To Leinsdorf

An Open Letter to Erich Leinsdorf, Conductor of the Boston Symphony:

Dear Mr. Leinsdorf:

You may consider the writer as the unofficial spokesman for some 300 patrons of the Woolsey series who missed all of the Boston Symphony's performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 39 Tuesday evening. This was the result, as you may guess, of your somewhat arbitrary decision to deny latecomers the usual courtesy of admittance to the auditorium between the movements of the work.

We have no quarrel with your desire to start concerts on time—even though most musical events here, as elsewhere, rarely do. There are too many chronic latecomers who unfortunately still consider tardiness to be fashionable! But invariably there are others who, through no fault of their own, may be unable to be present for the conductor's first down beat. There were many in the latter category on Tuesday evening and they were anything but happy over the rather unprecedented circumstance you enforced.

One frustrated ticket-buyer informed me that he came to the concert especially to hear the Haydn. Aside from his claim that the program started before 8:30 p.m., he was naturally expecting to hear the last three movements. He was so exasperated at being denied this traditional right in concerthall etiquette, that he declared his intention to get his money back! Unquestionably many other "lobbyists" shared his mood.

The writer (and a few others) were even more "put-out." It is a part of my job to be on time at concerts and I am quite conscientious in that regard. However, I was unavoidably detained on this occasion. Despite my status as a press representative, I could'nt gain access to the auditorium. So I sneaked in the stage door like a culprit and listened as best I could with an ear to the door leading to the platform. Had it not been for the percussion section on the other side of the door, I might have heard most of the performance. But the mentioned opposition was just too much! So I was a double loser.

Perhaps you have a legitimate reason for your action which would seem to intrude into the province of the concert manager. Your New Haven audience would like to know what it is. If you intend henceforth to peremptorily insist on the "new rules" which were enforced at this time, these stipulations should be made known in advance.

To paraphrase the familiar expression, half a concert was better than none. I feel sure that most of the "culprits," who were locked up in the lobby, temporarshared my enthusiasm for the exily forgot their troubles and citements in the performance of "Don Quixote," by Strauss. This brilliantly orchestrated work came off — even outside the hall —in real "Boston style." We are sorry, as you undoubtedly are, that the two soloists — cellist Samuel Mays and violist Joseph de Pasquale, are leaving to join the Philadelphia Orchestra. Their farewell performance here, at least, was a memorable one.

Very truly yours,
Gordon E. Armstrong

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
JAN 8 1964

All in a Lifetime:

And what of the burdens a conductor must assume with the young musicians and composers? He listens. He counsels. He patiently tries to guide or push them toward the barriers he knows they are capable of smashing. It never ends.

Each step forward is just one step. You take it—and you are greatly pleased—then you rally your energy, your talent and your will and strive to take another.

—Erich Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JAN 7 1964

Homage to Leinsdorf

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Last summer during the Bach-Mozart series at Tanglewood I had my first opportunity to watch Erich Leinsdorf conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The initial impression came in the performances of the "Posthorn" and "Haffner" serenades by Mozart. Leinsdorf conducted these works with remarkable clarity, buoyancy and delicacy without exaggeration of tempo — a feat not achieved by his illustrious predecessors.

I also listened to some of the divertimentos and early symphonies and was deeply impressed. I do not believe there is a conductor in the United States who can conduct Mozart as well as Leinsdorf does.

I attended eight concerts conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, and all were brilliant. His performances of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Mahler's first symphony and Britten's "War Requiem" were masterpieces.

I think he is the most eclectic conductor in his tastes since the days of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Leinsdorf will, I am convinced, have as extensive a repertoire as did Koussevitzky and will also champion the cause of contemporary American composers.

An article in Time magazine last year stated that the Cleveland Symphony under George Szell was the No. 1 orchestra in the country. That may have been so last year; but now that Leinsdorf is head of the Boston Symphony, I have my doubts about that ranking.

During Charles Munch's tenure, the quality of the performances declined, principally because of slack discipline and inadequate rehearsal time. Mr. Munch did excel in interpreting Berlioz, Debussy and Ravel (all French composers) but did not conduct Bach, Mozart and Beethoven too well.

Mr. Leinsdorf has an enormous capacity for work and is a perfectionist. He has a wonderful ear, a good memory and sensitivity to musical details.

JOSEPH PIZZONIA Jr.
8 Lyric St.,
Pittsfield.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
JAN 19 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

Bountiful Summer Of Music Ahead

By ROBERT TAYLOR

During the course of a press conference last week, Erich Leinsdorf mildly speculated about the translation of the Greek word 'Parergon,' the title of Strauss's left-hand piano concerto which The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at Tanglewood next summer. It might mean a 'side piece,' he mused, or a 'main theme.'

A few minutes later one of Symphony Hall's employes left and later reappeared to report that Parergon meant 'incidental secondary, or subordinate.' "We have a Greek scholar," replied Mr. Leinsdorf. "Oh no," said the employee, "I checked with The Classics Department at Harvard."

"Ah, let us call it then a 'sidekick,' " said Mr. Leinsdorf. "And isn't it great to live in Boston and have this a local call?"

A Free Choice

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra indeed seemed very much at home and relaxed as he ranged over a musical terrain that stretched from this morning's solemn high Mass at Holy Cross Cathedral in memory of President Kennedy to the contour of next summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Cardinal Cushing, he said, had in no way dictated the choice of the musical offering which The Boston Symphony will present at the cathedral. ("We are happy to provide the music, and we are happy to let the Cardinal provide the liturgy.")

Mozart's Requiem was the choice of Mr. Leinsdorf because like Mr. Kennedy, Mozart died untimely after a short but radiant life span; and other Requiems such as Verdi's or Brahm's were inappropriate to the occasion.

Best Contract

Turning from today's events toward next summer, Mr. Leinsdorf paused to comment on recent personnel changes within the BSO. He is auditioning leading viola and cello performers both from the orchestra and from the nation at large for posts left vacant.

"The Boston Symphony has had and still has the best contract in the symphony field, and speculation about the future may be premature, but I think we shall continue to maintain our position."

Tanglewood, he went on, would stress a four-pronged approach: music especially suited for a Festival; significant contemporary scores; a cycle celebrating the centennial year of Richard Strauss; and chamber works.

Haydn Premiere

"Let me illustrate what I mean by 'music For Festival.' A subscription program permits fewer specialties or extreme specialization, the audience is, in a sense, a captive one, for, after all, it has subscribed to the series.

"During the summer we may present the works of a single master in a setting peculiarly appropriate — for example, the Mozart Serenade No. 8, a Nocturne for four orchestras, written for the gardens of Salzburg. The Nocturne has three echoes, and the problem of the placement of the orchestras makes it awkward to play in a conventional hall.

"I also consider it astonishing, if not amusing, that Tanglewood will hear the American premiere of Haydn's cantata, "Applausus," discovered by the Boston musicologist, Robbins Landon. Brilliant singing is required from the soloist, and the cantata exhibits various virtues. Furthermore, I shall conduct the complete music to "The Ruins of Athens," vintage Beethoven, but, since the work is connected with a play long forgotten, only the overture is generally given.

In Character

"Menotti's half-hour cantata, "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," based on a theme from The Children's Crusade, is a Tanglewood premiere and requires two children's choirs among its forces. As part of the Strauss Centennial, our three-act concert version of "Der Burger als Edelman" comprises another American permiere: I gave the concert suite in the subscription series, but this again illustrates the kind of music suitable for festivals.

"It is more than a suite based on Moliere's 'Bourgeois Gentilhomme,' and the score includes songs, a duel, a Turkish ceremony, lingua franca passages —all augmenting the suite and highly appropriate to Tanglewood's character."

237

3

1

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF AND BOSTON

A CHAMPION OF AESTHETIC ORDER TAKES CHARGE OF AN INFLUENTIAL ORCHESTRA —— A CANDID REPORT ON THE VIEW FROM BEACON HILL

By HANS H. FANTEL

PHOTOGRAPH BY KARSH OF OTTAWA—COURTESY RCA VICTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF's appointment in early 1962 as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra raised more than a few eyebrows in Back Bay drawing rooms. For decades, musical Bostonians had thought of their orchestra both as a civic monument and as a prized personal possession, and they were understandably apprehensive over the prospect of any new man's tinkering with it. Of equal concern was the fact that Leinsdorf, as a personality, was so abrupt a departure from the style of his predecessors. The social (and musical) gifts of the late Serge Koussevitsky, who led the orchestra through the golden age from 1924 to 1947, were expressed against a background of private wealth, feudal attitudes, and personal bonds with European society that have existed on Beacon Hill since the days of Henry James. And white-maned Charles Munch, Koussevitsky's successor, who reigned over the orchestra until Leinsdorf's ascension last year, was the archetype of the grand seigneur.

Erich Leinsdorf stands in sharp contrast to the majestic image offered to the public by his predecessors. A slight, conspicuously small man, he lacks the patrician aspect that for so long characterized the men on Boston's podium. Leinsdorf is fifty-one; his lined face, not handsome by conventional standards, is nevertheless striking for its mobility and vitality. The expression, whatever its emotional content, never seems to lose its aspect of controlled urgency.

(Continued overleaf)

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF AND BOSTON

A CHAMPION OF AESTHETIC ORDER TAKES CHARGE OF AN INFLUENTIAL ORCHESTRA —— A CANDID REPORT ON THE VIEW FROM BEACON HILL

By HANS H. FANTEL

PHOTOGRAPH BY KARSH OF OTTAWA—COURTESY RCA VICTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF'S appointment in early 1962 as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra raised more than a few eyebrows in Back Bay drawing rooms. For decades, musical Bostonians had thought of their orchestra both as a civic monument and as a prized personal possession, and they were understandably apprehensive over the prospect of any new man's tinkering with it. Of equal concern was the fact that Leinsdorf, as a personality, was so abrupt a departure from the style of his predecessors. The social (and musical) gifts of the late Serge Koussevitsky, who led the orchestra through the golden age from 1924 to 1947, were expressed against a background of private wealth, feudal attitudes, and personal bonds with European society that have existed on Beacon Hill since the days of Henry James. And white-maned Charles Munch, Koussevitsky's successor, who reigned over the orchestra until Leinsdorf's ascension last year, was the archetype of the grand seigneur.

Erich Leinsdorf stands in sharp contrast to the majestic image offered to the public by his predecessors. A slight, conspicuously small man, he lacks the patrician aspect that for so long characterized the men on Boston's podium. Leinsdorf is fifty-one; his lined face, not handsome by conventional standards, is nevertheless striking for its mobility and vitality. The expression, whatever its emotional content, never seems to lose its aspect of controlled urgency.

(Continued overleaf)

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF

The critics generally see Leinsdorf as a conductor who can always be relied on for a perceptive account of the score, for meticulous, detailed craftsmanship. But some take him to task for stressing the structural aspects of music at the expense of its expressiveness. The Christian Science Monitor sums up these reservations: "One finds oneself more intellectually aware of the performance than emotionally moved by it." And Winthrop Sargeant of the New Yorker returns a typical verdict on a Leinsdorf interpretation: ". . . elegant and refined rather than deeply contemplative and exalted. Nevertheless, it has the virtues of coherence and exemplary clarity."

When asked what he thinks about such criticism, Leinsdorf replies, "I honestly cannot say. I never read the reviews. It's a matter of conscience. I feel that I must not let other men's opinions influence my perceptions of music. The critic's job is to evaluate me to the public—not to guide me."

Leinsdorf is aware, of course, of his reputation as a predominantly cerebral conductor, but feels that the epithet misrepresents his intentions. "I am not out to intellectualize music. But music must be set forth within the proper framework of style. This is a matter of knowing the historic context of each work—within the total history of music, within the cultural climate of its time, and within the personal development of its composer. If anyone plays Stravinsky's Symphony in C with heavy romantic expressiveness, I don't think that's emotion. It's just the wrong style. On the other hand, nineteenth-century works demand a full-blooded statement. But I will not milk the music." Paradoxically, it would appear that Leinsdorf's comments, which betray a highly analytical turn of mind, tend to confirm rather than disprove the charge that his approach to music is essentially an intellectual one.

It is hardly surprising that the strongly academic cast not only of Leinsdorf's musical approach, but also of his personality, has endeared him to those across the Charles River at Harvard and M.I.T. Says one partisan Ivy League observer: "Bostonians have come to appreciate Leinsdorf as a gentleman and a scholar. Some of his predecessors were mostly gentlemen." M.I.T. professor Davis Howes III, cornered in a Cambridge coffee shop, theorized about Leinsdorf's appeal to the younger segment of his audience: "We are presently living in an almost fanatically anti-lyrical age. I believe that Leinsdorf, because he is culturally aware, feels this in his bones. That is why he instinctively fashions his music into the kind of understatement that is the only way the modern personality is able to receive emotional communication. Too much lyric transport would embarrass today's listener. Our appetite is for order rather than passion." Defending Leinsdorf against critics who deplore his lack of Orphic abandon, a young Harvard literature major protests: "They aren't judging him fairly. You can't blame a man for not achieving what he doesn't attempt."

MUSICAL AMERICA

Leinsdorf in 1938, when he joined the Metropolitan Opera.

But judged by any standard, Leinsdorf has already achieved an impressive transformation of the Boston Symphony. Without dulling the orchestra's traditional tonal gloss, he has added weight and solidity to its sound. The orchestra may no longer be able to whip up the light French confections that were the specialty of the house when Charles Munch was chef d'orchestre, but with its new sonority, the orchestra speaks more idiomatically than before the tonal language of Beethoven, Brahms, and the Austro-German classics. Bostonian old-timers settle back in comfortable recognition when they hear again the rich, velvety sound textures absent from Boston since the days of Serge Koussevitsky.

Leinsdorf himself insists that there is no typical Boston sound: "There is a Boston sound for Mozart, another for Bartók, and still another for Wagner. If an actor in the theater interpreted every part the same way, he would make a mockery of his roles. In the interpretation of music, we are like actors. We must present each work according to its own character." But he admits that the ideal of complete tonal flexibility is impossible to realize. "An orchestra can't really change its character three times during an evening's program." Even so, he is uncommonly attentive to purely sonic matters. "Munch never stopped us in rehearsal to adjust tonal balance," remarks one of the players. "Leinsdorf is always fussy about tone." Even RCA Victor's recording engineers credit him with giving them valuable pointers on stereo perspective, microphone placement, and such. George Marek, RCA Victor's general manager and Leinsdorf's long-time friend, is delighted with the tonal transformation achieved during the past season: "Now the Boston Symphony is a true all-purpose orchestra."

Under Leinsdorf, there has also been a marked increase of substance in Boston's musical fare. Major moderns, notably Bartók and Prokofiev, moved from the fringes to the central area of programming. Obscure early Mozart works were dug out of the treasure chest, Mahler had his day, and even Bruckner belatedly reached Bostonian ears. "It's a change for Boston, all right. Fewer tea parties," quips a Harvard undergraduate, too young to remember that the Boston Symphony once championed such radical unknowns as Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Milhaud, and Copland.

Leinsdorf feels an artistic commitment to what he calls "total repertoire"—the whole panorama of musical periods and styles—but he is also keenly aware of his responsibility to contemporary composers. In fact, he has proposed the idea of annually appointing a "composer-in-residence" for the Boston Symphony—but he is resolutely against any kind of musical boondoggling. He is also frankly unsympathetic to experimental music. "I can't perform works that don't communicate to a large part of my audience. I am always warning young composers not to join a coterie or 'school' of composition. When a composer joins a 'school' he is following the herd instinct. To me the exclusive group is just as much a herd as the lowbrow mass. The number of people involved in a group doesn't matter. It is absurd to assume that something has value simply because only a few people like it. It is important for a composer to keep his individual relationship both to his art and to his public."

Serial music is dismissed outright. "Such theories completely void the composer's volition. Everything is predetermined. I do not think it is possible to create a communicative art on such rigid principles. Such music frustrates both the charms of composition and the charms of performance. I shan't presume to mold the musical philosophy of composers, but I do believe that the musical director of a major orchestra has an obligation to make known his musical attitudes."

Leinsdorf's awareness that his post in Boston entails further responsibilities to American music as a whole is also reflected in his attitude toward the Berkshire Music Center, which is now under his direction. He regards Tanglewood's school as a weapon in the holy war against musical illiteracy—against the kind of music education that produces students who are proficient instrumentally but devoid of musical style and culture. "There is no necessity for profit at Tanglewood," he explains, "so why not search for a higher type of student? Why not stress general musical culture above the ability to finger a violin?"

In applying these standards last summer, Leinsdorf not only summarily flunked an unprecedented number of applicants for admission, but also remained quite unmoved by the resulting cries of anguish. To those who were able to negotiate the steep admission hurdles he set up, it was made clear that Tanglewood would be no summer vacation: "Our faculty members are determined not to encourage sluggish minds or mediocre ability. That group, unfortunately, is more than sufficiently represented within our profession." And to forestall future disappointment, Leinsdorf initiated a closer liaison between Tanglewood and the leading music schools of America, asking the schools to help in the preselection of candidates for Tanglewood.

The change in the intellectual atmosphere at Tanglewood was evident almost from the moment Leinsdorf took over. "For the first time in years, things are organized around here," comments an instructor.

The twenty-six-year-old Leinsdorf takes a Metropolitan curtain call with Lauritz Melchior. The smiles were later to fade, when Melchior accused Leinsdorf of being unworthy of conducting at the Metropolitan.

237

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF

"And those kids are really learning something. They know Big Brother is watching them."

In past years, under Charles Munch, the festival aspect of Tanglewood was largely separate from the school, to which Munch paid scant attention. Leinsdorf, however, insists on close contact between students and members of the Boston Symphony so that the aspirant musicians can become acquainted with the day-to-day realities of professional music-making. "Tanglewood is unique in offering this opportunity," explains Leinsdorf, "and we intend to make the most of it."

Just as he feels that he is a link between student and professional, so, in another way, Leinsdorf sees himself as a link between composer and public. He encourages correspondence from his listeners and tries to learn from this source what significance different kinds of music have for various segments of his audience. But his programming decisions are not dictated by popularity polls or by his board of directors. "Boston still has the European attitude that the expert knows more than the layman," he says. "Elsewhere I have encountered the typically American notion that four laymen know more about any subject than one expert. I grant that there is the kind of expert who defeats himself with his expertise. But I believe direction must come from an informed source. For instance, the concert managements believe that the public merely wants what it already knows. One must resist such pressure. For example, all the agents for our transcontinental tour made a unanimous request: no Mahler. I insisted. As it turned out, the Mahler First won the most acclaim wherever we played it."

A CONDUCTOR'S ultimate critics are the men who play for him. Leinsdorf's profound technical knowledge, his businesslike rehearsal manner, and his consideration for the players have won him the respect of his orchestra. True, a few of the musicians feel that Leinsdorf's meticulous pursuit of technical perfection leaves no room for the inspiration of the moment, but even those who disagree with Leinsdorf's method respect his reasons. According to an insider, sentiment within the orchestra favors Leinsdorf ten to one. Of more permissive conducting methods, which grant the orchestra a greater measure of freedom, Leinsdorf says drily: "I don't think music is improved by inaccuracy."

As an opera conductor, Leinsdorf has a knack for pulling a cast together quickly, and for shaping a unified performance with a minimum of fuss. No one admires this brisk efficiency more than George Marek of RCA, who regards Leinsdorf as the best insurance that complex and costly opera-recording sessions will come off on schedule.

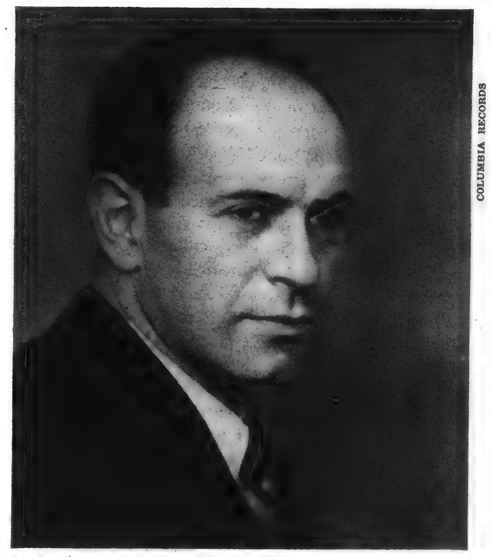
In his podium manner, Leinsdorf is the least demonic of conductors. He never tries to mesmerize an orchestra. There is no dictatorial imposition of will. To the onlooker, his understated gestures convey the notion that Leinsdorf and the orchestra, as they play, are simply "discussing" the score, as one would a mutual acquaintance. Sometimes, in quiet passages, his only movements are from the wrist. Yet every motion, however slight, makes its point. Anyone watching Leinsdorf conduct today would find it difficult to imagine his earlier conducting style, which—according to opera fans with long memories—was apt to result in torn clothes during the course of an evening.

Leinsdorf's manner offstage is a blend of formality and Viennese charm. His slightly accented speech, spiced with poker-faced but pointed wit, suggests a well-furnished mind in which everything is in its place. Even in casual conversation, statements are not ventured that have not already been properly indexed and cross-referenced. But Leinsdorf is never coldly professional, and an inner warmth is quickly discernible beneath his careful verbal formulations.

The same sense of aesthetic order that characterizes Leinsdorf's conducting is reflected in his personal taste. Famed for the elegance of his public wardrobe, he also dresses beautifully at home. In his study, he is likely to wear an ascot tie and one of the tailored, detailed leisure jackets made by his Roman tailor. Every knickknack on his desk is neatly arranged, set at precisely the proper angle. His five children, aged

A homecoming scene from Leinsdorf's guest-conducting days.

MUSICAL AMERICA



COLUMBIA RECORDS

In 1947, as the new conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic.

nine through twenty-one, are models of politeness, and though the house is adequately staffed for all social demands, the children sometimes serve at table. Nine-year-old Jenny has a reputation for mixing a mean martini, though her own preference is Bosco. Mrs. Leinsdorf, a slight, diminutive brunette, runs the Leinsdorfs' handsome house in Brookline with the imperturbable competence of a maître d'hôtel. On travels abroad, she collects recipes as others collect souvenirs. Appreciative guests have applauded her efforts to raise the culinary standards of Boston, a city historically partial to beans and scrod.

One afternoon last summer, Leinsdorf sat at his summer house in Stockbridge, musing over his career. He recalled how, in 1934, as a twenty-two-year-old with a diploma from Vienna's Musikakademie, he had intrepidly approached Bruno Walter for a job. Walter was so impressed with the young man's knowledge of opera scores that he hired him as a rehearsal assistant for the Salzburg Festival. For several summers at Salzburg, the young Leinsdorf conducted preparatory rehearsals for both Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini, the rest of the year touring provincial Italy with orchestras he describes as "slothful, ignorant, indifferent, and stupid."

A recommendation from Toscanini resulted in an offer from New York's Metropolitan Opera to assist ailing Arthur Bodansky, the Met's principal Wagnerian conductor. With the shadow of Hitler already darkening Austria, Leinsdorf left his native land with little regret. By the time Leinsdorf reached New York, Bodansky's failing health had already forced him to cancel many of the performances he had scheduled for the 1938-1939 season. So the twenty-six-year-old Leinsdorf unexpectedly found himself in his first season conducting Walküre, Parsifal, Lohengrin, Tannhäuser, and Elektra—a back-breaking assignment even for a veteran conductor. And when Bodansky died in 1939, Leinsdorf had to add to his repertoire—in a single season—Meistersinger, Tristan, Götterdämmerung, Orfeo ed Euridice, Rosenkavalier, and Pelléas et Mélisande. The task was staggering, but the critics were kind. Newsweek even reported that during a performance of Walküre he had "stolen the show from the Met's Norwegian goddess, Kirsten Flagstad."

Predictably, some of the Metropolitan's vocal luminaries balked at being upstaged by the conductorial Wunderkind, and by 1940 the Met was in full mutiny. Heldentenor Lauritz Melchior attacked broadside. In a front-page interview in the New York Herald Tribune he questioned the competence of a "mere youngster" to conduct at one of the world's leading opera houses. Flagstad, choosing more ladylike tactics, let it be known through friends that Leinsdorf made her physically ill. "He watches the music!" she complained indignantly, her idea evidently being that a conductor should watch the singers. At the height of the revolt, Melchior got so nervous that he appeared on stage

Leinsdorf on conducting: "I used to be very partial to Toscanini... but... I now seem to veer more and more toward the attitudes exemplified by Bruno Walter."

RCA VICTOR

237

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF

with his eagle-winged helmet on backwards, and Flagstad threatened to quit.

With considerable courage, Edward Johnson, the opera company's general manager, backed up his young conductor. "There are some old boats in this company," he ungallantly announced to his broad-beamed singers, "who would like to be the dictators of the Metropolitan. . . . Mr. Leinsdorf will be here long after they are gone. And he will be so acclaimed that they won't want to remember that they opposed him." A few days later, the press was informed that Melchior had apologized to Leinsdorf for his public statements. The mutiny had been quelled.

Leinsdorf, when asked recently how he had managed to stand up to this insurrection in Valhalla, responded disarmingly: "I don't know. I was very ambitious, very young, and very blind."

By 1943 Leinsdorf's reputation was so firmly established that he was offered the conductorship of the Cleveland Orchestra when Artur Rodzinsky left the Cleveland post for New York. At thirty-one, Leinsdorf was the youngest conductor ever to assume leadership of a major American orchestra, having won preference over such seasoned conductors as Vladimir Golschmann and Efrem Kurtz. "We have chosen youth with maturity," the Cleveland orchestra board said in its announcement. But an army draft call cut short his tenure. When Leinsdorf returned to Cleveland after the war, he found George Szell snugly ensconced there. Without a steady job, Leinsdorf spent some footloose years immediately after the war, guest-conducting in various European countries, notably England and Austria, until an appointment as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic in 1947 put him on firm ground.

During his Rochester years, Leinsdorf might well have disappeared into relative musical obscurity had not Columbia Records just then launched its low-price Harmony label. Goddard Lieberson, then Columbia's artists-and-repertoire chief, was casting about for a good orchestra to record major repertoire for the new low-cost line. Leinsdorf and the Rochester Philharmonic seemed a likely choice and were promptly signed. One of Leinsdorf's first releases, Beethoven's "Eroica," was immediately hailed as the best available version of that much-recorded symphony, surpassing rival performances by Leinsdorf's illustrious mentors, Toscanini and Walter.

If Leinsdorf had previously been known chiefly as an operatic workhorse, his Harmony recordings gained him national recognition as a symphonic conductor. He lost no time building up a prodigious discography on various labels. On Westminster he recorded all forty-one Mozart symphonies, an achievement unparalleled in the annals of the phonograph.

In 1956 Leinsdorf was asked to become the musical director of the New York City Opera. He responded eagerly to the challenge, but soon found the financial and organizational strictures too confining. After only one season he left the City Opera to return once more to the Metropolitan. The once-embattled prodigy had returned to his former haunts as a mature artist with an international reputation—just as Edward Johnson had predicted in the "revolutionary period." The high point of his second tenure at the Met came in the 1961-1962 season, when Leinsdorf revived Wagner's Ring tetralogy. Meanwhile, having joined RCA Victor's roster, chiefly as an operatic conductor, Leinsdorf, in a virtually unprecedented recording spree, wrapped up no fewer than fourteen complete operas, ranging from The Barber of Seville to Die Walküre.

TODAY, at the apex of his career, Leinsdorf acknowledges that his musical ideas are still changing and maturing. Thinking back on the disparate influence of his two mentors, Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini, he says: "Until recently, I have not attempted to reconcile the two approaches. I used to be very partial to Toscanini. I felt that Walter's more intuitive methods were impractical in many situations because they depend for their effectiveness on a pre-established rapport between the conductor and his orchestra. This, in turn, must be based on the sharing of a common outlook and tradition. But despite the greater difficulty, I now seem to veer more and more toward the attitudes exemplified by Bruno Walter. I now believe that a synthesis of the two approaches is possible."

Indeed, within this last year, there has been a notable change in Leinsdorf's performances. Without sacrificing the order and clarity of his musical expositions, Leinsdorf now seems to leave more room for the music to unfold. Increasingly, there are moments when he no longer appears to be a supervisor watching over the music, but becomes a part of it and is himself carried along in its flow. At such times, his gaze loses its customary penetration, his features soften, and a sense of repose comes into his gestures. Clearly he has entered that ultimate preserve of the conductor's art where—in the words of Berlioz—"a man can forget the public altogether, listening to himself, judging himself, and be touched by the emotions that are shared by the artists around him."

Hans H. Fantel, who is most familiar to HiFi/Stereo Review readers for his discussions of hi-fi equipment, has recently contributed two articles on musical subjects: "Richard Tauber and Vienna" (November), and this portrait of Erich Leinsdorf.

238

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4800

Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605

JAN 19 1964

Kersh

DO-IT-YOURSELF CONDUCTOR of the BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Leinsdorf plans the Tanglewood program over mid-morning coffee with Mrs. Leinsdorf. Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate given to the orchestra in 1936, has formal gardens, hemlock hedges and tall pine avenues. It also has a Theatre-Concert Hall and Chamber Music Hall designed by Eero Saarinen, the same architect who designed Yale's new colleges, Stiles and Morse, and the new Yale Skating Rink.

THE orchestra floor and the two balconies were filled. The Boston Symphony musicians were on stage—practicing, tuning up and conversing among themselves.

The conductor entered. The audience applauded. And then a strange thing happened.

Erich Leinsdorf, who has been the conductor for slightly less than a year and a half, sat down at the harpsichord and proceeded to play the instrument, at the same time conducting Bach's fourth Brandenburg Concerto.

This happened during the 1963 Thanksgiving concert in Boston, and it was an unusual sight—at least for this ardent symphony-goer—to see the conductor in a dual role.

The conductor himself seemed pleased. He played, flushed and smiling, bouncing up and down to keep time, looking like a child at a new school who has just revealed that he can recite all the books in the Bible.

In any other city the audience might have been surprised. Not in Boston, and for once this indicates not the nature of Bostonians, but of Leinsdorf himself, one of the most distinguished conductors in the world today.

An operatic background is probably responsible for the dramatic sense and great versatility of this conductor who is scheduled to appear in New Haven Tuesday night with his Boston musicians.

Leinsdorf, the father of five children, lives in an ample house in Brookline, within walking distance of Boston Symphony Hall. But he has lived in this house only for the 16 months he has been the conductor of the BSO. The road there has been a long one.

Leinsdorf is Viennese, and he received his musical education in his native city. When he was 22 he became the assistant at the Salzburg Festival to those two great men, Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

Of his four years at Salzburg he remembers that he "never looked at the watch, and always did every conceivable thing that one could possibly do . . . I certainly found out that the style of the great interpreter is his own, and I have never consciously tried to imitate anyone else. Because I know a conductor's communication with the public through the medium of a great work is due to his own convictions and how he can incorporate them in his work. I was always aware that for these great masters the one thing that counted was the ultimate result, and they didn't spare any effort to get it. There has to be individual preparation to get a clear image of what one wants, and that is probably the greatest discovery I made when I was at a very young, impressionable age, when I first met Toscanini and Walter."

New Haven Register

Boris and Altman

Whitestone Photo

Mr. Leinsdorf gives a class in conducting at the Orchestra's summer school of music, the Berkshire Music Center, which is in session at Tanglewood for the five week Festival period.

Whitestone Photo

One day Mr. Leinsdorf arrived at rehearsal — and discovered that the members of his orchestra were dressed in silly sweatshirts they'd ordered printed with the name of Leinsdorf's alma mater. Inside the oval is inscribed: "My University" in German.

When he was 26 Mr. Leinsdorf came to the United States to work for the Metropolitan Opera, serving as assistant conductor from 1937 to 1939, and chief conductor of German Operas from 1939 to 1943. Then came a short time as conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, followed by service in the United States Army. After the army, Mr. Leinsdorf became conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra for nine years. Then he became conductor of the New York City Opera for one catastrophically original season: the New York City Opera lost money hand over fist on Mr. Leinsdorf's adventurous series. But the Metropolitan Opera was eager to have him back; he went to work for them the next season, and stayed there for four years.

Finally, he was offered, and accepted, the Boston Symphony Orchestra post, one of the most coveted of all orchestral conducting jobs. The orchestra has the reputation of being first rate, the best. Secondly, there is an immense amount of community support. There is also a good deal of community pride which is illustrated by Mr. Leinsdorf's story about meeting a BSO trustee while he was vacationing abroad just after accepting the conductorship.

The trustee rushed over to introduce himself. "Welcome to Boston!" he said, waving his hand through the alien air.

Rarely are empty seats noticeable at a BSO concert. Here or there, perhaps, a Bostonian with pneumonia may have stayed away, but no one, judging from the sounds of coughs during the winter season, would allow a simple cold to keep him away. There is even a subway stop named Symphony, although Symphony Hall stands in the midst of other landmarks.

Thirdly, the Boston Symphony is expertly managed.

Mr. Leinsdorf considers his opera training a great advantage and his comments concerning the typical training of American conductors reflect very much on his own experience: "I think the average American conductor is lacking in certain advantages, one of them being an apprenticeship in opera. It is very difficult to take a man without much experience or background right out of his conservatory—even a brilliant man—and put him in charge of an orchestra. But in the opera there are tasks he can perform without having the spotlight on him, and there he can be groomed and educated for greater things.

"I think that the young conductor who goes into opera will have a better chance of going to the top. There are conductors who insist that they can only do concerts—and this is sometimes their own fault, because in opera you have got to have a certain command of piano and score playing, but many conductors play just a string instrument. So they work for these community orchestras where they perform many tasks which are terribly useful and are making great contributions, but their own careers will be somewhat stymied in the process."

When he first accepted the Boston symphony post, Mr. Leinsdorf was asked whether he would miss opera.

"For several years," Mr. Leinsdorf said, "my nostalgia will be dormant."

The orchestra under Leinsdorf has begun to have a different feeling than it had under its two most recent conductors, Munch and Koussevitzky. Both Mr. Munch and Mr. Koussevitzky had a French-Italian style, whereas Mr. Leinsdorf's style is German-Austrian. The orchestra has returned to the original Germanic flavor given to it three quarters of a century ago by its founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson, although even in those early years it was jokingly said that the fire-exits were for use "in case of Brahms."

Leinsdorf's hallmarks are precision and tight control, but this does not rule out a fluid, lyric, even humorous sense of melodic line. Another characteristic of the man is dedication, and pleasure in the music he conducts. This is contagious, and his violins, before a recent performance practiced until the minute he appeared, whereas the 'cello players were engrossed in a fearful argument, which made one wonder whether they wouldn't break the instruments over one another's heads and leave. But it was only an interesting musical discussion, among the members of an orchestra which is noted for its lack of built-in jealousies and personal friction.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall this coming Tuesday. This is a chance for New Haveners to hear on home ground one of the world's greatest conductors conduct one of the world's most distinguished orchestras. But this is not the only chance New Haveners have to hear Leinsdorf conduct nearer home than Boston.

During the summers he takes his orchestra to the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lennox, Mass., only 75 miles north of New Haven. Here listeners sprawl on the grass or sit in open sheds, eat box lunches, take walks, but there is little chatter, because the air is full of music, some coming from the instruments of music students and some from those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra members, with Leinsdorf often conducting.

By EMILY CAIN
Register Staff Reporter

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

JAN 26 1964

WHAT'S IN STORE FOR TANGLEWOOD

By RAYMOND ERICSON

WHEN Erich Leinsdorf goes to London this week for a fortnight's vacation, he will spend part of the time straightening out a copyright problem centered on a work by Richard Strauss that he wants to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival next summer.

This is the music to the three-act version of "Der Bürger als Edelmann." In its original form, this Hofmannsthal rendering of Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" was an unwieldy amalgam of the play with the opera "Ariadne auf Naxos." Later, Strauss separated the opera from the play, adding a prologue to "Ariadne" to form the work as it is usually performed today and making a nine-piece concert suite from the incidental music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

Play Extended

Finally, the play was extended to three acts, ending with a Turkish ceremony. For this production, Strauss wrote additional incidental music, involving three vocal soloists. This version totals 17 numbers, including the 9 in the suite.

The copyright problem is this: Bote & Bock, which controls the standard suite, is represented in America by Associated Music Publishers. Furstner, Ltd., which controls the three-act version of the play, is represented here by Boosey & Hawkes.

Since Mr. Leinsdorf assumes this jurisdictional problem will be settled, he is going ahead with plans for the performance at the festival. He expects to use 14 or 15 numbers, to last about an hour. Richard Wilbur, the poet, will provide narration to give the work continuity and perhaps provide English lyrics for some of the songs.

This will be the American premiere of this version of the Strauss work, and is being presented as part of the centenary observance of the composer's birth. In all, there will be 12 of his compositions performed, including such novelties as "Die Tageszeiten," for male chorus and orchestra; the "Parergon zur Symphonia domestica," a piano concerto for the left hand, and Three Hymns, for soprano.

ERICH LEINSDORF — Plans a Strauss Festival at Tanglewood for this summer.

The Strauss cycle is symptomatic of Mr. Leinsdorf's enterprise in freshening the repertory at the Tanglewood festival. For its eight-week duration, from July 3 to Aug. 23, he has scheduled 57 works, of which 32—more than half—will be new to the summer series.

Not that there is anything startling about many of these newcomers. They include, for example, Verdi's Requiem and Mahler's Fifth Symphony. But they indicate the trend being taken in the festival repertory, a trend that showed itself in Mr. Leinsdorf's first season there as musical director last summer.

Novelties Too

But genuine novelties there will be. Haydn's cantata, "Applausus," will be given its American premiere. Beethoven's complete music to "The Ruins of Athens" will be performed, as will be Liszt's fantasy for piano and orchestra on themes from the same work—not necessarily on the same program. Other choral works promised are Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" and Schubert's Great Mass in E flat.

Contemporary American works include Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, Alan Hovhaness's Prelude and Triple Fugue and Ned Rorem's "The Eagles."

As before, the programs for the first two weeks will be played by a chamber orchestra drawn from the Boston Symphony. Music by Mozart will dominate these concerts.

Among the guest conductors will be two who have not previously appeared at Tanglewood, Leopold Stokowski and Max Rudolf. The others are Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy and William Steinberg. Of the festival's 24 concerts, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 7 1964

By a Staff Photographer

Etude No. 3

Chauffeurs wait outside Symphony Hall for the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concert to end.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,971
FEB 8 1964

Re Concert-Going

To the Editor of The Register:

I add to the discussion of Tardy Concert-goers.

The scheduled time for the start of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was 8:30 p.m. and, according to my watch, that is exactly when it started. This seems eminently reasonable to me and equally sensible. It was a long and demanding program.

Anyone who enjoys listening to good music and who is, as certainly can happen to all of us, unavoidably detained, would not consider disturbing those who listen and those who play by breaking into the pattern of sound the composer has written and the artists are producing. He would, with good grace and understanding, await a scheduled break in the performance and then, as quietly and as swiftly as possible, take his seat.

Could it be, by any chance, that those who are so late in arriving and so disturbed by not being immediately seated are those who, when the last note has not quite died in the air, leap to their feet and leave the hall.

It is time the "local management" extended to their interested patrons the courtesy of ensuring that their listening is not disturbed by late-comers. I trust it was they, finally goaded to action, who closed the doors when the concert began, and I trust this procedure has now become a policy.

MRS. JAMES H. SHATTUCK
New Haven.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 11 1964

Pre-Symphony Luncheon For Newton Music School

The All-Newton Music School will be honored Friday at the pre-symphony luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn, at 12:15.

The school, a Red Feather service, was founded more than fifty years ago by a group of public-spirited citizens in Newton, who believed that music study of high quality should be available to all.

With this in mind, its director, Anne Combosi, an excellent musician in her own right, continues to affirm the highest possible standards so much in evidence in all activities of the school.

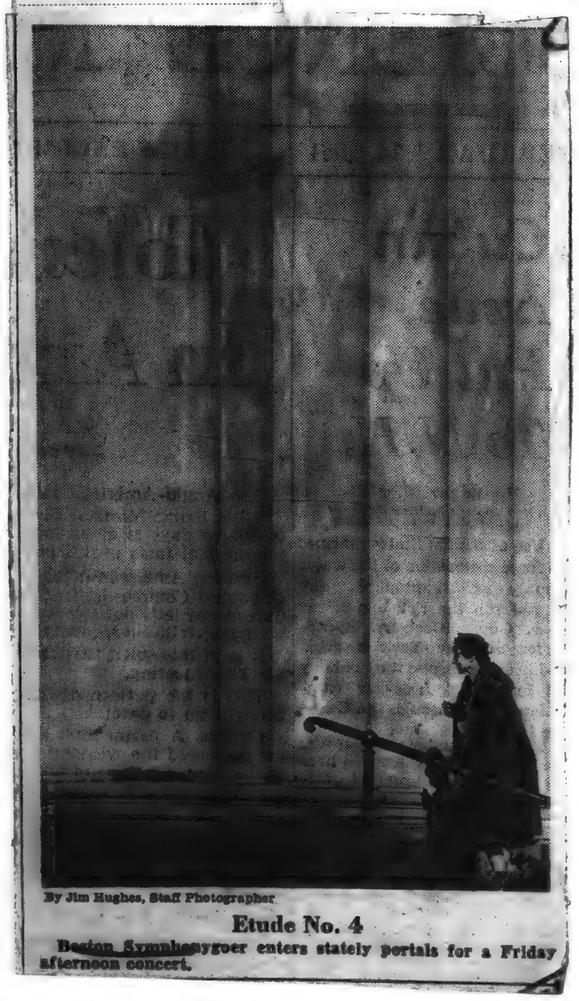
Louis Speyer, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the most colorful French musical personalities of this organization, will discuss and demonstrate the oboe and the English horn, as sustaining instruments of a symphony orchestra.

Friends of Louis Speyer, and patrons of the school will be on hand, Friday, and red tulips will add a gay note to this pre-symphony luncheon on Valentine's Day.

Those who have accepted invitations to be at the head table are Mrs. Endicott Peabody, Mrs. Anne Gombosi, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Speyer, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Ellis Dickson, Roland B. MacDonald, Winslow Adams, Mrs. B. Alden Thresher, Lyman H. Ziegler, Mrs. Loomis Patrick Miss Gretchen Clifford, Lucien Thayer, Henry Shepard Jr. Mrs. Dow Smith and Mrs. Victor Alper.

The luncheons are open to the public and parking is available.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 14 1964



By Jim Hughes, Staff Photographer

Etude No. 4

Boston Symphonyover enters stately portals for a Friday afternoon concert.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-420(
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 11 1964

Reception For Speyer On Friday

In the beautiful house at 53 Marlboro Street, which was given a few years ago by Mrs. F. Carrington Weems, to the French Library in Boston, a reception will be held in honor of M. Louis Speyer, Friday afternoon, from 4:30 to 6:30.

The occasion for this event is due to the fact that M. Speyer is retiring after 40 years as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has appeared as soloist, both with the English horn and the oboe. He is a graduate of the Paris Conservatory and has made a brilliant career in musical circles both in America and in Europe.

Invitations have been sent to the Boston Symphony Trustees and their wives, headed by Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Cabot, and also to the Board of Governors of the French Center, headed by Mr. and Mrs. Russell S. Codman Jr., and to all members of the French Center.

In charge of the committee for the reception are Mrs. Georges Florin, Mrs. Jean Francois Berry and Mrs. John Lloyd. Among the pourers will be Mrs. Philip Lane, Mrs. Chester B. Humphrey, Mrs. Charles Schepens, Mrs. Georges Doriot, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. Jasper Whiting and Miss Rebekah Hobbs.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SU 1 1964

Mr. and Mrs. Eric Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony leave Logan Airport Thursday for White House dinner with British Prime Minister Sir Alec Douglas-Home.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
MAR 1 1964

LEINSDORF – MUSIC'S RIVERBOAT GAMBLER

Tchaikovsky Score Draws Enthusiastic Response

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—A weird current phenomenon is the simultaneous discovery by a large number of musically sophisticated people than an old-line Russian named Peter Tchaikovsky composed a sizeable amount of pleasing music.

Musical Emoting

It will seem especially weird to the much larger number of comparatively unsophisticated musical people. They had never ceased cherishing his lush melodies and responding to his heart-on-the-sleeve musical emoting with a moist eye and a languishing sigh.

As recently as the beginning of the present music season Tchaikovsky appeared a composer on the toboggan slide which leads from major importance to minor and thence to obscurity. Such a matter has to be judged by which composers performing musicians choose to perform — and not perform.

These are bread-and-butter decisions. You can count on the fingers of one hand the musicians who can afford to follow their own tastes to the letter in organizing their programs while ignoring the prejudices of the sophisticated people who in one degree or another make music their fetish.

Spend Freely

They are the people who subscribe to whole seasons of opera and symphonic music and buy their tickets for individual recitals the day they're announced, weeks in advance.

Not only do they spend freely for their musical pleasures; they talk freely and since they talk impressively and dogmatically, they either lead less sophisticated people to box offices or keep them away.

Since the great Tchaikovsky resurgence at the end of World War II these people have had him on their pan and season by season they've made the fire under the pan hotter and hotter. They've broiled and fried him as a weeper and a creeper, as a vapid sentimentalist, and even as a transparent neurotic —as though neurotics were rare among creative artists!

As the heat increased the appearances of Tchaikovsky on programs decreased. It had gotten so that when a symphony conductor programmed a Tchaikovsky masterpiece like the "Pathetique" symphony he had his program annotator apologetically play up Tchaikovsky's superb technical mastery of the orchestra and play down his blatant appeals to tender hearts.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, has to be credited with exposing the phenomenon. About midseason he programmed Tchaikovsky's third suite for orchestra which is among his major works and had fallen into such neglect it was as though it had never been written.

Whether Leinsdorf sensed the anti-Tchaikovsky fever of the musically sophisticated had run its course or whether he was dutifully reviving a deserving composition isn't important. What is important was the enthusiastic reception. You should have heard those sophisticates rave!

Talk of Genius

They talked about "beauty," of "loveliness," of "georgeous melodies," of "superlative inventiveness," and, of course, of genius. All these are terms which were applied routinely to Tchaikovsky in the days when he was everybody's favorite but they have been out of fashion for a long long time.

After such an unexpected success, both in Boston and New York, Leindsorf has inserted the third suite into his programs at every opportunity. You can be sure other orchestras and musicians are deeply impressed by the Bostonian "hit," and a great Tchaikovsky revival is in the musical cards.

Meanwhile, the Metropolitan Opera put on Tchaikovsky's opera, "Eugene Onegin," evidently as a late-season filler. It was a new production at the met several seasons ago when the high expectations held for it were disappointed by the indifferent or condescending reactions of the sophisticates. And so it was dropped from the repertoire.

This time, from the very first performance, it took on the glow of a hit. The most amiable compliments were paid to it by the volunteer oracles in the lobbies and the house saloon between acts, and by the critics.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 18 1964

Pre-Symphony Luncheon to Fete MIT Music Head

Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn will honor a group from across the Charles—the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Music Department, and its director, Prof. Klaus Liepmann.

The Choral Society, founded by him, achieved a far-reaching reputation, and has had a brilliant career, winning praise for its artistry in this country and on tours aboard. It represents a cross-section of the entire Massachusetts Institute of Technology community, including students, scientists, engineers, secretaries and students' wives.

Robert Ripley, a prominent member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest speaker, and will discuss "Unknown Aspects—Inside the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The Pre-Symphony Luncheon gourmet menus, which already have made their reputation, add a pleasant note, and free parking is welcomed by the patrons.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 11 1964

LONG-TIME member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of its most colorful personalities, Louis Speyer, soloist on both the English horn and the oboe, will be guest speaker at Friday's pre-symphony luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn. He was feted last week at the French Center in New England in honor of his 46th year with the B. S. O. and achieving a record of never having missed a concert in that time.

Special guests at the luncheon will be the All Newton Music School, a Red Feather Service, founded over 50 years ago by a group of public-spirited citizens in Newton who believed that music study of high quality should be available to all.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 15 1964

As I Hear It

Don't Move. It's a Raid

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

IF THE TIGERS had announced in midseason last year that Mickey Mantle and Roger Maris would leave the Yankees and start the next playing year in Detroit, it wouldn't have caused any more comment in baseball circles than the announcement by the Philadelphia Orchestra a couple of months ago that two of the Boston Symphony's first chair men would come to them at the start of the next season.

Trades and transfers and sales are routine matters in the big leagues and in a narrower degree more or less the same process takes place in orchestras. An orchestra player's expectancy of tenure is longer than that of an athlete, but orchestras swap in hopes of strengthening their team; and players, too, for ever so many reasons, seek other situations.

* * *

AN ORCHESTRA, so far as personnel is concerned, is much like a lake which has an inlet and an outlet, gaining a few players and also losing a few each year by retirement, resignations, transfers and in rare cases, dismissal within the rules of the union for inadequacy. At the end of each Tanglewood season there is usually a banquet and ceremony to honor those who have arrived at retirement age. Richard Burgin retired in 1962 after occupying the concertmaster's chair for 42 years; Louis Speyer will complete 46 years as English horn this summer. If anyone was aspiring to posts such as those, he had a bit of a wait.

There are said to be about 1,200 orchestras in the United States. These would include amateur orchestras, such as our own stalwart Berkshire Community Orchestra in Williamstown. Those of truly professional caliber are quite few, and of these the conductors and managers of 16 claim they are among the first five. This is in the same ratio as that of Stradivarius violins; of the 300 in the world, 400 are in America.

* * *

IT PLEASES many people to grade and rank orchestras, and many discussions on such a subject end in controversy. One way orchestras can be graded is by the length of their seasons. The orchestras in cities other than the top metropolises have seasons of from 20 to 26 weeks. This is a factual basis for comparing orchestras. On that basis the Boston Symphony has the second longest season and, according to its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, the best orchestral contract in the world. There are a meager few others which are in the running by this method of counting.

It becomes obvious, therefore, that every musician in the "smaller" orchestras is eager to get into the "large" ones if for no other than remunerative reasons. This factor needs no supporting evidence. It will thus be seen why loyalty in the "small" orchestras is an undependable factor. The constant turn of eyes by the members of these short-season orchestras toward the more attractive situations in the long-season ones allows those who have the authority to fill vacancies, as they occur in the big orchestras, the choice of the entire roster of orchestral musicians in the whole country (with a few exceptions).

* * *

THE INCIDENTAL added incentive of fees from recording that the best-known orchestras provide is another not inconsequential reason for this pressure toward the top which is as constant, paradoxically, as the rush of lemmings to the sea. We have no access to secret information of the Boston situation, but we would wager a pretty penny that hundreds of violists and cellists throughout the country got in touch with Boston when the recent Philadelphia announcement was made public to ask for an audition for the posts to be vacated.

Relying still only on intuition and deduction, we think it a safe bet that Ormandy got in touch with Leinsdorf and told him that he hoped that Boston did not think Philadelphia was raiding it. It would be a normal sequitur to imagine that Leinsdorf phoned Szell to disclaim raiding Cleveland when it became news that the Boston replacements would come from that city.

* * *

THE DIVORCE courts of music are almost as active as the marriage license bureaus. Some abide by their contracts until death do them part; others for reasons either obvious or unpredictable go their separate ways.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 17 1964

What People Talk About

Delivering Us From Delusions

To the Editor—There are a few of us in Boston who regard Charles Munch as a splendid conductor. In the past, there have been many of us who have found great enjoyment in his readings of Berlioz, Debussy and Ravel.

Yes, on occasion, we have even shouted a sincere "bravo" to this man and to the orchestra which he lead for so long.

But apparently—poor souls—we have all been deceived. Poor, lost sheep, gone astray as it were. Yet, perhaps there is still time to repent? For, lo, the glory of the Globe has descended upon us. It seems, we humble folk have been given a musical Messiah, dedicated to delivering us from our sad delusions. With the righteousness of his 30-odd years, he has come among us to smite our traditional gods, and bathe Boston in a new light of musical truth.

So be it. Good luck to Michael Steinberg, even though I shall not be among the happy number redeemed from the error of their ways by the grace of your words.

You write with such talent and earnestness that it is almost a pity that no one takes music critics very seriously any more. A situation, no doubt, arising from the unfortunate tendency of most critics to take themselves too seriously.

With tongue in check, except when shouting "bravo."

THOMAS McCARTHY
South Boston.

Long Needed

To the Editor—May I congratulate you on your new music critic. We have for a long time needed a first-rate one, who could measure up to the late Philip Hale.

MRS. R. G. WADSWORTH
Brookline

"His Approach Is Trivial"

To the Editor — Michael Steinberg comes to the Globe with striking credentials as a music critic. We are bound to respect his opinions on music however much they differ from our own.

But by choosing to start his first review for the Globe—on the American premiere of Bernstein's "Kaddish" — with such sneering personal remarks as those in his first two paragraphs, he could only lessen our respect for the musical discussion which followed.

The presumption of introducing himself to Boston by sneering at a leading composer certainly seems bad manners, an example of the "vulgarity" of which he accuses Bernstein.

I think it would be impossible for someone who had not been at the Friday concert to tell from the review that the work was received by the audience with a five-minute standing ovation.

Steinberg may be too new to Boston to know that such a reception is not a familiar event at Symphony. In fact, I know of only one recent work which occasioned a similar response. That was Britten's "War Requiem," which is interestingly similar in basic conception to the Bernstein.

A serious critic must deal not only with the dynamics of any work he hears, and with his personal understanding of it, but also with its effect on the larger audience for whom the composer intended it.

The "Kaddish" is a powerful symphony which impressed an audience which has little predilection for modern music or sympathy with the Jewish tradition which lies behind this particular work.

Mr. Steinberg may question the depth and validity of the audience's response, but unless he is prepared to recognize that reaction and examine it, his approach is trivial.

The significance of this powerful composition could be more profitably explored by a reviewer who would not dismiss its effect with such emotional words as "vulgarity," "theatrical," and "a series of tricks."

BARBARA COLLINS
Malden.

A New, Vigorous Perspective

To the Editor—It is delightful and refreshing to have a music critic who writes with honest candor and who is able to translate his authority and knowledge into provocative prose.

We have long needed this valuable perspective of critique, and I for one welcome it as a stimulant Bostonians should take with respect.

No doubt Michael Steinberg will receive many anguished letters, for I am afraid that at times the local music lovers tend to become too provincial, too self-satisfied, too comfortable in their regard for the Boston Symphony and its conductors.

For many years, the late Cyrus Durgin and I enjoyed a close friendship, and it is doubly pleasing to me to know that a critic succeeds him who is obviously knowledgeable, and whose direct style is so welcome.

We desperately need an approach like Steinberg's to give to our concerts here a new, vigorous and authoritative perspective that will help to erase too much self-satisfaction and smugness.

JOHN R. THORNTON
Producer, Concert
Productions of Boston

Welcome to Boston

To the Editor—A welcome to Boston to Michael Steinberg. I am acquainted with his work in the Saturday Review and am pleased that the Globe has chosen him to succeed Cyrus Durgin. Since he died, there has been little musical criticism here worth reading.

I agreed heartily with his criticism of the Bernstein concert. "Kaddish" struck me as pretentious and vulgar.

But I am not writing because we agreed. I am writing because it is a delight to have a critic who writes with intelligence, authority and conviction.

I hope he will enjoy being here.

RICHARD W. DWIGHT, M.D.
Chestnut Hill

Two of the Finest

To the Editor—I was so impressed with Michael Steinberg's last two reviews of the Boston Symphony, Bernstein's "Kaddish" and Munch's Ravel, that I have finally been moved to speak. Two of the finest, wittiest and most incisive reviews I have ever seen. The wishy-washy ignorance, if not bad taste of most critics, in any field, has been plaguing dilettantes for years.

EUGENE SPIEGEL
New York.

A Stimulant for All

To the Editor—I feel compelled, after having read Michael Steinberg's second excellent review of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to welcome him to the Boston music scene. His scholarly criticism will, I hope, stimulate the Boston audience to expect more of their only large orchestra, and the orchestra itself to perform, at a higher level of excellence, programs of greater stimulation and innovation.

DOROTHY B. EDINBURG
Chestnut Hill.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

FEB 11 1964

LEINSDORF AND LIPKIN won't have to fight over who gets first crack at the score of John Knowles Paine's "Spring Symphony," which, I suggested several weeks ago, might be a suitable replacement for the perennial performance of the Schumann opus bearing the same popular name. First, Arthur Bennett Lipkin of the Portland Maine Symphony perked up at the notion. Then Erich Leinsdorf showed some interest. There happen to be two scores extant and both are available at Harvard's Loeb Library.

Cardinal Cushing has given a generous gift to the Boston Symphony through its supporting auxiliary, the Friends of the B. S. The Cardinal was moved to do so by the orchestra's participation in the majestic Requiem Mass sung for JFK in Holy Cross Cathedral last month. "Without that orchestra," the Cardinal wrote in the letter that came with his gift, "that magnificent ceremony would not have been possible." The Friends are trying to raise $150,000 to meet the orchestra's anticipated deficit for the year.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1 1964

N.Y. To Get Microfilm Archive Of Music Manuscripts

NEW YORK—Original music manuscripts on microfilm are making their way to the new Lincoln Center music dept. of the New York Public Library.

Called the (Arturo) Toscanini Memorial Archive, the collection has a three-fold purpose: to create a central deposit for such material; to let other libraries obtain the microfilm; to create a master microfilm file of the world's greatest music.

Sydney Beck, head of the Library's rare book and manuscript dept., is directing the establishment of the archive. He recently visited 23 European countries on its behalf.

He said it would take about five years to complete the project. The edifice that will house the archive is now under construction.

A committee of sponsors has been formed, members of which include Samuel Barber, Leonard Bernstein, Erich Leinsdorf, Eugene Ormandy and George Szell.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 15 1964

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

"This is how I came to be a proper Bostonian," English horn first deskman Louis Speyer told Boston Symphony subscribers at luncheon Friday at the Midtown Motor Inn. His French accent unmistakable even after 46 years of music-making here, Speyer reported that he came to this country with a French army band, speaking no English, but he said "Oui" to two gentlemen, who turned out to be Judge Cabot, president of the B.S.O. in 1918, and manager Brennan, asking him to join the orchestra.

"To stay in Boston and to become a civilian: what more could I want?" Speyer said. The French government consented, and he hasn't missed a concert ever since.

Swiss-born Mrs. Anne Gambosi reported how the All Newton Music School got its name. All of the Newtons are involved, but the "all" really means that the school's goal is for "all and every one to meet his potential in music and to help make it come true."

Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, hostess, cited the school for 54 years of service here and as a model for many like it.

Joining her and master of ceremonies Harry Ellis Dickson at the head table were Latin American music critic Albert Jimenez, Mme. Speyer, sculptress; Miss Gretchen Clifford, Winslow Adams, Mrs. Victor Alper, Roland B. MacDonald, Mrs. Patrick Loomis, Mrs. Cyril Shelvey, Mrs. Dow F. Smith, Mrs. B. Alden Thresher and Globe writer and composer Lucien Thayer.

Hostesses taking tables for guests included Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Stephen B. Ames, Mrs. S. R. Morton, Mrs. Sidney Stoneman and Mrs. Gordon Thayer.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 17 1964

What People Talk About

Delivering Us From Delusions

To the Editor—There are a few of us in Boston who regard Charles Munch as a splendid conductor. In the past, there have been many of us who have found great enjoyment in his readings of Berlioz, Debussy and Ravel.

Yes, on occasion, we have even shouted a sincere "bravo" to this man and to the orchestra which he lead for so long.

But apparently—poor souls—we have all been deceived. Poor, lost sheep, gone astray as it were. Yet, perhaps there is still time to repent? For, lo, the glory of the Globe has descended upon us. It seems, we humble folk have been given a musical Messiah, dedicated to delivering us from our sad delusions. With the righteousness of his 30-odd years, he has come among us to smite our traditional gods, and bathe Boston in a new light of musical truth.

So be it. Good luck to Michael Steinberg, even though I shall not be among the happy number redeemed from the error of their ways by the grace of your words.

You write with such talent and earnestness that it is almost a pity that no one takes music critics very seriously any more. A situation, no doubt, arising from the unfortunate tendency of most critics to take themselves too seriously.

With tongue in cheek, except when shouting "brava."

THOMAS McCARTHY
South Boston.

Long Needed

To the Editor—May I congratulate you on your new music critic. We have for a long time needed a first-rate one, who could measure up to the late Philip Hale.

MRS. R. G. WADSWORTH
Brookline

"His Approach Is Trivial"

To the Editor — Michael Steinberg comes to the Globe with striking credentials as a music critic. We are bound to respect his opinions on music however much they differ from our own.

But by choosing to start his first review for the Globe—on the American premiere of Bernstein's "Kaddish" — with such sneering personal remarks as those in his first two paragraphs, he could only lessen our respect for the musical discussion which followed.

The presumption of introducing himself to Boston by sneering at a leading composer certainly seems bad manners, an example of the "vulgarity" of which he accuses Bernstein.

I think it would be impossible for someone who had not been at the Friday concert to tell from the review that the work was received by the audience with a five-minute standing ovation.

Steinberg may be too new to Boston to know that such a reception is not a familiar event at Symphony. In fact, I know of only one recent work which occasioned a similar response. That was Britten's "War Requiem," which is interestingly similar in basic conception to the Bernstein.

A serious critic must deal not only with the dynamics of any work he hears, and with his personal understanding of it, but also with its effect on the larger audience for whom the composer intended it.

The "Kaddish" is a powerful symphony which impressed an audience which has little predilection for modern music or sympathy with the Jewish tradition which lies behind this particular work.

Mr. Steinberg may question the depth and validity of the audience's response, but unless he is prepared to recognize that reaction and examine it, his approach is trivial.

The significance of this powerful composition could be more profitably explored by a reviewer who would not dismiss its effect with such emotional words as "vulgarity," "theatrical," and "a series of tricks."

BARBARA COLLINS
Malden

A New, Vigorous Perspective

To the Editor—It is delightful and refreshing to have a music critic who writes with honest candor and who is able to translate his authority and knowledge into provocative prose.

We have long needed this valuable perspective of critique, and I for one welcome it as a stimulant. Bostonians should take with respect.

No doubt Michael Steinberg will receive many anguished letters, for I am afraid that at times the local music lovers tend to become too provincial, too self-satisfied, too comfortable in their regard for the Boston Symphony and its conductors.

For many years, the late Cyrus Durgin and I enjoyed a close friendship, and it is doubly pleasing to me to know that a critic succeeds him who is obviously knowledgeable, and whose direct style is so welcome.

We desperately need an approach like Steinberg's to give to our concerts here a new, vigorous and authoritative perspective that will help to erase too much self-satisfaction and smugness.

JOHN R. THORNTON
Producer, Concert
Productions of Boston

Welcome to Boston

To the Editor—A welcome to Boston to Michael Steinberg. I am acquainted with his work in the Saturday Review and am pleased that the Globe has chosen him to succeed Cyrus Durgin. Since he died, there has been little musical criticism here worth reading.

I agreed heartily with his criticism of the Bernstein concert. "Kaddish" struck me as pretentious and vulgar.

But I am not writing because we agreed. I am writing because it is a delight to have a critic who writes with intelligence, authority and conviction.

I hope he will enjoy being here.

RICHARD W. DWIGHT, M.D.
Chestnut Hill

Two of the Finest

To the Editor—I was so impressed with Michael Steinberg's last two reviews of the Boston Symphony, Bernstein's "Kaddish" and Munch's Ravel, that I have finally been moved to speak. Two of the finest, wittiest and most incisive reviews I have ever seen. The wishy-washy ignorance, if not bad taste of most critics, in any field, has been plaguing dilettantes for years.

EUGENE SPIEGEL
New York.

A Stimulant for All

To the Editor—I feel compelled, after having read Michael Steinberg's second excellent review of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to welcome him to the Boston music scene. His scholarly criticism will, I hope, stimulate the Boston audience to expect more of their only large orchestra, and the orchestra itself to perform at a higher level of excellence, programs of greater stimulation and innovation.

DOROTHY B. EDINBURG
Chestnut Hill.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 15 1964

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

"This is how I came to be a proper Bostonian," English horn first deskman Louis Speyer told Boston Symphony subscribers at luncheon Friday at the Midtown Motor Inn. His French accent unmistakable even after 46 years of music-making here, Speyer reported that he came to this country with a French army band, speaking no English, but he said "Oui" to two gentlemen, who turned out to be Judge Cabot, president of the B.S.O. in 1918, and manager Brennan, asking him to join the orchestra.

"To stay in Boston and to become a civilian: what more could I want?" Speyer said. The French government consented, and he hasn't missed a concert ever since.

Swiss-born Mrs. Anne Gambosi reported how the All Newton Music School got its name. All of the Newtons are involved, but the "all" really means that the school's goal is for "all and every one to meet his potential in music and to help make it come true."

Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, hostess, cited the school for 54 years of service here and as a model for many like it.

Joining her and master of ceremonies Harry Ellis Dickson at the head table were Latin American music critic Albert Jimenez, Mme. Speyer, sculptress; Miss Gretchen Clifford, Winslow Adams, Mrs. Victor Alper, Roland B. MacDonald, Mrs. Patrick Loomis, Mrs. Cyril Shelvey, Mrs. Dow F. Smith, Mrs. B. Alden Thresher and Globe writer and composer Lucien Thayer.

Hostesses taking tables for guests included Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Stephen B. Ames, Mrs. S. R. Morton, Mrs. Sidney Stoneman and Mrs. Gordon Thayer.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 11 1964

LEINSDORF AND LIPKIN won't have to fight over who gets first crack at the score of John Knowles Paine's "Spring Symphony," which, I suggested several weeks ago, might be a suitable replacement for the perennial performance of the Schumann opus bearing the same popular name. First, Arthur Bennett Lipkin of the Portland Maine Symphony perked up at the notion. Then Erich Leinsdorf showed some interest. There happen to be two scores extant and both are available at Harvard's Loeb Library.

Cardinal Cushing has given a generous gift to the Boston Symphony through its supporting auxiliary, the Friends of the B. S. The Cardinal was moved to do so by the orchestra's participation in the majestic Requiem Mass sung for JFK in Holy Cross Cathedral last month. "Without that orchestra," the Cardinal wrote in the letter that came with his gift, "that magnificent ceremony would not have been possible." The Friends are trying to raise $150,000 to meet the orchestra's anticipated deficit for the year.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.
FEB 1 1964

N.Y. To Get Microfilm Archive Of Music Manuscripts

NEW YORK—Original music manuscripts on microfilm are making their way to the new Lincoln Center music dept. of the New York Public Library.

Called the (Arturo) Toscanini Memorial Archive, the collection has a three-fold purpose: to create a central deposit for such material; to let other libraries obtain the microfilm; to create a master microfilm file of the world's greatest music.

Sydney Beck, head of the Library's rare book and manuscript dept., is directing the establishment of the archive. He recently visited 23 European countries on its behalf.

He said it would take about five years to complete the project. The edifice that will house the archive is now under construction.

A committee of sponsors has been formed, members of which include Samuel Barber, Leonard Bernstein, Erich Leinsdorf, Eugene Ormandy and George Szell.

BSO President Suggested Kennedy Memorial

Cabot, Best Friend Of the Orchestra

By MARGO MILLER

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a tall, laconic Yankee.

He wears the three-piece suit common to these parts, chews on his steel-rimmed glasses as though the earpieces were a spear of hay from his Walpole, N.H., dairy farm, and guides the fortunes of his orchestra from "a hole on the wall on Federal st." There he puts his feet up on an ancient couch and talks of Mozart or municipal bonds, as the occasion demands.

Last month's civic and religious memorial service for the late John Fitzgerald Kennedy was Cabot's inspiration. That it took place two months after the President's assassination was in keeping with Cabot's desire that the musical portion—the Mozart Requiem, played by the Boston Symphony—come off with the polish required for such an undertaking.

"No sense in going off half-cocked," commented Cabot who is no mean shot after grouse. This dignified pace might suggest to some the old Kingle's proclamation that "Cabots speak only to God," and in Cabot cadence, at that. Any person with legitimate business before the orchestra or the Cabot firm, which looks after Harvard College investments, can get to the Cabot ear by picking up the telephone.

On the Reservation

Cabot himself was so tapped, 32 years ago, when an orchestra trustee called him in. "They'd seen me at the Saturday concerts, so they'd elected me to the board." In presuming an interest in matters musical and civic, the trustees instead mined a passion for both.

"The orchestra's first duty is to Boston," says Cabot. Of his 38-member board, he is the trustee most conservative about orchestra tours, apart from the New York-Philadelphia-Washington axis. "It cost us $90,000 to go across the country last season. I guess it gives a lift to the players and its supposed to help sell records. On the European tours Uncle Sam pays most of it. Didn't used to."

The Best Deal

Despite Cabot's preference to stay on the reservation in a 44-week Boston season, including Pops and Esplanade, and two months at Tanglewood, Symphony Hall's tuning room calls him "the orchestra's best friend." He deals directly with the players' committee. Through the years have come the first pension fund in any orchestra, and comprehensive health-insurance plan, and in the 1940's, a smooth entrance into the American Federation of Musicians.

"The question was to get the best deal," says Cabot of the orchestra's joining the union. The threat of blacklist, which would deny the orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall and the making of records, sent Cabot and John T. Noonan, B.S.O. legal counsel, to meet with James Caesar Petrillo, A.F.M. head. "Symphony Hall thought we were two lambs off to the slaughter." Cabot found the union leader very happy, "with enough cold beer," to talk things over.

Cabot is proudest of getting a major union concession. Only in Boston is the musicians' local bound on orchestra affairs by a majority vote of B.S.O. players. In other cities, the uion head makes the contract, telling the players what they may accept from management.

Enviable, too, are orchestra-management relations over the trade agreement, or contract for services. Strike talk has been common the last few seasons in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Chicago, but not in Boston.

A Black Book

Naturally, all this costs money. The orchestra's annual budget is $2.5 million, representing $1.5 million for the compensation of conductor, players and soloists. While the orchestra earns more of its income than any other ensemble, the annual deficit is a stubborn $600,000, before contributions. "The trouble is the public thinks Higginson and Dane are still alive," says Cabot.

Col. Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra in 1881 and was its principal support. Ernest T. Dane was a trustee and generous patron.

Graduated from Harvard College in 1917 and into the war, Cabot, a former crew captain, planned an equally vigorous career in law. Pulmonary tuberculosis intervened. He spent a year in bed, adding to his education by keeping three reading projects going simultaneously: something light, something medium and the weightier books, which have led to his support of the World Federalists, civil liberties and population control.

As evidence that he tends the Cabot acres is the high-yield herd of milk cows, mostly Holsteins, which enjoy the latest techniques in dairy management. Strawberry jam from the Cabot preserve found its way one Christmas to Charles Munch. The enclosed card assured the conductor that Cabot himself had had a hand in the picking, washing, hulling and cooking. Cabot, of course, had had a hand in the selection of the music director and his successor.

The task is accomplished with the aid of a little black book, containing concert reviews and recommendations for likely candidates. "We leave out the old boys and the very young, though (Guido) Cantelli was our obvious pick for after Munch." When a plane disaster moved Cantelli from the list, the trustees considered Lorin Maazel, Carlo Maria Giulini, Wolfgang Sawallisch, and Erich Leinsdorf. "The idea is to get someone totally different from the previous conductor, so you can avoid the miserable situation of comparison."

HENRY B. CABOT

Mozart at Cathedral Could Start Revival

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

STEINBERG

The solemn pontifical Mass of Requiem celebrated by Richard Cardinal Cushing in memory of John Fitzgerald Kennedy at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross last Jan. 19, and including the music of Mozart's Requiem conducted by Erihc Leinsdorf, is now available in a handsomely produced two-record album by RCA Victor.

Cardinal Cushing was assisted by students from St. John's Seminary, Rt. Rev. Matthew P. Stapleton, rector; Rt. Rev. Francis S. Rossiter, master of ceremonies. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and members of the Chorus pro Musica, the New England Conservatory Chorus, and the combined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by their respective directors, Alfred Nash Patterson, Lorna Cooke de Varon and Eliot Forbes.

Solemn Moment

The soloists were Saramae Endich, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Nicholas Di Virgilio, tenor, and Mac Morgan, bass. The plainchant responses were sung by the St. John Seminary Choir, Rt. Rev. Russell H. Davis, director.

By those who were present, and by the many more whom television brought as though into the presence, the album can be accepted first of all as the memento of a great occasion. But even to one only now, as it were, present for the first time, the records convey powerfully the sense of the solemn moment.

It is a revelation to hear Mozart's music paced, spread, drawn together, by the other prayers and chants. It is above all things moving to hear Mozart's Requiem, not as an ornament of our concert repertory, but actually being put to work. And how much more meaningful Mozart's quotation of plainsong in the 'Te decet hymnus' becomes when the surrounding chant can provide a frame of reference for it.

This Requiem is so much more celebration rather than performance that it hardly invites musical criticism in the ordinary way. The acoustics are clearly those of a church and not of a concert hall, but they have been tamed remarkably by RCA's recording engineers, and everything is quite as audible as it should be. One of Mozart's piano concertos might not survive Holy Cross Cathedral very well, but the church works are composed with the hazards of over-reverberant acoustics in mind.

Even though a purely musical judgement of this Requiem takes second place to other considerations, it should be pointed out that the three choruses and the orchestra do their job beautifully, and that while the women soloists are excellent, the two men are only adequate. Leinsdorf conducts well. He seems to go wrong just once, and that is in the 'Tuba mirum', which is too slow, or at least much too static. Perhaps he feels it too, because at 'Judex ergo cum sedebit' there is a sudden and, under the circumstances, welcome jolt forward. The 'Oro spplex' at the end of the 'Confutatis', the violins' sighs in the 'Lacrymosa', and the whole 'Domine Jesu Christe!' are all particularly sensitively done.

Altogether the most remarkable feature of the album is that it documents that it could happen at all. It has long been a distressing paradox that while some of the greatest music we know is that written for the Catholic Church, the music to be heard even in the greatest churches and upon the most solemn of occasions, is by and large disgraceful. Warmly grateful tribute must be paid to Cardinal Cushing for his promptness and vigor in clearing the path toward the celebration of a Solemn Pontifical Requiem with Mozart's music.

Did anyone mind? Were the officers of the archdiocese swamped beneath the protests of those who would have preferred the music of Pietro Yon?

Tribute is due as well to Mr. Henry B. Cabot and the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to Erich Leinsdorf, for the combination of responsibility and imagination that made the gesture possible in the first place.

In that nightmare weekend in November, the music broadcast from the funeral services in the Washington Cathedral was the one blot to detract from the dignity, the grandeur, the aptness, with which the grim duties of those days were carried out. The Boston Requiem is in a sense an atonement. Let us hope that it be not left at that, and that the Church itself and church musicians will face the challenge of bringing religion and the best music into a meaningful and mutually fruitful relationship again. The White House dinner invitations to Frost and Stravinsky did not at once turn the United States into an artists' paradise, nor will one performance of Mozart's Requiem by itself change the status of sacred music in the middle of the 20th century. But, in Kennedy's words, "Let us begin." And perhaps on January 19, 1964, in Holy Cross Cathedral, a beginning was made.

Great Dignity

The literature released with the record contains a facsimile of the invitation issued by Cardinal Cushing and Henry B. Cabot and other trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Mass, along with the text of the address given by the cardinal at the Mass.

Also included is the article by Robert Healy, the Globe's political editor, which appeared in the Globe the following day, beginning with the words, "It could have been for no one else, for it was like the man. It had great dignity, great beauty, great quality.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 4 1964

'Pacem in terris'

Pope to Hear Concert Conducted by Munch

By MARGO MILLER

Charles Munch calls himself a retired conductor.

He means retired from the Boston Symphony.

And in calling it the best orchestra of the world, he implies that his engagements elsewhere are as guest director of some very promising bands—in France, Holland, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, Japan, Canada, England and those parts of the United States for which Bostonians depart "by way of the Dedham road."

CHARLES MUNCH

So it was as "Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra" that he signed the book of condolences at the American Embassy in The Hague on the day of President Kennedy's assassination:

"I have a rehearsal, no concert that evening. Afterward, we hear the news. In the square by the embassy, we are like herring in a box. We watch the American flag. It comes down to half (mast). We know."

Munch, now 72, returned last week to conduct the first U.S. performances of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish." The work had been commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation for the orchestra's 75th anniversary in the season of 1955-56—while Munch was music director.

On Wednesday, at a special convocation in Jordan Hall, the New England Conservator will give him an honorary Doctor of Music degree.

Harvard had given him a similar honor, and while at Symphony Hall publicity refers to him as Dr. Munch, his name is usually prefaced by "Mr.," occasionally by "Monsieur." Frenchmen in the orchestra call him "patron"; the English equivalent for him and his successor, Erich Leinsdorf, is "the boss."

Tall, silver-maned, speaking better English since he left the shelter of Symphony Hall, Munch's most eloquent gesture is still the hand to the heart, when a piece of music moves him deeply. Concert-goers and the orchestra watch also for his seraphic smile.

Such was the case in the Bernstein Symphony: "A beautiful work. Think what you have in this country with Bernstein. His 'signature;' you cannot mistake his music."

At a dinner party Friday evening Munch listened to tapes of the performance, conducting quietly except for the monumental entrances in the music which brought him out of his chair.

Between tours, Munch has brief respites at his estate in Louveciennes, a town near Paris. Paintings by Dutch masters and French Impressionists; drawings and engravings by Duerer and Canaletto, among others; objects d'art, have earned him the title in France of "great collector—conductor second."

Subsequent engagements include two weeks at the Edinburgh Festival with the French Radio Orchestra, a fortnight in Helsinski; annual visits to European and Mediterranean festivals.

The concert most exciting to him, however, comes on May 29 in Paris' Notre Dame. There, he will conduct the world premiere of Darius Milhaud's setting for soprano, baritone, chorus and orchestra of "Pacem in terris," the famous encyclical of Pope John XXIII. In the audience will be Pope Paul.

It will be, says Munch, truly an Ecumenical occasion—Catholic cathedral, Jewish composer, Protestant conductor.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 5 1964

On the Record

Events of 1963 Vivid On Documentary Disc

BY HERBERT A. KENNY

In an age of mechanical disasters and offensive gadgetry, the documentary record must be accounted a blessing.

History on discs reached a startling climacteric with the famous "Liberation of Paris," and the "I Can Hear It Now," series.

"A Time to Keep: 1963", now presented to the public, has the advantage in its demands on the listener of encompassing the period in which President Kennedy went to his death on what had been a bright, gala day in Dallas, where the brilliance of the Texas sun all but concealed the black soil of hatred.

The recording brings us once again the New England voice of the young man who stood before a frightened world as a charismatic figure, symbolic of hope and the assurance that the future, however terrifying, could yet be saved.

In the stitching together of snippets of the day of the assassination, Chet Huntley and David Brinkley, the National Broadcasting Co.'s most famous team of commentators, have created a stirring, penetrating collage of sound that curiously stars the audience at Boston Symphony Hall, Nov. 22.

"Ladies and gentlemen," we hear Erich Leinsdorf announce, "we have received a report on the wireless . . . the President of the United States has been the victim of an assassination." The anguished gasp wrenched from the audience is touched with shock and disbelief.

The second reaction from the crowd is even more moving. Leinsdorf continued his announcement with these words: "We will play the funeral march from Beethoven's Third Symphony."

This drove the audience to another cry of anguish, one which carried a note of protest, as if to enter on to the funeral march was to confirm what they did not want to believe. The Sombre music of the strings then begins.

The Kennedy death and funeral and the circumstances attending them dominate the record. There is about the whole a harmony of parts. We hear the denial of responsibility by Lee Oswald, and later the shot that kills him. But none of the year is neglected and the whole seems to begin with the Southern accents of Gov. George Wallace of Alabama throwing himself across the path of history and ordering time to stop.

The record rounds up the year, compresses it, polishes it—and naturally leaving much to be desired—nevertheless gives us a precis of our most historic year since the end of World War II. History in decibels; and well told.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810
FEB 2 1964

Pre-Symphony Luncheon Lauds Walter Piston

Boston Symphony Orchestra's "Court Composer," the celebrated Walter Piston, much beloved in the B. S. O, was well honored at Friday's pre-Symphony Luncheon at Midtown Motor Inn.

All the leading music groups of the city had distinguished delegations present and with the regular patrons of the popular programs at their reserved tables, the dining room was filled to overflowing.

Harry Ellis Dickson who has been revealing inside glimpses of the symphony, at the luncheon series told amusing anecdotes about the composer before introducing him to the gathering.

The modest honor guest replied, "Composers are still a curiosity like trained seals." He told a few of his encounters with his own townfolk.

Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, director of the luncheons introduced among the special guests Mrs. Endicott Peabody (who presented Mrs. Piston with an attractive plate from the Governor); Mrs. Piston, who is a talented artist in her own right; Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, Miss Mabel Daniels, Miss Winifred Johnstone, and Mrs. Dickson.

Among others present were the Richard Ehrliches, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. A. Roland Teiner, Mrs. Vincent L. Greene, Mrs. Veevold Strekalovsky, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Robert Steinert, Mrs. Ferdinand Brigham, Mrs. Lewis Cabot, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Gummere, Mrs. Frank Ludwig, Mrs. Joseph dePasquale, Mrs. John A. Moir, Francis W. Sidlauskas and Miss Mildred Bixby.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 8 1964

Globe's New Music Critic Scores With First Review

Vulgarity Not Always Bad

To the Editor—Allow me to congratulate Michael Steinberg on his review last Saturday of Bernstein's "symphony"? And may I add that I look forward to reading some forthright criticism at last in The Globe.

Bernstein, who is essentially a vulgarian on a large scale—not that that is always a bad thing—, seemed to want his often brilliant musical effects to be swamped and interrupted by that dreadful text.

When I heard about God's tying a rainbow around His finger, presumably to remind Him to fetch the groceries, I could hardly believe my ears. And the bussings and muggings on the stage! Thank God Koussevitsky did not have his way as to a successor!

ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS
Little, Brown & Co.
Boston

Michael Steinberg's review of yesterday's Symphony concert appears on Page 12.

Presumption

To the Editor—Congratulations on your new music critic! And congratulations to him for saying plainly what a piece of flamboyant presumption Bernstein's "Kaddish" is! We hope your man sticks to his guns, and we can have some quality music reviews in Boston again.

MRS. LYDIA A. SMITH
Concord

There Hasn't Been Such Criticism

To the Editor—I have just finished reading Michael Steinberg's review of the Bernstein Kaddish. It is a very fine piece of work. There hasn't been such criticism in a Boston paper in my memory. I hope the paper and the town realizes what they now have. Much luck and best wishes.

STEWART A. WASHBURN
New York

Teeth in His Bite

To the Editor — I certainly enjoyed your new music critic's informative review of Bernstein's Kaddish Symphony. It's about time we had a musical critic on the Boston scene with some teeth in his bite and a long overdue disregard for bland, appreciative statements about Friday afternoon concerts!

BENJAMIN A. BARNES, M.D.
Seabrook, N.H.

Not Commonly Encountered

To the Editor — My compliments to The Globe for the distinguished review by Michael Steinberg of the premiere of Leonard Bernstein's so-called "Kaddish" Symphony. The review is of a sort not commonly encountered these days in the American press. Honest, literate, musically attentive and informed.

HENRY AIKEN
Department of Philosophy
Harvard University
Cambridge

Los Angeles Times
DAILY CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 2,439 S. 1,120,153

64

THE SYMPHONIC ORCHESTRA GAME OF MUSICAL CHAIRS

BY DELOS SMITH

• When the New York Philharmonic was in need of a super cello player it found its man playing in the Philadelphia Orchestra.

That put the Philadelphia Orchestra in need of a super cellist. It found one—in the Boston Symphony, and for full measure also took along a super viola player.

Now the Boston Symphony is in need and if you have a super cellist or violist or any super stringed instrument player in your symphony orchestra, you're well advised to keep an eye on him.

This game of musical chairs is played for keeps. Super stringed instrument players are hard to come by, like flashy and reliable first basemen or outfielders who hit routinely in the .300s.

You can't have superlative symphonies nor baseball teams without such performers. If being superlative is your endeavor—and it is the endeavor of the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony—you'll get them at whatever cost.

Even a casual glance tells you symphony orchestras don't lack for stringed instrument players. Violinists, violists, cellists and string bass men are in large numbers arrayed in banks and usually bowing or plucking in unison that must be the envy of the Rockettes or any other chorus line.

But in each of these banks there usually are only one or two players who bat 1.000 in making their instruments "speak" with the eloquence of an orator — in sustaining with exquisitely perfect phrasing and intonation the long-drawn musical sentence.

The symphonic literature is replete with such sentences. When they come in the symphony, the orchestra suddenly is silent while one viola or one cello or one violin utters it. If this solo instrument gasps or gurgles or rasps or mumbles, the whole orchestra becomes conspicuously a poor one.

The current musical chairs among America's most celebrated orchestras began when Carl Stern, solo cellist of the New York Philharmonic for many years, announced his retirement at the end of the present season.

Next came the announcement that Lorne Munroe, solo cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra would succeed Stern at the beginning of the 1964-65 season.

The next party heard from was the Philadelphia Orchestra. It announced that Samuel Mayes would become its cello soloist and Joseph de Pasquale its principal violist at that time. They're now playing in the Boston Symphony.

Where do you suppose the Boston Symphony got Mayes in the first place? Answer: From the Philadelphia Orchestra in which he had a cello "first desk" from 1939 to 1948.

Whereas the present shortage of super stringed instrument players is distressing, there is much hope for the future and Munroe and his wife can take credit for it. She was a concert violinist before they married and now she is the mother of 10 sons. Both parents are still under 40.

Expert stringed instrument playing runs in families. Take the Pasquales. Joseph is going to join his brothers, Francis and William and William's wife in the Philadelphia Orchestra. Francis is a cellist; William and his wife are violinists.

There is yet another Pasquale brother. He is Robert and he plays the violin in the New York Philharmonic. The father of these strings-playing brothers was—as you've already guessed—a strings-player. United Press International

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

JAN 19 1964

Over Forty Applied For Two Vacancies

By MARGO MILLER

MILLER

Seldom must a major symphony orchestra replace a solo player in his prime. Two vacancies are unheard of, especially in the Boston Symphony.

Such was the case, however, in December following announcement of the resignations of Joseph de Pasquale, principal violist, and Samuel Mayes, principal cellist. Both men, in their 40's, will take equivalent positions next season with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Their chairs will be filled by Jules Eskin, present first cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Burton Fine of the Boston Symphony. "To replace Sammy and Joe, we went out loaded for bear," says Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster who served on the audition jury. Like the new men, he is in his early 30s, and like Fine once occupied the last violin desk.

Grapevine Greetings

How did the orchestra go about replacing its players.

The telephone was Silverstein's big gun at first, with an even bigger assist from the grapevine. "An unusual number of holiday greetings by phone," said Silverstein, wryly, "followed by the question, was it true about Joe and Sammy?"

The orchestra opened auditions first to its present players. Six violas and five cellos signed up, while the jury was issuing invitations to men in a dozen American and Canadian orchestras. "I was also on the telephone to other players not in orchestras but who were certainly worth hearing. Our own men had the first dope on repertoire but we had to give the others the maximum time to prepare," Silverstein continued.

Twice as many musicians volunteered to audition as were actually invited to play. "We had to do a lot of weeding out of players who were just not tops." After the orchestra's own men were heard in the beneficial acoustics of Symphony Hall, the jury moved to New Haven and New York on the orchestra's January tour, scrambling between hotel suites, rooms in Carnegie and Philharmonic Halls. In all, 40 candidates played.

The Repertoire

Cellists were expected to prepare the Bach Suite in C minor, sonatas by Brahms and Beethoven, the solo passages in Strauss' "Don Quixote," the Brahms B-flat Piano Concerto and the Haydn Mass "In Time of War." Then the jury asked for cello passages in Bruckner, Mahler and Rimsky-Korsakov, to be performed at sight.

Violists could bring a piece of their choice by Bach and Hindemith. The prescribed music included Schubert's "Arpeggione" Sonata, the F-minor of Brahms, "Don Quixote" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Strauss provided the at-sight selections.

The jury chose the audition music so that the players would be heard in a variety of styles and to see what their general musical comprehension was. "We could tell pretty quickly what a man was capable of," says Silverstein who heard 30-hours of auditions.

The jury was composed of six permenant members, four string players and two winds. In training they represented American, French, German and Russian schools. "Each man on the jury has his own idea of an ideal sonority and style. So you can see that the two new men were chosen for their universal appeal to the jury.

Unanimous Decision

Duties of orchestral principals include more than the incidental solos which fall to them. They must anticipate what the conductor has in mind for his interpretation of the music. Leaders of sections take care of marking music to this end, pencilling in preferred bowings and fingering, in the case of strings, and seeing that these are followed.

Silverstein takes an additional interest in the new players. Eskin and Fine will also join the Nova Arte Quartet which, with George Zazofsky as second violin, plans a full season of concerts at the New England Conservatory and in other engagements.

Was there a long session to choose the new men? ? "Five minutes, or maybe ten at the most, and none of this smoke-filled room business," says Silverstein. "The vote was unanimous and Leinsdorf, who didn't vote, accepted our recommendations immediately. He heard the auditions and he asked questions here and there as we went along. But the choice was ours. We knew we were hearing distinguished instrumentalists, all of them; we were looking for leaders who could fill the job immediately and would be capable of growth. Responsibility pushes a player but the potential has to be there."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350

FEB 4 1964

Pre - Symphony Lunch This Week Features Civic Orchestra

Theatre and music will combine at the Friday Pre - Symphony Luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn, when the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston will be honored.

This orchestra has been active in Boston since 1925 and has offered great opportunities to young composers, young conductors and gifted performers, and provides annual scholarships for talented students. An unusual event will take place at this luncheon - five students, winners of this year's scholarships, have been invited by the orchestra and will be presented with their awards by the director, Kalman Novak.

The Civic Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Novak, has been acclaimed by critics, artists, audiences and musical leaders for maintaining the highest possible standards of performance. It plays an essential part in the musical pattern in Boston and contributes to its cultural vitality.

On the same Friday, Patricia Peardon, leading actress of the American Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Conn. will be guest at the head table, on the eve of her appearance in "Midsummer Night's dream", with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Youth Concert at Symphony hall on Saturday morning. She performed the same program last summer in Tanglewood, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction. The guest speaker at this Pre - Symphony Luncheon will be Harold Thompson, master of the cymbals in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and famous for his unsurpassed virtuosity.

This luncheon, as all the others, is open to the public, and free parking is offered.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 2 1964

FROM THE RANKS: When it was learned tnat Samuel Mayes, first cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, first violist, were leaving the Boston Symphony to take similar posts in the Philadelphia Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf said that he would let present members of the Boston Symphony compete in auditions for the vacant first chairs. One of the men in the orchestra made it—namely, Burton Fine, who next year will be first violist. But the cello auditions were won by Jules Eskin, the principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra. The auditions were undertaken by a committee that included 10 members of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf accepted the two men the committee unanimously recommended.

Meanwhile, in Cleveland, another orchestra member has come up through the ranks. Arnold Steinhardt, the first assistant concertmaster is leaving to pursue a career in chamber music and solo performances. Daniel Majeske, who was an assistant under Mr. Steinhardt, is being moved up to Mr. Steinhardt's post. But last week it was still not determined who would get Mr. Eskin's job as first cellist.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Boston
BOSTON, Mass.
Monthly Circ. 6,000
MAR 1964

OF MUSIC AND MONEY

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf turns his attention to the business side of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and explains why the quality of his music is in direct proportion to his interest in budgets, contracts, expenses and income. By Erich Leinsdorf.

ONE OF THE CLASSIC screwball stories making the rounds in professional music circles is the report of the efficiency expert who has been engaged to streamline the operations of a symphony orchestra. In this report the efficiency expert suggests that it is evidently wasteful for eighteen violin players to use exactly the same music at the same time. Why should eighteen violins play the same music? Why not four violins and an amplifier?

We performers have inherited music of more than two centuries, music with its own rules. It is in the nature of great art to impose certain conditions upon the performer and upon the spectator, the audience; rules which in the final analysis make music enjoyable and meaningful. I wish sometimes that we had the same possibilities as moving-picture producers, who, in search of a cast of characters, can go out into the street and grab some promising-looking normal citizens, make one film with them, and send them back into their private lives. Film and television seem to flourish with frequent recourse to the amateur. But music cannot exist thus, for everything we do needs, from A to Z, professionals of the highest caliber and with superb training.

When we have a vacancy in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, five first-desk men audition the applicants who play behind a screen, their identity unknown to the jury. It has happened in our recent auditions that twenty-eight came from all parts of the country, all with a perfect right of auditioning. Five were presented to me for final selection, and I was not able to accept any of the five because of my conviction, which all of our trustees, the management, and members of the Orchestra share—that only the best ought to get into the Orchestra. Since my appointment I have had the opportunity to select nine new musicians for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Two of them gave up excellent positions in Houston, one in Detroit, one in Cleveland, one in Oklahoma City, one in New York, and two we took practically out of graduate school, and one came to us after his naval service.

To be able to induce those whom we want from any part of the country to move here, the Boston Symphony has given to its members the finest and longest contract in the profession. Facing some stiff competition, we must maintain our head-start, which in turn enables us to keep the Orchestra artistically and musically on top.

The President of Lincoln Center, the noted American composer William Schuman, used to say, and not jokingly either, that the sound of a symphony orchestra improves in equal proportion to its budget. There is a great shortage of top instrumentalists, particularly string players, and it is obvious what happens to salary structures in fields where there are shortages of desirable and necessary people with top qualifications. The Boston Symphony also has a type of personnel who are proud that they are artists and who do not act like industrial workers, threatening strikes or publicizing salary disputes. The situation here is highly civilized, thanks to the combination of human forces. We are very lucky to have on the one side trustees and management who understand the problems of the players, and on the other hand, players represented by a very fine committee and a very understanding local musicians' union who pride themselves on having good relations without sacrificing their justified demands.

The schedule of the Orchestra is formidable, and the loyalty of its public in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New York is such that we get many complaints from people who are unable to get tickets. Yet the gap between the possibilities of earned income and expenses seems to grow. This again is a necessity because the attendance at symphony concerts must not be reserved for the affluent only. People of modest means should always be able to subscribe to a season of concerts. But this in terms of mathematics tells a story: our higher expenses cannot necessarily be passed on to the public. Our working schedule is so intense that we cannot perform more frequently than at present because a good portion of the calendar must be kept free to rehearse, to practice, to study, for only with constant preparation can musicians retain and improve their artistry. All this spells D-E-F-I-C-I-T.

The word deficit may have a nasty connotation or an off-pitch sound. Yet, if our great musical institutions are to continue as pace-setters and as sources of joy and pleasure to countless people, the term deficit should be accepted as one of the necessary by-products of the good life.

A museum, be it in Florence, Paris, London, or on the Fenway should admit the visitor for a few cents. The great concert halls in Vienna, in Amsterdam, or in Boston should welcome the music lover for moderately-priced tickets. And in both cases, the museum as well as the symphony, the cost of maintaining a great institution has to be borne by someone.

This particular city, Boston, has had for over eighty years by far and wide the best setting for this philosophy. The somewhat sonorous name of the "Athens of America" is not unjustified —a center of learning, a center of the finest cultural values, libraries, museums, the symphony, the great universities. It should be the concern of the community and its pride to keep it all in the most excellent shape.

I have known many organizations in the field of music. The difference between those which are great and those which are less significant and less excellent lies primarily with a few people. These few people are the leaders of their respective communities where these organizations reside. It is really only a handful of individuals who determine the standards.

It is quite evident that the sources of wealth in this country are shifting from individuals to corporations. This is why the time has come for leaders in the business field to take a good philosophical look at their own position in relation to the community. It is very easy to say for a member of the managerial class that he does not have the right to contribute money which belongs to stockholders who are totally uninterested in Boston, residing as they do in Idaho, Ohio, and Iowa, and some other western outposts. I believe that the task of the business managers is now to get their directors and their shareholders to understand the obligation toward music and to become intimately familiar with the concepts of deficit as a cultural necessity.

May I suggest that in the long run the contributions to important cultural enterprises, no matter how generous, no matter how lavish, will be infinitely less costly than the price which must be paid in a society with no standards.

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 249,867 S. 347,167

MAR 22 1964 Rockefeller

IN THE PAST COUPLE WEEKS, several of the key organizations in the civil rights movement have urged the top musicians of the nation to refuse to play in segregated concert halls and to help make cultural events equally accessible to Negroes in the South.

The response to this plea has been widespread and extremely gratifying, as the comments of Horowitz indicate. Two other important musicians who have spoken out against segregation in concert halls are Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The time is long overdue," Bernstein said, "for steps to bring equal cultural as well as political opportunities to all Americans."

Bernstein said he would "most certainly" not perform before segregated audiences, and he added that he would do "whatever I can" to help the civil rights organizations in their efforts.

Leinsdorf, a native of Austria who became an American citizen in 1942, said mounting danger of a revolutionary situation in the South as a result of the suppression of Negro rights was a compelling reason for "an unqualified stand" by the American artistic community.

Leinsdorf said it was "unthinkable" to him that anyone who had experienced racial intolerance in Europe could do anything else.

"Indifference and timidity would only contribute to allowing tensions to heighten," Leinsdorf said. "I am sure that we would only contribute to President Johnson's efforts to obtain effective civil rights legislation by making our position known."

Musicians are apolitical, indifferent, out of touch?

New England Monthly Newspaper
Box 2058, Boston 6 • Kirkland 2-4300
Boston
BOSTON, Mass.
Monthly Circ. 6,000
MAR 1964

OF MUSIC AND MONEY

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf turns his attention to the business side of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and explains why the quality of his music is in direct proportion to his interest in budgets, contracts, expenses and income. By Erich Leinsdorf.

ONE OF THE CLASSIC screwball stories making the rounds in professional music circles is the report of the efficiency expert who has been engaged to streamline the operations of a symphony orchestra. In this report the efficiency expert suggests that it is evidently wasteful for eighteen violin players to use exactly the same music at the same time. Why should eighteen violins play the same music? Why not four violins and an amplifier?

We performers have inherited music of more than two centuries, music with its own rules. It is in the nature of great art to impose certain conditions upon the performer and upon the spectator, the audience; rules which in the final analysis make music enjoyable and meaningful. I wish sometimes that we had the same possibilities as moving-picture producers, who, in search of a cast of characters, can go out into the street and grab some promising-looking normal citizens, make one film with them, and send them back into their private lives. Film and television seem to flourish with frequent recourse to the amateur. But music cannot exist thus, for everything we do needs, from A to Z, professionals of the highest caliber and with superb training.

When we have a vacancy in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, five first-desk men audition the applicants who play behind a screen, their identity unknown to the jury. It has happened in our recent auditions that twenty-eight came from all parts of the country, all with a perfect right of auditioning. Five were presented to me for final selection, and I was not able to accept any of the five because of my conviction, which all of our trustees, the management, and members of the Orchestra share—that only the best ought to get into the Orchestra. Since my appointment I have had the opportunity to select nine new musicians for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Two of them gave up excellent positions in Houston, one in Detroit, one in Cleveland, one in Oklahoma City, one in New York, and two we took practically out of graduate school, and one came to us after his naval service.

To be able to induce those whom we want from any part of the country to move here, the Boston Symphony has given to its members the finest and longest contract in the profession. Facing some stiff competition, we must maintain our head-start, which in turn enables us to keep the Orchestra artistically and musically on top.

The President of Lincoln Center, the noted American composer William Schuman, used to say, and not jokingly either, that the sound of a symphony orchestra improves in equal proportion to its budget. There is a great shortage of top instrumentalists, particularly string players, and it is obvious what happens to salary structures in fields where there are shortages of desirable and necessary people with top qualifications. The Boston Symphony also has a type of personnel who are proud that they are artists and who do not act like industrial workers, threatening strikes or publicizing salary disputes. The situation here is highly civilized, thanks to the combination of human forces. We are very lucky to have on the one side trustees and management who understand the problems of the players, and on the other hand, players represented by a very fine committee and a very understanding local musicians' union who pride themselves on having good relations without sacrificing their justified demands.

The schedule of the Orchestra is formidable, and the loyalty of its public in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New York is such that we get many complaints from people who are unable to get tickets. Yet the gap between the possibilities of earned income and expenses seems to grow. This again is a necessity because the attendance at symphony concerts must not be reserved for the affluent only. People of modest means should always be able to subscribe to a season of concerts. But this in terms of mathematics tells a story: our higher expenses cannot necessarily be passed on to the public. Our working schedule is so intense that we cannot perform more frequently than at present because a good portion of the calendar must be kept free to rehearse, to practice, to study, for only with constant preparation can musicians retain and improve their artistry. All this spells D-E-F-I-C-I-T.

The word deficit may have a nasty connotation or an off-pitch sound. Yet, if our great musical institutions are to continue as pace-setters and as sources of joy and pleasure to countless people, the term deficit should be accepted as one of the necessary by-products of the good life.

A museum, be it in Florence, Paris, London, or on the Fenway should admit the visitor for a few cents. The great concert halls in Vienna, in Amsterdam, or in Boston should welcome the music lover for moderately-priced tickets. And in both cases, the museum as well as the symphony, the cost of maintaining a great institution has to be borne by someone.

This particular city, Boston, has had for over eighty years by far and wide the best setting for this philosophy. The somewhat sonorous name of the "Athens of America" is not unjustified —a center of learning, a center of the finest cultural values, libraries, museums, the symphony, the great universities. It should be the concern of the community and its pride to keep it all in the most excellent shape.

I have known many organizations in the field of music. The difference between those which are great and those which are less significant and less excellent lies primarily with a few people. These few people are the leaders of their respective communities where these organizations reside. It is really only a handful of individuals who determine the standards.

It is quite evident that the sources of wealth in this country are shifting from individuals to corporations. This is why the time has come for leaders in the business field to take a good philosophical look at their own position in relation to the community. It is very easy to say for a member of the managerial class that he does not have the right to contribute money which belongs to stockholders who are totally uninterested in Boston, residing as they do in Idaho, Ohio, and Iowa, and some other western outposts. I believe that the task of the business managers is now to get their directors and their shareholders to understand the obligation toward music and to become intimately familiar with the concepts of deficit as a cultural necessity.

May I suggest that in the long run the contributions to important cultural enterprises, no matter how generous, no matter how lavish, will be infinitely less costly than the price which must be paid in a society with no standards.

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 249,887 S. 347,167
MAR 2 2 1964

[illegible] COURIER WEEKS, several of Negro organizations in the civil rights movement have urged the top musicians of the nation to refuse to play in segregated concert halls and to help make cultural events equally accessible to Negroes in the South.

The response to this plea has been widespread and extremely gratifying, as the comments of Horowitz indicate. Two other important musicians who have spoken out against segregation in concert halls are Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The time is long overdue," Bernstein said, "for steps to bring equal cultural as well as political opportunities to all Americans."

Bernstein said he would "most certainly" not perform before segregated audiences, and he added that he would do "whatever I can" to help the civil rights organizations in their efforts.

Leinsdorf, a native of Austria who became an American citizen in 1943, said mounting danger of a revolutionary situation in the South as a result of the suppression of Negro rights was a compelling reason for "an unqualified stand" by the American artistic community.

Leinsdorf said it was "unthinkable" to him that anyone who had experienced racial intolerance in Europe could do otherwise.

"I am sure that we [illegible] efforts to obtain [illegible] civil rights [illegible] our [illegible] political indifferent, out of touch?

BOSTON : March

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
1964

Moral Issue

Leinsdorf Denounces Segregated Audiences

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

h Leinsdorf wishes it to wn in the strongest terms that in the matial integration he is e of the angels. As t started in The New Times of Mar. 13, he is ously allied with Leonard Bernstein, Arthur Fiedler, Gary Graffman, Vladimir Horowitz, Eugene Istomin, Arthur Rubinstein, and the other performers who refuse to appear in those areas of the South where concert audiences are segregated by race.

In an interview last week, Leinsdorf had some other points that he wished to make with vigor and clarity. First of all, he speaks as an individual, and not for or on behalf of any organization. He cannot, he emphasized, speak for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose musical director he is: that can only be done by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

Leinsdorf further believes that he can act most effectively as an individual. He was asked by John A. Morsell, Assistant to the Executive Secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, to lend his name toward the forming of a committee whose ultimate aim would be an organized artists' boycott of "auspices which present concerts to segregated audiences."

Leinsdorf's reply to Morsell reads in part: "I happen to believe that performers are most effective when they stand up and are counted as individuals. I do not think that what you call a concerted effort is the most effective or even the most urgently necessary method of dealing with the question."

The conductor is aware that his stand is in a sense theoretical or ideal rather than practical: the Boston Symphony at present has no plans to play in any areas where the question of segregated audiences is still an issue.

The stand must nonetheless be taken, and it must be taken in a meaningful way. Leinsdorf cited as an unfortunate example the declaration by the conductor Bruno Walter that he would not give concerts in Vienna after the annexation of Austria by the German Reich in the Spring of 1938. Leinsdorf's succinct comment: "As if he could have."

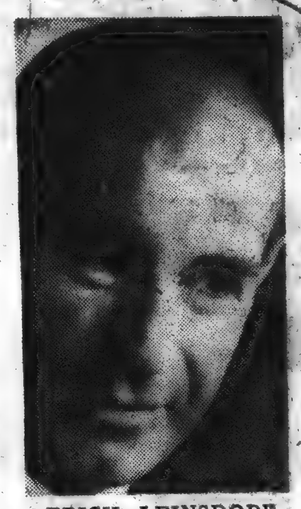
Leinsdorf believes that in quite another sense the element of choice did not enter into his original statement to The New York Times at all but that his position is a moral imperative. "Any of us"—including his interviewer in the observation with a gesture—"who has experienced racial discrimination in Europe—as I did—has only the one way open to him."

What about a Jewish musician like Nathan Milstein, who is reported to have declined to cancel some appearances before segregated audiences.

"An apolitical stand, though from a Jew I confess I do not understand it," Leinsdorf said, "And it shows that an apolitical or an amoral point of view—and these, it is very important to understand, are quite distinct from "unpolitical" and "immoral"—has no connection with artistic excellence." . . .

What about Hans Richter-Haaser, the German pianist who filled the Southern dates vacated by Graffman? Leinsdorf conceded he knew next to nothing about him, had not met him, was not familiar with his playing. He was surprised to learn Richter-Haaser was not so young a man as he had thought—but was born in 1912—the same year as Leinsdorf, and had been an adult in Germany during the Hitlerian persecutions. Leinsdorf then cited another passage from his letter to Morsell: "I have seen that foreign artists, fearing more the wrath of commercial agents than any wrath from their own consciences, have willingly replaced those who have refused to perform."

Leinsdorf believes that for many persons an issue becomes valid "only when their financial revenue suffers," and he cited appropriate examples from his own first experiences with discrimination against Negroes here when he was in service during the Second World War in Camp Lee, Va. "And when the conflict is one between revenue and conscience, then there can be no conflict at all."



ERICH LEINSDORF

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 128,713 S. 191,399
MAR 13 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 14 1964

Leinsdorf Joins Push to Integrate Southern Concerts

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently expressed support for a campaign to obtain pledges from concert artists against playing before segregated audiences.

The Boston conductor joins a growing list of musicians sympathetic to the appeal of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Racial Equality, and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

Leinsdorf, a native of Austria, who became an American citizen in 1942, said it was "unthinkable" to him that anybody who had experienced racial intolerance in Europe could do less.

Other prominent musicians indicating support include Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, pianists Vladimir Horowitz, Artur Rubinstein, Gary Graffman, Leon Fleisher and Eugene Istomin, and violinist Issac Stern.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 17 1964

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INDEPENDENT
W 12,736 (N)
MAR 21 1964

Top Musicians Backing Drive Against Bias

WASHINGTON — Three celebrated musicians expressed support this week for a campaign to obtain pledges from concert artists against playing before segregated audiences.

They are Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist, Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A new protest against the exclusion of Negroes from concert halls was begun recently by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Racial Equality and the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee.

The NAACP this week appealed to about 60 prominent musicians to form a committee to help make cultural events accessible to Negroes, as well as whites, in Southern cities. One objective was to get musicians to refuse to play segregated halls.

Although he has not been performing in public for the last 10 years, Mr. Horowitz supported the active artists who have taken a public stand on the racial issue.

Defining music as "the highest expression of the spiritual unity of mankind," the Russian-born pianist said performers ought to convey the message of human dignity and independence, "especially in view of the political and social realities of our time."

Mr. Bernstein, who has long been identified with civil rights causes, said he would do "whatever I can" to help the NAACP campaign. He said he "most certainly" would not perform before segregated audiences.

The danger of a revolutionary situation in the South as a result of the denial of civil rights to Negroes was cited by Mr. Leinsdorf as a compelling reason for "an unqualified stand" by the artistic community.

Mr. Leinsdorf, a native of Austria, who became an American citizen in 1942, said it was "unthinkable" to him that anybody who had experienced racial intolerance in Europe could do anything less.

Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Horowitz praised Gary Graffman, the New York pianist, for canceling an engagement last month in Jackson, Miss., after learning that two Negroes had been arrested when they attempted to attend an earlier concert there.

The incident prompted several other well-known musicians to seek to omit segregated communities from their concert tours. It also encouraged civil rights groups to organize resistance to the segregation of audiences.

Many prominent musicians have indicated their readiness to support the integration campaign, although a few have expressed reservations about organizing a formal boycott.

Martin Feinstein, spokesman for the Hurok Attractions, Inc., said that his concern had avoided booking its artists in segregated concert hall for the last 10 years. Hurok manages Mr. Rubinstein, Marian Anderson, Isaac Stern, Jan Peirce, Eugene Istomin, Andres Segovia, Victoria de los Angeles, Van Cliburn and others.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,925
MAR 20 1964

Artistic Boycott

[illegible] visitors and they wanted to hear the London Royal [illegible] came to town last November. But the town was Jac[illegible] are still segregated, and tickets are sold by subscription [illegible]. Instead of getting into the hall, the boys landed in jail because they insisted they had a right to hear the performance. The affair was hardly noticed at the time, but by now [illegible] the inspiration [illegible] one after another, the nation's leading concert artists are [illegible] the segregated South.

The first of them to act was Pianist Gary Graffman, who canceled a February appearance in Jackson after learning of the students' arrest. His place was promptly filled by German Pianist Hans Richter-Haaser (who argued that artists should be above involving themselves in social problems), but the boycott was gathering momentum. Conductors George Szell, Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf all announced that they would not appear before segregated audiences, and they were joined by such performers as Risë Stevens, Leon Fleisher, Jaime Laredo and Julius Katchen. Artur Rubinstein declared that such a stand is "a right and natural step."

Segregation remains the general rule for concert audiences in Mississippi and Alabama; elsewhere it is accomplished more discreetly. And much of the South is effectively ear-muffed; Rudolf Bing two years ago refused to allow the touring Met to appear before segregated audiences, and Sol Hurok, with his huge stable of artists, has had a similar policy for a decade. At week's end the new musical boycott of the Deep South was endorsed by Vladimir Horowitz. Horowitz' stand was duly reported in the press, despite its purely theoretical value—he has not played in public anywhere in eleven years.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 18 1964

Erich?

To the Editor—Can you settle a bet in my office? How does the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra pronounce his first name?

J. BARRY
Boston

Ed. Note: Mr. Leinsdorf does not care which way it is pronounced by his friends. If he was in Austria, where he was born, it would be pronounced with an aspirated gutteral sound: ch. Since he now is an American, it is pronounced: K. K.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
MAR 13 1964

Mr. Woodworth Honor Guest At Luncheon

G. Wallace Woodworth, who has devoted himself to bringing great music to both young people and the general public through lectures and concerts, will be honored by Symphony-goers at a luncheon, Friday, at the Midtown Motor Inn.

Harvard's "Woody," as he is affectionately called by his students, associates and friends, has, since his appointment at his alma mater in 1926, played a significant role in music on both sides of the Charles. He is the recipient of many awards, among them, one for distinguished service to American Music.

The last in the series of guest speakers will be Jordan Whitelaw, who was appointed this year radio and television producer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will discuss the importance of these 20th-century media "Inside the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The Pre-Symphony Luncheons are open to the public and free parking is provided.

JONES

The Moral Is: Never Trust a Left-Handed Orchestra

Customers and Violas Are Always Right

By VICTOR O. JONES

Nobody who has worked for The Globe for any length of time is inclined to doubt the composite perception, wisdom, and knowledge of its readers. Make a mistake in no matter what field, and it will be pointed out to you; ask for advice, and you'll get it in good quality; ask for information no matter how esoteric, and some reader will know the answer.

So nobody around here was surprised when mail started arriving about a picture which appeared in that magnificent special rotogravure section which accompanied the Mar. 15 Sunday Globe: "Boston: City of Culture."

This was a picture of Erich Leinsdorf leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and these perceptive and knowledgeable readers wanted to know why the violins had been positioned to the right of the conductor, the violas to his left rather than the usual vice versa. Others, who perhaps missed this detail, wanted to know why all the Boston Symphony players were left-handed.

Among Globe readers who spotted both abnormalities were Phineas Tobe of Everett, once famous as a Harvard athlete, now famous as a violinist on the Boston Civic Symphony; Joseph Pogra, from way up in Wilder, Vt.; Mrs. James C. Walsh of South Weymouth and Mrs. C. H. Hendrickson of Medford.

Among those who immediately noted the reversal of the violins and violas (but not the left-handedness of all the players) was the Globe's music critic, Michael Steinberg, who had written the article which accompanied the picture. What went through his mind is so interesting that I asked him to put on paper his thought processes as he puzzled over the odd picture. Here's what he says happened:

"Almost at once I noticed there was something odd. Why, I wondered, was Joseph de Pasquale, principal viola, sitting on Erich Leinsdorf's left where Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, would normally belong?

"An explanation came quickly: the orchestra must have been playing something without violins. There are a few such pieces, but somehow none of them would fit. There is a Brahms Serenade, but I didn't think Leinsdorf had conducted it here. In Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms a special seating is generally used. There were too many players for the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, and in any case that piece requires no winds, of whom a few were visible.

"If it is characteristic of the scholarly temperament not to see the wood for the trees, then last Sunday was one of the few occasions in my life when my scholar's training asserted itself.

"Unwilling to find a simple explanation when the search for a complicated one was so much more entertaining, I took a long time to reach the dawn. My eye traveled from Mr. de Pasquale, past Mr. Leinsdorf, and arrived at Mr. Silverstein, on the conductor's right hand, where, however much he should be there in spirit, no concertmaster belongs in the flesh.

"And then I saw the assemblage of left-handed string players, and also the curious handholds of the wind players upon their instruments. There are a few southpaw fiddlers, though the only one I know is Rudolf Kolisch, founder and leader of the famous ensemble that bore his name. The Kolisch Quartet always was a disconcerting sight, and it took many listeners half a Haydn Quartet at the beginning of a concert to figure out why it looked so strange.

"As odd bowing techniques go, nothing can beat the viol-playing angel in the Angelic Concert of Matthias Gruenewald's Isenheim altar, the inspiration for Hindemith's Mathis der Maler. Just try getting your bow arm into that position some time! And then there was Franz Clement. He was the first violinist ever to play the Beethoven Concerto, and between its first two movements he inserted a Sonata of his own to be executed upon one string and with the violin upside down."

Globe readers will hardly need to be told that this snafu was caused by the photoengravers who, in their mechanical process, photographed the color transparency from the rear instead of the front.

For the benefit of those who noted this snafu and those who didn't, here's the way the picture ran a week ago Sunday and the way it should have run.

The Southpaws

The Right View

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 15 1964

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, formed in 1881, had had 12 musical directors or conductors before Erich Leinsdorf came from the Metropolitan Opera Company in 1962 to assume command. Here he leads the distinguished group in one of the regular concerts of the Winter season at Symphony Hall. The Summer season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires has become internationally famous.

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,136,800

MAR 1964

5454 Boston Symphony

if he was kind, then probably I shouldn't have tried to destroy him. Maybe, I thought, I wasn't ready to decide who should die. With that established, my being a witch ended, and I again saw myself in a gauze tutu. I raised one foot and planted it on the bulge of the mattress in the upper berth.

"Don't do that," Ruth said sleepily.

"Ruthie," I said, "do you know what I've decided?"

"No," she said.

"I'm going to be a ballet dancer."

"Golly day," said Ruth. "Go to sleep!"

But the next morning, she held her hat up while I high-kicked it ten times.

It was always strange to see our father on the stage. At home he was the arbiter of our fortunes. Our bedtime was his law. Our school reports were at his mercy. So it was with an air of unbelief that we found ourselves in a box for a matinee of Such a Little Queen, in which he was appearing with Elsie Ferguson. We waited breathlessly for the curtain to rise and give us our father, who would somehow not be our father but a new and beautiful person transformed by grease paint and spotlights. In Such a Little Queen, he had a blond mustache, which entranced us even though we knew it was false, and he spoke with a slight German accent and made love to the most beautiful woman we had ever seen. We glanced self-consciously at Mother to see how she was taking it. She seemed to be giving it her full approval.

After the matinee, Ruth asked me anxiously if I thought Miss Ferguson was more beautiful than Mother. I thrust the comparison away and answered stoutly, "Our mother is the most beautiful woman in the world."

At the end of this engagement, with time on his hands and no job, Dad kept himself busy by helping organize Actors Equity and writing a vaudeville sketch, with which he hoped to fill the vacuum between parts.

A vaudeville act received a flat fee, no matter how many players there were; so, for economy's sake, Dad decided there would be only two in the play, Mother and himself. He read the act aloud to us. We hoped we were wrong, but privately Ruth and I thought it was not very good. Despite our apprehension, Mother and Dad received a trial booking of three weeks—Staten Island, Brooklyn, and Toronto.

At the end of the third week, they returned full of enthusiasm for the kindness they had received from all the different acts that had played with them. It seemed that everyone had tried to improve their sketch, including four young comedians whose name was Marx. "It needs more bellies and boffos," the Marx brothers said. And one night my parents got them.

Mother and Dad's dressing room was next to five performing seals, and the smell of fish mingled with their makeup, but they bore with it until one of these artists decided he'd like to review their work—but from a better vantage point than the wings.

It was during the act's opening telephone conversation that Mother heard the first boffo from the audience and saw a seal waddling onto the stage.

"Go away," she said in an undertone.

The audience was enthralled. The seal smiled at them and honked.

There was a glass of water on the table beside the telephone, and Mother threw it in the seal's face and repeated firmly, "Go away!"

The seal was delighted at this sudden refreshment and slapped his flippers together and would have remained through the entire act if his trainer hadn't lured him off with a raw fish. There was a long and magnificent round of applause, and afterward the Marx brothers said, "Sign him up."

But the five seals were booked solid for a year. Alas! Father and Mother were not. After a few anxious weeks, though, a new play materialized.

Opening a script is like opening Pandora's box; but instead of evil spirits, moths fly out, followed by Hope, the last to leave, fluttering after the moths pretending they are butterflies. Hope is the very essence of an actor. Actors hope they'll get a play; then they hope it will succeed; and they continue to hope when it is sheer folly to do so. So Dad hopefully took the script to his bedroom to read, and we anxiously waited to hear how he liked it.

When he came out for a cigarette, we asked, "How's the first act?" "Well, not so good, but it may build up in the second." He returned to the second act, and we waited. "Second act not so good either, but there's always the third," our father said cheerfully. He finished the play. "I think it's quite bad, but I'll take it. You never know what a clever director can do for it."

So our father was employed.

"I'll hear your lines," I said to Dad after the second day of rehearsal. I was experienced at this hazardous chore and knew perfectly the slippery course it would follow. Dad would be edgy and touchy. "Don't tell me, don't tell me. I know it perfectly," he'd say when I tried to offer him a line. Or then in misery he'd say, "Just give me the first word, only the first word." Which would be "why," and then I was reviled for lack of generosity.

Now I held the new part in my hand and / continued on page 171

We waited breathlessly for our father to come onstage

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,136,800

MAR 1964 Buffalo

SET TO MUSIC

In a clapboard house behind a high white fence, on a serene residential street in Brookline, Massachusetts, Erich Leinsdorf, the brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lives with his wife and five children. It is a home that exists for and with music, from the soundproof wing where the Maestro runs through his scores (sometimes far into the night) down to the many ingenious and delightful old music boxes that appear throughout the house. The Leinsdorfs have lived in many cities with fine orchestras—New York, Salzburg, Vienna, Cleveland—and in each, they have added paintings and other objects of art, which give their rooms such personality and warmth. You see some of them here, in these pictures of the conductor's study: the colorful rug from Spain, mechanical clock with marching figures, and quaint music stand, found in European antiques shops. The hi-fi floor-to-ceiling cabinets, though, are American custom-built.

McCALL'S DECORATING DEPARTMENT / NATHAN MANDELB
PHOTOGRAPHS BY TOSH MATSUMOTO. INTERIORS BY JAMES AMSTER, F.A.I.D. ARCHITE

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8.136.800

MAR 1964

We waited breathlessly for our father to come onstage

SET TO MUSIC

In a clapboard house behind a high white fence, on a serene residential street in Brookline, Massachusetts, Erich Leinsdorf, the brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lives with his wife and five children. It is a home that exists for and with music, from the soundproof wing where the Maestro runs through his scores (sometimes far into the night) down to the many ingenious and delightful old music boxes that appear throughout the house. The Leinsdorfs have lived in many cities with fine orchestras —New York, Salzburg, Vienna, Cleveland— and in each, they have added paintings and other objects of art, which give their rooms such personality and warmth. You see some of them here, in these pictures of the conductor's study: the colorful rug from Spain, mechanical clock with marching figures, and quaint music stand, found in European antiques shops. The hi-fi floor-to-ceiling cabinets, though, are American custom-built.

McCALL'S DECORATING DEPARTMENT / NATHAN MANDELBAUM editor / MARY SHEPHERD, MARION HOLBROOK associates
PHOTOGRAPHS BY TOSH MATSUMOTO. INTERIORS BY JAMES AMSTER, F.A.I.D. ARCHITECT FOR MUSIC ROOM: JEAN PAUL CARLHIAN

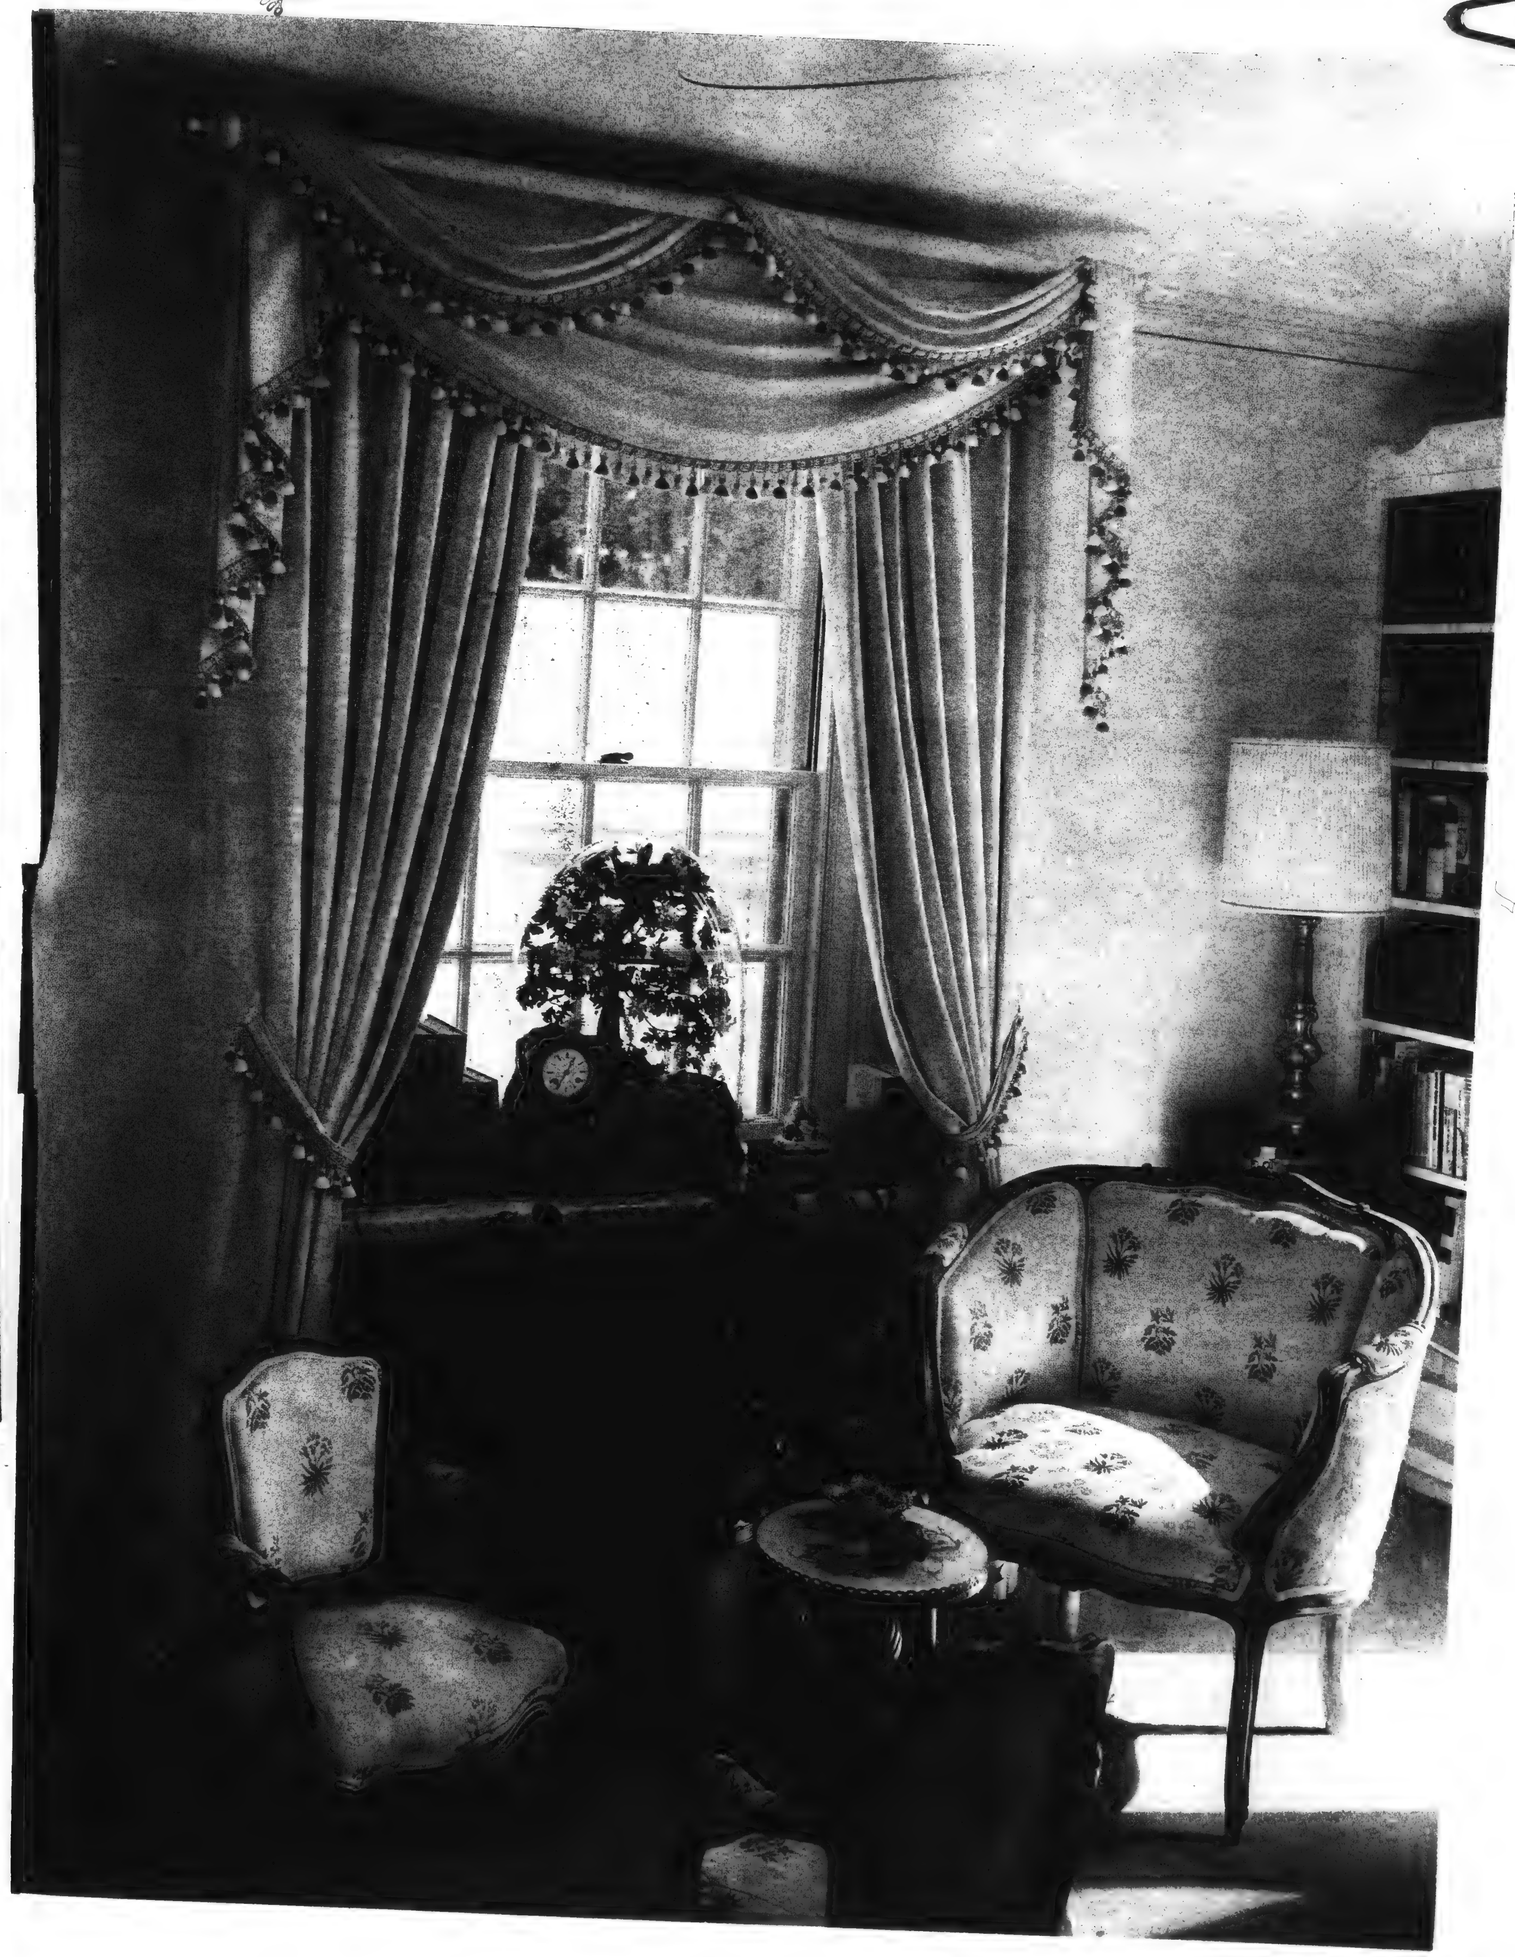
McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,136,800

MAR 1964 Buffalo

This is Mrs. Leinsdorf's domain, and here the rest of the family meets when the conductor is occupied in his study. The room at the near right is her study, a gay little room that is as personal as her signature. On the small, painted Italian desk, she writes her letters and pays the household bills. Here, too, she plans her menus, her guest lists for parties, and takes care of all the paperwork in a well-run house. Dominating the room is a tall, eighteenth-century armoire from Austria, with four octagonal religious paintings, framed in molding, on the doors. The interesting paisley wallpaper repeats the colors of the rug, the curtains, the armoire, and even the red of the roses you'll always find on her desk. The sunny green room at the far right is her sitting room, where she serves tea when her friends come to call. Mrs. Leinsdorf is fond of child-size chairs, and she has collected many of them. Upholstered and positioned importantly, like the delightful pair shown here, they have all the charm of a well-mannered child at a grown-ups' party. The antique music-box clock in the window, one of her many enchanting music boxes, has a garden and a mechanical "waterfall."

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,136,800

MAR 1964



McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,136,800

MAR 1964

The Leinsdorf dining room is a friendly, expansive one that lends itself with ease and grace to informal, after-the-concert entertaining or to dining with the family. The walls of this room are covered in the same imported cotton as the draperies. The French floor tiles ("they're so easy to clean") are Mrs. Leinsdorf's idea. And so are the centerpieces of fresh fruits and vegetables she arranges, and the copper vessel heaped with flowers on the fascinating buffet. The elegant antique crystal chandelier, with its clusters of topaz grapes, accompanies them whenever they move; its soft brilliance has shone on many a supper party attended by world-famous singers and other artists. American-born Mrs. Leinsdorf is a superb cook and an avid recipe-begger, whose files bulge with prize recipes from people and places she and her husband have visited, including his birthplace, Vienna, a city renowned for its cuisine. On days when he shuts himself away in his silent study to work on his next concert, his meals are served on a tray. He eats very simple food then: "More for self-discipline than weight control," he will tell you.

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,136,800

MAR 1964

TIGHT BINDING

250

MIDWEST NEWSCLIP, INC.
Box 1359, Chicago 90, WEbster 9-5497

Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Massachusetts
Midwestern Edition
Weekly Circ. 62,000

APR 11 1964

Lili Boulanger Award

This year the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund gave its 25th annual award to Idil Biret, Turkish pianist. This is the second time Miss Biret has won the award, the first being 10 years ago when she was 12.

The board of judges decided to give the award again to Miss Biret in recognition of her artistic achievements and especially for her courageous performance on the afternoon of Nov. 22, 1963, when she made her American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a few minutes after Erich Leinsdorf had announced to the audience that President Kennedy had been assassinated.

The judges are Nadia Boulanger, Aaron Copland, Alexei Haieff, Walter Piston, and Igor Stravinsky.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 28 1964

Why No Bow?

To the Editor—Boston has always been notorious for its rude audiences; but at the final Friday afternoon concert (Apr. 17) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra many in the audience were shocked at the extreme discourtesy (not by the audience this time) shown the first desk men who are leaving the orchestra.

I have been attending these concerts since the Koussevitzky era, and in my recollection it has been customary to bring the outgoing orchestra members, regardless of status, forward to take a special, final bow at the closing of a series.

I'm not alone in my feelings, for I heard many comments about this as I left Symphony Hall after the concert.

As a regular subscriber and Friend of the B.S.O. I would like very much to learn the reason for this apparently deliberate gesture toward distinguished musicians who have contributed so much over so many years toward making the B.S.O. the great orchestra that it is—or was—???

HOPE C. JACKSON
Wellesley Hills

The Boston Sunday Globe—April 19, 1964

Symphony's Leinsdorf Responds to Globe's Steinberg

Critic, Composer, Conductor— What Are Their True Roles?

See Page 100

When Erich Leinsdorf in February led the Boston Symphony in a series of excerpts from Wagner, Globe critic Michael Steinberg suggested that to do so was to render a disservice to the composer.

When there are no voices in "Die Walkuere," therefore, Steinberg wrote. The result: an amazingly evocative piece of drama[illegible] into a "shapelessly repetitive gallop that finally just peters out to a point." Such excerpts make Wagner appear, Steinberg declared, to have "gigantic imagination" but merely a "masterful orchestrator . . . with occasional poetic effect." He added, "It's the worse kind of misrepresentation."

Steinberg had raised a profound and recuring point about Wagner. It was a problem for conductor as well as critic Mr. Steinberg asked Mr. Leinsdorf to discuss the whole area, including the roles of critic, composer and conductor. The result was the following illuminating article.

By ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The musical world has three branches somewhat comparable to the ones we know so well from our form of government. In music the three are: the creative, the performing, and the critical. Their functions, at least in today's musical world, are different, and their viewpoints need not agree if we are to have stimulating progress, growth and development.

Recently a friend of mine who is the foreign editor and head of the editorial page on a great Midwestern newspaper wrote to me that he has asserted his vital interest in the arts by establishing a special Sunday section, having hired new people to write about the arts. Their views, because of not conforming to the pattern of past practices, aroused in some local establishments a good deal of resentment. Yet the section has proved a tonic for the cultural activities of the community.

The composer is not only entitled, but almost compelled, to hold one-sided subjective views about every musical issue.

It is indeed Stravinsky's privilege to consider Gounod superior to Beethoven; I don't want to decide if this is meant seriously or as an attempt to get people's goat. Inanycase it is his privilege as a composer to hold such eccentric views. Without them he might not be one of the great figures in 20th Century music.

The critic's function is to hold his standards up to the community.

These standards are absolutely his; and by the kind of standards he has, he will be a factor in the cultural life of his city.

The performer, whose social function differs fromthat of the critic, must weigh critical standards against possibilities, conditions, desiderata, and to put it in a nutshell, public demand.

I do not believe that the concert hall is a night school or a specialized workshop, and I do believe that the highest standards must always prevail within a great organization, a great o rchestra. In reconciling conflicts, we the performers come occationally to disagreement with composers and with critics. This is the beneficial friction among the three branches of music.

Comments in Mail

The specific issue for which I have been invited to state my views is the simple question of whether certain Wagner excepts should be played in symphony concerts. I readily concede to your correspondent that his position has been admirably taken for a critic. But, by the same token, I cannot take the same position as a conductor.

My mail since I came to Boston has fallen into the following main lines: "We are so relieved, Mr. Leinsdorf, that you haven't flooded us with Wagner." "The only disappointment which I must voice is that you are not giving us nearly enough Wagner." I also hear, "Mr. Leinsdorf, why don't you give us really modern music?" "Why must we always still hear Bartok, Prokofieff, and Stravinsky?"

The questions of: how much modern music, how much Wagner — and — an almost equally sticky issue, how much choral music—are constantly asked. Many music lovers think that among the great choral works are the most enduring masterpieces of music. Other detest choral music and will have none of it in an orchestral cycle.

My own view is that no orchestral season today can exist without a measure of Wagner and should include a few of the great excerpts. How much depends upon the total opportunities which the public has to hear this great master's music. If I were to adopt the standard, with which I am very sympathetic, that no excerpts from "The Ring" can be performed without exhibiting questionable taste by either using bad concert endings from 19th Century Wagner sycophants, or making jumps from one portion to another, one could not perform two minutes of music from the tetralogy.

I hope that the morgue of this great newspaper has the is pertinent to my argument —how long ago the last full performance of any "Ring" work was presented in Boston. As at this moment no house exists here to even dream of a performance of "Walkuere" or "Goetterdaemmerung," we shall have to wait until such construction is completed.

Is itreally fair to the public not to let them hear any part of this tetralogy? The obvious answer is, "No."

Then, why not do an entire scene or an entire act with singers? Wagner with his radical demands needs huge voices. His dramatic sopranos must be women who control the mezzo and soprano ranges; his heroic tenors men who possess baritone and tenor notes; and the interpreters of Wotan and Sachs should be equally strong as bass and baritone.

Such people are hard to find. The great opera houses of the world, starting with Bayreuth, readily admit that it is well-nigh impossible to find these types except on rare occasions.

Singers Hard to Find

For four years I watched how the Metropolitan spent two-thirds to three-fourths of its season-planning on the strength of the "bench," because singers are notoriously liable to indisposition which are no cause for cancelling a piano recital or a quartet evening but are compelling reasons for singers to stay in bed. Singers are almost as delicate as baseball pitchers.

he could only find the right people.

I recall my last stint with the Metropolitan Opera in 1961-1962, the Winter before I came to Boston. My major involvement that season was the entire Ring Cycle, and while we had no mishaps with the soprano and tenor parts, we could not get through one "Walkuere" performance without some emergency with Wotan.

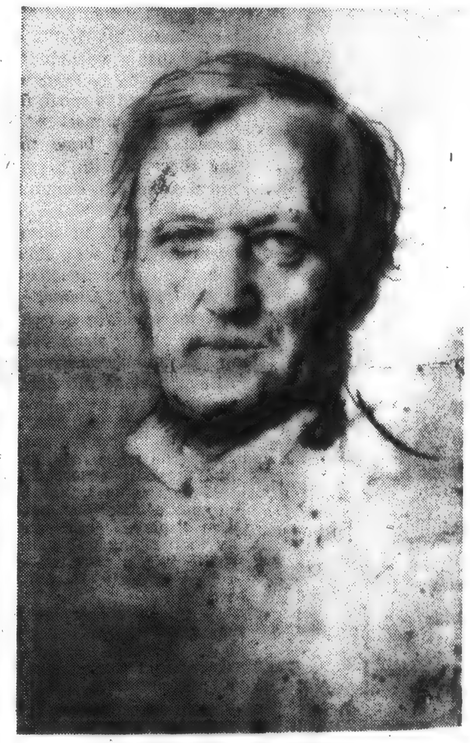
Three 6-Footers

We had three strapping men, each of them over 6 feet tall, huge fellows, seemingly with invulnerable physiques, and yet delicate flowers when it came to singing those two acts in which Wotan appears from beginning to end.

It was in one of those performances, when a Wotan had to be replaced after Act II by one whose voice failed him in Act III, that I realized how much more Wagner relied on the voice than is generally conceded even by well-versed musicians.

I can very easily imagine what would happen in Boston if I were rashly going into planning a scene or an act of Wagner with participation of three of those heroic voices. They would look at the contract, seeing Friday afternoon at 2, Saturday at 8:30, Tuesday at 8:30, Sunday at 3, and the first reply would be, "Nobody can sing this music five times in 10 days."

Then we would reduce their commitments and engage them merely for Friday-Saturday, which would later

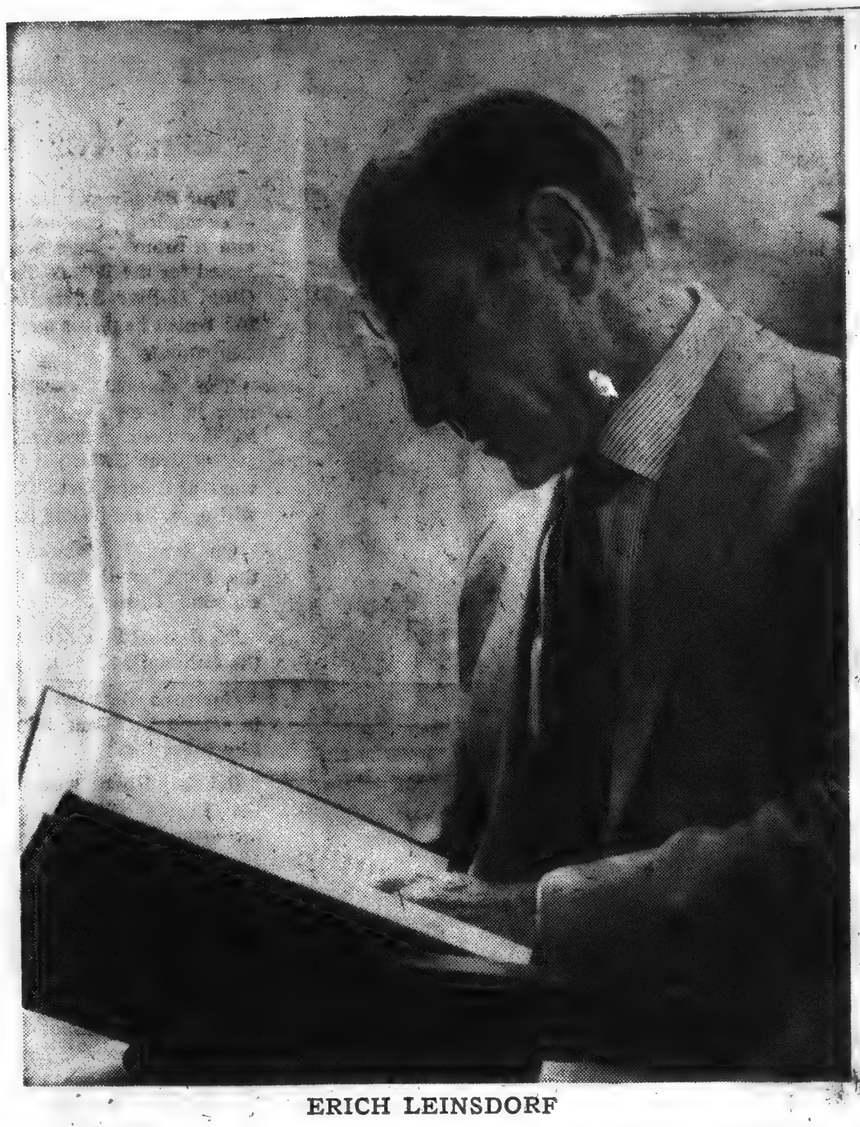


RICHARD WAGNER
The Tenors Are Heroic

But the supply of Wagnerian singers is a lot shorter than that of pitchers. For a symphony orchestra to venture into this chiaroscuro which requires the services of diagnosticians, psychiatrists, cheerleaders and whatnot is at the very best a highly questionable enterprise. Yet, I would gladly consider it if

TIGHT BINDING

251



ERICH LEINSDORF

The Critics Must Have Standards

Wagner are performed, usually three days before the first performance. This, in order to allow singers two full days of complete rest before they embark upon their arduous task.

Even if all the "ifs" and "buts" were solved, I want to mention again the "bench." Nobody can reasonably expect the Boston Symphony Orchestra organization to engage two sets of singers for one series' concert performances.

But what happens, if after three singers, unaccustomed to the slightly frigid climate which we are wont to present to our visitors during the Winter declares out of order.

What do I do for Saturday?

I can't just call Albany, Montreal, or Philadelphia, and say, "Can you send me your dramatic soprano; mine is ill." These people don't sit in American cities waiting to be asked.

It is different in Germany where there are 70 opera houses and where one phone call can produce a replacement.

Best Choice

What do I do with the Saturda night concert if we have an indisposed baritone?

The program is prepared, half of which is suddenly going by the board. It is the right thing for me then to pull out the Fifth Tchaikovsky?

I do think that up to such Utopian Times when the singers are more readily available and their delicate condition improves under the ministrations of modern preventive medicine, the orchestral excerpts are about the best we can offer to the public.

The specific question of what excerpts are acceptable varies with era and with the opportunities of hearing a composer's total output. We made Wagner the central issue of this article, but there are other composers and other compositions in this category.

Next Fall when we shall perform an excerpt from Arnold Schoenberg's "Gurre-Lieder," the question undoubtedly will (and should) beraised again: Why don't we do the complete "Gurre-Lieder?" The simple answer is because the stage of Symphony Hall isn't large enough to hold the three choirs plus the gigantic orchestra. (For the same reason the Eighth Symphony of Mahler has not been given in Symphony Hall.)

Critics Standards

At all times the critic must be left completely undisturbed in the pursuit of his high, uncompromising standards.

If he says there must be a second hall which can accommodate the Eighth Symphony of Mahler and "Gurre-Lieder" this is his right to demand. In my view it is foolish of performer and composer to take issue with criticism which they do not like. The performer and composermake public careers and most of them have done so for centuries out of their own volition. They are public figures for better and for worse, and no one can expect to find only approval.

The function of the composer is to compose. The function of the performer is to perform. And the function of the critic is to criticize.

Where Responsibilities Lie

When the performance begins to criticize the critic, and when the composer begins to tell the performer how to perform, except when explaining his intentions, the branches of music disturb each other and run interference, with results that are less than beneficial.

A critic has the right to a specialized taste. A composer has the right to completely eccentric tastes.The performer does not, particularly not the conductor of a modern symphony orchestra. He cannot say, "I won't do 19th century music," or "I shall do only such and such music."

He is responsible to his public. When in the pursuit of that function he is criticized, he should take the criticism with the same kind of resistance which a good boxer shows to a well-aimed punch.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W: 1,600,948

APR 13 1964

Home At Last

1 5454

In Boston nearly everyone deplores excess. Small wonder, then, the trepidation of the Back Bay matrons when Erich Leinsdorf became the leader of the Boston Symphony—one of the nation's most distinguished orchestras.

Leinsdorf's clashes of temperament with tenor Lauritz Melchior at the Metropolitan Opera had not been forgotten. His conducting of the Cleveland orchestra was so vehement that his wife had to sew his shirt cuffs to his jacket sleeves. Moreover, his fame as a Wagnerian was ominous: the Boston habitually played less Wagner than any other major orchestra in the country. Under Monteux, Koussevitsky, and Munch, French and romantic music reigned. Leinsdorf was a Viennese known for his [illegible]bral (some said cold) interpretations. Nor had he seemed very sympathetic to American composers, a [illegible] Boston tradition.

But now [illegible] two seasons passed, Boston's fears of Leinsdorf have been routed. His decorum has been impeccable. He estimates he has played a total of 103 minutes of Wagner, and American music has been performed even more frequently than before. And Leinsdorf's scrupulous and architectonic musicianship has been a welcome change after the long reign of the romantic. Boston in general and musicians in particular adore him," says Rosario Mazzeo, the orchestra manager, "is the happiest orchestra in the world."

New Works: Last week Leinsdorf was busy rounding out the season in Washington and New York. His Washington concert was the first given in the White House by [illegible] the Boston Symphony. Afterward the conductor took time off to talk about past and present and he began with Wagner. He just happened to be on the spot, he said, when the Met needed a Wagnerian conductor. He reflected that some men are born to Wagner, some achieve Wagner, and some have Wagner thrust upon them. It seemed that he was among the most thrust upon.

As for the Boston Symphony: "I want it to be a repertory orchestra," Leinsdorf said. "My men are at home with the familiar works, with the 'roast beef' like Beethoven or Brahms. Because of this we free valuable rehearsal time for new works like the Benjamin Britten 'War Requiem' or the 'Kaddish' of Leonard Bernstein." And he added, "I don't want the Boston sound. I want many Boston sounds. The sound of an orchestra should be like the costumes and gestures and speech of a great actor, who plays King Lear one day and Big Daddy the next."

If Leinsdorf has won Boston over,

MUSIC

Boston for him appears to be the promised land. At 21 he burst upon the musical world as a wunderkind. He became a protégé of both Bruno Walter and Toscanini. By 26, he was the enfant terrible of the Metropolitan. After a hitch in the Army, he became a wanderer in the wilderness of the spirit, looking for some Jordan to cross, haphazardly conducting here and in Europe. None of it helped his disposition. Today he recalls that, "'in the winter of my discontent,' Virgil Thomson promised that I would someday find my place."

Now 52, Leinsdorf is proud of the spirit that links him and his men. "Perhaps never before has such an orchestra

Newsweek

Leinsdorf: A White House first

needed such a man," says Mazzeo, "nor such a man such an orchestra." For Leinsdorf, he and his musicians are "soldiers in the front line." And what is the enemy? "Music played badly."

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,634 SUN. 84,383

APR 19 1964

The press department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sends out releases in pairs. The one with the masthead printed in white on a red ground reports the activities of the orchestra and its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, in Boston and on tour. The one with the green ground keeps publications informed about plans and progress of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Human-interest bits gleaned from the red releases included the fact that Leinsdorf and President Johnson have been friends since 1938 when the President, then Congressman Johnson, undertook the arrangements necessary for the extension of Leinsdorf's visa.

And that when a player auditions for a job in the orchestra the person who listens knows neither his name nor background, and he plays from behind a screen.

And that it was Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, who suggested the symphony's performance of Mozart's Requiem at the Solemn Pontifical Mass of Requiem that Richard Cardinal Cushing celebrated on Jan. 19 as a memorial to President Kennedy.

TIGHT BINDING

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,600,948

APR 13 1964

Home At Last

In Boston nearly everyone deplores excess. Small wonder, then, the trepidation of the Back Bay matrons when Erich Leinsdorf became the leader of the Boston Symphony—one of the nation's most distinguished orchestras.

Leinsdorf's clash of temperament with tenor Lauritz Melchior at the Metropolitan Opera had not been forgotten. His conducting of the Cleveland orchestra [illegible] at that his wife had to sew [illegible] jacket sleeves. Moreover, [illegible] a Wagnerian was eminently [illegible] Boston habitually played less W[illegible] any other major orchestra [illegible] country. Under Monteux, Koussev[illegible] French and romanti[illegible]dorf was a Vienne[illegible]bral (some said co[illegible]or had he seemed [illegible] American com[illegible]dition.

[illegible]ons passed, Bo[illegible] have been routed [illegible]een in[illegible] cable: [illegible] minutes [illegible]as played a total of 103 minutes of Wagner, an American music has been performed even more frequently than before. And Leinsdorf's [illegible] architectonic musicianship [illegible] welcome change after [illegible] romantic. Boston [illegible] musicians in particular [illegible]re have been," says Rosario [illegible] the [illegible]nel manager, "is the [illegible]or[illegible] in the world."

New Works

[illegible]orf was busy round[illegible] the [illegible] in Washington and New [illegible]. Washington concert was the first [illegible] in the White House by [illegible] the Boston Symphony. Afterwa[illegible] conductor took time off to talk [illegible] and present and he began with W[illegible]. He just happened to be on the spot, he said, when the Met needed a Wagnerian conductor. He reflected that some men are born to Wagner, some achieve Wagner, and some have Wagner thrust upon them. It seems that he was among the most thrust upon.

As for the Boston Symphony: "I want it to be a repertory orchestra," Leinsdorf said. "My men are at home with the familiar works, with the 'roast beef' like Beethoven or Brahms. Because of this we free valuable rehearsal time for new works like the Benjamin Britten 'War Requiem' or the 'Kaddish' of Leonard Bernstein." And he added, "I don't want the Boston sound, I want many Boston sounds. The sound of an orchestra should be like the costumes and gestures and speech of a great actor, who plays King Lear one day and Big Daddy the next."

If Leinsdorf has won Boston over,

MUSIC

Boston [illegible]pears to be the promised land. [illegible] burst upon the musical world a[illegible]derkind. He became a protégé of [illegible]rnstein, Koussevitzky and Toscanini. By 26, [illegible] was the enfant terrible of the Metropolitan. After a hitch in the Army, he became a wanderer in the wilderness of the spirit, looking for some Jordan to cross, haphazardly conducting here and in Europe. None of it helped his disposition. Today he recalls that, "'in the winter of my discontent,' Virgil Thomson promised that I would some day find my place."

Now 52, Leinsdorf is proud of the spirit that links him and his [illegible]. "Perhaps never before has such an [illegible]chestra

Newsweek
Leinsdorf: A White House first

needed such a man," says Mazzeo, "nor such a man such an orchestra." For Leinsdorf, he and his musicians are "soldiers in the front line." And what is the enemy? "Music played badly."

ERICH LEINSDORF

The Critics Must Have Standards

Wagner are performed, usually three days before the first performance. This, in order to allow singers two full days of complete rest before they embark upon their arduous task.

Even if all the "ifs" and "buts" were solved, I want to mention again the "bench." Nobody can reasonably expect the Boston Symphony Orchestra organization to engage two sets of singers for one series' concert performances.

But what happens, if after three singers, unaccustomed to the slightly frigid climate which we are wont to present to our visitors during the Winter declares out of order. What do I do for Saturday?

I can't just call Albany, Montreal, or Philadelphia, and say, "Can you send me your dramatic soprano; mine is ill." These people don't sit in American cities waiting to be asked.

It is different in Germany where there are 70 opera houses and where one phone call can produce a replacement.

Best Choice

What do I do with the Saturday night concert if we have an indisposed baritone? The program is prepared, half of which is suddenly going by the board. It is the right thing for me then to pull out the Fifth Tchaikovsky?

I do think that up to such Utopian Times when the singers are more readily available and their delicate condition improves under the ministrations of modern preventive medicine, the orchestral excerpts are about the best we can offer to the public.

The specific question of what excerpts are acceptable varies with era and with the opportunities of hearing a composer's total output. We made Wagner the central issue of this article, but there are other composers and other compositions in this category.

Next Fall when we shall perform an excerpt from Arnold Schoenberg's "Gurre-Lieder," the question undoubtedly will (and should) beraised again: Why don't we do the complete "Gurre-Lieder?" The simple answer is because the stage of Symphony Hall isn't large enough to hold the three choirs plus the gigantic orchestra. (For the same reason the Eighth Symphony of Mahler has not been given in Symphony Hall.)

Critics Standards

At all times the critic must be left completely undisturbed in the pursuit of his high, uncompromising standards.

If he says there must be a second hall which can accommodate the Eighth Symphony of Mahler and "Gurre-Lieder" this is his right to demand. In my view it is foolish of performer and composer to take issue with criticism which they do not like. The performer and composermake public careers and most of them have done so for centuries out of their own volition. They are public figures for better and for worse, and no one can expect to find only approval.

The function of the composer is to compose. The function of the performer is to perform. And the function of the critic is to criticize.

Where Responsibilities Lie

When the performance begins to criticize the critic, and when the composer begins to tell the performer how to perform, except when explaining his intentions, the branches of music disturb each other and run interference, with results that are less than beneficial.

A critic has the right to a specialized taste. A composer has the right to completely eccentric tastes.The performer does not, particularly not the conductor of a modern symphony orchestra. He cannot say, "I won't do 19th century music," or "I shall do only such and such music."

He is responsible to his public. When in the pursuit of that function he is criticized, he should take the criticism with the same kind of resistance which a good boxer shows to a well-aimed punch.

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,634 SUN. 84,383

APR 19 1964

The press department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sends out releases in pairs. The one with the masthead printed in white on a red ground reports the activities of the orchestra and its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, in Boston and on tour. The one with the green ground keeps publications informed about plans and progress of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Human-interest bits gleaned from the red releases included the fact that Leinsdorf and President Johnson have been friends since 1938 when the President, then Congressman Johnson, undertook the arrangements necessary for the extension of Leinsdorf's visa.

And that when a player auditions for a job in the orchestra the person who listens knows neither his name nor background, and he plays from behind a screen.

And that it was Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, who suggested the symphony's performance of Mozart's Requiem at the Solemn Pontifical Mass of Requiem that Richard Cardinal Cushing celebrated on Jan. 19 as a memorial to President Kennedy.

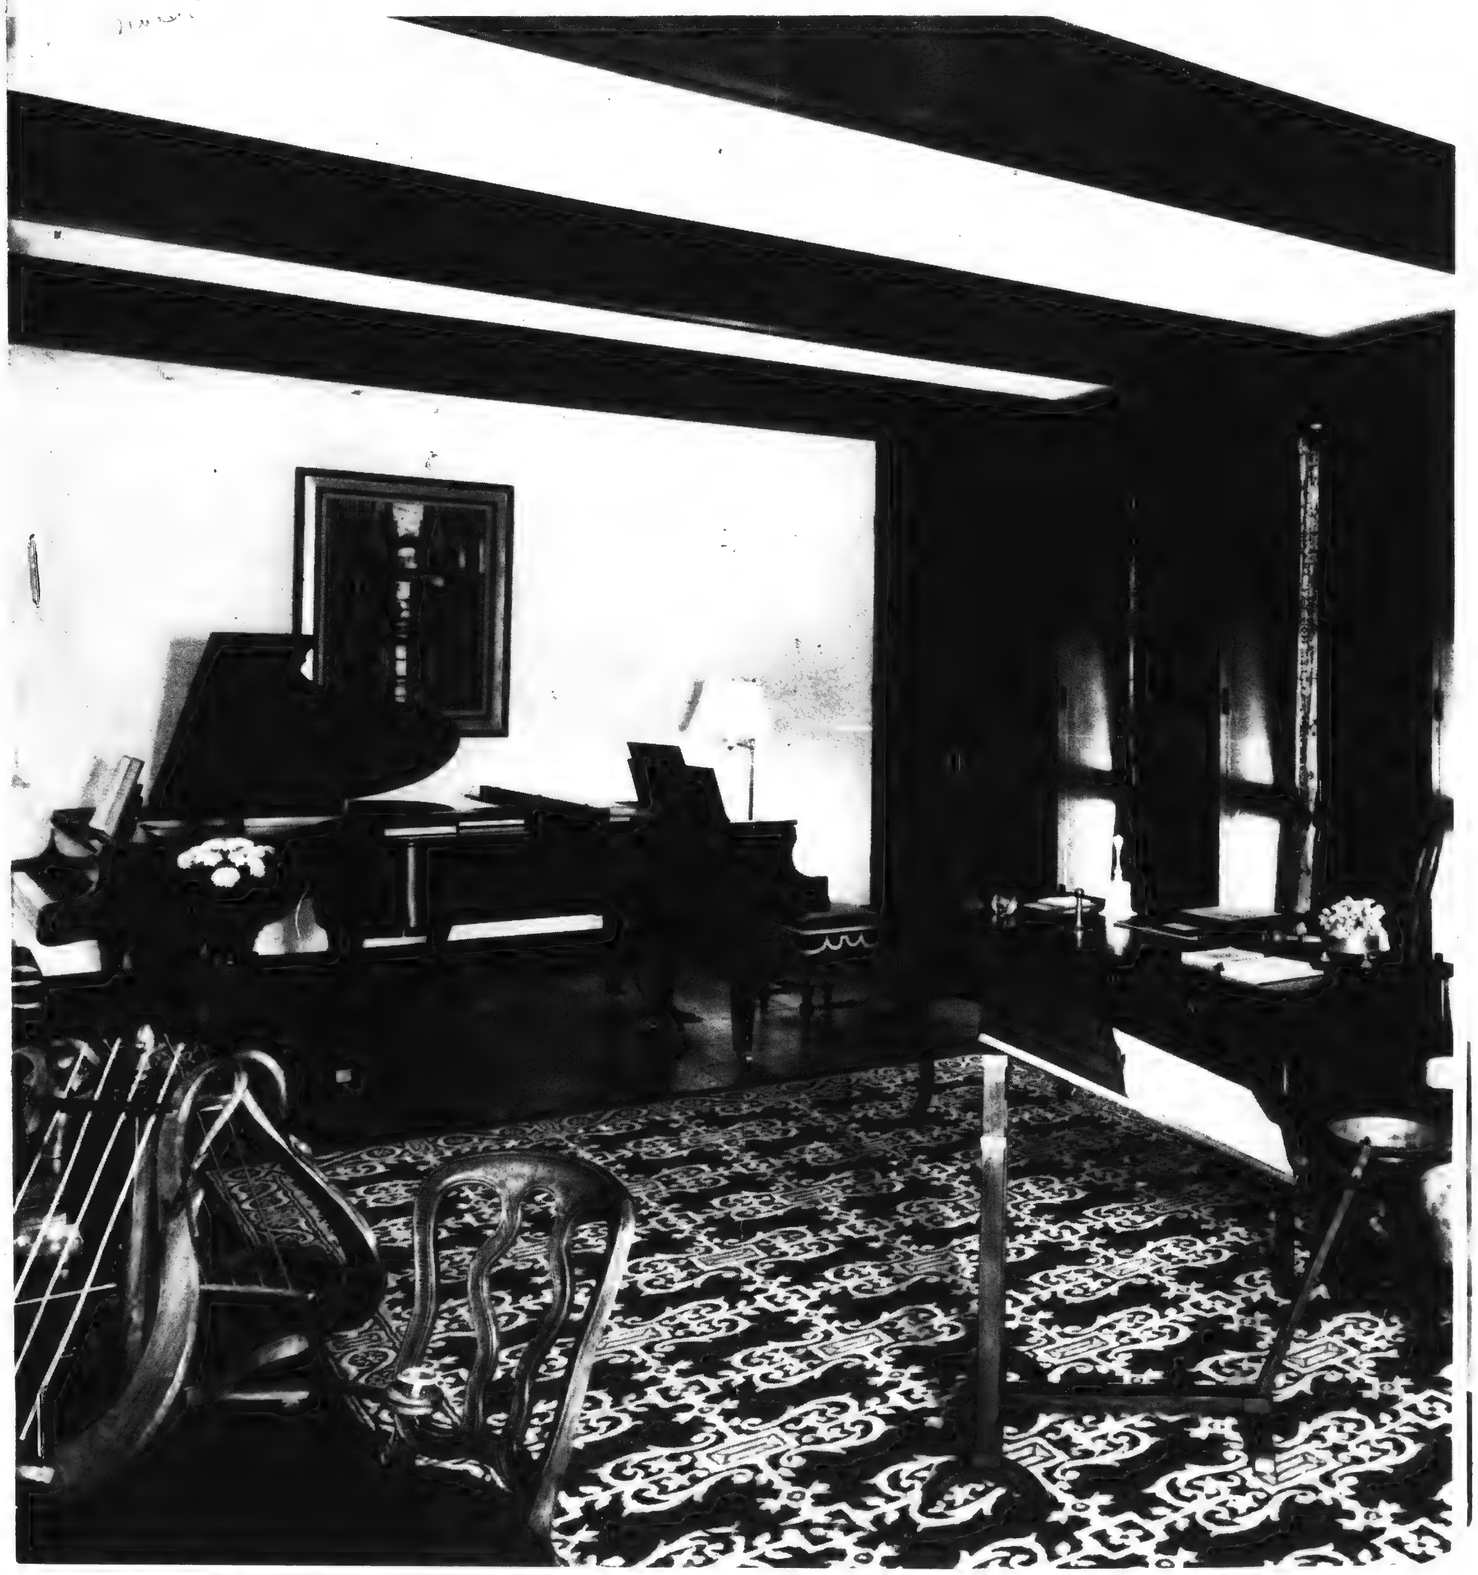
252

HOUSE AND GARDEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,153,000

JUN 1964

A famous conductor's office-at-home:

A WORKING MUSIC



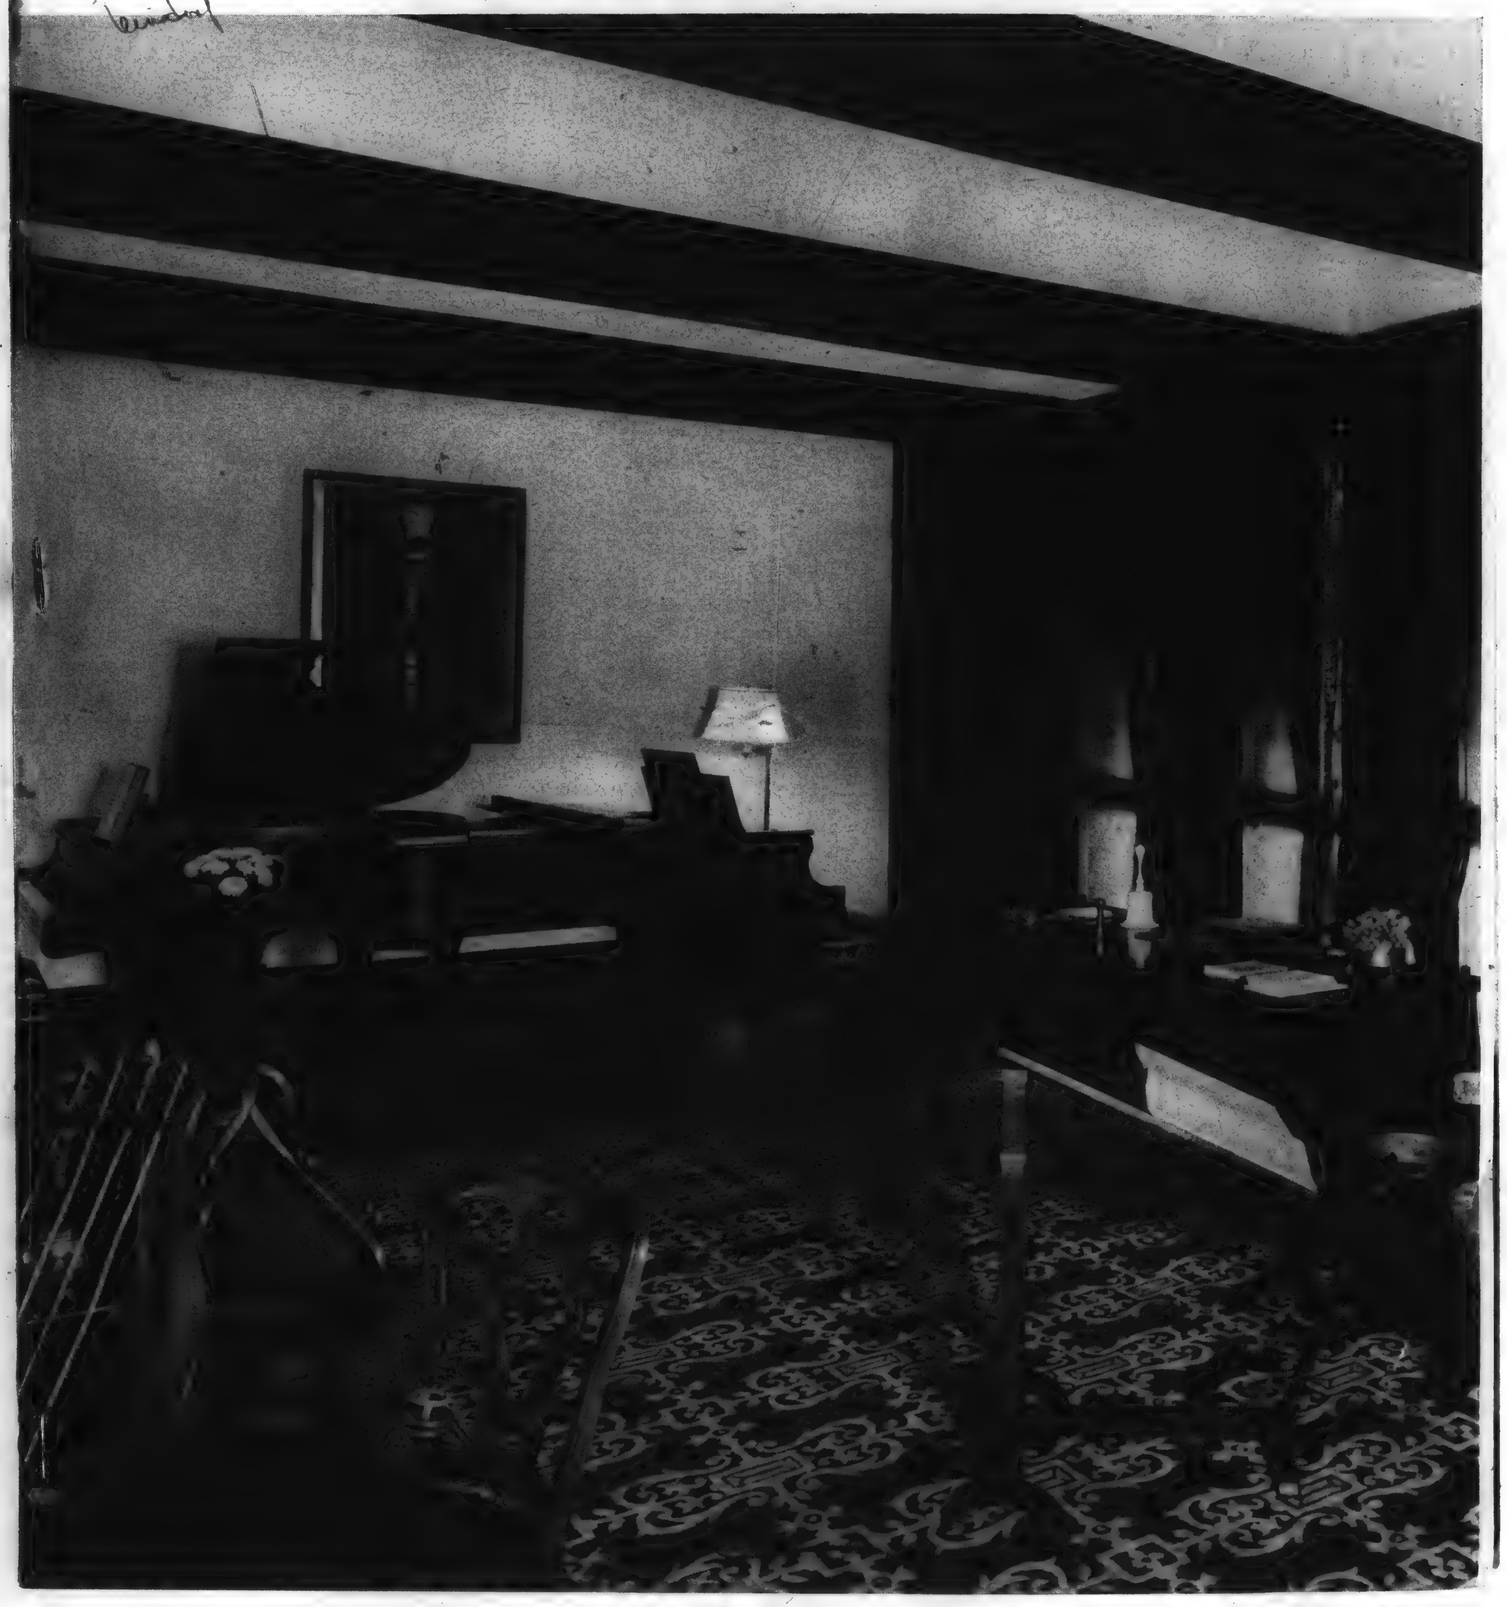
252

HOUSE AND GARDEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,153,000

JUN 1964

A famous conductor's office-at-home:

A WORKING MUSIC



252

HOUSE AND GARDEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,153,000

JUN 1964

ROOM

Deep storage cabinets alternate with windows along one whole wall of th doors closed, left, cabinet fronts resemble paneling.) Shelves are variously commodate scores, tapes, records and reference books. One shelf holds components purposely not built in because Mr. Leinsdorf tries out many n likes to place them in different spots—see the loudspeaker on the floor be

Since music to most people is pure delight and relaxation, it is that music is work, serious and demanding, for the artists wh musician's office-at-home calls for as many facilities and as much as any other kind of workroom, and in the case of a conductor Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
ments are spectacularly multiplied. Yet they have all been met in a roo James Amster, which at first glance might seem more like a place devo enjoyment of music than to its production. This 21-by-28-foot workroo floor of a new wing designed by architect Jean Paul Carlhian for the Le in Brookline, Mass., and is connected to it by a 20-foot passage. (The wi is a garage.) The room serves the conductor variously for conferences, a rehearsals, listening to recordings, storage of scores and tapes—and o playing duos with his younger daughter. The colors are his favorites—r mixed in a vivid counterpoint against a setting of white walls and

In the comfortable sitting area on the other side of the room the conductor holds conferences. Spotlights set into the box beams along each side of room serve as stand-ins for daylight, washing walls and window recesses with clear, glareless light.

LEFT:
The conductor's music stand is an adjustable model specially designed for score-reading from an armchair. Double lyre is one of his collection of antique stands, sometimes used for rehearsals. An old Viennese scroll motif that seems to suggest a lyre was adapted for the pattern of the red and white rug and the printed linen curtains which are red on one side of the room and green on the other.

TOM LEONARD

252

HOUSE AND GARDEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,153,000

JUN 1964

ROOM

Deep storage cabinets alternate with windows along one whole wall of the room. (With doors closed, left, cabinet fronts resemble paneling.) Shelves are variously spaced to accommodate scores, tapes, records and reference books. One shelf holds music-system components purposely not built in because Mr. Leinsdorf tries out many new models and likes to place them in different spots—see the loudspeaker on the floor behind his desk.

Since music to most people is pure delight and relaxation, it is easy to forget that music is work, serious and demanding, for the artists who create it. A musician's office-at-home calls for as many facilities and as much storage space as any other kind of workroom, and in the case of a conductor as dedicated as Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, those requirements are spectacularly multiplied. Yet they have all been met in a room designed by James Amster, which at first glance might seem more like a place devoted to the calm enjoyment of music than to its production. This 21-by-28-foot workroom is the upper floor of a new wing designed by architect Jean Paul Carlhian for the Leinsdorfs' house in Brookline, Mass., and is connected to it by a 20-foot passage. (The wing's lower floor is a garage.) The room serves the conductor variously for conferences, auditions, small rehearsals, listening to recordings, storage of scores and tapes—and occasionally for playing duets with his younger daughter. The colors are his favorites—red and green—mixed in a vivid counterpoint against a setting of white walls and oak cabinetry.

In the comfortable sitting area on the other side of the room the conductor holds conferences. Spotlights set into the box beams along each side of room serve as stand-ins for daylight, washing walls and window recesses with clear, glareless light.

LEFT:

The conductor's music stand is an adjustable model specially designed for score-reading from an armchair. Double lyre is one of his collection of antique stands, sometimes used for rehearsals. An old Viennese scroll motif that seems to suggest a lyre was adapted for the pattern of the red and white rug and the printed linen curtains which are red on one side of the room and green on the other.

TOM LEONARD

BLANK PAGE

254

RADIO & TELEVISION.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
MALDEN, Mass.
Circ. 10,537
OCT 1 1 1963

Boston Symphony Returns on WGBH

It will be the same glorious sound but a brand new sight when WGBH simulcasts the famed Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this year.

Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., the broadcast series which used to come from Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, moves into the great Symphony Hall itself. The change was made because the small hall in Cambridge could no longer hold the number of people who wanted to attend.

WGBH audiences can't help but feel the warm tradition of a concert in the orchestra's own home. The setting is magnificent, and even the enthusiasm of the audience itself is a stirring thing.

The opening program of this year's broadcast series conducted by Erich Leinsdorf includes Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Carl Maria von Weber" and Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1 Opus 9" and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
NOV 1 0 1963

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will perform Piano Concerto in A minor by Schumann and Symphony No. 5 by Mahler in a program on Channel 2, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for the piano concerto is Theodore Lettvin.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980
DEC 1 1963

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Boston Symphony in first of Monday series on WFLN-FM, at 8 P. M.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 1 5 1963

BSO Concerts, Organ Recitals on WBUR-FM

Live broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts and the Symphony Hall organ recital series have been added to the schedule of WBUR-FM in a major shift of programming emphasis for the FM educational station.

In addition, some 20 campus concerts and recitals from B.U.'s School of Fine and Applied Arts will be taped for delayed broadcast during the year.

"We are entering a new phase in music planning," according to Asst. Prof. Edward F. Obrist, director of broadcasting of the university's School of Public Relations and Communications. "The prime objective is to bring current community music to WBUR listeners."

The station began its shift to local performance by broadcasting several concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Civic Symphony and the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra last season.

"This year we will add the Tuesday night series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Sunday afternoon organ performances, as well as our own university faculty recital series and major performances by campus, choral and instrumental groups," Prof. Obrist said.

BSO broadcast dates are Dec. 17, 31; Feb. 4, 18; Mar. 10 and Apr. 7. Organ recitals from Symphony Hall follow: Jan. 26, John Ferris; Feb. 16, Robert Lloyd; Mar. 1, John Weaver; Apr. 5, E. Power Biggs.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

JAN 2 9 1964

Boston Symph In New Syndie Cycle

Seven Arts Associated has made a deal with the Boston Symphony Orch for another series of 13 one-hour concerts batoned by Erich Leinsdorf. WNEW-TV, N. Y., and other Metrodmedia stations, have bought the second Boston Symphony package.

Seven Arts is reissuing internationally the first group of 13 Boston Symphony programs which were placed into distribution originally in 1962. This series was sold in over 40 markets in the U. S. and Canada. Previously offered for one-showing only, it is now being sold for multiple telecasts.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
JAN 1 2 1964

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their regular Saturday evening concert broadcast live from Symphony Hall, Boston, at 8:28 on WPFM.

DAILY VARIETY
HOLLYWOOD, L.A.,CAL.
D. 9,239
JAN 28 1964

13 Spex From 7 Arts

New York, Jan. 27.—Seven Arts Associated will release a second series of 13 hour-long tv concert spex featuring the Boston Symphony orch.

UTICA PRESS
Tuesday, December 17, 1963

To Broadcast 'War Requiem'

Benjamin Britten's War Requiem by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its chamber orchestra, soprano Phyllis Curtin, the Chorus pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir and two male soloists will be broadcast in stereo over WUFM at 8 p.m. Saturday.

The huge work, requiring 300 musicians, was recorded earlier in Boston's Symphony Hall with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

The male soloists are Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D.C.
W. 24,106
JAN 2 7 1964

Second symphony series set by Seven Arts

Seven Arts Associated has contracted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a second series of 13 one-hour concerts that will be offered internationally to TV stations for showing after Feb. 15.

Metropolitan Broadcasting's WNEW-TV New York and WTTG(TV) Washington made special arrangements with Seven Arts to begin telecasting the first of the series Feb. 2 (9-10 p.m.). Metropolitan's KTTV(TV) Los Angeles also has signed a contract but a starting date has not been announced.

Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted two of the 13 concerts in the first series, will conduct all 13 in the second series. (The first program presented by the 104-piece symphony features Wagner's Good Friday Spell from the opera "Parsifal" and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote.")

Seven Arts also announced that the original 13 programs, which were bought by some 40 stations in the U. S. and Canada on a single showing basis, now are available for use as multiple telecasts.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,453 SAT. 294,168
JAN 4 1964

Featured FM Music

Symphonic Music

Mendelssohn Featured

The Overture and Incidental Music to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Festival Chorus and soloists, will be the featured work on WBEN-FM's Saturday night concert at 8:30 this evening.

The program, taped last summer at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., will open with the Overture to Prokofiev's "War and Peace," followed by Brahms Concerto in A minor for Violin and Violoncello.

The Boston Symphony's new concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, is violin soloist and Samuel Mayes is cellist on this latter work.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
JAN 2 4 1964

Boston Symphony Series

A new series of 13 one-hour taped concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented over Channel 5 beginning Feb. 2 at 9 P.M. Erich Leinsdorf will be the conductor. Station WNEW-TV said that at the end of the 13-week cycle, it would repeat 13 other Boston Symphony concerts it first presented in 1962.

254

RADIO & TELEVISION.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
MALDEN, Mass.
Circ. 10,537
OCT 1 1 1963

Boston Symphony Returns on WGBH

It will be the same glorious sound but a brand new sight when WGBH simulcasts the famed Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this year.

Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., the broadcast series which used to come from Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, moves into the great Symphony Hall itself. The change was made because the small hall in Cambridge could no longer hold the number of people who wanted to attend.

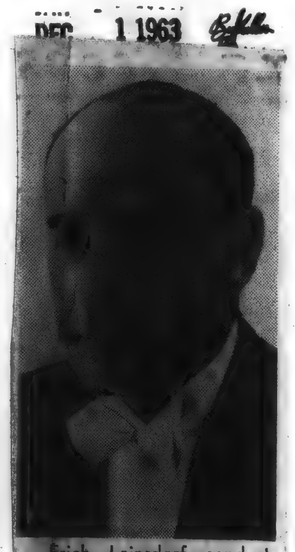
WGBH audiences can't help but feel the warm tradition of a concert in the orchestra's own home. The setting is magnificent, and even the enthusiasm of the audience itself is a stirring thing.

The opening program of this year's broadcast series conducted by Erich Leinsdorf includes Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Carl Maria von Weber" and Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1 Opus 9" and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
NOV 1 0 1963

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will perform Piano Concerto in A minor by Schumann and Symphony No. 5 by Mahler in a program on Channel 2, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for the piano concerto is Theodore Lettvin.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980
DEC 1 1963



Erich Leinsdorf conducts Boston Symphony in first of Monday series on WFLN-FM, at 8 P. M.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
UTICA PRESS
Tuesday, December 17, 1963

To Broadcast 'War Requiem'

Benjamin Britten's War Requiem by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its chamber orchestra, soprano Phyllis Curtin, the Chorus pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir and two male soloists will be broadcast in stereo over WUFM at 8 p.m. Saturday.

The huge work, requiring 300 musicians, was recorded earlier in Boston's Symphony Hall with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

The male soloists are Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 1 5 1963

BSO Concerts, Organ Recitals on WBUR-FM

Live broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts and the Symphony Hall organ recital series have been added to the schedule of WBUR-FM in a major shift of programming emphasis for the FM educational station.

In addition, some 20 campus concerts and recitals from B.U.'s School of Fine and Applied Arts will be taped for delayed broadcast during the year.

"We are entering a new phase in music planning," according to Asst. Prof. Edward F. Obrist, director of broadcasting of the university's School of Public Relations and Communications. "The prime objective is to bring current community music to WBUR listeners."

The station began its shift to local performance by broadcasting several concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Civic Symphony and the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra last season.

"This year we will add the Tuesday night series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Sunday afternoon organ performances, as well as our own university faculty recital series and major performances by campus, choral and instrumental groups," Prof. Obrist said.

BSO broadcast dates are Dec. 17, 31; Feb. 4, 18; Mar. 10 and Apr. 7. Organ recitals from Symphony Hall follow: Jan. 26, John Ferris; Feb. 16, Robert Lloyd; Mar. 1, John Weaver; Apr. 5, E. Power Biggs.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,453 SAT. 294,168
JAN 4 1964

Featured FM Music

Symphonic Music

Mendelssohn Featured

The Overture and Incidental Music to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Festival Chorus and soloists, will be the featured work on WBEN-FM's Saturday night concert at 8:30 this evening.

The program, taped last summer at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., will open with the Overture to Prokofiev's "War and Peace," followed by Brahms Concerto in A minor for Violin and Violoncello.

The Boston Symphony's new concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, is violin soloist and Samuel Mayes is cellist on this latter work.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
JAN 2 9 1964

Boston Symph In New Syndie Cycle

Seven Arts Associated has made a deal with the Boston Symphony Orch for another series of 13 one-hour concerts batoned by Erich Leinsdorf. WNEW-TV, N. Y., and other Metromedia stations, have bought the second Boston Symphony package.

Seven Arts is reissuing internationally the first group of 13 Boston Symphony programs which were placed into distribution originally in 1962. This series was sold in over 40 markets in the U. S. and Canada. Previously offered for one-showing only, it is now being sold for multiple telecasts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
JAN 1 2 1964

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their regular Saturday evening concert broadcast live from Symphony Hall, Boston, at 8:28 on WPFM.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D.C.
W. 24,106
JAN 2 7 1964

Second symphony series set by Seven Arts

Seven Arts Associated has contracted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a second series of 13 one-hour concerts that will be offered internationally to TV stations for showing after Feb. 15.

Metropolitan Broadcasting's WNEW-TV New York and WTTG(TV) Washington made special arrangements with Seven Arts to begin telecasting the first of the series Feb. 2 (9-10 p.m.). Metropolitan's KTTV(TV) Los Angeles also has signed a contract but a starting date has not been announced.

Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted two of the 13 concerts in the first series, will conduct all 13 in the second series. (The first program presented by the 104-piece symphony features Wagner's Good Friday Spell from the opera "Parsifal" and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote.")

Seven Arts also announced that the original 13 programs, which were bought by some 40 stations in the U. S. and Canada on a single showing basis, now are available for use as multiple telecasts.

DAILY VARIETY
HOLLYWOOD, L.A., CAL.
D. 8,239
JAN 28 1964

13 Spex From 7 Arts

New York, Jan. 27.—Seven Arts Associated will release a second series of 13 hour-long tv concert spex featuring the Boston Symphony orch.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
JAN 2 4 1964

Boston Symphony Series

A new series of 13 one-hour taped concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented over Channel 5 beginning Feb. 2 at 9 P.M. Erich Leinsdorf will be the conductor. Station WNEW-TV said that at the end of the 13-week cycle, it would repeat 13 other Boston Symphony concerts it first presented in 1962.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 85,831 S. 369,281

FEB 3 1964

Symphonic Series to Bow on TV

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, will be featured in a new series of 13 weekly one-hour concerts over Channel 5 beginning tonight at 9.

Following the conclusion of this new 13-week cycle, Channel 5 will immediately repeat the original thirteen Boston Symphony concerts telecast on the station during the latter weeks of 1962.

The new concerts will include works of Tchaikovsky, Dvorak, R. Strauss, Beethoven, Schubert, Milhaud, Piston, Mozart, Bach, Shostakovitch, Mahler, Hindemith, Wagner, Bartok, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Brahms, and Rimsky-Korsakov.

As its initial attraction in the new cycle, the world famous 104-piece orchestra, now in its 82nd season, will offer Wagner's "Good Friday Music, Parsifal" and Strauss' "Don Quixote."

Next Sunday, Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Weber" and Schumann's "Piano Concerto."

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

FEB 3 1964

CRITIC'S VIEW

Camera Work Unusual On Boston Symphony

By JOHN HASKINS
Star Special Writer

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. WTTG—Channel 5, 9 to 10 p.m. Program: Good Friday Music, from Parsifal, Wagner; Don Quixote, fantastic variations on a knightly theme, Strauss.

This opening concert in a 13-week Boston Symphony series, to run at 9 p.m. every Sunday, showed a definite improvement over a similar series televised in 1962. It was videotaped in Boston's Symphony Hall, for one thing, and a live audience in that fine hall gave the concert a surpassing character of immediacy.

Conductor Leinsdorf worked without score, an excellent thing in itself for presentations that are visual as well as aural. Without any extraneous mannerisms, his batonless nonducting technique molded the music he drew from his superb orchestral instrument with extreme plasticity.

A Musical Crab

Sound was good, apparently achieved through a single all-directional microphone mounted above and slightly behind the podium, and the camera work was no busier than it needed to be. Ideally, the way to televise a concert by orchestra would seem to be to set up a single camera in the middle of the aisle at about row 7, and just shoot. That is the way the concertgoer sees what he hears. But that would not give one the orchestral overview, which is television's special faculty.

There was lively use of the cameras in the Strauss. They had much to observe, with solo cellist Samuel Mayes and solo violist Joseph de Pasquale seated out front, and a great deal of individual solo work taking place within the orchestra. A favorite study of the director was a right profile view of Samuel Mayes, his bow arm in motion, and with what appeared to be a disembodied left hand working over the fingerboard of his cello, like a musical crab. Fascinating.

Sonic, Visual Marraige

There were many attractive, and instructive, uses of the cameras. Duets between the solo viola and the euphonium, for example, were shown clearly, almost analytically, without jumpiness, and it was a delight to watch the camera move smoothly from euphonium to tuba to mark the completion of a key phrase.

Another fascinating camera study during the Strauss was a percussionist grinding away at the wind machine. That's something you seldom see from the seventh row. Or the face of the conductor superimposed on the orchestra, his expressive physiognomy a matchless guide to the course of the music, allowing the audience to be in two places at one time.

If there seems to be much more said here about the camera work than the playing, there is a reason. Televised concerts, to be successful, must achieve a mystic marriage between sonic and visual arts, and this one came off well.

Next Sunday, same time, same orchestra, same conductor, there will be another of these concerts on Channel 5. Pianist Theodore Lettvin will be soloist in the Schumann concerto, and the orchestra will play Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber, by the late Paul Hindemith. It should be worth seeing as well as hearing. This one certainly was.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 3 1964

Fine Evening for Music

Thanks to New York's independent stations, Sunday night at the moment is television's best musical evening. Along with variety and Western drama there are now back-to-back symphonies from 8 to 10.

WNEW-TV last night began another series of taped concerts featuring the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The program comes immediately after the regular WPIX series featuring the Chicago Symphony.

Such civilized scheduling to avoid conflicts between like attractions gives the independents a deserving "A" in thoughtfulness and good manners. Moreover, the ability to handle a spot announcement without peril to the integrity of the music speaks well for the elasticity of a commercial culture.

Last evening's two hours were a delightful alternative to the viewer so disposed, particularly because in both Boston and Chicago the visual coverage was so tastefully restrained and unobtrusive.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

FEB 2 1964

GUEST CONDUCTOR

Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a stereo presentation of the Orchestra on WCRB Thursday, Feb. 6, at 8:05 p.m. Mr. Monteux, now in his 98th year, conducted the Boston Symphony from 1919-1924; he is now Music Director of the London Symphony Orchestra.

HOLLYWOOD REPORTER
HOLLYWOOD, L.A.CAL.
D. 9,345

FEB 5 1964

7 Arts Associated Set Sales Meeting

New York. — A three-day general sales meeting, Feb. 10-12, will be held here by Seven Arts Associated, it is announced by Robert Rich, v-p and general sales manager, and Donald Klauber, v-p and national sales manager. President Eliot Hyman will join Rich and Klauber in discussing marketing plans for Seven Arts' new Volume 9 (Parts 1, 2, 3 and 4) "Films of the 50's" plus the new second series of 13 one-hour TV Concert Specials featuring Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among others taking part in the sessions will be Herbert G. Richek, director of operations; Harvey Chertok, ad-publicity director; Leonard E. Hammer, director of station representatives and national sales, and George Mitchell and Alden Adolph of west coast division.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108

FEB 9 1964

Good Music

ERICH LEINSDORF will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a live concert from Symphony Hall, Boston, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from Le Coq d'Or, Piston's Symphony No. 4, Suite for Orchestra No. 3 by Tchaikovsky and excerpts from Di Walkure by Wagner.

VAN NUYS, CALIF.
VALLEY NEWS AND VALLEY GREEN SHEET
D. 161,501

FEB 6 1964

Boston Symphony Airs On Feb. 16

World renowned conductor Charles Munch will direct the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music by Claude Debussy and Irving Fine on KTTV, Sunday, Feb. 16, from 9 to 10 p.m.

Opening on Fine's "Symphony" (1962,) the orchestra concludes the hour-long concert, with Debussy's "La Mar."

Friday, January 24, 1964
RADIO - TELEVISION DAILY

7 ARTS SIGNS ON FOR MORE MUSIC

2d Hub Symphony Series To Be Released Worldwide

Seven Arts Associated will release internationally a second series of 13 one-hour Boston Symphony Orchestra TV specials, reports Robert Rich, VP and general sales manager and Donald Klauber, VP and national sales manager.

The series will be placed into worldwide distribution, along with earlier series, which has so far been telecast in over 40 cities in the U. S. and Canada. The initial series, produced in '62, is also now available for multiple telecasts (it was previously offered for one-showing only).

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

FEB 2 1964

NEWS FROM HERE—There will be music in the air to be seen as well as heard today when WTTG Channel 5 begins the first of 13 weekly Sunday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 9 to 10 p.m. The concert tonight, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will present the Good Friday Music from Parsifal and Strauss's Don Quixote. Later concerts will offer (among others) Pianist Theodore Lettvin and violist Joseph de Pasquale as soloists. When the series finishes, the station will rerun the 1962 telecasts which were conducted by Charles Munch, with Aaron Copland, Richard Burgin, Erich Leinsdorf, and William Steinberg as guest conductors.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK
D. 30,520

FEB 15 1964

Boston Orchestra Plays Debussy, Fine

World renowned conductor Charles Munch will direct the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music by Claude Debussy and Irving Fine at 9 p.m. Sunday, on Channel 11.

First, the orchestra will play Fine's "Symphony" (1962). To conclude the hour concert, the Symphony has programmed Debussy's "La Mer."

SPONSOR
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 10,373

FEB 3 1964

More Boston Symphony: Seven Arts is releasing internationally a second series of 13 one-hour TV concert specials featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seven Arts is also re-releasing, to overseas markets, the initial 13 specials, which have been shown in more than 40 cities in the U. S. and Canada. The initial series, previously offered for one-showing only, is now available for multiple runs.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (e)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
Circ. 15,352

FEB 11 1964

Symphony

DURHAM — Channel 11 will bring viewers another Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, direct from Symphony Hall in Boston, tonight at 8:30 p.m.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, has given Channel 11 in Durham permission to carry the live concerts through the facilities of the Eastern Educational Network.

The second concert of the 1964 winter season will feature selections by Rimsky-Korsakov, Piston and Tchaikovsky.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 295,831 S. 369,281
FEB 2 1964

Symphonic Series to Bow on TV

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, will be featured in a new series of 13 weekly one-hour concerts over Channel 5 beginning tonight at 9.

Following the conclusion of this new 13-week cycle, Channel 5 will immediately repeat the original thirteen Boston Symphony concerts telecast on the station during the latter weeks of 1962.

The new concerts will include works of Tchaikovsky, Dvorak, R. Strauss, Beethoven, Schubert, Milhaud, Piston, Mozart, Bach, Shostakovitch, Mahler, Hindemith, Wagner, Bartok, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Brahms, and Rimsky-Korsakov.

As its initial attraction in the new cycle, the world famous 104-piece orchestra, now in its 82nd season, will offer Wagner's "Good Friday Music, Parsifal" and Strauss' "Don Quixote."

Next Sunday, Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Weber" and Schumann's "Piano Concerto."

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112
FEB 3 1964

CRITIC'S VIEW

Camera Work Unusual On Boston Symphony

By JOHN HASKINS
Star Special Writer

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. WTTG—Channel 5, 9 to 10 p.m. Program: Good Friday Music, from Parsifal, Wagner; Don Quixote, fantastic variations on a knightly theme, Strauss.

This opening concert in a 13-week Boston Symphony series, to run at 9 p.m. every Sunday, showed a definite improvement over a similar series televised in 1962. It was videotaped in Boston's Symphony Hall, for one thing, and a live audience in that fine hall gave the concert a surpassing character of immediacy.

Conductor Leinsdorf worked without score, an excellent thing in itself for presentations that are visual as well as aural. Without any extraneous mannerisms, his batonless nonducting technique molded the music he drew from his superb orchestral instrument with extreme plasticity.

A Musical Crab

Sound was good, apparently achieved through a single all-directional microphone mounted above and slightly behind the podium, and the camera work was no busier than it needed to be. Ideally, the way to televise a concert by orchestra would seem to be to set up a single camera in the middle of the aisle at about row 7, and just shoot. That is the way the concertgoer sees what he hears. But that would not give one the orchestral overview, which is television's special faculty.

There was lively use of the cameras in the Strauss. They had much to observe, with solo cellist Samuel Mayes and solo violist Joseph de Pasquale seated out front, and a great deal of individual solo work taking place within the orchestra. A favorite study of the director was a right profile view of Samuel Mayes, his bow arm in motion, and with what appeared to be a disembodied left hand working over the fingerboard of his cello, like a musical crab. Fascinating.

Sonic, Visual Marraige

There were many attractive, and instructive, uses of the cameras. Duets between the solo viola and the euphonium, for example, were shown clearly, almost analytically, without jumpiness, and it was a delight to watch the camera move smoothly from euphonium to tuba to mark the completion of a key phrase.

Another fascinating camera study during the Strauss was a percussionist grinding away at the wind machine. That's something you seldom see from the seventh row. Or the face of the conductor superimposed on the orchestra, his expressive physiognomy a matchless guide to the course of the music, allowing the audience to be in two places at one time.

If there seems to be much more said here about the camera work than the playing there is a reason. Televised concerts, to be successful, must achieve a mystic marriage between sonic and visual arts, and this one came off well.

Next Sunday, same time, same orchestra, same conductor, there will be another of these concerts on Channel 5. Pianist Theodore Lettvin will be soloist in the Schumann concerto, and the orchestra will play Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber by the late Paul Hindemith. It should be worth seeing as well as hearing. This one certainly was.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
FEB 3 1964

Fine Evening for Music

Thanks to New York's independent stations, Sunday night at the moment is television's best musical evening. Along with variety and Western drama there are now back-to-back symphonies from 3 to 10.

WNEW-TV last night began another series of taped concerts featuring the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The program comes immediately after the regular WPIX series featuring the Chicago Symphony.

Such civilized scheduling to avoid conflicts between like attractions gives the independents a deserving "A" in thoughtfulness and good manners. Moreover, the ability to handle a spot announcement without peril to the integrity of the music speaks well for the elasticity of a commercial culture.

Last evening's two hours were a delightful alternative to the viewer so disposed, particularly because in both Boston and Chicago the visual coverage was so tastefully restrained and unobtrusive.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 2 1964

GUEST CONDUCTOR

Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a stereo presentation of the Orchestra on WCRB Thursday, Feb. 6, at 8:05 p.m. Mr. Monteux, now in his 98th year, conducted the Boston Symphony from 1919-1924; he is now Music Director of the London Symphony Orchestra.

HOLLYWOOD REPORTER
HOLLYWOOD, L.A.CAL.
D. 9,345
FEB 5 1964

7 Arts Associated Set Sales Meeting

New York. — A three-day general sales meeting, Feb. 10-12, will be held here by Seven Arts Associated, it is announced by Robert Rich, v-p and general sales manager, and Donald Klauber, v-p and national sales manager. President Eliot Hyman will join Rich and Klauber in discussing marketing plans for Seven Arts' new Volume 9 (Parts 1, 2, 3 and 4) "Films of the 50's" plus the new second series of 13 one-hour TV Concert Specials featuring Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among others taking part in the sessions will be Herbert G. Richek, director of operations; Harvey Chertok, ad-publicity director; Leonard E. Hammer, director of station representatives and national sales, and George Mitchell and Alden Adolph of west coast division.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
FEB 9 1964

Good Music

ERICH LEINSDORF will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a live concert from Symphony Hall, Boston, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from Le Coq d'Or, Piston's Symphony No. 4, Suite for Orchestra No. 3 by Tchaikovsky and excerpts from Di Walkure by Wagner.

VAN NUYS, CALIF.
VALLEY NEWS AND VALLEY GREEN SHEET
D. 161,501
FEB 6 1964

Boston Symphony Airs On Feb. 16

World renowned conductor Charles Munch will direct the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music by Claude Debussy and Irving Fine on KTTV, Sunday, Feb. 16, from 9 to 10 p.m.

Opening on Fine's "Symphony" (1962,) the orchestra concludes the hour-long concert, with Debussy's "La Mar."

Friday, January 24, 1964
RADIO - TELEVISION DAILY

7 ARTS SIGNS ON FOR MORE MUSIC

2d Hub Symphony Series To Be Released Worldwide

Seven Arts Associated will release internationally a second series of 13 one-hour Boston Symphony Orchestra TV specials, reports Robert Rich, VP and general sales manager and Donald Klauber, VP and national sales manager.

The series will be placed into worldwide distribution, along with earlier series, which has so far been telecast in over 40 cities in the U. S. and Canada. The initial series, produced in '62, is also now available for multiple telecasts (it was previously offered for one-showing only).

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112
FEB 2 1964

NEWS FROM HERE— There will be music in the air to be seen as well as heard today when WTTG Channel 5 begins the first of 13 weekly Sunday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 9 to 10 p.m. The concert tonight, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will present the Good Friday Music from Parsifal and Strauss's Don Quixote. Later concerts will offer (among others) Pianist Theodore Lettvin and violist Feseph de Pasquale as soloists. When the series finishes, the station will rerun the 1962 telecasts which were conducted by Charles Munch, with Aaron Copland, Richard Burgin, Erich Leinsdorf, and William Steinberg as guest conductors.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK
D 30,520
FEB 15 1964

Boston Orchestra Plays Debussy, Fine

World renowned conductor Charles Munch will direct the 104-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music by Claude Debussy and Irving Fine at 9 p.m. Sunday, on Channel 11.

First, the orchestra will play Fine's "Symphony" (1962). To conclude the hour concert, the Symphony has programmed Debussy's "La Mar."

SPONSOR
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 10,373
FEB 3 1964

More Boston Symphony: Seven Arts is releasing internationally a second series of 13 one-hour TV concert specials featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seven Arts is also re-releasing, to overseas markets, the initial 13 specials, which have been shown in more than 40 cities in the U. S. and Canada. The initial series, previously offered for one-showing only, is now available for multiple runs.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (e)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
Circ. 15,352
FEB 11 1964

Symphony

DURHAM — Channel 11 will bring viewers another Boston Symphony Orchestra concert direct from Symphony Hall in Boston, tonight at 8:30 p.m.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor has given Channel 11 in Durham permission to carry the live concerts through the facilities of the Eastern Educational Network.

The second concert of the 1964 winter season will feature selections by Rimsky-Korsakov, Pis[illegible] and Tchaikovsky.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780

FEB 9 1964

Music

Symphonies For the Home

By ALAN BRANIGAN

Applause is in order for an interesting musical development on television. This is the serious presentation of symphony orchestras, not as accompaniments for singers as on the Bell Telephone Hour or as a basis for kiddie lectures a la Leonard Bernstein.

Last Sunday evening offered an excellent example of this trend, with two hours of good music offered by, respectively, the Chicago Symphony under Hans Rosbaud, guest conductor, and the magnificent Boston Symphony under its pluperfect new leader, Erich Leinsdorf.

The Chicago played Mozart's G Minor Symphony and Franck's "Symphonic Variations," with Robert Casadesus, plus Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso." The proper Bostonians played the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal" and Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Samuel Mayes as cello soloist and Joseph De Pasquale as violist.

The whole thing was quite engaging. It seemed to us that the cameramen on the two different networks were quite self-possessed and less likely to jump from one instrument to another, one of the painful attributes of earlier TV music. Also, by some miracle, the sound seemed to be pretty good all around, with especially good marks for the flute solos of Dorit Anthony Dwyer and the oboe of Ralph Gomberg in the "Parsifal," plus James Stagliano's horn solos.

Music Master

The Chicago program dwelt a little more lovingly on the conductor Rosabud than the other outfit did on Leinsdorf. Rosbaud appeared as a gentle, almost timid, old-style music master, almost like a kindly leader of the village band. The music he produced, however, was clean, masterful and respectable in every phrase.

Leinsdorf showed up as much more of a professional virtuoso of the modern baton school, fiery, electric and capable of many kinds of expressions, all conveyed with the utmost conviction. One of the unrecognized assets of today's TV concerts is, in fact, the audience's chance to get to know conductors as the players see them, something that is impossible in a concert hall. Whether this may yet turn the baton fraternity into a bunch of hams is yet to be resolved.

There is one respect in which TV probably will never rival concert hall experience. And that is in the length of the programs. Just as radio is cursed with the 55-minute programming limitation, so is the hour-long television show. This is great for the lovers of short works, but those with a longer attention span must look elsewhere.

We are reminded of a magnificent Boston Symphony concert we attended not long ago in New York's Carnegie Hall. Leinsdorf, the conductor of the evening, had arranged something pretty special, in fact, the type of program he does extremely well. It paired Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 with Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E Major. The tiny Bach orchestra held only 20 players, plus solo violin (the marvelous Joseph Silverstein) and two solo flutes, with Leinsdorf conducting and playing the harpsichord simultaneously. It met an uproarious reception from the audience and the last movement had to be played over again. A Boston encore is rare.

The Bruckner employed the full orchestra, 110 strong, lacking only a few percussion to being the equal of some of Mahler's powerhouse utterances and taking well over an hour in elapsed time. The tremendous volume of sound, coming after the Bach, was a stunner and throughout the serpentine unwinding of the themes this listener was astonished at the inventiveness and variety of Bruckner's though in this rarely played work.

Large Pattern

Leinsdorf laid the form bare for us that evening. It was a revelation of Bruckner's grandiose designs, his command of instrumental masses, the enormous complexity of his harmonic coloration. He was a Wagnerian of the deepest dye and one can hear the chromatic steps up and down, the leading motifs, the sudden bursts of sheer sound mass, just as in Wagner. His use of a quartet of tubas gives the work an unusual sound, especially solid in the brass phrases.

Bruckner was the stream from which many of Mahler's inspirations flowed. But with the latter the emotion is Austrian, personal, warm, echoing Schubert and the folk song spirit. Bruckner is more of a strict, cool German in sound and feeling, detached and improvisational, like an organist. It is thrilling music, but mysterious in its personal message.

Aside from the beauty of its sound, especially as played by the Boston geniuses, the Bruckner symphony is like a Ph. D. test in conductorship. Leinsdorf passed with honors.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 29 1964

B50 TV concerts

The Boston Symphony announces that it has renewed its television contract with Seven Arts Associated in New York City, thus continuing to make its televised concerts available to commercial stations throughout the world.

Seven Arts Associated is producing and releasing for international distribution a second series of 13 one-hour televised concerts by the orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

In addition Seven Arts will release its first series of 13 one-hour Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The series was originally placed into television distribution in 1962 and has been telecast in 35 United States cities. This series, previously offered for one-showing only, is now available for multiple telecasts.

TELEVISION AGE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
E.O.WEEK 10,202
FEB 17 1964

Seven Arts is adding a second series of 13 hour tv concert specials featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its list of product for syndication. It is re-releasing the first 13 which were shown one-time-only in more than 40 markets for multiple telecasting. Seven Arts also reported the sales of its 39 half-hours featuring clown Emmett Kelley for children to a third Canadian market.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
MAR 1 1964

Leopold Stokowski will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, broadcast live from Symphony Hall, Boston, Saturday at 8:28 p.m. on WPFM. Works by Gabrieli, Vivaldi, Mozart, Hovhaness, Rorem and Stravinsky will be heard.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
MAR 1 1964

Boston Symphony on Ch. 5

Ch. 5 will present the fifth in a series of 13 television concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at 9 p.m.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Milhaud's Viola Concerto and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
NEW YORK POST
Sunday, March 1, 1964

Boston Symphony on Ch. 5

Ch. 5 will present the fifth in a series of 13 television concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at 9 p.m.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Milhaud's Viola Concerto and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
SYR

WONO to Offer Boston Symphony

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's leading symphonic organizations, will be broadcast at 8 p.m. Wednesday evenings, beginning March 11 over WONO-FM.

The Boston Symphony was established in 1881 and has been distinguished through the years by having Leinsdorf some of the finest conductors available as its directors. Among the conductors of the symphony in the past have been Karl Muck, Arthur Nikisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, and Charles Munch. In 1962, upon Munch's retirement, Erich Leinsdorf took over the post, and has continued the great tradition of the orchestra.

The concerts that are broadcast by WONO will be "live" performances of the symphony during the 1963-64 season.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS CO. CHRONICLE
W. 10,000
MAR 3 1964

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES (WNEW)

BOSTON SYMPHONY—This is the sixth in a series of weekly specials featuring one of America's finest symphony orchestras. Erich Leinsdorf is the conductor. The program will include Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" with soloists Doriot Anthony Dwyer, James Pappoutsakis, and Joseph Silverstein, and Bartok's "Violin Concerto No. 2" with soloist Joseph Silverstein. March 8th at

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
MAR 8 1964

Van Cliburn will be the piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night's broadcast at 8:28 on WPFM. Erich Leinsdorf will direct the orchestra in works by Mendelssohn, Toch and Brahms.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
SUN. 210,836
Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780
MAR 15 1964

Soloist

Pianist Van Cliburn will be featured in Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 1" when it's presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its broadcast Saturday from 8:07 to 10 p.m.

Also to be featured on the two-hour concert will be Berlioz's Damnation of Faust: 3 Excerpts and the world premiere of Toch's "Symphony No. 5."

MAR 15 1964

Radio Highlights

WONO-FM will broadcast concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesdays at 8 p.m. The symphony is under direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The concerts are recorded at performances in Boston's Symphony Hall, and at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood. Among the concerts will be the world premiere of the "Third Symphony" by Leonard Bernstein. This work has not been performed or played over the air in Syracuse.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780
FEB 9 1964

Music

Symphonies For the Home

By ALAN BRANIGAN

Applause is in order for an interesting musical development on television. This is the serious presentation of symphony orchestras, not as accompaniments for singers as on the Bell Telephone Hour or as a basis for kiddie lectures a la Leonard Bernstein.

Last Sunday evening offered an excellent example of this trend, with two hours of good music offered by, respectively, the Chicago Symphony under Hans Rosbaud, guest conductor, and the magnificent Boston Symphony under its pluperfect new leader, Erich Leinsdorf.

The Chicago played Mozart's G Minor Symphony and Franck's "Symphonic Variations," with Robert Casadesus, plus Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso." The proper Bostonians played the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal" and Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Samuel Mayes as cello soloist and Joseph De Pasquale as violist.

The whole thing was quite engaging. It seemed to us that the cameramen on the two different networks were quite self-possessed and less likely to jump from one instrument to another, one of the painful attributes of earlier TV music. Also, by some miracle, the sound seemed to be pretty good all around, with especially good marks for the flute solos of Dorit Anthony Dwyer and the oboe of Ralph Gomberg in the "Parsifal," plus James Stagliano's horn solos.

Music Master

The Chicago program dwelt a little more lovingly on the conductor Rosabud than the other outfit did on Leinsdorf. Rosbaud appeared as a gentle, almost timid, old-style music master, almost like a kindly leader of the village band. The music he produced, however, was clean, masterful and respectable in every phrase.

Leinsdorf showed up as much more of a professional virtuoso of the modern baton school, fiery, electric and capable of many kinds of expressions, all conveyed with the utmost conviction. One of the unrecognized assets of today's TV concerts is, in fact, the audience's chance to get to know conductors as the players see them, something that is impossible in a concert hall. Whether this may yet turn the baton fraternity into a bunch of hams is yet to be resolved.

There is one respect in which TV probably will never rival concert hall experience. And that is in the length of the programs. Just as radio is cursed with the 55-minute programming limitation, so is the hour-long television show. This is great for the lovers of short works, but those with a longer attention span must look elsewhere.

We are reminded of a magnificent Boston Symphony concert we attended not long ago in New York's Carnegie Hall. Leinsdorf, the conductor of the evening, had arranged something pretty special, in fact, the type of program he does extremely well. It paired Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 with Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E Major. The tiny Bach orchestra held only 20 players, plus solo violin (the marvelous Joseph Silverstein) and two solo flutes, with Leinsdorf conducting and playing the harpsichord simultaneously. It met an uproarious reception from the audience and the last movement had to be played over again. A Boston encore is rare.

The Bruckner employed the full orchestra, 110 strong, lacking only a few percussion to being the equal of some of Mahler's powerhouse utterances and taking well over an hour in elapsed time. The tremendous volume of sound, coming after the Bach, was a stunner and throughout the serpentine unwinding of the themes this listener was astonished at the inventiveness and variety of Bruckner's though in this rarely played work.

Large Pattern

Leinsdorf laid the form bare for us that evening. It was a revelation of Bruckner's grandiose designs, his command of instrumental masses, the enormous complexity of his harmonic coloration. He was a Wagnerian of the deepest dye and one can hear the chromatic steps up and down, the leading motifs, the sudden bursts of sheer sound mass, just as in Wagner. His use of a quartet of tubas gives the work an unusual sound, especially solid in the brass phrases.

Bruckner was the stream from which many of Mahler's inspirations flowed. But with the latter the emotion is Austrian, personal, warm, echoing Schubert and the folk song spirit. Bruckner is more of a strict, cool German in sound and feeling, detached and improvisational, like an organist. It is thrilling music, but mysterious in its personal message.

Aside from the beauty of its sound, especially as played by the Boston geniuses, the Bruckner symphony is like a Ph. D. test in conductorship. Leinsdorf passed with honors.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 29 1964

BSO TV concerts

The Boston Symphony announces that it has renewed its television contract with Seven Arts Associated in New York City, thus continuing to make its televised concerts available to commercial stations throughout the world.

Seven Arts Associated is producing and releasing for international distribution a second series of 13 one-hour televised concerts by the orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

In addition Seven Arts will release its first series of 13 one-hour Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The series was originally placed into television distribution in 1962 and has been telecast in 35 United States cities. This series, previously offered for one-showing only, is now available for multiple telecasts.

TELEVISION AGE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
E.O.WEEK 10,202
FEB 17 1964

Seven Arts is adding a second series of 13 hour tv concert specials featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its list of product for syndication. It is re-releasing the first 13 which were shown one-time-only in more than 40 markets for multiple telecasting. Seven Arts also reported the sales of its 39 half-hours featuring clown Emmett Kelley for children to a third Canadian market.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
MAR 1 1964

Leopold Stokowski will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, broadcast live from Symphony Hall, Boston, Saturday at 8:28 p.m. on WPFM. Works by Gabrieli, Vivaldi, Mozart, Hovhaness, Rorem and Stravinsky will be heard.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
MAR 1 1964

Boston Symphony on Ch. 5

Ch. 5 will present the fifth in a series of 13 television concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at 9 p.m.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Milhaud's Viola Concerto and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
NEW YORK POST
Sunday, March 1, 1964

Boston Symphony on Ch. 5

Ch. 5 will present the fifth in a series of 13 television concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at 9 p.m.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Milhaud's Viola Concerto and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SYRACUSE POST STANDARD
Sunday, March 1, 1964

WONO to Offer Boston Symphony

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's leading symphonic organizations, will be broadcast at 8 p.m. Wednesday evenings, beginning March 11 over WONO-FM.

Leinsdorf

The Boston Symphony was established in 1881 and has been distinguished through the years by having some of the finest conductors available as its directors. Among the conductors of the symphony in the past have been Karl Muck, Arthur Nikisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, and Charles Munch. In 1962, upon Munch's retirement, Erich Leinsdorf took over the post, and has continued the great tradition of the orchestra.

The concerts that are broadcast by WONO will be "live" performances of the symphony during the 1963-64 season.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS CO. CHRONICLE
W. 10,000
MAR 3 1964

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES (WNEW)

BOSTON SYMPHONY—This is the sixth in a series of weekly specials featuring one of America's finest symphony orchestras. Erich Leinsdorf is the conductor. The program will include Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" with soloists Doriot Anthony Dwyer, James Pappoutsakis, and Joseph Silverstein, and Bartok's "Violin Concerto No. 2" with soloist Joseph Silverstein, March 8th at

---

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
MAR 8 1964

Van Cliburn will be the piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night's broadcast at 8:28 on WPFM. Erich Leinsdorf will direct the orchestra in works by Mendelssohn, Toch and Brahms.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780
MAR 15 1964

Soloist

Pianist Van Cliburn will be featured in Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 1" when it's presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its broadcast Saturday from 8:07 to 10 p.m.

Also to be featured on the two-hour concert will be Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust: 3 Excerpts" and the world premiere of Toch's "Symphony No. 5."

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
SUN. 210,836
MAR 15 1964

Radio Highlights

WONO-FM will broadcast concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesdays at 8 p.m. The symphony is under direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The concerts are recorded at performances in Boston's Symphony Hall, and at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood. Among the concerts will be the world premiere of the "Third Symphony" by Leonard Bernstein. This work has not been performed or played

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
MAR 1 5 1964

Joseph DePasquale will be the viola soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday night's broadcast at 8:30 on WPFM. Erich Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra in works by Telemann, Hindemith and Strauss.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
UTICA PRESS
Monday, March 23, 1964

Russians Hear Boston Symphony

Moscow (AP) — Radio Moscow devoted its evening transmission yesterday to works conducted by Charles Munch and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch and the orchestra created a sensation when they played here in 1956—the first western orchestra to play in the Soviet Union after World War II.

CHICAGO
SUN - TIMES
CHICAGO, ILL.
D. 543,420 S. 651,327
MAR 2 7 1964

RADIO MOSCOW devoted a recent evening transmission to works conducted by Charles Munch and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch and the orchestra created a sensation when they played in Moscow in 1956. The maestro's autobiography, "I Am a Conductor," was published in Russian and sold out in two weeks. Munch, 73, has retired and lives in Paris.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,453 SAT. 294,168
MAR 1 4 1964

Featured FM Music

Hollande

Plays Pr

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in a full-length concert, taped recently in Boston's Symphony Hall, at 8:30 this evening over WBEN-FM. Featured soloist will be 20-year-old pianist Lorin Hollander performing Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5 in G major.

The orchestra will perform Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E major.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 2 3 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 2 3 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,020
MAR 2 3 1964

Reds Broadcast Symphony Program By Charles Munch

MOSCOW — Radio Moscow devoted its evening transmission Sunday to works conducted by Charles Munch and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch and the orchestra created a sensation when they played here in 1956 — the first Western orchestra to play in the Soviet Union after World War II.

His autobiography, "I Am A Conductor," was published in Russian and sold out in two weeks. Munch, 73, has now retired and lives in Paris.

Works played during the evening-long concert included Mozart's Symphony in G. Minor, symphonic variations by Richard Strauss, Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe, and Stravinsky's Ballet Card Game.

(Associated Press)

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
MAR 2 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 2 2 1964

Hollander to Make Channel 2 Debut

The young American pianist Lorin Hollander makes his Channel 2 debut at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be broadcast live from Symphony Hall Tuesday, March 24 at 8:30 p.m. on both WGBH-RV and FM.

Playing Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto the 20-year-old virtuoso will repeat a performance that earned him wide praise earlier this season.

To begin the full-length concert, music director Erich Leinsdorf has chosen Rossini's overture to "Il Signor Brushino." Also included are Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and excerpts from "Siegried" by Richard Wagner.

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 99,290 S. 103,160
MAR 1 8 1964

WONO-FM to Air Bernstein Work

The first hearing in this area of the Third Symphony by Leonard Bernstein, completed last year and entitled the "Kaddish" Symphony, played by the Boston Symphony, will be aired at 8 p.m. today on WONO-FM.

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony and New England Conservatory Chorus with Jeanne Tourel, mezzo-soprano. Also included on the same program are the Concerto Grosso by George Handel, and the Symphony C by Georges Bizet.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,236 SUN. 296,860
APR 4 1964

Featured FM Music

Wagner, Beethoven

Symphony Performs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf will present a concert of music by Wagner and Beethoven at 8:30 tonight on WBEN-FM. The first portion of the program will have the introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin" by Wagner and excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal." The orchestra will conclude with Bethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

Tomorrow evening at 7, WBFO-FM broadcasts "New Sounds in Choral Music" with Robert S. Beckwith, assistant professor of music and choral director at State University of Buffalo.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
APR 5 1964

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Symphony No. [illegible] Major by Beethoven, Violin Concerto No. 1 by Prokofiev, Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Schuller and the Waltz Sequence from Der Rosenkavalier by Strauss, on Saturday's broadcast at 8:28 p.m. on WPFM.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
MAR 19 1964

BSO on TV

The young American pianist Lorin Hollander makes his Channel 2 debut at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be broadcast live from Symphony Hall Tuesday, Mar. 24 at 8:30 pm on both WGBH-TV and FM.

Playing Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto the 20 year old virtuoso will repeat a performance that earned him wide praise earlier this season.

To begin the full-length concert, music director Erich Leinsdorf has chosen Rossini's overture to "Il Signor Bruschino". Also included are Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and excerpts from "Siegfried" by Wagner.

NEW YORK Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
APR 1 2 1964

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart stereo broadcast this Saturday night on WQXR's weekly concert heard at 8:07.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
APR 12 1964

258

Concert Features Singers From Harvard, Radcliffe

The famed Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will perform with the Boston Symphony at the Orchestra's final televised concert of the season Tuesday, April 14 at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2 and WGBH-FM.

Also featured will be organist Berj Zamkochian, a native Bostonian, graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music and frequent organ soloist with the Boston Symphony.

To open this full-length Symphony Hall concert Erich Leinsdorf has chosen the Te Deum of Haydn, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Then Mr. Zamkochian will be soloist in Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, followed by two tone poems of Richard Strauss: "Die Tageszeiten" and "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

The last two works are being presented in honor of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. The first, "Die Tageszeiten," or "Times of Day" was written for men's chorus and orchestra and will feature the Harvard Glee Club. "Also Sprach Zarathustra," based on the words of Nietzsche, is scored for orchestra alone.

With this concert Channel 2 will come to the end of its sixth consecutive season of live Boston Symphony telecasts, and its first year of concerts from Symphony Hall.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAY 10 1964

Violin Concerto By Ruth Posselt

Violinist Ruth Posselt will play the Violin Concerto by Paul Hindemith in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast in stereophonic sound by WCRB Thursday, May 14, beginning at 8:05 p.m.

Miss Posselt, who has performed many times as soloist with the Orchestra, first played this work with Serge Koussevitsky conducting the Boston Symphony just seven months after the concerto's premiere in 1940.

The Thursday broadcast, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will open with the Overture in C by Telemann, followed by the Hindemith, and close with the tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss. This concert is drawn from the recently-completed season of the Boston Symphony.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
MAY 1964

AIRWAVES

The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, has renewed its television contract with SEVEN ARTS ASSOCIATED in New York City, thus continuing to make its televised concerts available to commercial television stations throughout the world. . . . The award-winning NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS, with Leonard Bernstein conducting and narrating, have been renewed on the CBS Television Network for two years. . . . CBS TELEVISION will present the American premiere of Menotti's Martin's Lie, which has its world premiere in Bristol Cathedral, England.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932
MAY 22 1964

'War Requiem' On TV

The American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," given last July 27 at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony, will be re-broadcast from 7 to 8:30 May 30 over Channel 2.

Erich Leinsdorf leads the orchestra, choruses and soloists in the composition, an anti-war work written to dedicate England's Coventry Cathedral.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
SUN
D. 48,900
MAY 20 1964

Channel 18 Buys New Tapes Of Boston Symphony Concerts

KCHU-TV — Channel 18 has purchased the new series of taped concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for showing early in 1965, Walter P. Baker, the San Bernardino station's general manager, announced yesterday.

Baker completed arrangements with the Seven Arts distributing firm, from which he obtained the current series of the Chicago Symphony which will continue to be shown throughout the summer.

Conductor of the new Boston series is Erich Leinsdorf. The first Boston series, telecast on Channel 18 last fall and winter, was directed by Charles Munch, the orchestra's former musical director whom Leinsdorf has succeeded.

The first two concerts of the 1965 series will feature music from Wagner's "Parsifal," Strauss' "Don Quixote," Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on a Theme by Weber" and Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor, with Theodore Lettvin as soloist.

RADIO-TELEVISION DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D 14,000
MAY 26 1964

Kudos to KTTV

KTTV, Los Angeles, was acclaimed by NAFBRAT (National Association for Better Radio and TV) for running Seven Arts' series of Boston Symphony concerts. KTTV has acquired the two Seven Arts' series, a total of 26 Boston Symphony Concert Specials.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483
MAY 22 1964

'War Requiem' on TV

The American premiere performance of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem,' which was given last July 27 at Tanglewood by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with choruses and soloists, and televised by WGBH-TV, will be re-broadcast over Channel 2 on Memorial Day, May 30, from 7 to 8:30 p.m.

The "War Requiem," which was written as an anti-war declaration for the dedication of the new Coventry Cathedral in England, received a 20-minute ovation at its Tanglewood performance.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
MAY 31 1964

Boston Symphony Concerts Slated

Nine Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts recorded by WGBH in Symphony Hall during the winter will be presented Tuesdays at 8:30 pm by both Channel 2 and WGBH-FM beginning June 2.

Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the opening concert will feature Mindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber," Samuel Barber's First Symphony and Brahms 'Symphony No. 1, Op. 68.

The repeat broadcasts are a direct result of the many letters received by WGBH requesting that these Symphony Hall concerts be aired during the summer months.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (e)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
Circ. 15,352
JUN 4 1964

Boston Symphony On Channel 11

DURHAM—Next week Channel 11 will continue its broadcasts of winter concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Tuesday night programs will all start at 8:30 p.m. and appear on the following dates: June 9, 23, 30, July 7 and 14.

On June 16, WENH-TV will carry a live concert by the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. The program will be broadcast direct from Boston.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the summer season will include Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on themes by Carl Maria von Weber," Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1 Opus 9" and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

The concerts are productions of WGBH-TV in Boston, a Channel 11 affiliate in the Eastern Educational Network.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 194,795
MAY 31 1964

Good Music

UNDER the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber by Hindemith, Symphony No. 1 by Samuel Barber and Symphony No. 1 in C Minor by Brahms, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2. This is a repeat of the concert recorded in Symphony Hall, Boston, in October, 1963.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
Standard-Times
Sun. Circ. 55,328
JUN 14 1964

'Live' Boston Symphony Concerts Due

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, June 13 — The Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company will sponsor 52 weeks of Saturday night broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops Orchestras in stereophonic sound on radio station WCRB beginning today, according to announcement today by Theodore Jones, president and general manager of the station.

Broadcasts from Symphony Hall in Boston will be presented "live" in high fidelity stereophonic sound (FM stereo) and programs from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood by high fidelity stereo tape. All programs will be simulcast on WCRB-AM, as well as FM.

The series, which begins with today's concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting, marks the first time that "live" stereophonic broadcasts of the Boston Orchestras have been sponsored.

Presented from 8:25 to 10:30 p. m., most of the programs will be Boston Symphony concerts, beginning with the orchestra's programs at the Berkshire Festival in July.

William Pierce, long associated with broadcasts by these orchestras, will handle music commentary and announcements for the trust company.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, said he welcomed sponsorship of the orchestra's concerts on WCRB by Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
APR 12 1964

Concert Features Singers From Harvard, Radcliffe

The famed Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will perform with the Boston Symphony at the Orchestra's final television concert of the season Tuesday, April 14 at 8:30 p. m. on Channel 2 and WGBH-FM.

Also featured will be organist Berj Zamkochian, a native Bostonian, graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music and frequent organ soloist with the Boston Symphony.

To open this full-length Symphony Hall concert Erich Leinsdorf has chosen the Te Deum of Haydn, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Then Mr. Zamkochian will be soloist in Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, followed by two tone poems of Richard Strauss: "Die Tageszeiten" and "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

The last two works are being presented in honor of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. The first, "Die Tageszeiten," or "Times of Day" was written for men's chorus and orchestra and will feature the Harvard Glee Club. "Also Sprach Zarathustra," based on the epoch of Nietzsche, is scored for orchestra alone.

With this concert Channel 2 will come to the end of its sixth consecutive season of live Boston Symphony telecasts, and its first year of concerts from Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483
MAY 22 1964

'War Requiem' on TV

The American premiere performance of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," which was given last July 27 at Tanglewood by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with choruses and soloists, and televised by WGBH-TV, will be re-broadcast over Channel 2 on Memorial Day, May 30, from 7 to 8:30 p.m. The "War Requiem," which was written as an anti-war declaration for the dedication of the new Coventry Cathedral in England, received a 20-minute ovation at its Tanglewood performance.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAY 10 1964

Violin Concerto By Ruth Posselt

Violinist Ruth Posselt will play the Violin Concerto by Paul Hindemith in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast in stereophonic sound by WCRB Thursday, May 14, beginning at 8:05 p. m.

Miss Posselt, who has performed many times as soloist with the Orchestra, first played this work with Serge Koussevitsky conducting the Boston Symphony just seven months after the concerto's premiere in 1940.

The Thursday broadcast, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will open with the Overture in C by Telemann, followed by the Hindemith, and close with the tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss. This concert is drawn from the recently-completed season of the Boston Symphony.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
MAY 1964

AIRWAVES

The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, has renewed its television contract with SEVEN ARTS ASSOCIATED in New York City, thus continuing to make its televised concerts available to commercial television stations throughout the world. . . . The award-winning NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS, with Leonard Bernstein conducting and narrating, have been renewed on the CBS Television Network for two years. . . . CBS TELEVISION will present the American premiere of Menotti's Martin's Lie, which has its world premiere in Bristol Cathedral, England.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
MAY 31 1964

Boston Symphony Concerts Slated

Nine Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts recorded by WGBH in Symphony Hall during the winter will be presented Tuesdays at 8:30 pm by both Channel 2 and WGBH-FM beginning June 2.

Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the opening concert will feature Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber," Samuel Barber's First Symphony and Brahms' Symphony No. 1, Op. 68.

The repeat broadcasts are a direct result of the many letters received by WGBH requesting that these Symphony Hall concerts be aired during the summer months.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 194,795
MAY 31 1964

Good Music

UNDER the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber by Hindemith, Symphony No. 1 by Samuel Barber and Symphony No. 1 in C Minor by Brahms, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2. This is a repeat of the concert recorded in Symphony Hall, Boston, in October, 1963.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932
MAY 22 1964

'War Requiem' On TV

The American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," given last July 27 at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony, will be re-broadcast from 7 to 8:30 May 30 over Channel 2.

Erich Leinsdorf leads the orchestra, choruses and soloists in the composition, an anti-war work written to dedicate England's Coventry Cathedral.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (e)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
Circ. 15,352
JUN 4 1964

Boston Symphony On Channel 11

DURHAM—Next week Channel 11 will continue its broadcasts of winter concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Tuesday night programs will all start at 8:30 p.m. and appear on the following dates: June 9, 23, 30, July 7 and 14.

On June 16, WENH-TV will carry a live concert by the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. The program will be broadcast direct from Boston.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the summer season will include Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on themes by Carl Maria von Weber," Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1 Opus 9" and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

The concerts are productions of WGBH-TV in Boston, a Channel 11 affiliate in the Eastern Educational Network.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
Standard-Times
Sun. Circ. 55,328
JUN 14 1964

'Live' Boston Symphony Concerts Due

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, June 13 — The Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company will sponsor 52 weeks of Saturday night broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops Orchestras in stereophonic sound on radio station WCRB beginning today, according to announcement today by Theodore Jones, president and general manager of the station.

Broadcasts from Symphony Hall in Boston will be presented "live" in high fidelity stereophonic sound (FM stereo) and programs from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood by high fidelity stereo tape. All programs will be simulcast on WCRB-AM, as well as FM.

The series, which begins with today's concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting, marks the first time that "live" stereophonic broadcasts of the Boston Orchestras have been sponsored.

Presented from 8:25 to 10:30 p. m., most of the programs will be Boston Symphony concerts beginning with the orchestra's programs at the Berkshire Festival in July.

William Pierce, long associated with broadcasts by these orchestras, will handle music commentary and announcements for the trust company.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, said he welcomed sponsorship of the orchestra's concerts on WCRB by Boston Safe Deposit

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
SUN
D. 48,900
MAY 20 1964

Channel 18 Buys New Tapes Of Boston Symphony Concerts

KCHU-TV — Channel 18 has purchased the new series of taped concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for showing early in 1965, Walter P. Baker, the San Bernardino station's general manager, announced yesterday.

Baker completed arrangements with the Seven Arts distributing firm, from which he obtained the current series of the Chicago Symphony which will continue to be shown throughout the summer.

Conductor of the new Boston series is Erich Leinsdorf. The first Boston series, telecast on Channel 18 last fall and winter, was directed by Charles Munch, the orchestra's former musical director whom Leinsdorf has succeeded.

The first two concerts of the 1965 series will feature music from Wagner's "Parsifal," Strauss' "Don Quixote," Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on a Theme by Weber" and Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor, with Theodore Lettvin as soloist.

RADIO-TELEVISION DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 14,000
MAY 26 1964

Kudos to KTTV

KTTV, Los Angeles, was acclaimed by NAFBRAT (National Association for Better Radio and TV) for running Seven Arts' series of Boston Symphony concerts. KTTV has acquired the two Seven Arts' series, a total of 26 Boston Symphony Concert Specials.

RECORDS.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

JUN 6 1964

Erich, BSO Go Together Like Champagne, Caviar

NEW YORK — The recent awards of the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences (NARAS) focused particular attention on one company—RCA Victor—winner of 13 of the Grammy awards. In the classical division RCA received seven Grammys out of the 10 categories. Among these, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's recording of Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra" was named best classical performance by an orchestra, and Erich Leinsdorf received the award for the best opera recording (conductor's award) for Puccini's "Madame Butterfly."

This winning three-way combination should perhaps be increased to a foursome: Symphony Hall in Boston, which has contributed much to the success of the recordings. Considered one of the finest houses, acoustically, in the world, it is the site of most of the recordings.

RCA and BSO

The association of orchestra and recording company dates back to 1917, when in September of that year, the Boston Symphony journeyed to Camden, N. J., to make its first record. The affiliation has lasted without interruption to this day.

Under some of the finest conductors of the 20th century—Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzsky, Charles Munch—the BSO has become one of the most highly esteemed orchestral bodies in the world and has earned its title, "The Aristocrat of Orchestras."

In 1962, into this patrician circle came Erich Leinsdorf, a conductor in search of an orchestra and to an orchestra in need of a conductor to carry on its tradition.

Leinsdorf has completed his second season with the BSO and there are few who would argue the choice was not a happy one.

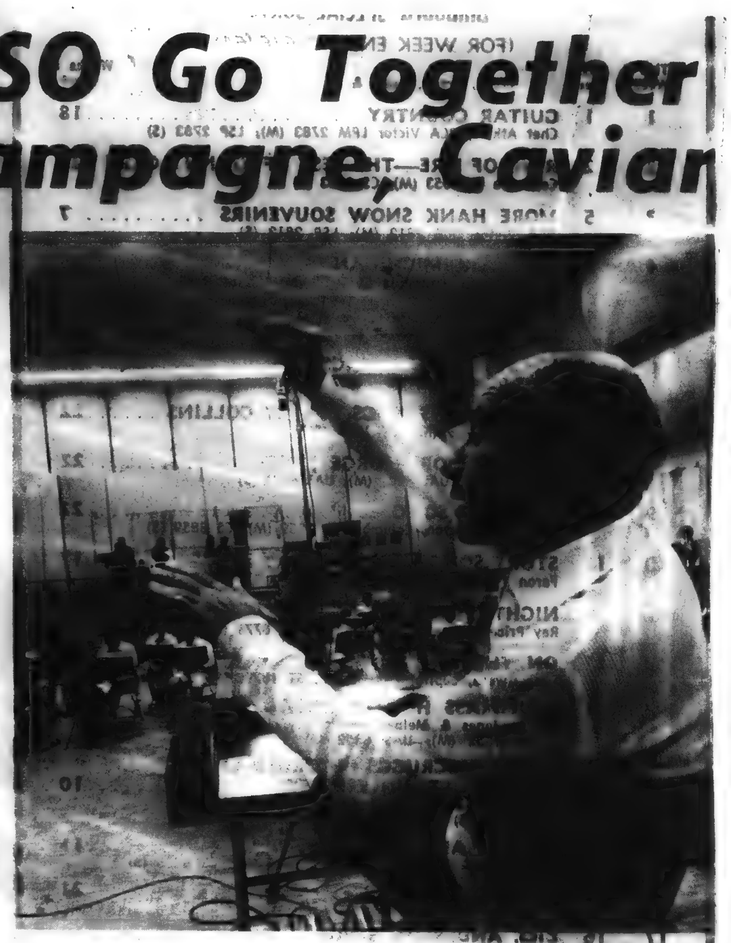
Man and Mind

The repertory of the BSO under Leinsdorf is extensive, encompassing works of the Romantic, classical and contemporary periods. "A listener can have favorites," he says, "but the performer cannot. He is an intellectual musician; he conceives of music as a whole, a unity with a strong line, connecting beginning, middle and end. He never allows emotionalism or sentimentality to distort a musical idea. His taste is more for the grand rather than the exhibitionist. Criticism has been voiced in the past for this dedication to the structure of a piece, at what some consider the expense of the song.

For many years Leinsdorf was characterized as a man with a short temper and little patience. He admits to having a low tolerance for the second-rate. Of late there has been a change in him, a mellowing, perhaps because now he works only with the first-rate.

Early Years

Born in Vienna in 1912, he made his official debut as a conductor in that city at the age of 21. The next year he was assistant to Bruno Walter at the Salzburg Festival and occupied the same position with Arturo Toscanini from 1935 to 1937. Unable to accept the impending European situation,



ERICH LEINSDORF

Leinsdorf came to the U. S. At 26 he was conducting at the Metropolitan Opera where he remained until 1943 when he was appointed musical director of the Cleveland Orchestra. Since then he has been conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, the New York City Opera and from 1957 to 1962 he was associated with the Philharmonic as consultant and guest conductor.

Musician of the Year

Leinsdorf is recognized as one of the foremost conductors of opera house and on recordings. In addition to this year's NARAS Award, he has been twice before honored by the Academy—in 1959 for Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and in 1960 for Puccini's "Turandot," both on RCA Victor. He has also been named "Musician of the Year" (1963) in a poll of the nation's critics and editors taken by "Musical America."

A further opera recording assignment for Leinsdorf and the BSO is Wagner's "Lohengrin" with Leontyne Price (her first Wagnerian role), Sandor Konya and Jerome Hines. This represents the first time in years that an opera has been recorded in the U. S. Other scheduled recordings are Menotti's cantata, "Death of the Bishop of Brandisi"; Verdi's "Requiem" with Birgit Nilsson and further issues of the Prokofiev series.

It seems evident that the requirements of both orchestra and conductor have been satisfied.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAY 16 1964

BEST SELLING CLASSICAL LP'S

Below is a list of best selling Classical LP's, by category, in top Classical Retail Outlets. Four categories will receive a periodic coverage. The categories are: Opera, Vocal and Choral; Solo Instrumental and Concerti; Orchestral and Chamber Music.

ORCHESTRAL

This Week

1. PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, Op. 100; Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf): RCA Victor LM 2707 (M); LSC 2707 (S).
2. BEETHOVEN: Symphonies (9) (complete); Berlin Philharmonic Orch. (Karajan): Deutsche Grammophon (8-12") KL 1/8 (M); SKL 101/8 (S).
3. MOZART: Symphonies No. 40 and 38 in G, K. 550; Columbia Symphony Orch. (Walter): Columbia ML 5894 (M); MS 6494 (S).
4. HINDEMITH: Mathis der Maler/Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber; Philadelphia Orch. (Ormandy): Columbia ML 5962 (M); MS 6562 (S).
5. TCHAIKOVSKY: "1812" Overture, Op. 49; Minneapolis Symphony Orch. (Dorati): Mercury 50292 (M); 90292 (S).
6. TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 4 in F, Op. 36; Pittsburgh Symphony Orch. (Steinberg): Command CC 33-11021 (M); CC 11021/SD (S).
7. BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 6 in F, "Pastorale," Op. 68; Chicago Symphony Orch. (Reiner): RCA Victor LM-2714 (M); LSC-2614 (S).
8. TCHAIKOVSKY: Swan Lake Ballet (excerpts): Boston Pops (Fiedler): RCA Victor LM-2688 (M); LSC-2688 (S).
9. BEETHOVEN: Symphonies (9) (complete): London Symphony Orch. (Krips): Everest (8-12") 6065 (M); 3065 (S).
10. STRAUSS: Also Sprach Zarathustra, Op. 30; Philadelphia Orch. (Ormandy): Columbia ML 5947 (M); MS 6547 (S).

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 4 1964

Victor To Issue 2-LP Set Of Mahler's 5th, Berg's Wozzeck

NEW YORK—RCA Victor Records has announced plans for the early release of a two-pocket set to include Mahler's 5th Symphony in C Sharp minor and excerpts from Berg's opera "Wozzeck," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The opera excerpt will feature soprano Phyllis Curtin and a boys' choir.

Roger Hall, manager of Red Seal A&R for Victor said that a new issue of the Mahler symphony recorded in the Dynagroove process, along with another newly recorded work would be of special interest to the disk-buying public.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 18 1964

Victor Premiere LP For Menotti's Cantata

NEW YORK—RCA Records has announced plans to record a Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Gian-Carlo Menotti's new cantata, "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" next fall.

Erich Leinsdorf will direct the orchestra, the Chorus Pro Musica and soloists George London, baritone, and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

The work was given its world premiere in Cincinnati last year.

The 30-minute composition tells the story of a crusade during the 13th century known as the "Children's Crusade," during which disaster strikes a ship carrying children to the Holy Land wars. The children had been blessed by the Bishop of Brindisi, and the drama unfolds in the form of a flashback to the event by the Bishop, now dying and troubled by a sense of guilt.

The work will be coupled on the LP with a recording of Schonberg's "Wood Dove Scene" from Gurre Lieder, also with Lili Chookasian as the soloist.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 4 1964

Victor To Cut Hollander With Boston Symphony

NEW YORK—RCA Victor Records has announced that American piano virtuoso Lorin Hollander has recorded the Prokofieff 5th Piano Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the latest in a series of Prokofieff recordings by the label.

The disk marks Hollander's second appearance on records with the Boston Symphony, the first having been a disking of Norman Dello Joio's "Fantasia and Variations" coupled with Ravel's "Concerto in G."

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
6 TI. a YR. 41,600

JAN 1964

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, Boston, Massachusetts, has won the award for the best classical performance of 1962. The award, presented annually by the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences, was made to the Conservatory Chorus for its RCA Victor recording of Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet. The award-winning performance was recorded with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. The Conservatory Chorus is directed by Lorna Cooke deVaron.

260

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

DEC 28 1963

Boston Symphony Reaps In More Awards for RCA Victor

NEW YORK — RCA Victor Records, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the orchestra's current and former conductors, Erich Leinsdorf and Charles Munch, have recently distinguished themselves and each other by the receipt of several highly regarded industry achievement awards.

Erich Leinsdorf, who assumed the post of musical director of the B.S.O. last season 1962-1963, was just named "Musician of the Year" for 1963 by the magazine Musical America. The selection of Leinsdorf was determined through a poll of the nation's music crities and editors. As "Musician of the Year" he will appear on the cover of the January edition of the magazine and will be subject of a major article in that issue.

Meanwhile the RCA Victor recording of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" has been awarded the coveted "Prix du President de la Republique." The company was notified of the award last week by the Academie du Disque Francaise. This marks the second award for this album. It also won the "Grand Prix des Discophiles 1963." This album was released in September, 1962, in the RCA Victor Soria Series, performed by Munch and the B.S.O., with soloists Rosalind Elias, Cesare Valleti and Giorgio Tozzi.

Leinsdorf, who succeeded Munch at the Boston Symphony, was also recipient of the Grand Prix National du Disque 1963 for his RCA Victor recording of "Die Walkure," which starred Birgit Nilsson and Jon Vickers.

Since his assumption to the Boston post, Leinsdorf has been distinguished by several "firsts." He conducted the "Madame Butterfly" of Leontyne Price, which became the first opera to become a best seller on the "pop" charts. His recording of the Mahler First Symphony with the Boston was also the first Mahler symphony to appear on the popular best selling chart.

In the past year RCA Victor has issued seven albums of Leinsdorf with the Boston. In January Victor will release his eight recorded collaboration with them in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

Profile of Erich Leinsdorf, "Musician of the Year"

SAN JOSE, CALIF.
NEWS
D: 58,499

NOV 29 1963

Holiday Music

Boston Symphony's Six Great Works Tops In

By MARTA MORGAN
Mercury-News Fine Arts Editor

If there were sweepstakes among recordings of symphonic music during 1963, the Boston Symphony would have won by a mile. This venerable musical organization has always been one of the nation's finest and proclaims itself "the aristocrat of orchestras" with justifiable pride.

This has been particularly true since Erich Leinsdorf took over the helm of the instrumentalists in the fall of 1962. A dynamic personality and firm disciplinarian, he has injected the orchestra with a new tonal transparency and an extraordinary cohesion, which are a credit to his tremendous abilities as a musician and a conductor, and to the top-notch virtuoso players who make up the Boston Symphony.

BARTOK — Concerto for Orchestra — (RCA Victor LM-LSC-2643; also available in stereo tape and mono hi-fi).

For his disc debut as director of the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf chose this brilliant contemporary orchestral score, which demands the utmost of both conductor and orchestra. The release is an absolute spellbinder and provides a full-scale musical experience coupled with radiant sound.

STRAUSS — "A Hero's Life" — (RCA Victor LM-LSC-2641).

Even more impressive is this huge and sprawling tone-poem which, one suspects, will stand as a monument of sonic splendor. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony go to great pains to avoid both the turgid sound and febrile theatricality often foisted on Richard Strauss' scores. Instead they emphasize clarity and tonal opulence. Although there are a number of excellent recorded versions available, this is unquestionably the definitive interpretation and serves as a touchstone for RCA Victor's new dynagroove phonographic system.

BEETHOVEN — Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") in E flat major (LSC-2644).

Leinsdorf has called this symphony "a statement of my convictions" as well as "among the three or four greatest masterpieces of the classic repertoire." His interpretation of the work is a simultaneous LP and tape, and was recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall after a two hour experimental session aimed at capturing on record a large, rich sound with maximum linear lucidity, sharply etched instrumental detail and a warm strong tone.

MAHLER — Symphony No. 1 in D major (LSC-2642).

The orchestral dynamics of this work, its scoring and the excitement of its musical mood make it an ideal showpiece for RCA's dynagroove recording process. Erich Leinsdorf's reading of the work can be summed up as an electrifying performance. Rarely has this score been given so articulate a presentation and seldom has the Boston Symphony sounded in better form. Furthermore, the stormy finale provides an acid test of the inner-groove distortion-free qualities of the dynagroove process, and the results are wholly admirable.

RAVEL—"Bolero," coupled with the same composer's choreographic tone-poem "La Valse" and "Pavan for a Dead Princess." (RCA Victor LM-2664).

Again the Boston Symphony is featured, but the director is Charles Munch, former director of the orchestra and one of the foremost interpreters of French music alive. His versions are elegant, sophisticated and altogether right and the sound is magnificent.

COSMOPOLITAN
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 885,482

NOV 1963

ERICH LEINSDORF. Hailed as a conductor of "vision and vitality," Leinsdorf has displayed both, throughout an extremely demanding career. Born in Vienna in 1912, he made his musical debut there at the age of eight in a children's orchestra performance. His debut as a conductor which, he says, "was something I slid into," came when he was twenty-one. At twenty-two he became assistant conductor under Bruno Walter at the Salzburg Festival, and during the succeeding three years held the same post under Toscanini.

The Metropolitan Opera gave him his first American post when it engaged him as assistant conductor in 1937. Within two years he became principal conductor for German operas, a position he held for four seasons. During the years between 1943 and 1962, he held music directorships of the Cleveland Orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic and the New York City Opera, and did additional conducting at the Metropolitan where he was named music consultant by Rudolf Bing. In 1962 he took over from Charles Munch as permanent conductor for the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Leinsdorf has a wife and five children, aged ten to twenty years, and lives near Boston.

The Saturday Review 1962 critic poll listed Leinsdorf's recording of Die Walküre as the top operatic record of the year. He has also recorded Puccini's Turandot and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. On one of his latest recordings, in RCA Victor's new Dynagroove process, he conducts the Boston Symphony in Mahler's powerful Symphony No. 1.

Erich Leinsdorf: Munch's successor.

260

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

DEC 2 8 1963

RECORDS.

Boston Symphony Reaps In More Awards for RCA Victor

NEW YORK — RCA Victor Records, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the orchestra's current and former conductors, Erich Leinsdorf and Charles Munch, have recently distinguished themselves and each other by the receipt of several highly regarded industry achievement awards.

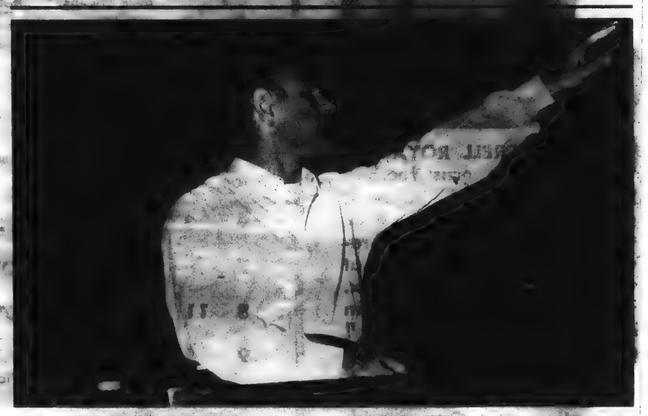
Erich Leinsdorf, who assumed the post of musical director of the B.S.O. last season 1962-1963, was just named "Musician of the Year" for 1963 by the magazine Musical America. The selection of Leinsdorf was determined through a poll of the nation's music critics and editors. As "Musician of the Year" he will appear on the cover of the January edition of the magazine and will be subject of a major article in that issue.

Meanwhile the RCA Victor recording of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" has been awarded the coveted "Prix du President de la Republique." The company was notified of the award last week by the Academie du Disque Francaise. This marks the second award for this album. It also won the "Grand Prix des Discophiles 1963." This album was released in September, 1962, in the RCA Victor Soria Series, performed by Munch and the B.S.O., with soloists Rosalind Elias, Cesare Valleti and Giorgio Tozzi.

Leinsdorf, who succeeded Munch at the Boston Symphony, was also recipient of the Grand Prix National du Disque 1963 for his RCA Victor recording of "Die Walkure," which starred Birgit Nilsson and Jon Vickers.

Since his assumption to the Boston post, Leinsdorf has been distinguished by several "firsts." He conducted the "Madame Butterfly" of Leontyne Price, which became the first opera to become a best seller on the "pop" charts. His recording of the Mahler First Symphony with the Boston was also the first Mahler symphony to appear on the popular best selling chart.

In the past year RCA Victor has issued seven albums of Leinsdorf with the Boston. In January Victor will release his eight recorded collaboration with them in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."



Profile of Erich Leinsdorf, "Musician of the Year"

SAN JOSE, CALIF.
NEWS
D: 58,498

NOV 29 1963

Holiday Music

Boston Symphony's Six Great Works Tops In

By MARTY MORGAN
Mercury-News Music Critic

If there were sweepstakes among recordings of symphonic music during 1963, the Boston Symphony would have won by a mile. This venerable musical organization has always been one of the nation's finest and proclaims itself "the aristocrat of orchestras" with justifiable pride.

This has been particularly true since Erich Leinsdorf took over the helm of the instrumentalists in the fall of 1962. A dynamic personality and firm disciplinarian, he has injected the orchestra with a new tonal transparency and an extraordinary cohesion, which are a credit to his tremendous abilities as a musician and a conductor, and to the top-notch virtuoso players who make up the Boston Symphony.

BARTOK — Concerto for Orchestra — (RCA Victor LM-LSC-2643; also available in stereo tape and mono hi-fi).

For his disc debut as director of the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf chose this brilliant contemporary orchestral score, which demands the utmost of both conductor and orchestra. The release is an absolute spellbinder and provides a full-scale musical experience coupled with radiant sound.

STRAUSS — "A Hero's Life" — (RCA Victor LM-LSC-2641).

Even more impressive is this huge and sprawling tone-poem which, one suspects, will stand as a monument of sonic splendor. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony go to great pains to avoid both the turgid sound and febrile theatricality often foisted on Richard Strauss' scores. Instead they emphasize clarity and tonal opulence. Although there are a number of excellent recorded versions available, this is unquestionably the definitive interpretation and serves as a touchstone for RCA Victor's new dynagroove phonographic system.

BEETHOVEN — Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") in E flat major (LSC-2644).

Leinsdorf has called this symphony "a statement of my convictions" as well as "among the three or four greatest masterpieces of the classic repertoire." His interpretation of the work is a simultaneous LP and tape, and was recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall after a two hour experimental session aimed at capturing on record a large, rich sound with maximum linear lucidity, sharply etched instrumental detail and a warm strong tone.

MAHLER — Symphony No. 1 in D major (LSC-2642).

The orchestral dynamics of this work, its scoring and the excitement of its musical mood make it an ideal showpiece for RCA's dynagroove recording process. Erich Leinsdorf's reading of the work can be summed up as an electrifying performance. Rarely has this score been given so articulate a presentation and seldom has the Boston Symphony sounded in better form. Furthermore, the stormy finale provides an acid test of the inner-groove distortion-free qualities of the dynagroove process, and the results are wholly admirable.

RAVEL — "Bolero," coupled with the same composer's choreographic tone-poem "La Valse" and "Pavan for a Dead Princess." (RCA Victor LM-2664).

Again the Boston Symphony is featured, but the director is Charles Munch, former director of the orchestra and one of the foremost interpreters of French music alive. His versions are elegant, sophisticated and altogether right and the sound is magnificent.

COSMOPOLITAN
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 885,482

NOV 1963

ERICH LEINSDORF. Hailed as conductor of "vision and vitality," Leinsdorf has displayed both, throughout his extremely demanding career. Born in Vienna in 1912, he made his musical debut there at the age of eight in a children's orchestra performance. His debut as a conductor, which, he says, "was something I sort into," came when he was twenty-one. At twenty-two he became assistant conductor under Bruno Walter at the Salzburg Festival, and during the succeeding three years held the same post under Toscanini.

The Metropolitan Opera gave him his first American post when it engaged him as assistant conductor in 1937. Within two years he became principal conductor for German operas, a position he held for four seasons. During the years between 1943 and 1962 he held music directorships of the Cleveland Orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic and the New York City Opera, and did additional conducting at the Metropolitan where he was named music consultant by Rudolf Bing. In 1962 he took over from Charles Munch as permanent conductor for the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Leinsdorf has a wife and five children, aged ten to twenty years, and lives near Boston.

The Saturday Review 1962 critic poll listed Leinsdorf's recording of Die Walküre as the top operatic record of the year. He has also recorded Puccini's Turandot and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. On one of his latest recordings, in RCA Victor's new Dynagroove process, he conducts the Boston Symphony in Mahler's powerful Symphony No. 1.

Erich Leinsdorf: Munch's successor.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 25 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JAN 23 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
JAN 22 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N.Y.
Circ. 681,612
JAN 21 1964

MIDWEST NEWSCLIP, INC.
Box 1359, Chicago 90, WEbster 9-5497
Tribune
Chicago, Ill.
Morning Circ. 907,570
FEB 6 1964
MUSIC VENDOR
NEWARK, N. J.
W. 6,600

JAN 25 1964
New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

JAN 23 1964
Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 839,581 S. 1,143,546

FEB 6 1964
The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
JAN 22 1964

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

FEB 23 1964
The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

JAN 21 1964
Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 218,345 S. 654,561

FEB 2 1964

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JAN 25 1964

Victor & Boston Symphony Start Proj... On Prokofieff Works

GEORGE MAREK & ERICH LEINSDORF

NEW YORK — RCA Victor Records and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have started a long-range major recording program of all the major orchestral works of the late Sergei Prokofieff.

Announcement was made last week by George R. Marek, vice president and general manager of Victor, and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony.

"This is a project which excites the musical imagination and pays tribute to one of the towering musical voices of the twentieth century," Marek said. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, so closely identified through the years with the composer and as a champion of his music in this country, is the ideal, perhaps only musical body, superbly equipped by past association, for this project."

Leinsdorf outlined the program as follows:

"The purpose of the Prokofieff cycle as presently being undertaken by RCA Victor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to bring to the record-collecting public within a short number of years, the enduring scores of Prokofieff performed by the same orchestra in the same hall, and recorded by the same company, thereby manifesting a unity in the cycle which would otherwise be impossible."

The first four works chosen for the project—The Fifth Symphony, First Violin Concerto, Fifth Piano Concerto and Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, opus 125—were initially performed in the U.S. by the Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony became Prokofieff's principal American champion, particularly during the era of the late Serge Koussevitzky. The orchestra gave American premieres to 12 Prokofieff compositions and the world premiere of his Fourth Symphony. Moreover, Prokofieff was guest conductor on one occasion and a piano soloist on five occasions. During those concerts, he performed American premieres for two of his five piano concertos.

The Boston programs in Symphony Hall list some 80 performances of about 25 of Prokofieff's works beginning in 1922. In addition there have been numerous performances at Tanglewood and elsewhere.

In addition to the Feb. release of the Fifth Symphony, other recordings in the immediate future will be of the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra opus 125, with Samuel Mayes as soloist. This work was given its American premiere by the Bostonians in 1940 under the title of Cello Concerto No. 1 with orchestra. It subsequently was revised by the composer and later was given its present title. Releases of the Violin Concerto No. 1 with Erick Friedman as the violin soloist, and the Fifth Piano Concerto with Lorin Hollander as the pianist, will follow.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
MAR 8 1964

WHAT NOT TO RECORD IN A PROKOFIEV CYCLE

By ERICH LEINSDORF

(The author is musical director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

IT seems only right for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to embark on a recorded cycle of the works of Serge Prokofiev. For in the years 1925 to 1937, the orchestra participated in the United States premieres of nine major works of the Russian master. Among these were the First Violin Concerto, the Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges," the Suite from "Pas d'Acier," the Second Piano Concerto, the the Fifth Piano Concerto, Suite from "The Gambler," "Lieutenant Kijé" and the Second Violin Concerto.

In 1930, the Boston Symphony played the world premiere of the Fourth Symphony, especially commissioned for its 50th anniversary. It is evident that our orchestra has been an important force in introducing Prokofiev's works to United States audiences.

When we decided to record this extensive Prokofiev cycle, the question was immediately raised: would this be a complete Prokofiev? — would we follow the present trend of completeness in recording? The answer was obvious — a resounding No. In our Western economy, this would be technically and economically impossible. Early in the planning, before our Prokofiev cycle at Tanglewood last summer, it was decided that our recording project would be a broad, yet critical, edition and selection of the composer's works.

Prokofiev composed for more than 50 years, amassing some 130 works, including seven symphonies, eight operas, seven ballets, seven vocal-orchestral works, nine instrumental concertos, along with the many sonatas, songs, choruses, music for the theater and films and chamber music. Though the sheer number of works at first appears formidable, the task of choosing those for recording has not been so impossible as it may seem.

Arturo Toscanini once said that no one is a genius 24 hours a day. This was certainly true of Prokofiev, as it was with the creative lives of many other composers, including Beethoven and Haydn. The fact remains that there is a greatly varying character and quality in Prokofiev's works, and that surrounding the impressive heights of his greatest compositions is much that is worth only a passing glance.

Prokofiev was one of the most important musical figures of the 20th century, coming out of certain traditions and creating a distinctive modern musical language. Recordings of his works have been sporadic and of varying quality in performance and sound. We are hoping that our project will be a worthy document of Prokofiev's creative life, of the significant aspects of his wide-ranging career, produced more than 10 years after his death.

Though the level of Prokofiev's genius varied considerably from year to year and from work to work, it is also evident that his genius was shown in every form he used — and he composed in almost all forms of music. The best scores arrived on the musical scene sounding fresh and original, and they still sound that way today — and, I think, will sound that way many years hence.

Perhaps this is because Prokofiev was always an individual. While impressionism, futurism, atonalism, late romanticism and the rest of the musical movements evolved, he remained generally unresponsive to them, though he was always aware of and often flirted briefly with novelty. His great achievement of a perfectly unified and original contemporary style of music, forming a synthesis of 18th and 19th-century tradition, should remain his distinctive contribution.

The three general areas in which he left his most appealing scores are for the theater, for the piano and for the orchestra. Though these three areas are tightly wound up with one another because of Prokofiev's experimentation in one for use in another, there do exist peaks of his genius in each.

Vocal Style

Contrary to the view held by a very persuasive British critic, who recently said that Prokofiev's operas were his most important works, I do not feel that his vocal writing had the specific distinction that is crucial for an opera composer. Unlike Wagner or Strauss, who did have a particular vocal style of writing, Prokofiev's melodic invention depends on the twisting of harmony and textures of which he is a master. But this is more effective in instrumental writing. So, in his operas — ranging from "The Gambler" to "War and Peace" — we have an instrumentally conceived vocal line over a finely evolved orchestral fabric.

One of the high spots of Prokofiev's invention is his ballet music. Here we find the same color as in his best non-programmatic orchestral works, piano concertos and sonatas. The "Romeo and Juliet" story is captured with a genius for the essence of Shakespeare. I have conducted suites of 14 scenes, but all of the concert suites use a different orchestration from the original ballet score. One long-playing record in this cycle will be my own suite from the "Romeo" ballet in the original scoring, including the six horns and the gavotte that we know from the Classical Symphony (though in different garb).

Last Period

Many of Prokofiev's great works were written in his last, "Soviet" period (1934-53) — "Romeo and Juliet," "Alexander Nevsky," the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies and the late piano sonatas. No longer was he compelled to rebel either against academic conservatory methods or the strong influences of the experimentalists, either domestic or foreign. And while he was under party pressure for an understandable musical language for the people, he was sufficiently tied to his Russian heritage and the 19th-century traditions never to lose his identity.

The classical 18th-century forms and straightforward logic; the relentless dynamism and elements of the primitive and grotesque; the compactness and urgency; the restrained lyricism and youthful optimism; the mockery and laughter; the daring harmonies and rhythmic innovations, the revitalized orchestral expressiveness with the juxtaposition of the simple and the complex — these are the components of his life's opus. Prokofiev was a man of imagination and innovation with an awareness of his past.

He often combined these seemingly disparate elements into one composition, resulting in a dramatic and exciting musical statement which possessed a style of originality and individuality. It is these works in which his unique methods worked to the best effect that we will try to capture and preserve in our recorded Prokofiev cycle for RCA Victor.

SUBJECT—The late Serge Prokofiev, whose music is being recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2075, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 4 1964

Musical Chairs

Leinsdorf Recordings; Fiedler in New York

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Erich Leinsdorf has announced some of his current recording plans with RCA Victor. The big Prokofiev project continues. Lorin Hollander has recorded the Fifth Piano Concerto, and Erick Friedman will do the First Violin Concerto after he plays it here next week.

For next season Leinsdorf plans two sides worth of music from "Romeo and Juliet," not the standard suites, which he suspects have been reorchestrated by another hand, but excerpts he will choose from the original full ballet score. Van Cliburn will contribute the First and Second Piano Concertos.

Leinsdorf plans to record the Verdi Requiem. For that he will use the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson director, and the soloists will be Birgit Nilsson, Lili Chookasian, Carlo Bergonzi and Ezio Flagello. Miss Chookasian will be involved in another pair of projects, Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," with Jerome Hines, and the Song of the Wood-dove from Schoenberg's "Gurrelieder."

Mahler's Fifth Symphony was recorded earlier in the season, and will be issued in the Fall with the concert excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" on the fourth side. As a counterpart to the album, next season Leinsdorf will be recording the Mahler Sixth, and the filler will be Berg's concert aria "Der Wein." Phyllis Curtin is the soprano soloist in both Berg pieces.

Berg's aria is most familiar as a setting of Stefan George's German translation of Baudelaire's poem, but there is also a version to accommodate the French original. That is the one Curtin and Leinsdorf will do, which really makes it "Le Vin" rather than "Der Wein."

The biggest surprise was the announcement that the complete Wagner "Lohengrin" will be performed at Tanglewood in 1965 and then recorded. The cast includes Leontyne Price Rita Gorr and Jerome Hines It is hoped that the French baritone Ernest Blanc will be available for Telramund; the herald is yet to be found.

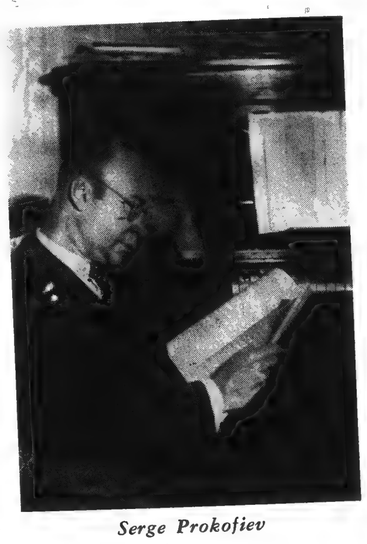
Leinsdorf made the announcement at a lunch given in his honor by RCA Victor in New York on Thursday. Since he himself chose the locale and, largely, the menu, the occasion is worth mentioning here. It happened at The Colony, chosen because Leinsdorf says it has the best "bollito" in town. A "bollito misto" of boiled beef, chicken, cotechino, and veal knuckle, accompanied by various vegetables and an endive and beet salad, was the central event. It was preceded by smoked fillet of trout and salmon; dessert was beignets with zabaione. The wine was a 1961 Beaujolais. First class program building, Maestro!

Lewisohn Stadium

It has been announced that Arthur Fiedler will conduct at New York's Lewisohn Stadium for the first time this Summer. He will be there twice. On July 2, he will lead a mixed program, yet to be made up. Then as a special Fourth of July celebration, he will conduct an all-Gershwin program, to include Robert Russell Bennet's Symphonic Picture "Porggy and Bess," "An American in Paris," "Strike up the Band," and the Piano Concerto and "Rhapsody in Blue," both with Earl Wild as soloist.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

MAY 1964



Serge Prokofiev

Prokofiev from Boston—
A New Series Launched

by Alan Rich

IT IS ALTOGETHER APPROPRIATE that the Boston Symphony should launch a project to record the entire orchestral output of Serge Prokofiev. The composer and this orchestra have been linked ever since the halcyon days of Serge Koussevitzky, and in fact it was under this conductor's baton that many of Prokofiev's major works were introduced to this country and later recorded. Prokofiev himself led the BSO many times, and composed his Fourth Symphony for its fiftieth anniversary in 1930.

Koussevitzky's recordings of Prokofiev set a standard that is still seldom equaled. A microgroove reissue of his marvelously witty version of the Lieutenant Kije music would be a treasure today, as would his first (c. 1928) gossamer performance of the Classical Symphony. (While his second, 1947, recorded performance of this work is available on the Boston Symphony souvenir disc issued by Victor a year or so ago, it is sluggish by comparison with that earlier version.) But Koussevitzky was an individualistic interpreter, perhaps the greatest one of our century, building his reading of any piece, whether by Prokofiev or Bach, out of a series of spontaneous decisions. His failures, naturally, were many and abject, and they occurred even in music he deeply loved and chose to champion. For all the lapidary perfection of his Classical, Kije, or Peter and the Wolf, his command of the long line failed him in other works of Prokofiev, in the G minor Violin Concerto and especially in the Fifth Symphony.

This latter is Prokofiev's supreme masterwork, emotionally intense and moving. In a sense, it is also a synthesis of his stylistic journey, rational and clearheaded in its organization in a manner reminiscent of his early compositions, icily witty and sardonic like the pieces of the '20s, and revealing the power of personal involvement which the composer acquired relatively late in life. It unfolds with a luxuriance that is deceptive; it actually contains not a wasted note. While many of these elements were beyond Koussevitzky's sphere of interest, they fully engage Leinsdorf, who combines the best in his celebrated predecessor's manner with the sense of logic that the Russian conductor seemed to lack. If the projected Prokofiev series continues on the level of this present Fifth Symphony, it will indeed be a landmark in phonographic history.

Leinsdorf's success with the symphony is not the principal work on this recording, Prokofieff's "Symphony-Concerto" for Cello and Orchestra, but the little gem that fills out the second side, Fauré's "Elégie," Op. 24, that brings into play the best features of cellist Samuel Mayes and the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor (RCA Victor LSC-2703). Fauré wrote it in 1830 with a piano accompaniment which he later arranged for orchestra. Mr. Hayes, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony, treats it gently, letting its remote and melancholy themes float peacefully.

This recording is part of Boston's project to record the principal works of Prokofieff. The "Symphony-Concerto," Op. 125, had not been recorded previously, either in its original 1938 form or in its revised 1950 version, the one used here. One is struck by the simplicity of materials and scoring in the revised version, but not by their appeal. It seems that Prokofieff's powers to make his grotesquerie convincing waned in his later years, and this piece seems to offer not one tenth the beauty which some far more dissonant works offer. The one nice thing which pervades the generally arid climate, a dark Russian sadness, does not get sufficient emphasis in the performance. Mr. Mayes handles the grateful cello writing nicely without making any startling or original contributions. C S S

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY 1964

An Arid Climate

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

JAN 25 1964

BOSTON—RCA Victor Records Division Vice-President and General Manager George Marek and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced last week that they are inaugurating an unusual project of recordings. The program will involve recording all the major orchestral works of the master Russian composer Sergei Prokofiev (1891-1953). The first of the series is scheduled for February release; namely, the Fifth Symphony.

Leinsdorf noted that "the purpose of the Prokofiev cycle as presently being undertaken . . . is to bring to the record-collecting public, within a short number of years, the enduring scores of Prokofiev, performed by the same orchestra in the same hall, and recorded by the same company, thereby manifesting a unity in the cycle which could otherwise by impossible."

The choice of the Boston Symphony for this project is no mere accident. For many years the Boston has been one of the principal champions of Prokofiev's music—particularly during the era of the late Serge Koussevitzky. Under his direction, the orchestra gave the American premiere to some dozen Prokofiev compositions, as well as the world premiere of his Fourth Symphony.

Also, Prokofiev himself was a frequent visitor to Boston. He appeared with the Symphony as piano soloist on five occasions (twice these appearances accounted for American premieres for two of his five piano concertos) and at another time he was guest conductor.

Since 1922, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given more than 80 performances of some 25 Prokofiev works at Symphony Hall (this does not include numerous other performances at Tanglewood and elsewhere).

George Marek spoke of this undertaking as "a project which excites the musical imagination and pays tribute to one of the towering musical voices of the 20th century. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, so closely identified through the years with the composer and as a champion of his music in this country, is the ideal, perhaps only musical body, superbly equipped by past association, for this project."

Releases already scheduled to follow February's "Fifth Symphony" include the "Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, Op. 125," which features Samuel Mayes (a work given its American premiere by the Bostonians in 1940, later revised by the composer); the "Violin Concerto No. 1," with Erick Friedman and the "Piano Concerto No. 5," with Young Lorin Hollander as pianist. All four of these works were initially performed in the U. S. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PLAYBACK ON "FIRST" OF A SERIES: Erich Leinsdorf (right) and George R. Marek listen carefully to playback of Prokofiev's "Fifth Symphony" in Boston. This will be the first in a series of Prokofiev orchestral masterworks to be released by RCA Victor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 4 1964

Musical Chairs

Leinsdorf Recordings; Fiedler in New York

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Erich Leinsdorf has announced some of his current recording plans with RCA Victor. The big Prokofiev project continues. Lorin Hollander has recorded the Fifth Piano Concerto, and Erick Friedman will do the First Violin Concerto after he plays it here next week.

For next season Leinsdorf plans two sides worth of music from "Romeo and Juliet," not the standard suites, which he suspects have been reorchestrated by another hand, but excerpts he will choose from the original full ballet score. Van Cliburn will contribute the First and Second Piano Concertos.

Leinsdorf plans to record the Verdi Requiem. For that he will use the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson director, and the soloists will be Birgit Nilsson, Lili Chookasian, Carlo Bergonzi and Ezio Flagello. Miss Chookasian will be involved in another pair of projects, Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," with Jerome Hines, and the Song of the Wood-dove from Schoenberg's "Gurrelieder."

Mahler's Fifth Symphony was recorded earlier in the season, and will be issued in the Fall with the concert excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" on the fourth side. As a counterpart to the album, next season Leinsdorf will be recording the Mahler Sixth, and the filler will be Berg's concert aria "Der Wein." Phyllis Curtin is the soprano soloist in both Berg pieces.

Berg's aria is most familiar as a setting of Stefan George's German translation of Baudelaire's poem, but there is also a version to accommodate the French original. That is the one Curtin and Leinsdorf will do, which really makes it "Le Vin" rather than "Der Wein."

The biggest surprise was the announcement that the complete Wagner "Lohengrin" will be performed at Tanglewood in 1965 and then recorded. The cast includes Leontyne Price, Rita Gorr and Jerome Hines. It is hoped that the French baritone Ernest Blanc will be available for Telramund; the herald is yet to be found.

Leinsdorf made the announcement at a lunch given in his honor by RCA Victor in New York on Thursday. Since he himself chose the locale and, largely, the menu, the occasion is worth mentioning here. It happened at The Colony, chosen because Leinsdorf says it has the best "bollito" in town. A "bollito misto" of boiled beef, chicken, cotechino, and veal knuckle, accompanied by various vegetables and an endive and beet salad, was the central event. It was preceded by smoked fillet of trout and salmon; dessert was beignets with zabaione. The wine was a 1961 Beaujolais. First class program building, Maestro!

Lewisohn Stadium

It has been announced that Arthur Fiedler will conduct at New York's Lewisohn Stadium for the first time this Summer. He will be there twice. On July 2, he will lead a mixed program, yet to be made up. Then as a special Fourth of July celebration, he will conduct an all-Gershwin program, to include Robert Russell Bennet's Symphonic Picture "Porgy and Bess," "An American in Paris," "Strike up the Band," and the Piano Concerto and "Rhapsody in Blue," both with Earl Wild as soloist.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
MAY 1964

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900
MAY 1964

An Arid Climate

It is not the principal work on this recording, Prokofieff's "Symphony-Concerto" for Cello and Orchestra, but the little gem that fills out the second side, Fauré's "Elégie," Op. 24, that brings into play the best features of cellist Samuel Mayes and the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor (RCA Victor LSC-2703). Fauré wrote it in 1830 with a piano accompaniment which he later arranged for orchestra. Mr. Hayes, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony, treats it gently, letting its remote and melancholy themes float peacefully.

This recording is part of Boston's project to record the principal works of Prokofieff. The "Symphony-Concerto," Op. 125, had not been recorded previously, either in its original 1938 form or in its revised 1950 version, the one used here. One is struck by the simplicity of materials and scoring in the revised version, but not by their appeal. It seems that Prokofieff's powers to make his grotesquerie convincing waned in his later years, and this piece seems to offer not one tenth the beauty which some far more dissonant works offer. The one nice thing which pervades the generally arid climate, a dark Russian sadness, does not get sufficient emphasis in the performance. Mr. Mayes handles the grateful cello writing nicely without making any startling or original contributions.

C.S.S.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
JAN 25 1964

BOSTON—RCA Victor Record Division Vice-President and General Manager George Marek and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced last week that they are inaugurating an unusual project of recordings. The program will involve recording all the major orchestral works of the master Russian composer Sergei Prokofiev (1891-1953). The first of the series is scheduled for February release; namely, the Fifth Symphony.

Leinsdorf noted that "the purpose of the Prokofiev cycle as presently being undertaken . . . is to bring to the record-collecting public, within a short number of years, the enduring scores of Prokofiev, performed by the same orchestra in the same hall, and recorded by the same company, thereby manifesting a unity in the cycle which could otherwise by impossible."

The choice of the Boston Symphony for this project is no mere accident. For many years the Boston has been one of the principal champions of Prokofiev's music—particularly during the era of the late Serge Koussevitzky. Under his direction, the orchestra gave the American premiere to some dozen Prokofiev compositions, as well as the world premiere of his Fourth Symphony.

Also, Prokofiev himself was a frequent visitor to Boston. He appeared with the Symphony as piano soloist on five occasions (twice these appearances accounted for American premieres for two of his five piano concertos) and at another time he was guest conductor.

Since 1922, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given more than 80 performances of some 25 Prokofiev works at Symphony Hall (this does not include numerous other performances at Tanglewood and elsewhere).

George Marek spoke of this undertaking as "a project which excites the musical imagination and pays tribute to one of the towering musical voices of the 20th century. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, so closely identified through the years with the composer and as a champion of his music in this country, is the ideal, perhaps only musical body, superbly equipped by past association, for this project."

Releases already scheduled to follow February's "Fifth Symphony" include the "Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, Op. 125," which features Samuel Mayes (a work given its American premiere by the Bostonians in 1940, later revised by the composer); the "Violin Concerto No. 1," with Erick Friedman and the "Piano Concerto No. 5," with Young Lorin Hollander as pianist. All four of these works were initially performed in the U. S. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Serge Prokofiev

by Alan Rich

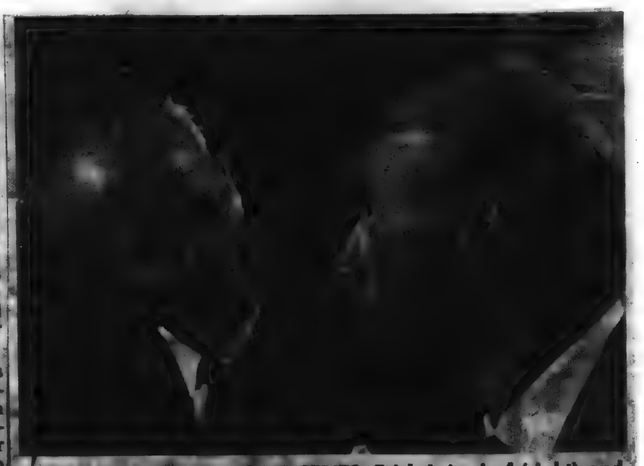
Prokofiev from Boston— A New Series Launched

IT IS ALTOGETHER APPROPRIATE that the Boston Symphony should launch a project to record the entire orchestral output of Serge Prokofiev. The composer and this orchestra have been linked ever since the halcyon days of Serge Koussevitzky, and in fact it was under this conductor's baton that many of Prokofiev's major works were introduced to this country and later recorded. Prokofiev himself led the BSO many times, and composed his Fourth Symphony for its fiftieth anniversary in 1930.

Koussevitzky's recordings of Prokofiev set a standard that is still seldom equaled. A microgroove reissue of his marvelously witty version of the Lieutenant Kije music would be a treasure today, as would his first (c. 1928) gossamer performance of the Classical Symphony. (While his second, 1947, recorded performance of this work is available on the Boston Symphony souvenir disc issued by Victor a year or so ago, it is sluggish by comparison with that earlier version.) But Koussevitzky was an individualistic interpreter, perhaps the greatest one of our century, building his reading of any piece, whether by Prokofiev or Bach, out of a series of spontaneous decisions. His failures, naturally, were many and abject, and they occurred even in music he deeply loved and chose to champion. For all the lapidary perfection of his Classical, Kije, or Peter and the Wolf, his command of the long line failed him in other works of Prokofiev, in the G minor Violin Concerto and especially in the Fifth Symphony.

This latter is Prokofiev's supreme masterwork, emotionally intense and moving. In a sense, it is also a synthesis of his stylistic journey, rational and clearheaded in its organization in a manner reminiscent of his early compositions, icily witty and sardonic like the pieces of the '20s, and revealing the power of personal involvement which the composer acquired relatively late in life. It unfolds with a luxuriance that is deceptive; it actually contains not a wasted note. While many of these elements were beyond Koussevitzky's sphere of interest, they fully engage Leinsdorf, who combines the best in his celebrated predecessor's manner with the sense of logic that the Russian conductor seemed to lack. If the projected Prokofiev series continues on the level of this present Fifth Symphony, it will indeed be a landmark in phonographic history.

Leinsdorf's success with the sym-



PLAYBACK ON "FIRST" OF A SERIES: Erich Leinsdorf (right) and George R. Marek listen carefully to playback of Prokofiev's "Fifth Symphony" in Boston. This will be the first in a series of Prokofiev orchestral masterworks to be released by RCA Victor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROKOFIEV'S 5TH SYMPHONY.

263

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780

MAR 8 1964

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD TRIBUNE
D. 22,800 S. 26,000

MAR 8 1964

RECORD CABINET

Series Of Prokofieff Is Worthy

A worthy project is a "Prokofieff series" of recordings planned by the Boston Symphony and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf. This is the American orchestra with which the Russian genius was closely identified through much of his mature career and long since demonstrated affinities for his music.

The first record of the series is of Prokofieff's 5th symphony which is so close-packed with tensions, some agonized and some merely ironic but all dramatic, that it has to be a major challenge both to conductor and players. Leinsdorf and his Bostonians do extraordinarily well since the piece is projected with irresistable power (RCA Victor-2707).

Prokofieff has now been dead over 10 years and the signs are increasing that his music is destined for a measure of immortality. It continues to be programmed by all symphonies. The projected recording series of his major works has the interest of any test — it will give the first wave of the composer's posterity an organized chance to take his measure.

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

APR 1964

Prokofieff: Classical Symphony; Love for Three Oranges Suite; Lieutenant Kijé Suite. Phila. Orch., Ormandy.
Columbia MS 6545 stereo

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5, Boston Symph., Leinsdorf.
RCA Victor LSC 2707 stereo

The now-familiar concert suites from the 1919 opera "Love for Three Oranges" and the 1933 movie ("The Czar Sleeps"), out of which came the legendary Lt. Kijé, join very happily here with the even more familiar "Classical" of 1917. The three works are now easily heard as one, from the same mind that produced "Peter and the Wolf." Suave, juicy playing by the Philly Orchestra is good for these works, bringing out their benign qualities, smoothing out the once-"modern" spiciness into a wholly tasteful sound for today's ears.

The Symphony No. 5 is the same, on a bigger, grander scale; the BSO performance is a most happy one, Prokofieff being an old friend of that orchestra back from the early days.

The contrast between Columbia and RCA sound is something else again. If RCA is working for the common man's common box of a phonograph, OK—but on my slightly superior equipment the Dynagrooved Symphony No. 5 is unavoidably unpleasant, and that is that.

With the most complete inattention (I get lost in the music itself) I still was forcibly reminded by that curiously coarse, wooden sound, by the seeming lack of an "imaginative space," by the pops-style semi-uniformity of level, that this was no ordinary recording but a Dynagroove. I've long since given up any attempt to analyse this sound by ear in terms of the published engineering info; I don't really know how much of it is actually a part of the Dyna process. I just know that I tend to be relieved when I see an RCA label without the Dynagroove letters on it. But, remembre, Dynagroove wasn't designed for the likes of me.

Anyhow, RCA's Boston Dynagroove made me think obscurely that something was wrong with my equipment. Columbia's sound reassured me that all was right. Just a normal modern stereo effect for a good LP disc—open, wide-spaced, easy, the strings shimmering brightly, the volume levels rising and falling naturally, the orchestra well placed within the realistic illusion of big-hall space, right there in front of you and unvarying.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, February 15, 1964

Disc Data

A New Prokofieff's No. 5

By Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony

By NELL LAWSON

A new recording from RCA Victor of Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf stirs memories of a time when many music lovers felt uneasy and were puzzled by the music of this Russian composer.

Now he is accepted with the fondness and enthusiasm once reserved for much earlier composers. This is particularly true of the Fifth Symphony. It is a warm, subjective performance, moving the listener deeply.

This recording, one of a Prokofieff series, would be your best choice among present available recordings of the Fifth Symphony. Dynagroove sound is particularly good. Stereo and mono.

* * *

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, March 8, 1964

Record Turntable

Leinsdorf Leads Taut Prokofieff

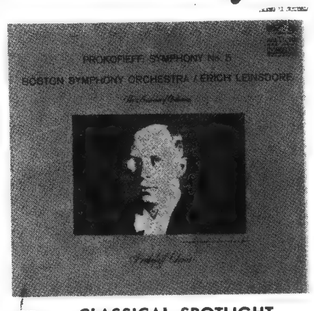
By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

Among the Boston Symphony's announced recording projects is a complete survey of all of Prokofieff's major works for orchestra. If one is to judge by the first endeavor in this series, noteworthy things are in store for record buyers.

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5 (Boston Symphony/Erich Leinsdorf) RCA Victor Stereo LSC 2707, Mono LM 2707. It was Serge Koussevitzky and the very same Bostonians who gave the American premiere of this work in 1945, and for years this performance was the standard by which all other recorded performances were judged. Leinsdorf's view of the score differs from his predecessor's, but it is nonetheless powerful, and just as often taut and compelling. As before, the Bostonians are performing with arch precision and almost unbelievable virtuosity, if not with the romantic warmth of the previous era. Sonically, this is one of the most effective of Dynagroove ventures.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

FEB 29 1964



CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

PROKOFIEFF: SYMPHONY NO. 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2707 (M); LSC 2707 (S)

The Boston Symphony has had a long and close association with the works of Prokofieff. This LP is just one of the Prokofieff Series. Erich Leinsdorff takes the orchestra into a brilliant excursion of the Russian composer's popular Symphony No. 5.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

JUN 1964

Prokofieff, Symphony No. 5; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor Dynagroove LM-2707.

This is the first disc in a new long-range project which envisions the recording of all the major orchestral works of Sergei Prokofieff. It is fitting that the series will be played by the Boston Symphony, which was closely identified through the years with the composer. The Boston orchestra, under the late Serge Koussevitsky, performed the American premiere of the Fifth Symphony.

There is more than sentimental justification, however, in choosing the rich-sounding Boston orchestra to perform the music, particularly in a score like the Fifth, where melody plays such an important role. They make the most of its flowing and exalted quality.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1964

Of recent releases, a fine one is Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony in Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony. Leinsdorf has an affinity for the late Russian, because we have here a definitive performance (RCA Victor LSC 2707, stereo). An unusual release, conducted by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops is Gershwin's American in Paris, and conversely, Darius Milhaud's, A Frenchman in New York, commissioned by RCA Victor. Milhaud's work is evocative and coloristic. Gershwin is Gershwin and stands the test of time very well, and Fiedler plays them both with a great deal of affection (RCA Victor LSC 2702, stereo).

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

FEB 28 1964

DISCussions
★★★★ Top ★★★ Good ★★ Average

RECORD OF THE WEEK

★★★★ Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5—Leinsdorf [RCA Victor]. This "first release" augurs exceptionally well for a planned series of recordings by Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony which will encompass all the major orchestral works of Serge Prokofieff (1891-1953). The great modernist's work has long been closely linked with the Bostonians; in fact, Leinsdorf himself helped to cop the orchestra's directorship by his exciting performances of the 5th during a 1961 guest appearance. There have been many superb recordings before now of this 20th-century masterpiece (by Schippers, Rodzinski, Ormandy, Dorati, etc.)—but forget them. With this release, it's Leinsdorf hands down—for clarity, spirit, excitement, tone color, everything!

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAY 1964

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓜ PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5, Op. 100. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Victor LSC 2707 $5.98, LM 2707 $4.98.

Interest: The composer's best
Performance: Stunning
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Effective

With this recording we have a first manifestation of RCA Victor's plan to record all the major works of Serge Prokofiev with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is clearly a brilliant beginning.

The Prokofiev Fifth is, in the opinion of many critics, not only the composer's finest orchestral work, but a high point of the stylistic synthesis of Prokofiev's own discoveries as a young musical revolutionary in the Paris of the Twenties and the later demands that the Soviet government made for the development of a "Socialist style." Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about the Fifth Symphony is that, viewed from either position, the piece manages somehow not to show signs of ruinous compromise.

It would be extremely difficult to find fault with the Leinsdorf-Boston combination in this case. The collaboration delivers the sort of white-hot brilliance and perfection of detail that has been anything but abundant since the high-flying days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Unfortunately, Victor's Dynagroove recording is compressed in volume—not a true pianissimo or fortissimo is to be heard on the two sides. Furthermore, the sound is generally dull and thick of texture, and lacking in instrumental definition. I am beginning to wonder if there is not in this process a tendency toward the production of a sort of mechanical sound that dehumanizes an otherwise superb recording. W. F.

PROKOFIEV'S 5TH SYMPHONY.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780

MAR 8 1964

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD TRIBUNE
D. 22,800 S. 26,000

MAR 8 1964

RECORD CABINET

Series Of Prokofieff Is Worthy

A worthy project is a "Prokofieff series" of recordings planned by the Boston Symphony and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf. This is the American orchestra with which the Russian genius was closely identified through much of his mature career and long since demonstrated affinities for his music.

The first record of the series is of Prokofieff's 5th symphony which is so close-packed with tensions, some agonized and some merely ironic but all dramatic, that it has to be a major challenge both to conductor and players. Leinsdorf and his Bostonians do extraordinarily well since the piece is projected with irresistable power (RCA Victor-2707).

Prokofieff has now been dead over 10 years and the signs are increasing that his music is destined for a measure of immortality. It continues to be programmed by all symphonies. The projected recording series of his major works has the interest of any test — it will give the first wave of the composer's posterity an organized chance to take his measure.

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

APR 1964

Prokofieff: Classical Symphony; Love for Three Oranges Suite; Lieutenant Kijé Suite. Phila. Orch., Ormandy.
Columbia MS 6545 stereo

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5, Boston Symph., Leinsdorf.
RCA Victor LSC 2707 stereo

The now-familiar concert suites from the 1919 opera "Love for Three Oranges" and the 1933 movie ("The Czar Sleeps"), out of which came the legendary Lt. Kijé, join very happily here with the even more familiar "Classical" of 1917. The three works are now easily heard as one from the same mind that produced "Peter and the Wolf." Suave, juicy playing by the Philly Orchestra is good for these works, bringing out their benign qualities, smoothing out the once-"modern" spiciness into a wholly tasteful sound for today's ears.

The Symphony No. 5 is the same, on a bigger, grander scale; the BSO performance is a most happy one, Prokofieff being an old friend of that orchestra back from the early days.

The contrast between Columbia and RCA sound is something else again. If RCA is working for the common man's common box of a phonograph, OK—but on my slightly superior equipment the Dynagrooved Symphony No. 5 is unavoidably unpleasant, and that is that.

With the most complete inattention (I get lost in the music itself) I still was forcibly reminded by that seriously coarse, wooden sound, by the seeming lack of an "imaginative space," by the pops-style semi-uniformity of level, that this was no ordinary recording but a Dynagroove. I've long since given up any attempt to analyse this sound by ear in terms of the published engineering info; I don't really know how much of it is actually a part of the Dyna process. I just know that I tend to be relieved when I see an RCA label without the Dynagroove letters on it. But, remembre, Dynagroove wasn't designed for the likes of me.

Anyhow, RCA's Boston Dynagroove made me think obscurely that something was wrong with my equipment. Columbia's sound reassured me that all was right. Just a normal modern stereo effect for a good LP disc—open, wide-spaced, easy, the strings shimmering brightly, the volume levels rising and falling naturally, the orchestra well placed within the realistic illusion of big-hall space, right there in front of you and unvarying.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
047
BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, February 15, 1964

Disc Data

A New Prokofieff's No. 5

By Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony

By NELL LAWSON

A new recording from RCA Victor of Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf stirs memories of a time when many music lovers felt uneasy and were puzzled by the music of this Russian composer.

Now he is accepted with the fondness and enthusiasm once reserved for much earlier composers. This is particularly true of the Fifth Symphony. It is a warm, subjective performance, moving the listener deeply.

This recording, one of a Prokofieff series, would be your best choice among present available recordings of the Fifth Symphony. Dynagroove sound is particularly good. Stereo and mono.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, March 8, 1964

Record Turntable

Leinsdorf Leads Taut Prokofieff

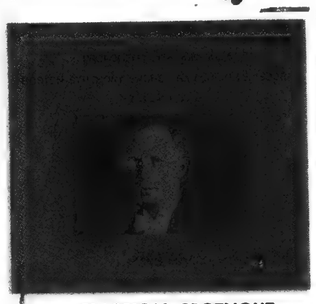
By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

Among the Boston Symphony's announced recording projects is a complete survey of almost Prokofieff's major works for orchestra. If one is to judge by the first endeavor in this series, noteworthy things are in store for record buyers.

Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5 (Boston Symphony/Erich Leinsdorf) RCA Victor Stereo LSC 2707, Mono LM 2707. It was Serge Koussevitzky and the very same Bostonians who gave the American premiere of this work in 1945, and for years this performance was the standard by which all other recorded performances were judged. Leinsdorf's view of the score differs from his predecessor's, but it is nonetheless powerful, and just as often taut and compelling. As before, the Bostonians are performing with arch precision and almost unbelievable virtuosity, if not with the romantic warmth of the previous era. Sonically, this is one of the most effective of Dyna-

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

FEB 29 1964



CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

PROKOFIEFF: SYMPHONY NO. 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2707 (M); LSC 2707 (S)

The Boston Symphony has had a long and close association with the works of Prokofieff. This LP is just one of the Prokofieff Series. Erich Leinsdorff takes the orchestra into a brilliant excursion of the Russian composer's popular Symphony No. 5.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

JUN 1964

Prokofieff, Symphony No. 5; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor Dynagroove LM-2707.

This is the first disc in a new long-range project which envisions the recording of all the major orchestral works of Sergei Prokofieff. It is fitting that the series will be played by the Boston Symphony, which was closely identified through the years with the composer. The Boston orchestra, under the late Serge Koussevitsky, performed the American premiere of the Fifth Symphony.

There is more than sentimental justification, however, in choosing the rich-sounding Boston orchestra to perform the music, particularly in a score like the Fifth, where melody plays such an important role. They make the most of its flowing and exalted quality.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1964

Of recent releases, a fine one is Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony in Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony. Leinsdorf has an affinity for the late Russian, because we have here a definitive performance (RCA Victor LSC 2707, stereo). An unusual release, conducted by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops is Gershwin's American in Paris, and conversely, Darius Milhaud's, A Frenchman in New York, commissioned by RCA Victor. Milhaud's work is evocative and coloristic. Gershwin is Gershwin and stands the test of time very well, and Fiedler plays them both with a great deal of affection (RCA Victor LSC 2702, stereo).

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

FEB 28 1964

RECORD OF THE WEEK

* Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5—Leinsdorf [RCA Victor]. This "first release" augurs exceptionally well for a planned series of recordings by Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony which will encompass all the major orchestral works of Serge Prokofieff (1891-1953). The great modernist's work has long been closely linked with the Bostonians; in fact, Leinsdorf himself helped to cop the orchestra's directorship by his exciting performances of the 5th during a 1961 guest appearance. There have been many superb recordings before now of this 20th-century masterpiece (by Schippers, Rodzinski, Ormandy, Dorati, etc.)—but forget them. With this release, it's Leinsdorf hands down—for clarity, spirit, excitement, tone color, everything!

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAY 1964

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓡ PROKOFIEV: *Symphony No. 5, Op. 100. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2707 $5.98, LM 2707 $4.98.

Interest: The composer's best
Performance: Stunning
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Effective

With this recording we have a first manifestation of RCA Victor's plan to record all the major works of Serge Prokofiev with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is clearly a brilliant beginning.

The Prokofiev Fifth is, in the opinion of many critics, not only the composer's finest orchestral work, but a high point of the stylistic synthesis of Prokofiev's own discoveries as a young musical revolutionary in the Paris of the Twenties and the later demands that the Soviet government made for the development of a "Socialist style." Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about the Fifth Symphony is that, viewed from either position, the piece manages somehow not to show signs of ruinous compromise.

It would be extremely difficult to find fault with the Leinsdorf-Boston combination in this case. The collaboration delivers the sort of white-hot brilliance and perfection of detail that has been anything but abundant since the high-flying days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Unfortunately, Victor's Dynagroove recording is compressed in volume—not a true pianissimo or fortissimo is to be heard on the two sides. Furthermore, the sound is generally dull and thick of texture, and lacking in instrumental definition. I am beginning to wonder if there is not in this process a tendency toward the production of a sort of mechanical sound that dehumanizes an otherwise superb recording. W. F.

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL.
STAR
TW. 18,154

FEB 6 1964

Music In The Groove

By PAUL H. LITTLE

This week is rich in outstanding discs. So without more ado, let's listen.

"The Art of Pablo Casals" from Victor's "Immortal Performances" series is a 12-inch lp featuring short solo works for cello by the great Spanish musician. It includes the Intermezzo from Granados' "Goyescas."

Another series by the Boston symphony under Erich Leinsdorf has been inaugurated by the same company. It will be rewarding to admirers of Prokofieff's music. The first disc in the series is a sinewy reading of the "Fifth Symphony." When he wrote this masterpiece, Prokofieff was already subject to Russian press censure, but it did not emasculate the music. Of all his symphonies, it contains the most ebullience, wit, humor and drama. Leinsdorf gives it a reading that does not dawdle over the lyric passages.

Columbus Evening Dispatch
COLUMBUS, OHIO
D. 212,887 SUN. 293,416

MAY 11 1964

FIRST IN A projected series of Prokofieff recordings from Victor and the Boston Orchestra under Leinsdorf is the Russian composer's 5th Symphony (LSC-2707). Leinsdorf's treatment of the score is more broadly conceived than any I have heard; certainly it is much different than the kinetic and exciting experience Koussevitsky, who premiered the work in this country, used to make of it.

Nevertheless, this is a beautiful performance, and it illustrates anew how much the personality of a conductor can be reflected in a familiar work, even to the point of giving it new dimensions. In any hands, Prokofieff's 5th is one of the best symphonic works in this century, and you won't want to miss Leinsdorf's view of it, which stresses the romantic side of the composer.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 504,880 S. 502,274

MAR 18 1964

PROKOFIEV Symphony No. 5, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony (RCA Victor LM-2707): The first in a new series incompassing the "major works" of Prokofiev, by Leinsdorf and the BSO. Excellent sound, as usual, but a performance lacking in bite and excitement.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JUN 1964

Prokofiev: Symphony No. 5, in B-flat—The new Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony performance (RCA Victor LSC/LM 2707) reveals more of the lyric content of this score than any other currently available recording. For those who prefer a more extroverted, dynamic account, the Ormandy performance (Columbia MS 6004, ML 5260) is recommended.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI MONTHLY 22,050

MAY 15 1964

PROKOFIEV: Symphony no. 5 Boston Sym. O.; Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor (S) LSC 2707, $5.98; (M) LM 2707, $4.98
Another Prokofiev work which has become standard repertory with major orchestras, this symphony has also received several fine recordings. Hardly a profound work, the score nevertheless is a highly dynamic one which offers plenty of opportunity for a display of orchestral virtuosity. The Boston Symphony responds admirably, and Leinsdorf's approach to the score is sufficiently intense so that the listener can occasionally forget the emptiness of the music. The sound and stereo quality are both quite good, although the first side of the review copy contains an annoying "beep" which recurs with each revolution from lead grooves to the end.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

APR 5 1964

RECORD

By HOWARD KLEIN

THE second album in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current series devoted to the works of Prokofiev has been released by RCA Victor. On it Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the orchestra, plays the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra (LM 2703; stereo LSC 2703). It is a redraft of the Cello Concerto of 1938, which the composer undertook between 1950 and 1952. He died in 1953 and the work was published posthumously as Op. 125.

The composer consulted the Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich about the concerto when he first wrote it in 1938, and that artist has recorded the later version also.

Unlike the piano concertos, this work is predominantly an outpouring of song. The solo cello sings long lines that could be from one of the composer's operas. The opening measures of the first movement, marked Andante, establish a march pattern in the orchestra over which the cello plays its cantilena. The march dissolves and though the melodies now introduced are more fragmented and jagged, they are nevertheless richly lyrical.

This may be Prokofiev's most consistently melodic work. In writing for the cello (and, he has explored its range and color possibilities exhaustively) he avoids the kind of brittle, percussive writing he is best known for.

The second movement, Allegro giusto, begins with the cello, which no sooner gets the momentum rolling with fast, repeated patterns, than it leaves the motor rhythms to the orchestra and sings a long line above.

Three Tempos

The last movement has three tempo markings, Andante con moto, Allegretto and Allegro marcato. This does what it implies: it begins in the basic character of the work, that is, expansive and lyrical, and gradually gains in speed until a fairly explosive temperature is reached. The solo, which has been busy with a repeated figure that eggs the momentum on, suddenly goes to the very top of its register and, still reiterating its motor rhythm, ends the work in a bright light.

Mr. Mayes is an expressive cellist who gives the work his best with very good results. His tone lacks strength only in those passages where the bow moves the fastest, and here instead of the correct driving sound, the passages are apt to sound fuzzy. But elsewhere, and this is more important, his tone sings freely and heartily.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts with a sure hand.

To fill in the second side Faure's Elegie for Cello and Orchestra gives Mr. Mayes more chance to show off his fine tone and the orchestra its warmth.

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS
D. 169,001

APR 16 1964

Prokofiev Shows Wit, Little Depth

By WALTER WHITWORTH

Prokofiev managed to retain much of his musical individuality in spite of the hampering rules and regulations placed in the way of all Russian composers (painters and authors, too) by the politicians.

Leinsdorf

Nonetheless, Prokofiev's music suffered from the imposed restrictions.

What was individual about it was its wit and humor, its melodic lines and its piquant harmonies. These were enough to attract concertgoers throughout the Occidental world, for the scores were lively and, with few exceptions, conservative for the time.

The drawback to the Prokofievan wit was a cleverness that prohibited depth. The Fifth Symphony, for instannce, recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf, has a theme or two in the first movement that could easily have led to something substantial, perhaps something memorable.

The themes are buried beneath a dazzling orchestration, beneath a shallow drama that offers only surface interest. The other improvements are frankly and lightly entertaining.

This does not mean, of course, that the Bostonians and their excellent conductor do not seek the good and give it full worth. Their performance, indeed, is remarkable and wonderfully good listening. But the music easily eludes a lengthy memory. (RCA Victor LM 2707)

The Boston orchestra has also recorded the composer's so-called symphony-concerto for cello and orchestra, with Samuel Mayes as the soloist. The cello score demands extraordinary dexterity, a dexterity fully possessed by the soloist.

Again one listens with pleasure to the skill exercised by Prokofiev—and again one is left vaguely unsatisfied. Music is a finer art than this bravura piece indicates, and the bravura playing only emphasizes that fact.

The second side of the disc is completed with Faure's agreeable but sentimental "Elegie." (RCA Victor LM 2703.)

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 2,904,639

APR 3 1964

PROKOFIEV: SYMPHONY-CONCERTO FOR CELLO AND ORCHESTRA (RCA Victor). Prokofiev had no affinity for the cello, but with the counsel of Soviet Cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, he made his cello concerto one of his loveliest works. Here it is impeccably performed by Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Cellist Samuel Mayes in a recording that also includes Gabriel Fauré's noble little Élégie.

PROKOFIEV'S CONCERTO FOR 'CELLO

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

APR 11 1964

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

PROKOFIEFF: SYMPHONY-CONCERTO FOR CELLO AND ORCHESTRA
Samuel Mayes, Cello; Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2703 (M); LSC 2703 (S)

One in a series of recordings by Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony of the major works of Serge Prokofieff. "Elegie," by Faure, is also presented. Performances are brilliant.

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Friday, May 29 1964

THE SECOND of the projected Prokofieff series by the Boston Symphony and its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, is of that composer's Symphony-Concerto for 'cello in the last of several versions which was published after his death. The cellist was Samuel Mapes who is the orchestra's first cellist (RCA Victor).

This piece cost Prokofieff years of periodic labors and the recurrent pains of many uncertainties. As it turned out, however, there is nothing tentative or uncertain about it.

It is direct, original and forcefully eloquent, and gives the soloist much difficult but fruitful work. The record is filled out with Faure's Elegie for 'cello and orchestra.

'64

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL.
STAR
TW. 18,154

FEB 6 1964

Music In The Groove

By PAUL H. LITTLE

This week is rich in outstanding discs. So without more ado, let's listen.

"The Art of Pablo Casals" from Victor's "Immortal Performances" series is a 12-inch lp featuring short solo works for cello by the great Spanish musician. It includes the Intermezzo from Granados' "Goyescas."

Another series by the Boston symphony under Erich Leinsdorf has been inaugurated by the same company. It will be rewarding to admirers of Prokofieff's music. The first disc in the series is a sinewy reading of the "Fifth Symphony." When he wrote this masterpiece, Prokofieff was already subject to Russian press censure, but it did not emasculate the music. Of all his symphonies, it contains the most ebullience, wit, humor and drama. Leinsdorf gives it a reading that does not dawdle over the lyric passages.

Columbus Evening Dispatch
COLUMBUS, OHIO
D. 212,887 SUN. 293,416

MAY 11 1964

FIRST IN A projected series of Prokofieff recordings from Victor and the Boston Orchestra under Leinsdorf is the Russian composer's 5th Symphony (LSC-2707). Leinsdorf's treatment of the score is more broadly conceived than any I have heard; certainly it is much different than the kinetic and exciting experience Koussevitsky, who premiered the work in this country, used to make of it.

Nevertheless, this is a beautiful performance, and it illustrates anew how much the personality of a conductor can be reflected in a familiar work, even to the point of giving it new dimensions. In any hands, Prokofieff's 5th is one of the best symphonic works in this century, and you won't want to miss Leinsdorf's view of it, which stresses the romantic side of the composer.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 504,880 S. 502,274

MAR 18 1964

PROKOFIEV Symphony No. 5, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony (RCA Victor LM-2707): The first in a new series incompassing the "major works" of Prokofiev, by Leinsdorf and the BSO. Excellent sound, as usual, but a performance lacking in bite and excitement.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JUN 1964

Prokofiev: Symphony No. 5, in B-flat—The new Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony performance (RCA Victor LSC/LM 2707) reveals more of the lyric content of this score than any other currently available recording. For those who prefer a more extroverted, dynamic account, the Ormandy performance (Columbia MS 6004, ML 5260) is recommended.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 22,050

MAY 15 1964

PROKOFIEV: Symphony no. 5. Boston Sym. O.; Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor (S) LSC 2707, $5.98; (M) LM 2707, $4.98

Another Prokofiev work which has become standard repertory with major orchestras, this symphony has also received several fine recordings. Hardly a profound work, the score nevertheless is a highly dynamic one which offers plenty of opportunity for a display of orchestral virtuosity. The Boston Symphony responds admirably, and Leinsdorf's approach to the score is sufficiently intense so that the listener can occasionally forget the emptiness of the music. The sound and stereo quality are both quite good, although the first side of the review copy contains an annoying "beep" which recurs with each revolution from lead grooves to the end.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

APR 5 1964

RECOR

By HOWARD KLEIN

THE second album in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current series devoted to the works of Prokofiev has been released by RCA Victor. On it Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the orchestra, plays the Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra (LM 2703; stereo LSC 2703). It is a redraft of the Cello Concerto of 1938, which the composer undertook between 1950 and 1952. He died in 1953 and the work was published posthumously as Op. 125.

The composer consulted the Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich about the concerto when he first wrote it in 1938, and that artist has recorded the later version also.

Unlike the piano concertos, this work is predominantly an outpouring of song. The solo cello sings long lines that could be from one of the composer's operas. The opening measures of the first movement, marked Andante, establish a march pattern in the orchestra over which the cello plays its cantilena. The march dissolves and though the melodies now introduced are more fragmented and jagged, they are nevertheless richly lyrical.

This may be Prokofiev's most consistently melodic work. In writing for the cello (and he has explored its range and color possibilities exhaustively) he avoids the kind of brittle, percussive writing he is best known for.

The second movement, Allegro giusto, begins with the cello, which no sooner gets the momentum rolling with fast, repeated patterns, than it leaves the motor rhythms to the orchestra and sings a long line above.

Three Tempos

The last movement has three tempo markings, Andante con moto, Allegretto and Allegro marcato. This does what it implies: it begins in the basic character of the work, that is, expansive and lyrical, and gradually gains in speed until a fairly explosive temperature is reached. The solo, which has been busy with a repeated figure that eggs the momentum on, suddenly goes to the very top of its register and, still reiterating its motor rhythm, ends the work in a bright light.

Mr. Mayes is an expressive cellist who gives the work his best with very good results. His tone lacks strength only in those passages where the bow moves the fastest, and here instead of the correct driving sound, the passages are apt to sound fuzzy. But elsewhere, and this is more important, his tone sings freely and heartily.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts with a sure hand.

To fill in the second side Faure's Elégie for Cello and Orchestra gives Mr. Mayes more chance to show off his fine tone and the orchestra its warmth.

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS
D. 169,001

APR 16 1964

Prokofiev Shows Wit, Little Depth

By WALTER WHITWORTH

Prokofiev managed to retain much of his musical individuality in spite of the hampering rules and regulations placed in the way of all Russian composers (painters and authors, too) by the politicians.

Leinsdorf

Nonetheless, Prokofiev's music suffered from the imposed restrictions.

What was individual about it was its wit and humor, its melodic lines and its piquant hermonies. These were enough to attract concertgoers throughout the Occidental world, for the scores were lively and, with few exceptions, conservative for the time.

The drawback to the Prokofievan wit was a cleverness that prohibited depth. The Fifth Symphony, for instannce, recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf, has a theme or two in the first movement that could easily have led to something substantial, perhaps something memorable.

The themes are buried beneath a dazzling orchestration, beneath a shallow drama that offers only surface interest. The other improvements are frankly and lightly entertaining.

This does not mean, of course, that the Bostonians and their excellent conductor do not seek the good and give it full worth. Their performance, indeed, is remarkable and wonderfully good listening. But the music easily eludes a lengthy memory. (RCA Victor LM 2707)

The Boston orchestra has also recorded the composer's so-called symphony-concerto for cello and orchestra, with Samuel Mayes as the soloist. The cello score demands extraordinary dexterity, a dexterity fully possessed by the soloist.

Again one listens with pleasure to the skill exercised by Prokofiev—and again one is left vaguely unsatisfied. Music is a finer art than this bravura piece indicates, and the bravura playing only emphasizes that fact.

The second side of the disc is completed with Faure's agreeable but sentimental "Elegie." (RCA Victor LM 2703.)

PROKOFIEV'S CONCERTO FOR 'CELLO

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

APR 11 1964

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

PROKOFIEFF: SYMPHONY-CONCERTO FOR CELLO AND ORCHESTRA

Samuel Mayes, Cello; Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2703 (M); LSC 2703 (S)

One in a series of recordings by Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony of the major works of Serge Prokofieff. "Elegie," by Faure, is also presented. Performances are brilliant.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 2,904,639

APR 3 1964

PROKOFIEV: SYMPHONY-CONCERTO FOR CELLO AND ORCHESTRA (RCA Victor). Prokofiev had no affinity for the cello, but with the counsel of Soviet Cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, he made his cello concerto one of his loveliest works. Here it is impeccably performed by Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Cellist Samuel Mayes in a recording that also includes Gabriel Fauré's noble little Élégie.

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Friday, May 29 1964

THE SECOND of the projected Prokofieff series by the Boston Symphony and its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, is of that composer's Symphony-Concerto for 'cello in the last of several versions which was published after his death. The cellist was Samuel Mapes who is the orchestra's first cellist (RCA Victor).

This piece cost Prokofieff years of periodic labors and the recurrent pains of many uncertainties. As it turned out, however, there is nothing tentative or uncertain about it.

It is direct, original and forcefully eloquent, and gives the soloist much difficult but fruitful work. The record is filled out with Faure's Elegie for 'cello and orchestra.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 148,940 S. 137,891

APR 27 1964

265

Prokofieff's Debt To Boston

Lively Arts

By PAM JOHNSON
Miami News Special Writer

Prokofieff's "Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra" (RCA Victor LM-2703, stereo LSC-2703) is one of a series planned by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to span all of the Russian's major works.

Why does Boston undertake the task? It has a long history in common wiht Prokofieff, sparked by Serge Koussevitzky. When that conductor came from Europe in 1924 he brought many Prokofieff scores with him. Through the Boston Symphony Orchestra he successfully presented the music to America.

It was delayed reaction, for Prokofieff had been to America himself in 1918 and met with monumental indifference. In his autobiography he wrote about New York that "the whole accent of musical life concentrated on execution" — high standards of performance, but no interest in new trends in music.

He toured as a pianist with no better luck. What a dreary scene is conjured by these words of his: "At times, as I roamed New York's Central Park and looked up at the skyscrapers facing it, I would think with cold fury of all the wonderful orchestras in America that cared nothing about my music."

Erich Leinsdorf

This from the man who would find greater enthusiasm for his music in the United States than possibly in any other country on earth.

Once launched by Koussevitzky, Prokofieff returned to Boston many times as guest conductor and soloist in his piano concertos.

He was a superb pianist and understood writing for the piano. The cello was another matter. He had difficulty probing its personality. His good friend, cellist Mstislav Postropovich, helped him in this regard. Still, the "Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra" was a labor of years.

Outlined in 1933, ostensibly finished in 1938, it was performed by the Boston Symphony two years later in revised form with a new cadenza. Between 1950 and 1952, the score was changed again and expanded to symphonic proportions.

It is, above all, marvelously melodic music with a modicum of Prokofieff's brittle wit for flavor.

On the present recording the soloist is Samuel Mayes. For 16 years he has been first cellist of the Boston Symphony. His tone is noble — comparing with wines, more Bordeaux than Burgundy. His technique is superior.

There's a dividend, too. Filling out the record is Gabriel Faure's "Elegie" for cello and orchestra, a gem of small and precious proportions, polished by Mayes' superlative performance.

MOZART: EINE KLEINE NACHT MUSIK & JUPITER SYMPHONY

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

The Pilot
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 155,000

JAN 25 1964

Records

MOZART: Jupiter Symphony: Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. There are some who consider Mozart's 41st the greatest of all symphonies. To judge by his performance, Erich Leinsdorf is among them and he persuades the Boston Symphony (never before a notable Mozart orchestra) to expound his view with rare eloquence. At climatic points, particularly in the first movement, this performance gives the music a weight and thrust equal to anything in Beethoven without ever losing sight of its specifically Mozartian elegance. The grace of phrasing is exquisite, particularly in the exposiitons of the second and last movements (both of which—bless him—the conductor repeats) and the overall interpretation has a rare cogency. This may not be the only way to do it, but those who have not heard Leinsdorf do not know all of the symphony's possible dimensions. The Nachtmusik is a nice filler.

Credit RCA's Dynagroove with great clarity, particularly in bringing out some often unheard wind nuances. But the volume has to be turned 'way down to preserve a Mozartian scale of sound. (RCA).

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL.
STAR
TW. 18 154

JAN 19 1964

EACH NEW conductor imprints his personality on an orchestra no matter how selfless he seeks to be. The Boston symphony is a prime illustration. Under Charles Munch the richness of the orchestra's string section and the mellow glow of the brass were stressed. There was more dramatic richness of detail discernible on record.

Erich Leinsdorf, the new musical director, tends to emphasize a terseness and sparsity of outline so that sometimes his readings seemed brisk and steely. Yet, this works wonders with certain types of music as for example his conducting of the orchestral accompaniment in Capitol's new issue of the Ravel "Concerto for the Left Hand, Piano, and Orchestra" with John Browning as piano soloist. (The Prokofieff Third Concerto in C Major is on the overside).

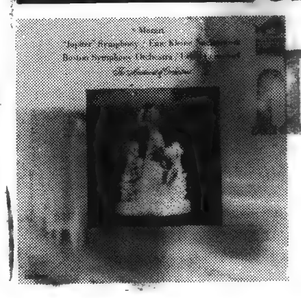
Victor is offering this month Leinsdorf's excellent — if somewhat cool reading — of the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Here a more "romantic" approach might readily slacken the intensity Mozart achieves in this noble symphony.

* * *

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 25 1964

CLASSICAL PICKS



MOZART: Jupiter Symphony, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, Boston Symph. Orch/Leinsdorf—RCA Victor LM2694

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf at the helm, brilliantly performs Mozart's final symphony, the Jupiter, and his liltingly melodic Eine Kleine Nachtmusik on this superb classical offering from RCA Victor. The maestro's interpretation is faultless and the orchestra supreme. The classical devotee will enjoy the breath-taking fourth movement as well as the immensely popular "Nachtmusik" serenade.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020

FEB 16 1964

MOZART: Symphony No. 41 (Jupiter); Eine Kleine Natchtmusik. Boston Symphony, Leinsdrof cond. Victor LM 2694; mono; LSC 2694 stereo. Mozart's serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," as any musician, linguist, or lullaby-laden Lilliputian can tell you, is calculated to put people to sleep. Or so the composer hoped when he concocted this delightful little potion. Conductors, however, while not always inimical toward composers' intentions, do occasionally have a way of making us sit up and take notice even in the administration of musical sedatives. Leinsdorf has done this. We are not asleep. Nor will we ever fall asleep listening to this conductor put the Boston through its Mozartean paces, lullaby or no. For this we thank Mr. Leinsdorf. We thank him, too, for the new Jupiter Symphony on this disc which, for its depth, precision, insight and exposition must take a high place among the finest recorded performances of the work. The Dynagroove sound is excellent.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 300,065 S. 330,671

FEB 2 1964

MOZART: Symphony No. 41 in C "Jupiter"; Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting). Victor: LM-2694.

Leinsdorf favors a fast, almost frenetic pace in the outer movements of the "Jupiter" and the beginning of the Serenade, finding a reflection of this mood in the more restless portions of the slow sections. Interesting thesis, but not altogether successful.

266

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

JAN 26 1964

RECORD REVIEWS

Orchestral Favorites In Vivid New Dress

By HERMAN SCHADEN
Star Record Critic

Old orchestral music in splendid new garb is one of the joys of record-collecting as well as a mainstay of the recording industry. Thus it is with pleasure that we single out some particularly fine examples today.

For one thing, Erich Leinsdorf's first Mozart with the Boston Symphony convinces us that the Boston should have hired him for Mozart if he could do nothing else. Which, of course, he can. But there is nothing to compare, we are sure, with his new Symphony No. 41 in C (The Jupiter) and Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik (R C A Victor LSC 2694).

There is eloquent evidence of Leinsdorf's intimate knowledge of the composer gained through his recording of all the symphonies several years ago for Westminster. Now with this magnificent orchestra the stage is set for many more repeats. There cannot be too many to suit us.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660

JAN 29 1964

MOZART: "Jupiter Symphony" and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (RCA LSC 2694). Erich Leinsdorf and his Boston Symphony Orchestra are superb in this new Dynagroove recording of the two famous works.

The "Jupiter" has received a sharply defined reading in which the sound is some of the best on the new Victor process. Mr. Leinsdorf has the correct feeling for Mozart. His precision is formidable, but there is a leeway allowed within the ensemble, producing a sparkling performance throughout.

Even the timeworn "Nachtmusik" takes on new luster in this disc. The finale of the composition is sprightly and yet still in control. There are excellent readings of both pieces.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 195,987 S. 206,275

FEB 16 1964

THE "JUPITER" is also conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and by the late Ferenc Fricsay on new discs.

Leinsdorf, conducting the Boston Symphony on a new RCA Victor disc, is careful with the textures. He drives the first movement; does not fail to miss the genuine tensions in the andante; shapes a lovely minuet, and gives a rather heavy-handed finale. A gracious "Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik" fills out the disc.

The Hartford Times
D. 126,360

JAN 18 1964

What's New In Records

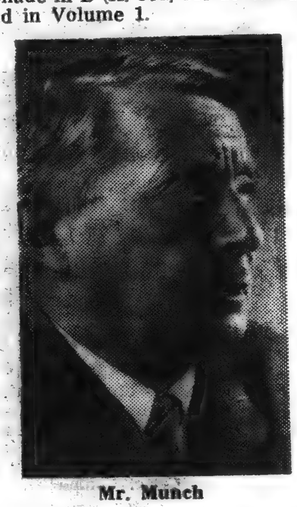
By GEORGE W. STOWE Times Music Critic

London Records, which has a penchant for doing things complete, has just recorded all of Mozart's music for wind instruments on five discs (London 9346/50, mono; 6346/50, stereo) in a manner calculated to discourage the competition.

In a sampling based on listening to the first two releases (Volumes 1 and 2), I can vouch for the suavity and elegance of these performances. The so-called London Wind Soloists (under the direction of Jack Brymer) are actually a group of topnotch players from English orchestras. It would be difficult to find a smoother-sounding ensemble anywhere.

London's superb sonics point up the wonderful balance achieved in these performances. If you doubt my word, listen to the immaculately performed Serenade in B (K. 361) for 13 Wind Instruments, which is to be found in Volume 1.

Mr. Leinsodorf



Mr. Munch

Erich Leinsdorf's Mozart at Tanglewood last Summer was notable for both its warmth and precision and these qualities are in evidence in his new recording of the composer's "Jupiter" Symphony (No. 41) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Victor (LM or LSC-2694).

Although I miss the poignance that the late Bruno Walter invariably brought to this beloved work, there is an admirable vitality to his reading and the clarity that is always an enhancement to Mozart. Leinsdorf takes the finale at a more deliberate tempo than is customary, which reiterates the miraculous vertical texture of the writing. The composer's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" fills out this disc.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 299,174

FEB 29 1964

Mozart: Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Symphony No. 41 in C (Jupiter). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LM 2694, $4.98; stereo LSC 2694, $5.98.

The strings of the Boston Symphony are beautifully regulated to an ensemble effort of exceptional evenness and balance in the Serenade, which is a kind of end achievement in itself. However, the playfulness and fantasy in the music are rather grimly rejected, especially in the Romanza and Minuet. Leinsdorf's conception of the Jupiter is architecturally broad and tonally spacious, to the extent, indeed, that the first side (of over twenty-seven minutes) is unable to accommodate the fugal finale, which is put over to the second side. It, too, is impressively executed, but the total is blandly unexpressive for my taste.

WEST ALLIS, WIS.
STAR
TW. 11,332

MAR 19 1964

MOZART

Symphony No. 41 in C Major, K 551 (Jupiter), Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K 525; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA Victor LM 2694 (Stereo LSC 2694.

Leinsdorf is a Viennese and thoroughly steeped in the Mozart tradition. It follows, therefore, that, even though Mozart Jupiters and Nachtmusiks are practically a dime a dozen on discs (18 Jupiters and 21 Nachtmusiks), his interpretations should be exceptionally good. They are, especially the dancing Nachtmusik, which is as good as any available. The infectious work is played with sparkling grace and a lilting elegance. The Jupiter is, by contrast, somewhat bland although also very good.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

FEB 1 1964

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

MOZART: JUPITER SYMPHONY/EINE KLEINE NACHTMUSIK
Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf)
RCA Victor LM 2694 (M); LSC 2694 (S)

Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, long a favorite of both students and devotees of the classics, is expertly performed by Leinsdorf and the Boston. Artistic cover of LP should do much to catch the eye.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112
JAN 26 1964

RECORD REVIEWS

Orchestral Favorites In Vivid New Dress

By HERMAN SCHADEN
Star Record Critic

Old orchestral music in splendid new garb is one of the joys of record-collecting as well as a mainstay of the recording industry. Thus it is with pleasure that we single out some particularly fine examples today.

For one thing, Erich Leinsdorf's first Mozart with the Boston Symphony convinces us that the Boston should have hired him for Mozart if he could do nothing else. Which, of course, he can. But there is nothing to compare, we are sure, with his new Symphony No. 41 in C (The Jupiter) and Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik (R C A Victor LSC 2694).

There is eloquent evidence of Leinsdorf's intimate knowledge of the composer gained through his recording of all the symphonies several years ago for Westminster. Now with this magnificent orchestra the stage is set for many more repeats. There cannot be too many to suit us.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660
JAN 29 1964

MOZART: "Jupiter Symphony" and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (RCA LSC 2694). Erich Leinsdorf and his Boston Symphony Orchestra are superb in this new Dynagroove recording of the two famous works.

The "Jupiter" has received a sharply defined reading in which the sound is some of the best on the new Victor process. Mr. Leinsdorf has the correct feeling for Mozart. His precision is formidable, but there is a leeway allowed within the ensemble, producing a sparkling performance throughout.

Even the timeworn "Nachtmusik" takes on new luster in this disc. The finale of the composition is sprightly and yet still in control. There are excellent readings of both pieces.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 195,987 S. 206,275
FEB 16 1964

THE "JUPITER" is also conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and by the late Ferenc Fricsay on new discs.

Leinsdorf, conducting the Boston Symphony on a new RCA Victor disc, is careful with the tempi. He drives the first movement; does not fail to mind the genuine tensions in the andante; shapes a lovely minuet, and gives a rather heavy-handed finale. A gracious "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" fills out the disc.

The Hartford Times
D. 126,360
JAN 18 1964

What's New In Records

By GEORGE W. STOWE Times Music Critic

London Records, which has a penchant for doing things complete, has just recorded all of Mozart's music for wind instruments on five discs (London 9346/50, mono; 6346/50, stereo) in a manner calculated to discourage the competition.

In a sampling based on listening to the first two releases (Volumes 1 and 2), I can vouch for the suavity and elegance of these performances. The so-called London Wind Soloists (under the direction of Jack Brymer) are actually a group of topnotch players from English orchestras. It would be difficult to find a smoother-sounding ensemble anywhere.

London's superb sonics point up the wonderful balance achieved in these performances. If you doubt my word, listen to the immaculately performed Serenade in B (K. 361) for 13 Wind Instruments, which is to be found in Volume 1.

Mr. Leinsdorf

Mr. Munch

Erich Leinsdorf's Mozart at Tanglewood last Summer was notable for both its warmth and precision and these qualities are in evidence in his new recording of the composer's "Jupiter" Symphony (No. 41) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Victor (LM or LSC-2694).

Although I miss the poignance that the late Bruno Walter invariably brought to this beloved work, there is an admirable vitality to his reading and the clarity that is always an enhancement to Mozart. Leinsdorf takes the finale at a more deliberate tempo than is customary, which reiterates the miraculous vertical texture of the writing. The composer's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" fills out this disc.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 299,174
FEB 29 1964

Mozart: Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Symphony No. 41 in C (Jupiter). Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LM 2694, $4.98; stereo LSC 2694, $5.98.

The strings of the Boston Symphony are beautifully regulated to an ensemble effort of exceptional evenness and balance in the Serenade, which is a kind of end achievement in itself. However, the playfulness and fantasy in the music are rather grimly rejected, especially in the Romanza and Minuet. Leinsdorf's conception of the Jupiter is architecturally broad and tonally spacious, to the extent, indeed, that the first side (of over twenty-seven minutes) is unable to accommodate the fugal finale, which is put over to the second side. It, too, is impressively executed, but the total is blandly unexpressive for my taste.

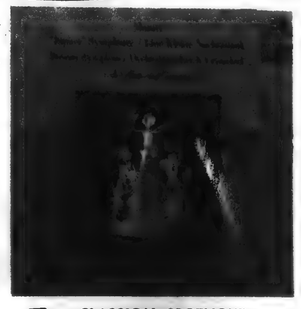
WEST ALLIS, WIS.
STAR
TW. 11,332
MAR 19 1964

MOZART

Symphony No. 41 in C Major, K 551 (Jupiter), Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K 525; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting: RCA Victor LM 2694 (Stereo LSC 2694.

Leinsdorf is a Viennese and thoroughly steeped in the Mozart tradition. It follows, therefore, that, even though Mozart Jupiters and Nachtmusiks are practically a dime a dozen on discs (18 Jupiters and 21 Nachtmusiks), his interpretations should be exceptionally good. They are, especially the dancing Nachtmusik, which is as good as any available. The infectious work is played with sparkling grace and a biting elegance. The Jupiter is, by contrast, somewhat bland although also very good.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
FEB 1 1964



CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

MOZART: JUPITER SYMPHONY/EINE KLEINE NACHTMUSIK

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf)
RCA Victor LM 2694 (M); LSC 2694 (S)

Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, long a favorite of both students and devotees of the classics, is expertly performed by Leinsdorf and the Boston. Artistic cover of LP should do much to catch the eye.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 2 1964 Buffalo

DISKS: TEMPOS

By RAYMOND ERICSON

A QUARTET of Mozart recordings points up a curious fact about European conductors still conducting in Europe and European conductors who have settled in America. It has to do with the relative tempos of symphonic movements. These examples may be coincidental, but they suggest a specific variance in attitudes on interpretation.

On one disk, Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Symphony No. 41 in C (Jupiter) and Eine kleine Nachtmusik (RCA Victor LM 2694; stereo LSC 2694). The "Jupiter" is also on a disk in which Herbert von Karajan leads the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and the companion piece is Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E flat (Drum Roll) (London CM 9369; stereo CS 6369).

Another pair of disks has Mozart's Symphony No. 33 in B flat (K. 319) in common. Istvan Kertesz leads the Vienna Philharmonic in this work and the Symphony No. 39 in E flat (K. 543) (London OS 9354; stereo CS 6354). George Szell conducts his Cleveland Orchestra in No. 33 and in the Divertimento No. 2 in D (K. 131) (Epic LC 3873; stereo BC 1273).

In the "Jupiter" Symphony, it is Mr. Leinsdorf who leads off with the faster tempo — a bracing one—as if to catch the attention of the listener. The whole first movement is imposing and forceful. Mr. Karajan settles for a slower tempo, with more stress on the singing tone of individual voices, as if to say this is the meaty part of the symphony and requires thoughtful elucidation.

There is little difference in tempos for the second and third movements. In the fourth, Mr. Karajan is the one who unleashes the orchestra and whips it along for a breezy finale. Mr. Leinsdorf takes matters more sedately.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

APR 1964 Buffalo

Ⓢ Ⓜ MOZART: Symphony No. 41, in C Major (K. 551, "Jupiter"); Serenade, in G Major (K. 525, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2694 $5.98, LM 2694 $4.98.

With this Erich Leinsdorf-BSO recording, and the recent London release with Karajan and the Vienna Philharmonic, the currently available stereo versions of the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony number one dozen. Like his recent RCA recording of the "Eroica" with the Boston Symphony (LSC/LM 2644), Leinsdorf's reading of the "Jupiter" is expansive and virile, aimed at setting forth the symphony's structure on the largest scale. (As a means to this end, he takes all the repeats in the first, second, and final movements.) In the first movement and in the poignant slow movement, Leinsdorf is 100 per cent successful, but in the minuet and in the colossal sonata-fugue that serves as the finale, I miss the lift and drive that he brought a decade ago to his Rochester Philharmonic performance, once available on Columbia's low-price Harmony label. Of course, the orchestral playing and the recorded sound throughout this new release are infinitely more revealing of detail and nuance than either of Leinsdorf's previous recordings of the "Jupiter," for Harmony and Westminster. But I find his present approach to the minuet and finale fastidious to the point that the music's vitality suffers. Even with this reservation, however, this recording takes its place beside the very different versions by Walter, Toscanini, and Schmidt-Isserstedt as a most distinguished "Jupiter" performance.

For me, the most attractive music-making on this disc is the treatment of the thrice-familiar and ceaselessly abused serenade Eine kleine Nachtmusik. Only the late Erich Kleiber's prewar Telefunken 78's offer such a combination of elegance and spontaneity in this piece. Leinsdorf wisely uses a reduced string section here. It should also be noted that he plays the beginning of the fifth measure in the minuet with an acciaccatura, or short appoggiatura, in accordance with modern editions of the score, rather than with the usually heard even series of eighth-notes. In this he is preceded by the late Felix Weingartner, who played it thus in his wartime performance with the London Symphony on 78's. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

APR 1964 Buffalo

Leinsdorf's Jupiter is faithful—too faithful—to the score. He takes all the repeats, plays everything printed and nothing that's not. With his wonderful orchestra and first-class engineering, he produces a beautifully balanced, antiseptic performance in which there is little to criticize and not much to admire. In the Andante the horns' solo triplets are a bit too soft (they should be on the same dynamic level as the bassoons), and the Minuet strikes me as a trifle slow and lacking in grace. But these are minor matters. The important thing is the air of what might be called painstaking perfunctoriness characteristic of the performance. It is an air that is less noticeable in the Kleine Nachtmusik. Here the Minuet seems rather broad and heavy for this serenade, but the Trio is beautifully played, and the finale has a fine tempo and spirit.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, March 22, 1964

There are three new recordings of Mozart's Symphony No. 41, commonly called 'Jupiter' Symphony. The nickname has no real significance in that Mozart did not give it to the work, but it is helpful in remembering his last great symphony, the great C Major, by a name rather than a number (No. 41, K.551). I have not heard the one by Wand with Cologne Philharmonic (Counterpoint Records). Of the other two, Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony (RCA Victor, m. or s.) and Von Karajan conducting Vienna Philharmonic (London, m. or s.), I prefer Leinsdorf's more intense interpretation. Von Karajan and the Vienna give a sensitive, warmly glowing rendition but fail to realize as fully the dramatic possibilities of the work, especially in the unexpected turns of arresting loveliness of melody and phrasing which Leinsdorf exploits. The Vienna sounds tamer and full of soft sweetness, particularly the beautiful Andante Cantabile (second movement); the Boston sings nobly, building exciting crescendoes with unerring subtlety. The wider span of dynamic contrasts employed by Leinsdorf adds vitality and interest. The Vienna does not approach these satisfying limits from forte to piano and indeed loses dramatic import through static dynamics.

In both readings the details are well defined, but Leinsdorf demands sharper definition, bolder attacks, more rhythmic incisiveness. He presents the powerfully brilliant fourth movement in its entirety. Both interpretations have their own merits. I personally prefer robust Mozart with a refinement that is not overly genteel. Some will prefer the fleshy Viennese softness of the Von Karajan which rounds off the edges of one musical idea into the next.

In this instance, the RCA Victor sound has more presence than the London which gives the impression of distance. The inclusion of Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E Flat Major ('Drum Roll') on the London disk is of more interest to me than the very popular, much recorded 'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik' of Mozart which finishes out the RCA Victor one. Yet for the new or average collector the latter coupling would probably be the more pleasing.

* * *

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Sunday Register
Sun. Circ. 109,204

MAY 10 1964

RECORDS:

Three Releases Show Bostonians In Brilliant Form

RCA Victor plays its big symphonic "trump card" in recent releases. This is, of course, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf dealing out some "winning hands" with a brilliant assist from RCA's Dynagroove recording process. Three records at hand bear aural witness to the aptness of the orchestra's badge of distinction — "The Aristocrat of Orchestras."

Mozart's Symphony No. 41 ("Jupiter") and Eine Kleine Nachmusik are found on one record. Another has Shumann's Symphony No. 4 and Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 as musical companions. The third record is devoted to Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5, one in a series of recordings planned by the Boston Symphony of the late composer's music.

All three records display the Bostonians in their best form, so much so that one can almost overlook the deficiencies in orchestration and the constructional weaknesses in the Schumann work. As for the dynamic and compelling Prokofieff performance here, it recalls the particular affinity of the orchestra for the Russian composer's music under three conductors — Koussevitzky, Munch, and now Leinsdorf.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 2 1964

DISKS: TEMPOS

By RAYMOND ERICSON

A QUARTET of Mozart recordings points up a curious fact about European conductors still conducting in Europe and European conductors who have settled in America. It has to do with the relative tempos of symphonic movements. These examples may be coincidental, but they suggest a specific variance in attitudes on interpretation.

On one disk, Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Symphony No. 41 in C (Jupiter) and Eine kleine Nachtmusik (RCA Victor LM 2694; stereo LSC 2694). The "Jupiter" is also on a disk in which Herbert von Karajan leads the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and the companion piece is Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E flat (Drum Roll) (London CM 9369; stereo CS 6369).

Another pair of disks has Mozart's Symphony No. 33 in B flat (K. 319) in common. Istvan Kertesz leads the Vienna Philharmonic in this work and the Symphony No. 39 in E flat (K. 543) (London OS 9354; stereo CS 6354). George Szell conducts his Cleveland Orchestra in No. 33 and in the Divertimento No. 2 in D (K. 131). (Epic LC 3873; stereo BC 1273).

In the "Jupiter" Symphony, it is Mr. Leinsdorf who leads off with the faster tempo — a bracing one — as if to catch the attention of the listener. The whole first movement is imposing and forceful. Mr. Karajan settles for a slower tempo, with more stress on the singing tone of individual voices, as if to say this is the meaty part of the symphony and requires thoughtful elucidation.

There is little difference in tempos for the second and third movements. In the fourth, Mr. Karajan is the one who unleashes the orchestra and whips it along for a breezy finale. Mr. Leinsdorf takes matters more sedately.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

APR 1964

MOZART: Symphony No. 41, in C Major (K. 551, "Jupiter"); Serenade, in G Major (K. 525, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Victor LSC 2694 $5.98, LM 2694 $4.98.

With this Erich Leinsdorf-BSO recording, and the recent London release with Karajan and the Vienna Philharmonic, the currently available stereo versions of the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony number one dozen. Like his recent RCA recording of the "Eroica" with the Boston Symphony (LSC/LM 2644), Leinsdorf's reading of the "Jupiter" is expansive and virile, aimed at setting forth the symphony's structure on the largest scale. (As a means to this end, he takes all the repeats in the first, second, and final movements.) In the first movement and in the poignant slow movement, Leinsdorf is 100 per cent successful, but in the minuet and in the colossal sonata-fugue that serves as the finale, I miss the lift and drive that he brought a decade ago to his Rochester Philharmonic performance, once available on Columbia's low-price Harmony label. Of course, the orchestral playing and the recorded sound throughout this new release are infinitely more revealing of detail and nuance than either of Leinsdorf's previous recordings of the "Jupiter," for Harmony and Westminster. But I find his present approach to the minuet and finale fastidious to the point that the music's vitality suffers. Even with this reservation, however, this recording takes its place beside the very different versions by Walter, Toscanini, and Schmidt-Isserstedt as a most distinguished "Jupiter" performance.

For me, the most attractive music-making on this disc is the treatment of the thrice-familiar and ceaselessly abused serenade Eine kleine Nachtmusik. Only the late Erich Kleiber's prewar Telefunken 78's offer such a combination of elegance and spontaneity in this piece. Leinsdorf wisely uses a reduced string section here. It should also be noted that he plays the beginning of the fifth measure in the minuet with an acciaccatura, or short appoggiatura, in accordance with modern editions of the score, rather than with the usually heard even series of eighth-notes. In this he is preceded by the late Felix Weingartner, who played it thus in his wartime performance with the London Symphony on 78's. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

APR 1964

Leinsdorf's Jupiter is faithful—too faithful—to the score. He takes all the repeats, plays everything printed and nothing that's not. With his wonderful orchestra and first-class engineering, he produces a beautifully balanced, antiseptic performance in which there is little to criticize and not much to admire. In the Andante the horns' solo triplets are a bit too soft (they should be on the same dynamic level as the bassoons), and the Minuet strikes me as a trifle slow and lacking in grace. But these are minor matters. The important thing is the air of what might be called painstaking perfunctoriness characteristic of the performance. It is an air that is less noticeable in the Kleine Nachtmusik. Here the Minuet seems rather broad and heavy for this serenade, but the Trio is beautifully played, and the finale has a fine tempo and spirit.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, March 22, 1964

There are three new recordings of Mozart's Symphony No. 41, commonly called 'Jupiter' Symphony. The nickname has no real significance in that Mozart did not give it to the work, but it is helpful in remembering his last great symphony, the great C Major, by a name rather than a number. (No. 41, K.551). I have not heard the one by Wand with Cologne Philharmonic (Counterpoint Records). Of the other two, Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony (RCA Victor, mono or s.) and Von Karajan conducting Vienna Philharmonic (London, m. or s.), I prefer Leinsdorf's more intense interpretation. Von Karajan and the Vienna give a sensitive, warmly glowing rendition but fail to realize as fully the dramatic possibilities of the work, especially in the unexpected turns of arresting loveliness of melody and phrasing which Leinsdorf exploits. The Vienna sounds tamer and full of soft sweetness, particularly the beautiful Andante Cantabile (second movement); the Boston sings nobly, building exciting crescendoes with unerring subtlety. The wider span of dynamic contrasts employed by Leinsdorf adds vitality and interest. The Vienna does not approach these satisfying limits from forte to piano and indeed loses dramatic import through static dynamics.

In both readings the details are well defined, but Leinsdorf demands sharper definition, bolder attacks, more rhythmic incisiveness. He presents the powerfully brilliant fourth movement in its entirety. Both interpretations have their own merits. I personally prefer robust Mozart with a refinement that is not overly genteel. Some will prefer the fleshy Viennese softness of the Von Karajan which rounds off the edges of one musical idea into the next.

In this instance, the RCA Victor sound has more presence than the London which gives the impression of distance. The inclusion of Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E Flat Major ('Drum Roll') on the London disk is of more interest to me than the very popular, much recorded 'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik' of Mozart which finishes out the RCA Victor one. Yet for the new or average collector the latter coupling would probably be the more pleasing.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2038, Boston 6 - 742-0200

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Sunday Register
Sun. Circ. 109,204

MAY 10 1964

RECORDS:

Three Releases Show Bostonians In Brilliant Form

RCA Victor plays its big symphonic "trump card" in recent releases. This is, of course, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf dealing out some "winning hands" with a brilliant assist from RCA's Dynagroove recording process. Three records at hand bear aural witness to the aptness of the orchestra's badge of distinction — "The Aristocrat of Orchestras."

Mozart's Symphony No. 41 ("Jupiter") and Eine Kleine Nachmusik are found on one record. Another has Shumann's Symphony No. 4 and Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 as musical companions. The third record is devoted to Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5, one in a series of recordings planned by the Boston Symphony of the late composer's music.

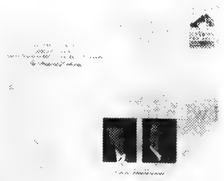
All three records display the Bostonians in their best form, so much so that one can almost overlook the deficiencies in orchestration and the constructional weaknesses in the Schumann work. As for the dynamic and compelling Prokofieff performance here, it recalls the particular affinity of the orchestra for the Russian composer's music under three conductors — Koussevitzky, Munch, and now Leinsdorf.

263

TCHAIKOVSKY'S PIANO CONCERTO #1

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

SEP 12 1963



TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto No. 1, Rubenstein/ Boston Symphony/Leinsdorf — RCA Victor LM2681

Despite the plethora of Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1 recordings already in existence, this new performance by Artur Rubinstein with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf is sure to make its mark as an important entry. It is the first wax marriage for these renowned artists. The pianist's interpretation reflects new enthusiasm and a sensitivity seldom heard. The orchestra brilliance and the fervor of Rubinstein's playing make for a potent listening experience.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1964

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto No. 1 in B flat Minor, Op. 23. Artur Rubinstein, pianist; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA Victor LSC 2681 (Stereo).

When confronted with still another recording of the Tchaikovsky piano concerto, there being almost two dozen currently available, one is likely to wearily wonder if a new one was really necessary. However, a few minutes listening to the one under consideration is eloquent proof that it was not only necessary but supremely right. Rubinstein sweeps through the work with an astonishingly youthful enthusiasm and technical adroitness, completely belying his seventy-five years. But even more satisfying is the magisterial maturity of conception. The melodramatic element is not belabored nor the bravura passages used just to stun the listener, the melodic lines have lovely shape and color and when lilt and grace is required, as in the little waltz in the second movement, it is there in abundance.

Erich Leinsdorf proves to be a magnificent collaborator. While the orchestra, when the occasion demands, plays with almost overpowering verve and passion, the conductor keeps a firm control over both himself and his players, never allowing the music to slip into the sentimental or rhetorical.

RCA's new Dynagroove process is given a real test in a work of such tonal and dynamic range. It meets the test superbly. The surfaces are extremely smooth, the presence quite extraordinary and the tonal range most satisfactory.—Anderson

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

FEB 1964

Ⓢ Ⓜ TCHAIKOVSKY: *Piano Concerto No. 1, in B-flat Minor, Op. 23. Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2681 $5.98, LM 2681 $4.98.

Interest: Pianistic warhorse
Performance: Straightforward
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good.

At long last the Tchaikovsky B-flat Minor Concerto has been recorded, in Boston, the city of its 1875 world premiere, by the soloist whose performance with Barbirolli and the London Symphony Orchestra on 78-rpm discs in the early 1930's was a touchstone for collectors of that day. The approach to this music by Artur Rubinstein and Erich Leinsdorf seems much the same as that of Philippe Entremont and Leonard Bernstein for Columbia: a search for a valid synthesis of brilliance and unabashed lyricism. But for all the conscientiousness and skill they lavish upon this performance, Rubinstein and Leinsdorf seem unable to match either the dynamic thrust or the delicacy of their younger colleagues. This is particularly noticeable in the slow movement, where the scherzando episode surprisingly lacks sparkle. Nor do I find in the finale the frenetic excitement that Rubinstein brought to his old London Symphony recording.

As a long-time admirer of Rubinstein's art, I regret that I cannot summon up more enthusiasm for this recorded performance. RCA has done a good recording job, even to capturing unerringly the rather hard tone of the solo piano's middle register. D. H.

MOUNT KISCO, N. Y.
PATENT TRADER
YORKTOWN EDITION
THURS. 17,200 SUN. 16,400

FEB 2 1964

Tchaikowsky's Piano Concerto No. 1. Artur Rubinstein with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Artur Rubinstein, one of the two great exponents of the Romantic era in his style, here addresses himself to a work that is both romantic and showy. It is in practically every pianist's repertoire and shows no sign of wearing out its welcome.

Each pianist has his own interpretation, not too widely differentiated because Tchaikowsky was fairly explicit in writing this concerto. It was devised not only to exhibit brilliant pianism but also to bring alive the composer's pervading lyricism.

Rubinstein's way with this work, I would say, is to lean backward rather than to give way to sentimentalism, as if he remembered that Tchaikowsky revered Mozart. In this attitude he has the support of Leinsdorf.

Whether this concerto has been played and recorded too often or not, it remains in so many repertoires because of its strong appeal. Speaking as one who has no love of the Tchaikowsky symphonies, except for the Fourth, I must say that this concerto stands up well. With Rubinstein, of course, it has the best possible interpretation.

Nor could the Boston Symphony be bettered.

Stereo (RCA Victor Dynagroove LM 2681)

The Courier-Journal
LOUISVILLE, KY.
D. 220,140 S. 324,549

SEP 29 1963

Discs In Brief

Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto No. 1, Artur Rubinstein, pianist; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. (Victor LSC 2681). Is there anyone left who doesn't have a performance of this warhorse in his record library? Apparently not, as unbelievable as it seems. Rubinstein, of course, is a reliable salesman for its gaudy extravagances.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

The Pilot
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 155,000

DEC 14 1963

STRAUSS: Ein Heldenlebn. Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA stereo or mono 2641).

Leinsdorf and his men play this for all its worth, and if I still like other works of Strauss better than this it is certainly not the fault of the performance. The sound is remarkably clear and very close-up, losing some of the sense of space that can be found in other stereo recordings. I still don't like the way soft passages aren't soft enough, but the detail is lovely.

TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1. Rubinstein, Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony (RCA stereo or mono 2681).

It's true; Rubinstein is a marvel. No allowance at all need be made for his advanced age; indeed, it brings a gloriously mellow and mature richness to the fire he has always had. The result is cohesive, unified Tchaikovsky, not big sobbing or declaiming melodies set off by lots of fireworks. Every ornament fits in, not on and makes musical sense. Leinsdorf is hand-in-glove, and RCA (with my usual reservations about Dynagroove —see above) has done well by both.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

DEC 1963

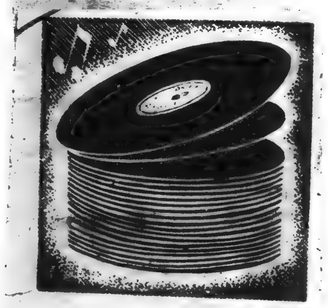
TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 23; Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2681, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2681, $5.98.

Ⓢ THIS is Rubinstein's fourth recording of the familiar war-horse. One of the three previous ones was not released because, as Rubinstein says in a radio interview that is transcribed on the back of the jacket in lieu of program notes: "I played it too badly." Be that as it may, this latest version—his first recorded collaboration with Erich Leinsdorf—is probably the most magnificent performance of the work he has given us to date. Both pianist and conductor succeed in doing what they say in the aforementioned interview that they set out to do—to "re-establish the beautiful, beautiful piece it is." In other words, by searching the score for its musical values rather than its opportunities for virtuosic display, they have restored the work to something like its pristine freshness. It is what Mr. Leinsdorf calls "a performance and not 359 snippets" (of spliced tape). In other words, it comes off like an inspired improvisation. Rubinstein plays with regal aplomb and daring, with all the freedom of the grand manner, and with all of that sensuous beauty of tone for which he has long been noted. Leinsdorf and his Bostonians are with him wholeheartedly all the way. —R.K.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108

OCT 27 1963



THE FIRST COLLABORATION on records by Artur Rubinstein and Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been released by RCA (LM-2681) and the music, equally famous, is the Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1. This is a musical document of genuine worth. Seasoned musicians have put musical values ahead of pure technical display, either from soloist or orchestra, and what we hear is an unusually beautiful performance of this melodious masterpiece.

SAN FRANCISCO
News Call Bulletin
D. 190,260 SAT. 162,823

OCT 19 1963

A fresh look is what Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto receives in a new Victor recording by Artur Rubinstein with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

This is not the big, sweeping, romantic view of a Cliburn, however attractive that may be. Rather, it's a more elfin, impetuous—and yet completely relaxed—interpretation.

It's unusually free of extremes, yet fully stocked with expensive effects. Witness the grotesque whimsy of the first theme after the famous introduction, and the wistful lyricism, the sense of wonder, in the dreamy theme which follows.

Leinsdorf's clean-cut, structure-clarifying conducting is completely attuned to Rubinstein's keyboard philosophy. And the Boston maestro deserves special laurels for the affectionate wind phrasing at the end of the slow movement.

—Arthur Bloomfield

Baltimore American
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN. 312,266

OCT 6 1963

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN presents his third recording of Tchaikovsky's over - recorded "Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor, Op. 23" on RCA Victor, accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf (LSC 2681, $5.98). According to the liner notes, Rubinstein is trying, in this recording, "to re-establish the beautiful, beautiful piece (this) is." He also feels this music has been used too much as a war horse for pianists who are only set on playing it quickly, pulling off the octaves at a tremendous ace, showing off their strength nd so on. Rubinstein feels this not making music, and it is hat he has been trying not to

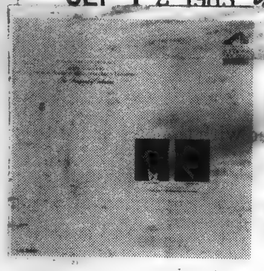
ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
Third Recording.
Robt. E. Benson

Rubinstein does take a decidedly lyrical approach to the score, but if one is interested in that approach, it can be found better stated in the impressive Sviatoslav Richter recording on Deutsche Grammophon with Herbert von Karajan conducting, which also has the advantage of warm, resonant reproduction superior to this new disc.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S PIANO CONCERTO #1

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 12 1963



TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto No. 1, Rubenstein/ Boston Symphony/Leinsdorf — RCA Victor LM2681

Despite the plethora of Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1 recordings already in existence, this new performance by Artur Rubinstein with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf is sure to make its mark as an important entry. It is the first wax marriage for these renowned artists. The pianist's interpretation reflects new enthusiasm and a sensitivity seldom heard. The orchestra brilliance and the fervor of Rubinstein's playing make for a potent listening experience.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1964

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto No. 1 in B flat Minor, Op. 23. Artur Rubinstein, pianist; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA Victor LSC 2681 (Stereo).

When confronted with still another recording of the Tchaikovsky piano concerto, there being almost two dozen currently available, one is likely to wearily wonder if a new one was really necessary. However, a few minutes listening to the one under consideration is eloquent proof that it was not only necessary but supremely right. Rubinstein sweeps through the work with an astonishingly youthful enthusiasm and technical adroitness, completely belying his seventy-five years. But even more satisfying is the magisterial maturity of conception. The melodramatic element is not belabored nor the bravura passages used just to stun the listener, the melodic lines have lovely shape and color and when lilt and grace is required, as in the little waltz in the second movement, it is there in abundance.

Erich Leinsdorf proves to be a magnificent collaborator. While the orchestra, when the occasion demands, plays with almost overpowering verve and passion, the conductor keeps a firm control over both himself and his players, never allowing the music to slip into the sentimental or rhetorical.

RCA's new Dynagroove process is given a real test in a work of such tonal and dynamic range. It meets the test superbly. The surfaces are extremely smooth, the presence quite extraordinary and the tonal range most satisfactory.—Anderson

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

FEB 1964

⑤ ⑧ TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1, in B-flat Minor, Op. 23. Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2681 $5.98, LM 2681 $4.98.

Interest: Pianistic warhorse
Performance: Straightforward
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good

At long last the Tchaikovsky B-flat Minor Concerto has been recorded, in Boston, the city of its 1875 world premiere, by the soloist whose performance with Barbirolli and the London Symphony Orchestra on 78-rpm discs in the early 1930's was a touchstone for collectors of that day. The approach to this music by Artur Rubinstein and Erich Leinsdorf seems much the same as that of Philippe Entremont and Leonard Bernstein for Columbia: a search for a valid synthesis of brilliance and unabashed lyricism. But for all the conscientiousness and skill they lavish upon this performance, Rubinstein and Leinsdorf seem unable to match either the dynamic thrust or the delicacy of their younger colleagues. This is particularly noticeable in the slow movement, where the scherzando episode surprisingly lacks sparkle. Nor do I find in the finale the frenetic excitement that Rubinstein brought to his old London Symphony recording.

As a long-time admirer of Rubinstein's art, I regret that I cannot summon up more enthusiasm for this recorded performance. RCA has done a good recording job, even to capturing unerringly the rather hard tone of the solo piano's middle register. D. H.

MOUNT KISCO, N. Y.
PATENT TRADER
YORKTOWN EDITION
THURS. 17,200 SUN. 16,400

FEB 2 1964

Tchaikowsky's Piano Concerto No. 1. Artur Rubinstein with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Artur Rubinstein, one of the two great exponents of the Romantic era in his style, here addresses himself to a work that is both romantic and showy. It is in practically every pianist's repertoire and shows no sign of wearing out its welcome.

Each pianist has his own interpretation, not too widely differentiated because Tchaikowsky was fairly explicit in writing this concerto. It was devised not only to exhibit brilliant pianism but also to bring alive the composer's pervading lyricism.

Rubinstein's way with this work, I would say, is to lean backward rather than to give way to sentimentalism, as if he remembered that Tchaikowsky revered Mozart. In this attitude he has the support of Leinsdorf.

Whether this concerto has been played and recorded too often or not, it remains in so many repertoires because of its strong appeal. Speaking as one who has no love of the Tchaikovsky symphonies, except for the Fourth, I must say that this concerto stands up well. With Rubinstein, of course, it has the best possible interpretation.

Nor could the Boston Symphony be bettered.

Stereo (RCA Victor Dynagroove LM 2681)

The Courier-Journal
LOUISVILLE, KY.
D. 220,140 S. 324,549

SEP 29 1963

Discs In Brief

Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto No. 1, Artur Rubinstein, pianist; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. (Victor LSC 2681). Is there anyone left who doesn't have a performance of this warhorse in his record library? Apparently not, as unbelievable as it seems. Rubinstein, of course, is a reliable salesman for its gaudy extravagances.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

The Pilot
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 155,000

DEC 14 1963

STRAUSS: Ein Heldenlebn. Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA stereo or mono 2641).

Leinsdorf and his men play this for all its worth, and if I still like other works of Strauss better than this it is certainly not the fault of the performance. The sound is remarkably clear and very close-up, losing some of the sense of space that can be found in other stereo recordings. I still don't like the way soft passages aren't soft enough, but the detail is lovely.

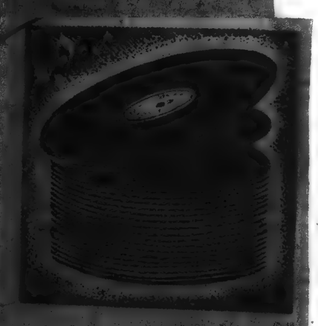
TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1. Rubinstein, Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony (RCA stereo or mono 2681).

It's true; Rubinstein is a marvel. No allowance at all need be made for his advanced age; indeed, it brings a gloriously mellow and mature richness to the fire he has always had. The result is cohesive, unified Tchaikovsky, not big sobbing or declaiming melodies set off by lots of fireworks. Every ornament fits in, not on and makes musical sense. Leinsdorf is hand-in-glove, and RCA (with my usual reservations about Dynagroove —see above) has done well by both.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108

OCT 27 1963



THE FIRST COLLABORATION on records by Artur Rubinstein and Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been released by RCA (LM-2681) and the music, equally famous, is the Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1. This is a musical document of genuine worth. Seasoned musicians have put musical values ahead of pure technical display, either from soloist or orchestra, and what we hear is an unusually beautiful performance of this

SAN FRANCISCO
News Call Bulletin
D. 190,260 SAT. 162,823

OCT 19 1963

A fresh look is what Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto receives in a new Victor recording by Artur Rubinstein with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

This is not the big, sweeping, romantic view of a Cliburn, however attractive that may be. Rather, it's a more elfin, impetuous—and yet completely relaxed—interpretation.

It's unusually free of extremes, yet fully stocked with expensive effects. Witness the grotesque whimsy of the first theme after the famous introduction, and the wistful lyricism, the sense of wonder, in the dreamy theme which follows.

Leinsdorf's clean-cut, structure-clarifying conducting is completely attuned to Rubinstein's keyboard philosophy. And the Boston maestro deserves special laurels for the affectionate wind phrasing at the end of the slow movement.

—Arthur Bloomfield

Baltimore American
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN. 312,266

OCT 6 1963

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN presents his third recording of Tchaikovsky's over - recorded "Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor, Op. 23" on RCA Victor, accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf (LSC 2681, $5.98). According to the liner notes, Rubinstein is trying, in this recording, "to re-establish the beautiful, beautiful piece (this) is." He also feels this music has been used too much as a war horse for pianists who are only set on playing it quickly, pulling off the octaves at a tremendous pace, showing off their strength and so on. Rubinstein feels this is not making music, and it is what he has been trying not to

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
Third Recording.

Rubinstein does take a decidedly lyrical approach to the score, but if one is interested in that approach, it can be found better stated in the impressive Sviatoslav Richter recording on Deutsche Grammophon with Herbert von Karajan conducting, which also has the advantage of warm, resonant reproduction superior to this new

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

DEC 1963

TCHAIKOVSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 23; Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2681, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2681, $5.98.

⑧THIS is Rubinstein's fourth recording of the familiar war-horse. One of the three previous ones was not released because, as Rubinstein says in a radio interview that is transcribed on the back of the jacket in lieu of program notes: "I played it too badly." Be that as it may, this latest version—his first recorded collaboration with Erich Leinsdorf—is probably the most magnificent performance of the work he has given us to date. Both pianist and conductor succeed in doing what they say in the aforementioned interview that they set out to do—to "re-establish the beautiful, beautiful piece it is." In other words, by searching the score for its musical values rather than its opportunities for virtuosic display, they have restored the work to something like its pristine freshness. It is what Mr. Leinsdorf calls "a performance and not 359 snippets" (of spliced tape). In other words, it comes off like an inspired improvisation. Rubinstein plays with regal aplomb and daring, with all the freedom of the grand manner, and with all of that sensuous beauty of tone for which he has long been noted. Leinsdorf and his Bostonians are with him wholeheartedly all the way. —R.K.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

OCT 2 0 1963

FIRST—Artur Rubinstein, right, and Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, ready their initial recording together, devoted to Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto.

RECORDS: A YOUTHFUL 75

By RAYMOND ERICSON

THE observation that youth is wasted on the young does not apply to Artur Rubinstein. Although the pianist will celebrate his 75th birthday on Jan. 28, he knows what to do with his youthful spirit and energy—to temper it with the wisdom and experience of his years and pour it into the music he plays.

These thoughts are occasioned by his recent recording of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf (RCA Victor LM 2681; stereo LSC 2681).

Mr. Rubinstein fills his performance with a fire and surge that would do credit to someone a third his age. At the same time, he brings to it the subtlety of detail, the naturalness of expression, the unsentimentality that mark the mature, complete artist. The concerto's various moods blend into a harmonious yet exhilarating whole in his hands. Like the good collaborator he is, Mr. Leinsdorf has whipped his orchestra into a performance of comparable brilliance and momentum.

Fort Worth Star-Telegram
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
D. 105,967 S. 211,467

NOV 2 4 1963

TCHAIKOVSKY: "Concerto No. 1 in B-flat Minor." Arthur Rubinstein with Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA Victor LM/LSC-2681.

This is the first collaboration of Rubinstein and Leinsdorf on records. Referring to this recording, Rubinstein said, "The piece has been used too much as a war horse for pianists who are only set on playing it quickly, pulling off the octaves at tremendous pace. I try to re-establish the beautiful piece it is." Accordingly here is an unhurried, thoughtful interpretation, at once postic and brilliant, not failing to electrify in the brilliant climaxes. The ringing piano tone, especially in slower declamatory passages, is remarkably reproduced in the process of recording.

The New York Times
WESTERN EDITION
D. 100,000

OCT 2 1 1963

Records: Rubinstein Brings Wisdom And Vigor to Tchaikovsky

By RAYMOND ERICSON

Special to The New York Times

NEW YORK.

THE observation that youth is wasted on the young does not apply to Artur Rubinstein. Although the pianist will celebrate his 75th birthday on Jan. 28, he knows what to do with his youthful spirit and energy—to temper it with the wisdom and experience of his years and pour it into the music he plays.

These thoughts are occasioned by his recent recording of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf (RCA Victor LM 2681; stereo LSC 2681).

Mr. Rubinstein fills his performance with a fire and surge that would do credit to someone a third his age. At the same time, he brings to it the subtlety of detail, the naturalness of expression, the unsentimentality that mark the mature, complete artist. The concerto's various moods blend into a harmonious yet exhilarating whole in his hands. Like the good collaborator he is, Mr. Leinsdorf has whipped his orchestra into a performance of comparable brilliance and momentum.

NEWARK EVENING NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.

SEP 2 2 1963

WED CLIPPING SERVIC
CALDWELL, N. J.
CApital 6-4044

Listening to Recc

Piano

By PAUL AFFELDER

Back in the days before the long-playing disc, Artur Rubinstein made a recording of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat Minor that was long considered the definitive interpretation. Now he has remade the concerto for RCA Victor for the first time in stereo, with the admirable assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

This is one of the many works for which Rubinstein has been renowned throughout his long and distinguished career. His performance here is big, broad, unhurried and on a grand scale, and he takes time to allow even the most rapid passages to come through clearly. The reproduction is excellent, though the overall volume level need not have been pushed quite so high.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

SEP 8 1963

SCENE and HEARD

By ATRA BAER

AT 74, ARTUR RUBINSTEIN must loathe being called a "living legend." The phrase is one that somehow carries a connotation of past glories standing slightly faded in the light of the present.

Rubinstein is a working artist who produces. Neither his age nor his fame should prevent him from being evaluated as such.

Last May, Rubinstein displayed the candor which characterized his youthful years, and the self-criticism which has been a constant quality, as he told a European admirer: "I have never played Brahms better."

●

FEW critics—professional or amateur—have ever questioned the strength of emotion and the depth of insight that are Rubinstein's. From time to time, quite a few have questioned his fingers. But perhaps while pouncing on a missed note — (how many things are more egogratifying than the prompt recognition of somebody else's mistakes?) — perhaps they missed a great thought.

There was a time in Rubinstein's career when his approach to the piano was rather cavalier. Were Rubinstein a jazz musician other musicians would have called it "hacking around" or "lazy." A "laziness" that sprang from believing the praise that implied this-man-can-do-no-wrong. It is something that has happened to many artists; artists in all fields. The great ones recognize it before it destroys them. And there is genius in the fact of that recognition.

Earlier this year, Rubinstein recorded the Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1 with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. RCA Victor has just released the recording (LM/LSC 2681), and it is a revelation of genius.

●

YOU just may have picked up rumors that Mr. Leinsdorf is not the "easiest" of conductors. If he is less than satisfied with the performance of a soloist, the soloist is not unaware.

This recording of the Tchaikovsky First is the third for Rubinstein—but the second for listeners.

"One recording was not issued because I played it too badly," he has admitted.

RCA Victor says that the decision not to release that particular recording was Rubinstein's alone. And that his decision might well have marked the resurgence in his art.

During a radio interview following the recording session in Boston, Mr. Leinsdorf commented:

"Isn't it true," Mr. Rubinstein, that the meaning of the concerto has often been lost. A very refreshing thing in recording it with you, if I may say so, was that you are fully convinced, and have convinced everybody in the orchestra, of the meaning of the work—what is majestic is majestic, what is scherzando is scherzando and the little waltz in the second movement is not a prestissimo where you can't hear the notes, but a waltz again. This I found so marvelously stimulating and refreshing — that the meaning of the work has been re-established."

"I try," answered Artur Rubinstein, "to re-establish the beautiful, beautiful piece it is. It is a piece of genius for the piano which has been, over the years, used too much as a war horse for pianists who are only set on playing it quickly, pulling off the octaves at tremendous pace. Showing off their strength and so on. That is not making music. This is what I have not tried to do."

"Well," countered Mr. Leinsdorf, "I think you know that this is a completely mutual admiration society."

A society with worldwide membership.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780

SEP 2 2 1963

Listening to Recc

Piano

By PAUL AFFELDER

Back in the days before the long-playing disc, Artur Rubinstein made a recording of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat Minor that was long considered the definitive interpretation. Now he has remade the concerto for RCA Victor for the first time in stereo, with the admirable assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

This is one of the many works for which Rubinstein has been renowned throughout his long and distinguished career. His performance here is big, broad, unhurried and on a grand scale, and he takes time to allow even the most rapid passages to come through clearly. The reproduction is excellent, though the overall volume level need not have been pushed quite so high.

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

270

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020
SEP 22 1963

TCHAIKOWSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1, with Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf (Victor). After so many heaven-storming versions of the familiar Tchaikowsky, it is gratifying to hear a pianist who stresses its lyrical and rhapsodic qualities. Rubinstein has, of course, recorded it before but, to my knowledge, never with more warmth and tonal beauty. Leinsdorf and the Bostonians are in happy accord and the whole thing can be highly recommended.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,174
OCT 26 1963

Tchaikovsky: Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor. Artur Rubinstein, piano, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2681, $4.98; stereo LSC-2681, $5.98.

Two reputable artists have rarely produced so distorted a representation of a standard work as in this collaboration by a pianist who seems to have forgotten his feeling for the composer and a conductor who has never had any such feeling. The objective, so we are told, is to present a "musical approach" to this much-played work, but this is hardly the first word that comes to mind to describe the lethargic tempo of the first movement, or the dull thuds of the timpani that result from the hard driven orchestra in the tuttis. Very clear, sharp sound which does not do justice to the lower ranges of Rubinstein's dynamics.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
FEB 1964

could praise it even more warmly if only it had made clearly audible the full series of midnight chimes strokes at the beginning of The Nightwanderer's Song section (slighted in all other Zarathustra recordings I know of). The chimes become apparent a bit earlier here than in the Reiner taping, but I'm still unable to hear the very first stroke and I'm still looking forward to a recording in which it is vividly spotlighted—as Strauss surely intended it to be.

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23

Artur Rubinstein, piano; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. • • RCA VICTOR FTC 2148. 33 min. $8.95.

Except for the Horowitz/Toscanini version, few readings of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto have enjoyed longer or wider favor than Rubinstein's. So the pianist's matured re-recording, in stereo, is particularly welcome both to his old admirers and to younger listeners seeking a more Olympian interpretation than most recent ones. This is a truly magisterial performance in its nobility, firm control, and unrushed drive. It is notable too for the breadth and warmth of its orchestral accompaniment, which includes

Continued on next page

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 218,345 S. 654,561
NOV 3 1963

NO PYROTECHNICS FOR RUBINSTEIN

Tchaikovsky Concerto Gets Thoughtful Interpretation

By EDWIN L. BOLTON

The trend in performing the Tchaikovsky PIANO CONCERTO NO. 1, with the aim of pumping something new into a tired horse, has been to wind it up tighter and tighter. Tempos have been reined in and the work dressed increasingly for sheer display.

Sometimes the effect has been that of beating a tired horse, rather than spurring him.

Now we have Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf reopening the subject in a version that borders on the heretical (RCA LSC-2681).

Rubinstein chooses not to try to outpound or outrace everyone else, and Leinsdorf goes along with the easy and unpretentious treatment.

To some listeners, weary of high pressure playing, this recording will attract for its natural, comfortable quality, with excitement arrived at in proper course. To listeners who say the concerto must strike instant fever and must never be relaxed, this reading will disappoint, perhaps irritate.

NEW RECORDS

Be assured it is a consistent and integrated interpretation, however, and it is a pleasure to hear all the notes, laid out uncluttered and clear. The playing is thoughtful, rather than weak—lest anyone infer that Rubinstein is off the pace because he is almost 75. He and Leinsdorf, in their first recording together, must be credited with forcing us to re-examine a piece about which we have gone blase.

No one can quibble about the brilliance of the playing of Byron Janis in the Liszt PIANO CONCERTOS NOS. 1 AND 2 (Mercury SR-90329), with the Moscow Philharmonic under Kyril Kondrashin and the Moscow Radio Symphony under Gennadi Rozhdestvensky. These, recorded in Moscow, capture full Lisztian keyboard flare and fire, although—particularly in the Second Concerto—the orchestra has not always the same keen edge as Janis.

EDWIN L. BOLTON is an assistant news editor and music reviewer for the Minneapolis Star.

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

270

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-420

Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020

SEP 22 1963

TCHAIKOWSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1, with Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf (Victor). After so many heaven-storming versions of the familiar Tchaikovsky, it is gratifying to hear a pianist who stresses its lyrical and rhapsodic qualities. Rubinstein has, of course, recorded it before but, to my knowledge, never with more warmth and tonal beauty. Leinsdorf and the Bostonians are in happy accord and the whole thing can be highly recommended.

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 218,345 S. 654,581

NOV 3 1963

NO PYROTECHNICS FOR RUBINSTEIN

Tchaikovsky Concerto Gets Thoughtful Interpretation

By EDWIN L. BOLTON

The trend in performing the Tchaikovsky PIANO CONCERTO NO. 1, with the aim of pumping something new into a tired horse, has been to wind it up tighter and tighter. Tempos have been reined in and the work dressed increasingly for sheer display.

Sometimes the effect has been that of beating a tired horse, rather than spurring him.

Now we have Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf reopening the subject in a version that borders on the heretical (RCA LSC-2681).

Rubinstein chooses not to try to outpound or outrace everyone else, and Leinsdorf goes along with the easy and unpretentious treatment.

To some listeners, weary of high pressure playing, this recording will attract for its natural, comfortable quality, with excitement arrived at in proper course. To listeners who say the concerto must strike instant fever and must never be relaxed, this reading will disappoint, perhaps irritate.

Be assured it is a consistent and integrated interpretation, however, and it is a pleasure to hear all the notes, laid out uncluttered and clear. The playing is thoughtful, rather than weak—lest anyone infer that Rubinstein is off the pace because he is almost 75. He and Leinsdorf, in their first recording together, must be credited with forcing us to re-examine a piece about which we have gone blase.

No one can quibble about the brilliance of the playing of Byron Janis in the Lisxt PIANO CONCERTOS NOS. 1 AND 2 (Mercury SR-90329), with the Moscow Philharmonic under Kyril Kondrashin and the Moscow Radio Symphony under Gennadi Rozhdestvensky. These, recorded in Moscow, capture full Lisztian keyboard flare and fire, although—particularly in the Second Concerto—the orchestra has not always the same keen edge as Janis.

EDWIN L. BOLTON is an assistant news editor and music reviewer for the Minneapolis Star.

NEW RECORDS

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
M. 298,174

OCT 26 1963

Tchaikovsky: Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor. Artur Rubinstein, piano, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2681, $4.98; stereo LSC-2681, $5.98.

Two reputable artists have rarely produced so distorted a representation of a standard work as in this collaboration by a pianist who seems to have forgotten his feeling for the composer and a conductor who has never had any such feeling! The objective, so we are told, is to present a "musical approach" to this much-played work, but this is hardly the first word that comes to mind to describe the lethargic tempo of the first movement, or the dull thuds of the timpani that result from the hard driven orchestra in the tuttis. Very clear, sharp sound which does not do justice to the lower ranges of Rubinstein's dynamics.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

FEB 1964

could praise it even more warmly if only it had made clearly audible the full series of midnight chimes strokes at the beginning of The Nightwanderer's Song section (slighted in all other Zarathustra recordings I know of). The chimes become apparent a bit earlier here than in the Reiner taping, but I'm still unable to hear the very first stroke and I'm still looking forward to a recording in which it is vividly spotlighted—as Strauss surely intended it to be.

TCHAIKOVSKY: Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23

Artur Rubinstein, piano; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. • • RCA VICTOR ARC 2148. 33 min. $8.95.

Except for the Horowitz/Toscanini version, few readings of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto have enjoyed longer or wider favor than Rubinstein's. So the pianist's matured re-recording, in stereo, is particularly welcome both to his old admirers and to younger listeners seeking a more Olympian interpretation than most recent ones. This is a truly magisterial performance in its nobility, firm control, and unrushed drive. It is notable too for the breadth and warmth of its orchestral accompaniment, which includes

Continued on next page

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

270

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-420

Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020

SEP 22 1963

TCHAIKOWSKY: Piano Concerto No. 1, with Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf (Victor). After so many heaven-storming versions of the familiar Tchaikowsky, it is gratifying to hear a pianist who stresses its lyrical and rhapsodic qualities. Rubinstein has, of course, recorded it before but, to my knowledge, never with more warmth and tonal beauty. Leinsdorf and the Bostonians are in happy accord and the whole thing can be highly recommended.

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 218,345 S. 654,561

NOV 3 1963

NO PYROTECHNICS FOR RUBINSTEIN

Tchaikovsky Concerto Gets Thoughtful Interpretation

By EDWIN L. BOLTON

The trend in performing the Tchaikovsky PIANO CONCERTO NO. 1, with the aim of pumping something new into a tired horse, has been to wind it up tighter and tighter. Tempos have been reined in and the work dressed increasingly for sheer display.

Sometimes the effect has been that of beating a tired horse, rather than spurring him.

Now we have Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf reopening the subject in a version that borders on the heretical (RCA LSC-2681).

Rubinstein chooses not to try to outpound or outrace everyone else, and Leinsdorf goes along with the easy and unpretentious treatment.

To some listeners, weary of high pressure playing, this recording will attract for its natural, comfortable quality, with excitement arrived at in proper course. To listeners who say the concerto must strike instant fever, and must never be relaxed, this reading will disappoint, perhaps irritate.

NEW RECORDS

Be assured it is a consistent and integrated interpretation, however, and it is a pleasure to hear all the notes, laid out uncluttered and clear. The playing is thoughtful, rather than weak—lest anyone infer that Rubinstein is off the pace because he is almost 75. He and Leinsdorf, in their first recording together, must be credited with forcing us to re-examine a piece about which we have gone blase.

No one can quibble about the brilliance of the playing of Byron Janis in the Liszt PIANO CONCERTOS NOS. 1 AND 2 (Mercury SR-90329), with the Moscow Philharmonic under Kyril Kondrashin and the Moscow Radio Symphony under Gennadi Rozhdestvensky. These, recorded in Moscow, capture full Lisztian keyboard flare and fire, although—particularly in the Second Concerto—the orchestra has not always the same keen edge as Janis.

EDWIN L. BOLTON is an assistant news editor and music reviewer for the Minneapolis Star.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
C. 298,174

OCT 26 1963

Tchaikovsky: Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor. Artur Rubinstein, piano, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2681, $4.98; stereo LSC-2681, $5.98.

Two reputable artists have rarely produced so distorted a representation of a standard work as in this collaboration by a pianist who seems to have forgotten his feeling for the composer and a conductor who has never had any such feeling. The objective, so we are told, is to present a "musical approach" to this much-played work, but this is hardly the first word that comes to mind to describe the lethargic tempo of the first movement, or the dull thuds of the timpani that result from the hard driven orchestra in the tuttis. Very clear, sharp sound which does not do justice to the lower ranges of Rubinstein's dynamics.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

FEB 1964

THE TAPE DECK

Continued from preceding page

a flute solo in the slow movement that well matches Rubinstein's own lyrical eloquence. Except for a few slight pre-echoes, the tape processing is fine, too, and while the recorded sonic qualities may not appeal equally to all ears (to mine they are slightly lacking in vividness), they are mightily impressive for their strength, excellent balances, and the bold "ring" of piano tone. Over-all, I'd rank this reel as the generally preferable tape choice (displacing Cliburn's, which in comparison now seems less vital and dramatically gripping). It is technically more satisfactory than perhaps any of the Boston Dynagroove releases to date, although I still crave a more complete return to the natural reverberance of Symphony Hall. But since this is the most recent Boston recording session (May 1963) represented on tape, I'm hoping that it may forecast a change in the handling of acoustical ambiences in Dynagroove.

STRAUSS EIN HELDENLEBEN

271

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,110

NOV 1963

STRAUSS, RICHARD: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• RCA VICTOR LM 2641. LP. $4.98.
• • RCA VICTOR LSC 2641. SD. $5.98.

By my reckoning there have been three great recordings of this music, each representing a different artistic approach: first is the old Mengelberg version, made with the New York Philharmonic more than thirty years ago and documenting the skill of the conductor to whom the score was dedicated; next comes the Reiner-Chicago edition, a landmark in early stereo recording; and finally, there is the Beecham memorial album. The two former sets were once available on RCA Victor; the latter remains in the catalogue on the Capitol label.

In this company the present release is a disappointment. I think this is largely due to the sound, for the set has been heavily "Dynagrooved" and the effect is rather like hearing it with extreme Fletcher-Munson compensation. If you're not going to play it very loud, this is not serious, but Heldenleben is music to be played loud or not at all. To do so with normal frequency emphasis demands that you eliminate the high degree of loudness compensation at the extremes of the high and low frequencies. Even with the control flexibility of first-rate equipment, I was unable to do this to my complete satisfaction, and the resultant sound gave a high-gloss, superficial character to the performance.

I was further disturbed by faulty balances, occasions when the main thematic line would drop below the level of the accompaniments, and by the muddied quality of the Battle sequence. My respect for Leinsdorf is too high to lead me to conclude that he was responsible for all this. This leaves us with a Heldenleben that has many merits, but one which I am reluctant to judge artistically until I can hear it from tape or a non-Dynagroove disc version. R.C.M.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

NOV 1963

R. STRAUSS: Ein Heldenleben; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2641, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2641, $5.98.

Ⓢ THE disciplined playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, respect for Strauss's directions, clarification of the score's elaborate textures, and an exceedingly smooth recording (with, however, the extreme dynamics scaled down) are the pleasures of this release.

Certainly, however, choosing a recorded Heldenleben is not an easy task. Leinsdorf's wants, I think, a stronger infusion of the kind of lyric grace and expressive persuasiveness Beecham gave us, but on the other hand Beecham's does not communicate the vitality [illegible] in the many extrovert sections of the work, and Ormandy's (the only other well-recorded and well-played competitor), for all its vigor and blazing virtuosity, misses most of the poetry. A new recording of Karl Böhm's marvelous performance might provide a Heldenleben around which everyone could rally. In the meantime, you pays your money and you takes your choice. —C.J.L.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

SEP 28 1963

RICHARD STRAUSS: Ein Heldenleben, with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf (Victor). The most notable aspect of Leinsdorf's interpretation is the crystal clarity of the orchestral texture. Even in the most complicated, heavily orchestrated passages, the listener can hear details that are normally lost in the mass of sound. The Boston conductor's tempi are inclined toward the deliberate, which robs the work of a great deal of its inherent excitement. In this respect, the Ormandy-Philadelphia Orchestra recording for Columbia is considerably more impressive, although the sound is not quite in Victor's class.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

Ⓢ Ⓜ STRAUSS: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2641 $5.98, LM 2641* $4.98.

Interest: Strauss as hero
Performance: Taut and brilliant
Recording: Vivid
Stereo Quality: Good

The full-blown romantic extraversion of this tone-poem realization of Strauss' hero-self has been most recently projected in brilliant fashion by Eugene Ormandy in his Columbia recording. Erich Leinsdorf's approach, by contrast, is much more taut. Thus the initial character portrayal, the set-to with the critics, and the love sections with solo violin are gone through with a minimum of waste motion and sentimentality. But when challenges arise, such as the problems of bringing the fullest musical and dramatic coherence to the battle scene and the cunningly woven tapestry of quotations from earlier Strauss scores, then the hero emerges, abjuring his pose, and springs to fascinating full-blooded life under Leinsdorf's baton. The combination of virtuosic generalship, virtuosic Boston playing, and virtuosic recording is all but unbeatable from the battle scene until the final solo violin episode.

Over-all, I still prefer the Ormandy version, but I do not expect to hear anyone surpass this performance in the specific episodes mentioned, nor soon to hear finer sound quality. D. H.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

DEC 1963

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony are represented by RCA Victor in three tapes: a well-paced, strongly conceived coupling of two "hero" pieces, Beethoven's Eroica and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben, on one reel (FTC-3006, $10.95—here is one instance of the tape price actually being lower than the equivalent two LP's); the Strauss sounds very well, but the massed orchestra in the Beethoven seems both dynamically limited and lacking in detail. Better reproduction of this superb orchestra can be heard in Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream (FTC-2141, $8.95), though I personally find Inga Swenson's narration lead-ins (in itself a good idea) unspeakably overacted and coy. Finally, Leinsdorf accompanies Artur Rubinstein in the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto FTC-2148, $8.95) the fifth tape of this piece now available. The playing is warm, colorful, and lyric in conception, while the reproduction, with some constricted climaxes in the orchestra, favors the piano.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 20,570

FEB 1 1964

STRAUSS, R.: Ein Heldenleben, op. 40. Boston Sym. O.; Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor (M) LM-2641, $4.98; (S) LSC-2641, $5.98
For cleanness of sound and clarity of musical texture this recording of Heldenleben is unequaled. Leinsdorf's reading of the score lacks vitality, however, and the performance in general has an overcalculated quality about it. Further, the general orchestral sound lacks the warmth required in this piece.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,980

NOV 26 1963

Concert In

By DANIEL

Since the advent of Dynagroove, RCA has been issuing a number of recordings featuring the Boston Symphony under its new conductor, Erich Leinsdorf. Some of the first discs still had a few problems to be worked out on the technical side, but now, with the pressing of Richard Strauss' "Erin Heldenleben," an excellent balance has been established which has eliminated a dry sound in the process.

The result is that the Boston Orchestra has, on record, the most full-bodied sound in any recording of the Strauss tone poem. The disc has a sound that is about as close as one can get to the actual concert hall.

★ ★ ★

THE reading of the work, itself, has the tight, well-rehearsed continuity that is a trademark of Leinsdorf's conducting. A proper perspective is given between all the choirs of the orchestra and the individual solo lines are sharply defined. Yet with this control comes a highly emotional performance. Victor LM (LSC) 2641.

BROOKFIELD, ILL.
CITIZEN
W. 2,336

SEP 12 1963

And here's a beauty: Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life), performed by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

No, it's more than a beauty; it's magnificent. It is the kind of music, and certainly the kind of performance, that makes us wish we had the biggest record player in the world to play it on.

But even on our dinky old monaural hi-fi the sound is glorious. For once we'll buy the "blurb" talk on the record jacket, which claims this to be "a moment of sonic splendor."

* * *

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

MAR 1964

STRAUSS, RICHARD: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40
†Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E flat, Op. 55 ("Eroica")

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• • RCA VICTOR FTC 3006. 91 min. $10.95.

This blockbuster of an economy-priced twin-pack seems destined to be one of the most controversial of tape releases.

Both its interpretative and technical merits can, and surely will, be debated at great length. I myself am most favorably impressed by the Bostonians' fine solo and ensemble performances, and by interpretations as massively scaled and extrovertedly "heroic" as the scores themselves. The recording is sonically bigger, heavier, and more forcible than almost any previous example of Dynagroove, and the tape processing is, apart from a few preëchoes on the Beethoven side, notably successful in handling such high modulation levels. Many listeners, however, may be less favorably impressed (if indeed not actively antagonized) by the vehemence and lack of grace and humor in the readings, and by the unnaturalness of the acoustical ambiences—the startling contrasts, for example, between the density of massed sonorities and the close-up focusing on many solo passages. The musical and sonic impact is tremendous here, but the effect must strike many listeners as wholly alien to any they have ever known in the concert-hall.

Readers who remember Robert C. Marsh's "disappointment" with the disc version of Ein Heldenleben, in his review of last November, may be interested to know that in comparing stereo disc and tape editions I found the latter significantly superior in its freedom from the excessive edginess of the disc's fortissimo highs, although in neither version is the high end glittering enough to balance adequately the extraordinarily massive lows. In other respects, especially in the tumultuousness and stridency of the too hard-pressed Battle section and the generally unnatural sonic qualities, the two editions are more closely akin.

STRAUSS EIN HELDENLEBEN

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS
MONTHLY 114,110

NOV 1963

STRAUSS, RICHARD: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• RCA VICTOR LM 2641. LP. $4.98.
• • RCA VICTOR LSC 2641. SD. $5.98.

By my reckoning there have been three great recordings of this music, each representing a different artistic approach: first is the old Mengelberg version, made with the New York Philharmonic more than thirty years ago and documenting the skill of the conductor to whom the score was dedicated; next comes the Reiner-Chicago edition, a landmark in early stereo recording; and finally, there is the Beecham memorial album. The two former sets were once available on RCA Victor; the latter remains in the catalogue on the Capitol label.

In this company the present release is a disappointment. I think this is largely due to the sound, for the set has been heavily "Dynagrooved" and the effect is rather like hearing it with extreme Fletcher-Munson compensation. If you're not going to play it very loud, this is not serious, but Heldenleben is music to be played loud or not at all. To do so with normal frequency emphasis demands that you eliminate the high degree of loudness compensation at the extremes of the high and low frequencies. Even with the control flexibility of first-rate equipment, I was unable to do this to my complete satisfaction, and the resultant sound gave a high-gloss, superficial character to the performance.

I was further disturbed by faulty balances, occasions when the main thematic line would drop below the level of the accompaniments, and by the muddied quality of the Battle sequence. My respect for Leinsdorf is too high to lead me to conclude that he was responsible for all this. This leaves us with a Heldenleben that has many merits, but one which I am reluctant to judge artistically until I can hear it from tape or a non-Dynagroove disc version. R.C.M.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JAN 1964

Ⓢ Ⓜ STRAUSS: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2641 $5.98, LM 2641 $4.98.

Interest: Strauss as hero
Performance: Taut and brilliant
Recording: Vivid
Stereo Quality: Good

The full-blown romantic extraversion of this tone-poem realization of Strauss' hero-self has been most recently projected in brilliant fashion by Eugene Ormandy in his Columbia recording. Erich Leinsdorf's approach, by contrast, is much more taut. Thus the initial character portrayal, the set-to with the critics, and the love sections with solo violin are gone through with a minimum of waste motion and sentimentality. But when challenges arise, such as the problems of bringing the fullest musical and dramatic coherence to the battle scene and the cunningly woven tapestry of quotations from earlier Strauss scores, then the hero emerges, adjuring his pose, and springs to fascinating full-blooded life under Leinsdorf's baton. The combination of virtuosic generalship, virtuosic Boston playing, and virtuosic recording is all but unbeatable from the battle scene until the final solo violin episode.

Over-all, I still prefer the Ormandy version, but I do not expect to hear anyone surpass this performance in the specific episodes mentioned, nor soon to hear finer sound quality. D. H.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,680

NOV 26 1963

Concert In

By DANIEL

Since the advent of Dynagroove, RCA has been issuing a number of recordings featuring the Boston Symphony under its new conductor, Erich Leinsdorf. Some of the first discs still had a few problems to be worked out on the technical side, but now, with the pressing of Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," an excellent balance has been established which has eliminated a dry sound in the process.

The result is that the Boston Orchestra has, on record, the most full-bodied sound in any recording of the Strauss tone poem. The disc has a sound that is about as close as one can get to the actual concert hall.

★ ★ ★

THE reading of the work, itself, has the tight, well-rehearsed continuity that is a trademark of Leinsdorf's conducting. A proper perspective is given between all the choirs of the orchestra and the individual solo lines are sharply defined. Yet with this control comes a highly emotional performance. Victor LM (LSC) 2641.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

MAR 1964

STRAUSS, RICHARD: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40 By R. D. Darrell
†Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E flat, Op. 55 ("Eroica")

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• • RCA VICTOR FTC 3006. 91 min. $10.95.

This blockbuster of an economy-priced twin-pack seems destined to be one of the most controversial of tape releases.

Both its interpretative and technical merits can, and surely will, be debated at great length. I myself am most favorably impressed by the Bostonians' fine solo and ensemble performances, and by interpretations as massively scaled and extrovertedly "heroic" as the scores themselves. The recording is sonically bigger, heavier, and more forcible than almost any previous example of Dynagroove, and the tape processing is, apart from a few preëchoes on the Beethoven side, notably successful in handling such high modulation levels. Many listeners, however, may be less favorably impressed (if indeed not actively antagonized) by the vehemence and lack of grace and humor in the readings, and by the unnaturalness of the acoustical ambiences—the startling contrasts, for example, between the density of massed sonorities and the close-up focusing on many solo passages. The musical and sonic impact is tremendous here, but the effect must strike many listeners as wholly alien to any they have ever known in the concert-hall.

Readers who remember Robert C. Marsh's "disappointment" with the disc version of Ein Heldenleben, in his review of last November, may be interested to know that in comparing stereo disc and tape editions I found the latter significantly superior in its freedom from the excessive edginess of the disc's fortissimo highs, although in neither version is the high end glittering enough to balance adequately the extraordinarily massive lows. In other respects, especially in the tumultuousness and stridency of the too hard-pressed Battle section and the generally unnatural sonic qualities, the two editions are more closely akin.

BROOKFIELD, ILL.
CITIZEN
W. 2,336

SEP 12 1963

And here's a beauty: Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life), performed by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

No, it's more than a beauty; it's magnificent. It is the kind of music, and certainly the kind of performance, that makes us wish we had the biggest record player in the world to play it on.

But even on our dinky old monaural hi-fi the sound is glorious. For once we'll buy the "blurb" talk on the record jacket, which claims this to be "a moment of sonic splendor."

* * *

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

NOV 1963

R. STRAUSS: Ein Heldenleben; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2641, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2641, $5.98.

Ⓢ THE disciplined playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, respect for Strauss's directions, clarification of the score's elaborate textures, and an exceedingly smooth recording (with, however, the extreme dynamics scaled down) are the pleasures of this release.

Certainly, however, choosing a recorded Heldenleben is not an easy task. Leinsdorf's rants, I think, a stronger infusion of the kind of lyric grace and expressive persuasiveness Beecham gave us, while on the other hand Beecham does not communicate the vitality [illegible] the many extrovert sections of the work, and Ormandy's (the only other well-recorded and well-played competitor), for all its vigor and blazing virtuosity, misses most of the poetry. A new recording of Karl Böhm's [illegible] performance might provide a [illegible]ben around which everyone could rally. In the meantime, you save your money and you takes your [illegible] —C.J.L.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

DEC 1963

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony are represented by RCA Victor in three tapes: a well-paced, strongly conceived coupling of two "hero" pieces, Beethoven's Eroica and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben, on one reel (FTC-3006, $10.95—here is one instance of the tape price actually being lower than the equivalent two LP's); the Strauss sounds very well, but the massed orchestra in the Beethoven seems both dynamically limited and lacking in detail. Better reproduction of this superb orchestra can be heard in Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream (FTC-2141, $8.95); though I personally find Inga Swenson's narration lead-ins (in itself a good idea) unspeakably overacted and coy. Finally, Leinsdorf accompanies Artur Rubinstein in the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto FTC-2148, $8.95) the fifth tape of this piece now available. The playing is warm, colorful, and lyric in conception, while the reproduction, with some constricted climaxes in the orchestra, favors the piano.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 20,570

FEB 1 1964

STRAUSS, R.: Ein Heldenleben, Op. 40. Boston Sym. O.; Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor (M) LM-2641, $4.98; (S) LSC-2641, $5.98
For cleanness of sound and clarity of musical texture this recording of Heldenleben is unequaled. Leinsdorf's reading of the score lacks vitality, however, and the performance in general has an overcalculated quality about it. Further, the general orchestral sound lacks the warmth required in this piece.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

SEP 28 1963

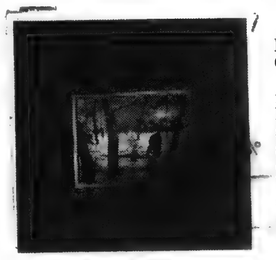
RICHARD STRAUSS: Ein Heldenleben, with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf (Victor). The most notable aspect of Leinsdorf's interpretation is the crystal clarity of the orchestral texture. Even in the most complicated, heavily orchestrated passages, the listener can hear details that are normally lost in the mass of sound. The Boston conductor's tempi are inclined toward the deliberate, which robs the work of a great deal of its inherent excitement. In this respect, the Ormandy-Philadelphia Orchestra recording for Columbia is considerably more impressive, although the sound is not quite in Vic[illegible]

272

BRAHMS: SYMPHONY # 1

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAY 3 0 1964



BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, Boston Symphony Orch/Leinsdorf—RCA Victor LM 2711

Brahms' classically beautiful Symphony No. 1 is performed with brilliance and sensitivity by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf at the helm. The work is the embodiment of classical purity yet boasts the soaring melodies that characterized the romantic movement. The opus has remained high on the lists of the classical devotees and this superb performance should receive immediate public acceptance.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

MAY 2 3 1964

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf (Victor LM or LSC-2711). It has been a long time since the Boston orchestra has sounded as disciplined in the music of Brahms. Munch, Leinsdorf's predecessor, reportedly had little affection for the composer and played him indifferently. There is both warmth and color to his reading, although it lacks the dynamism that characterized Toscanini's interpretation. Victor's Dynagroove Sound is a definite enhancement.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAY 2 3 1964

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

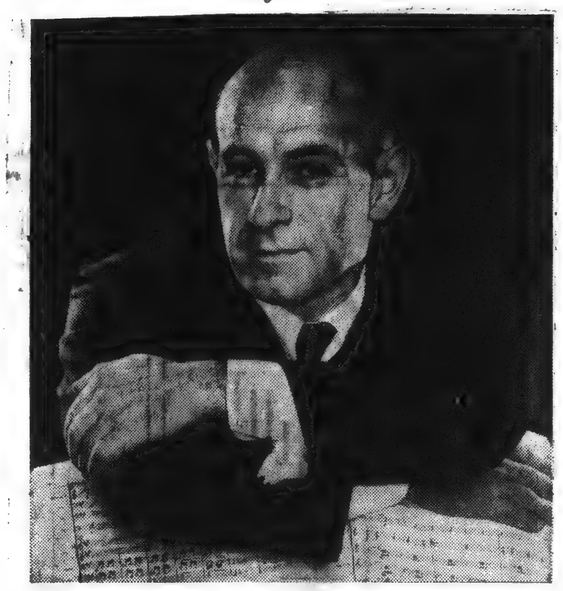
BRAHMS: SYMPHONY NO. 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2711 (M); LSC 2711 (S)

Another excellent recording of the very popular Brahms Symphony No. 1, the first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf. The Boston and Leinsdorf register high with the connoisseur of fine orchestras. Strong commercial appeal here.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 344,575 SUN. 569,578

MAY 1 0 1964



Erich Leinsdorf

Classical Records

By THOMAS B. SHERMAN

ERICH LEINSDORF shows off a magnificent instrument in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's recording of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor. The sections of the orchestra are well-blended and the various first men are the best that money can buy. As for the interpretation, it would be foolish to say that the conductor does not understand the work or does not like it. What is obviously true, however, is that the inflection in several instances amounts to no more than a literal reading of the score. The slow movement for instance, which can be deeply contemplative and at times ecstatic, is pleasant but never expansive.

The big chorale which follows the introduction to the final movement is also under-inflected and the pace is too fast for either an appropriate breadth or an elevation of feeling. (RCA-Victor, Stereophonic, one record)

SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY No. 4 in D Minor has the qualities and defects of all the Schumann symphonies. It moves in blocks, the interior instruments have little independence and the range of color is narrow. Against this one is forced to consider the profusion of lyricism. A recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf makes the most of its qualities. The radiant melodic content repays the listener for the deficiency of color and the somewhat tedious working-out section in the first movement. The sound is excellent. (RCA-Victor, Stereophonic, one record)

MAHLER: SYMPHONY # 1

273

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 27 567

AUG 1963

RECORDS

Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 1. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2642.

Symphony No. 1. Columbia Symphony: Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia ML 5194/MS 6394.

Symphony No. 3. Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano; choruses of the Schola Cantorum and Church of the Transfiguration; New York Philharmonic; Leonard Bernstein, cond. Columbia M2L 275/M2S 675.

Of these recordings, the Leinsdorf has particular interest — in addition to the performance it contains — as an example of RCA's new "Dynagroove" recording process. This has been both enthusiastically proclaimed, by George Marek of RCA, as a major revolution in recording technique, and even more enthusiastically denounced, by Goddard Lieberson of Columbia, as an anti-artistic capitulation to mechanistic gimmickry. But neither spokesman has been very enlightening as to the actual nature or function of the process; nor, indeed, very lucid on the entire question of the relation of recording to musical activity. To attack Dynagroove, as Mr. Lieberson has done, because it involves electronic manipulation, and to assert one's own virtuous devotion to "natural" recording of "real" performances, is simply disingenuous in the context of all of today's standard recording practices of tape editing, multiple microphone placement and everything else that goes under the name of "engineering." Dynagroove appears merely to add a precisely computed program for electronicaly controlled manipulation to the engineer's more informal, hit-or-miss dial twirling. This seems designed, as far as one can tell from the inadequate information available, to gain superior control over certain individual situations, mainly that of effective variable filtration of the frequency areas where the noise problem is most severe. In any case, the problem of what constitutes "fidelity" is far too troublesome and important to be decided in the publicity-happy spirit of commercial music enterprises.

As far as Dynagroove itself is concerned, my initial impression is that, while the audible noise level on the Mahler record is remarkably reduced — so much so that my acute awareness of the absence of noise was a startling indication of how prevalent it has been—the overall sound characteristic is somewhat constrained and biteless at the frequency extremes, lacking "depth" in the lows and "brilliance" in the highs, so that the net effect is of the Boston Symphony playing in an acoustical broom closet. That is not, however, sufficient reason for dismissing Dynagroove; such problems arise more frequently from the absence of any clear idea of what constitutes a desirable musical result than from faults inherent in the processes.

Erich Leinsdorf's performance has some remarkable qualities of its own, particularly his imposition of a firm discipline on both the orchestra and the piece. This certainly seems to be a "new" Boston Symphony in the care, clarity and accuracy of its individual and ensemble playing. And the work's tendency to garrulity and formal overextension is taken firmly in hand by Leinsdorf's strict definition of rhythm and phrase, which generates a constant forward push that, although it loses most of the special qualities of Mahler's shifting nuances of motion, does focus the listener on the intelligent and controlled ear which formed the piece on a large scale, rather than on the somewhat undistinguished thematic detail.

The latter is the classic Mahler problem, and becomes tragic in later works where his increasingly subtle and original invention of both intensive and wide-ranging associations is coupled with a helpless inability to realize them by any means other than an incessant thematic repetition that effectively conceals from the listener the presence of a musical mind or imagination of any kind. The problems for the performer are thus formidable and frustrating, because they are, by their nature, incapable of ultimate solution. Yet the music is unquestionably worth performing, if only as a monument to the incredibly vast difference between almost-great music that is blind in one dimension and a completely realized masterpiece. Leinsdorf's approach provides a superficially satisfactory solution by fabricating a framework of constant progression that succeeds only by falsifying every dimension of the music but its largest architectural blocks; it succeeds, in short, on a far smaller scale than Mahler himself fails. Bruno Walter's performance, on the other hand, takes many more of Mahler's chances, and succeeds to a really remarkable extent in holding the work together on its own terms, following closely the inner pace of the music rather than, as in the Leinsdorf, imposing a pace at which almost anything can be guaranteed to "go."

Thus Walter's way of balancing sonorities is much less obviously clean than Leinsdorf's, but is much more individually considered with regard to the important movement of the piece, so that one soon becomes aware of a "Mahler sound" in the orchestra that also contrasts with Leinsdorf's precise neutrality. One of the most striking instances of this is the uprushing dynamic sense at crucial phrase points in Walter's performance, which reveals Mahler's enlargement of classical procedure so convincingly that the enormous temporal span of the piece seems to result more from a similar process in the macroform and less from a gratuitous expansiveness. And instead of imposing definition on the fluctuating events by regularizing them, Walter patiently draws a total shape made up of several fluctuants. An interesting comparison here is of the tempo relationships between the scherzo and trio of the second movement in the two performances; Leinsdorf sharply individuates the two, taking a much slower tempo for the trio, whereas Walter finds for each a precise level at which they are clearly differentiated but also unmistakably integrated and continuous.

After these thoughtful and careful approaches to the problems of Mahler performance, it is astonishing to encounter Bernstein, who jumps with enormous enthusiasm into precisely those aspects of Mahler that everyone else would rather forget, who shows total unconcern for the qualities for which we forgive Mahler his sins, and who is, thus, blithely unaware that problems exist at all.

As a result, in both Bernstein's present recording of the Third Symphony and his performance earlier this year of the Fifth, the fascinating inner polyphony of the music is completely suppressed into a mere accompaniment to the eventless, relentlessly reiterated "top" line, each of whose repetitions is treated with an inflated expressivity that, given the absence of any indication of real happening, painfully exaggerates Mahler's hard-lost failures into a set of posturing caricatures. Unquestionably, all this is an honest result of Bernstein's complete faith in the music (one wonders whether this faith is also responsible for the sloppy playing he permits to his orchestra). But if Mahler must rely on such uncritical friends, he would be much better served by uncompromising enemies, who might at least grant his work the dignity of silence.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT KISCO TRADER
Sunday, August 4, 1963

Let's Look At The Record—

A Bit Of Romance

By BERTRAM TAYLOR

The records reviewed in today's column are all from the Romantic period. Romanticism which is rarely to be found in today's compositions, still draws large concert attendance.

Germany is represented by a Mahler symphony and a lieder recital. France, with Poland looking over her shoulder, comes to the fore in an album of Chopin Mazurkas.

Mahler's 1st Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Called "the last of the German neo-Romantic symphonists," Mahler has come to be recognized as something more than is implicit in that phrase. Romantic, yes, but also with more of the modern idiom in his work than in those of the 19th century romantics who were his contemporaries.

This first symphony is characteristic of a style to be found in the later ones. It is lavishly orchestrated, with heavy tonalities, and yet full of light, even gay, touches such as the intrusion of "Frere Jacques" in the 3d movement.

As a conductor Mahler was as hard to please as was Toscanini in his time and Reiner now. Perfection is what he demanded and that is a rare article. His life as a conductor was full of frustrations and it might be that these frustrations found an outlet in his music, often so troubled in its search for something.

If the composer had lived to hear Leinsdorf conduct this work I think that he would have been pleased. Leinsdorf has the advantage of inheriting a polished orchestra which is the better for having always had one conductor, as the New York Philharmonic has not. The Boston men, disciplined as they are, have been welded into a responsive instrument, never more responsive than with Leinsdorf, a fine conductor.

This is a Dynagroove recording, another way of saying that it is first class.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

AUG 1963

MAHLER: Symphony No. 1 in D; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four-Track 7½ ips. Stereo Tape, RCA Victor FTC-2129, $7.95.

LEINSDORF'S performance of this most popular of the Mahler symphonies is a slick, powerful one, not so personal nor so convincing as Bruno Walter's, though his observance of the repeats (ignored by Walter) and his tremendously effective finale are points in his favor.

I have not heard the much-publicized Dynagroove disc version of this performance and therefore cannot compare the tape and disc, but the dynamic range seems to me restricted and overloud. In this the Walter version surpasses this RCA tape, even in its disc format. At the moment there is no tape competition for Leinsdorf's performance (Everest's well-recorded version is no match for Leinsdorf and BSO) but if Columbia sees fit to release the Walter on tape—and it seems likely they will—there will be more serious grounds for indecision. —R.J.

MAHLER: SYMPHONY #1

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 27,567

22 1963

RECORDS

Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 1. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2642.

Symphony No. 1. Columbia Symphony; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia ML 5194/MS 6394.

Symphony No. 3. Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano; choruses of the Schola Cantorum and Church of the Transfiguration; New York Philharmonic; Leonard Bernstein, cond. Columbia M2L 275/M2S 675.

Of these recordings, the Leinsdorf has particular interest — in addition to the performance it contains — as an example of RCA's new "Dynagroove" recording process. This has been both enthusiastically proclaimed, by George Marek of RCA, as a major revolution in recording technique, and even more enthusiastically denounced, by Goddard Lieberson of Columbia, as an anti-artistic capitulation to mechanistic gimmickry. But neither spokesman has been very enlightening as to the actual nature or function of the process; nor, indeed, very lucid on the entire question of the relation of recording to musical activity. To attack Dynagroove, as Mr. Lieberson has done, because it involves electronic manipulation, and to assert one's own virtuous devotion to "natural" recording of "real" performances, is simply disingenuous in the context of all of today's standard recording practices of tape editing, multiple microphone placement and everything else that goes under the name of "engineering." Dynagroove appears merely to add a precisely computed program for electronicaly controlled manipulation to the engineer's more informal, hit-or-miss dial twirling. This seems designed, as far as one can tell from the inadequate information available, to gain superior control over certain individual situations, mainly that of effective variable filtration of the frequency areas where the noise problem is most severe. In any case, the problem of what constitutes "fidelity" is far too troublesome and important to be decided in the publicity-happy spirit of commercial music enterprises.

As far as Dynagroove itself is concerned, my initial impression is that, while the audible noise level on the Mahler record is remarkably reduced — so much so that my acute awareness of the absence of noise was a startling indication of how prevalent it has been—the overall sound characteristic is somewhat constrained and biteless at the frequency extremes, lacking "depth" in the lows and "brilliance" in the highs, so that the net effect is of the Boston Symphony playing in an acoustical broom closet. That is not, however, sufficient reason for dismissing Dynagroove; such problems arise more frequently from the absence of any clear idea of what constitutes a desirable musical result than from faults inherent in the processes.

Erich Leinsdorf's performance has some remarkable qualities of its own, particularly his imposition of a firm discipline on both the orchestra and the piece. This certainly seems to be a "new" Boston Symphony in the care, clarity and accuracy of its individual and ensemble playing. And the work's tendency to garrulity and formal overextension is taken firmly in hand by Leinsdorf's strict definition of rhythm and phrase, which generates a constant forward push that, although it loses most of the special qualities of Mahler's shifting nuances of motion, does focus the listener on the intelligent and controlled ear which formed the piece on a large scale, rather than on the somewhat undistinguished thematic detail.

The latter is the classic Mahler problem, and becomes tragic in later works where his increasingly subtle and original invention of both intensive and wide-ranging associations is coupled with a helpless inability to realize them by any means other than an incessant thematic repetition that effectively conceals from the listener the presence of a musical mind or imagination of any kind. The problems for the performer are thus formidable and frustrating, because they are, by their nature, incapable of ultimate solution. Yet the music is unquestionably worth performing, if only as a monument to the incredibly vast difference between almost-great music that is blind in one dimension and a completely realized masterpiece. Leinsdorf's approach provides a superficially satisfactory solution by fabricating a framework of constant progression that succeeds only by falsifying every dimension of the music but its largest architectural blocks; it succeeds, in short, on a far smaller scale than Mahler himself fails. Bruno Walter's performance, on the other hand, takes many more of Mahler's chances, and succeeds to a really remarkable extent in holding the work together on its own terms, following closely the inner pace of the music rather than, as in the Leinsdorf, imposing a pace at which almost anything can be guaranteed to "go."

Thus Walter's way of balancing sonorities is much less obviously clean than Leinsdorf's, but is much more individually considered with regard to the important movement of the piece, so that one soon becomes aware of a "Mahler sound" in the orchestra that also contrasts with Leinsdorf's precise neutrality. One of the most striking instances of this is the upsurging dynamic sense at crucial phrase points in Walter's performance, which reveals Mahler's enlargement of classical procedure so convincingly that the enormous temporal span of the piece seems to result more from a similar process in the macroform and less from a gratuitous expansiveness. And instead of imposing definition on the fluctuating events by regularizing them, Walter patiently draws a total shape made up of several fluctuants. An interesting comparison here is of the tempo relationships between the scherzo and trio of the second movement in the two performances; Leinsdorf sharply individuates the two, taking a much slower tempo for the trio, whereas Walter finds for each a precise level at which they are clearly differentiated but also unmistakably integrated and continuous.

After these thoughtful and careful approaches to the problems of Mahler performance, it is astonishing to encounter Bernstein, who jumps with enormous enthusiasm into precisely those aspects of Mahler that everyone else would rather forget, who shows total unconcern for the qualities for which we forgive Mahler his sins, and who is, thus, blithely unaware that problems exist at all.

As a result, in both Bernstein's present recording of the Third Symphony and his performance earlier this year of the Fifth, the fascinating inner polyphony of the music is completely suppressed into a mere accompaniment to the eventless, relentlessly reiterated "top" line, each of whose repetitions is treated with an inflated expressivity that, given the absence of any indication of real happening, painfully exaggerates Mahler's hard-lost failures into a set of posturing caricatures. Unquestionably, all this is an honest result of Bernstein's complete faith in the music (one wonders whether this faith is also responsible for the sloppy playing he permits to his orchestra). But if Mahler must rely on such uncritical friends, he would be much better served by uncompromising enemies, who might at least grant his work the dignity of silence.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT KISCO TRADER
Sunday, August 4, 1963

Let's Look At The Record—
A Bit Of Romance

By BERTRAM TAYLOR

The records reviewed in today's column are all from the romantic period. Romanticism which is rarely to be found in today's compositions, still draws large concert attendance.

Germany is represented by a Mahler symphony and a lieder recital. France, with Poland looking over her shoulder, comes to the fore in an album of Chopin Mazurkas.

Mahler's 1st Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Called "the last of the ... an neo-Romantic symphonists," Mahler has come to be recognized as something more than implicit in that phrase. Romantic, yes, but also with more of the modern idiom in his work than in those of the 19th century romantics who were his contemporaries.

This first symphony is characteristic of a style to be found in the later ones. It is lavishly orchestrated, with heavy tonalities, and yet full of light, even gay, touches such as the introsion of "Frere Jacques" in the 3d movement.

As a conductor Mahler was as hard to please as was Toscanini in his time and Reiner now. Perfection is what he demanded and that is a rare article. His life as a conductor was full of frustrations and it might be that these frustrations found an outlet in his music, often so troubled in its search for something.

If the composer had lived to hear Leinsdorf conduct this work I think that he would have been pleased. Leinsdorf has the advantage of inheriting a polished orchestra which is the better for having always had one conductor, as the New York Philharmonic has not. The Boston men, disciplined as they are, have been welded into a responsive instrument; never more responsive than with Leinsdorf, a fine conductor.

This is a Dynagroove recording, another way of saying that it is first class.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

AUG 1963

MAHLER: Symphony No. 1 in D, Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four-Track 7½ ips. Stereo Tape, RCA Victor FTC-2129, $7.95.

LEINSDORF'S performance of this most popular of the Mahler symphonies is a slick, powerful one, not so personable nor so convincing as Bruno Walter's, though his observance of the repeats (ignored by Walter) and his tremendously effective finale are points in his favor.

I have not heard the much-publicized Dynagroove disc version of this performance and therefore cannot compare the tape and disc, but the dynamic range seems to me restricted and overloud. In this the Walter version surpasses this RCA tape, even in its disc format. At the moment there is no tape competition for Leinsdorf's performance (Everest's well-recorded version is no match for Leinsdorf and BSO) but if Columbia sees fit to release the Walter on tape—and it seems likely they will—there will be more serious grounds for indecision.

—R.J.

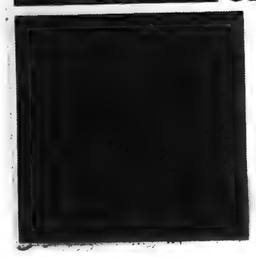
274

BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY #3 "THE EROICA"

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

OCT 19 1963

CLASSICAL PICKS



BEETHOVEN: Eroica; Eric Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra—RCA Victor LM 2644
Beethoven's powerful, romantic third symphony is given a masterful reading by Eric Leinsdorf on this superb new classical offering from Victor. The conductor's obvious understanding and appreciation of the work is firmly evidenced by his intricate attention to the symphony's subtle intricate chromatic developments. A superb entry.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, October 27, 1963

Record Turntable

New Eroica Takes Place With Best

By F. B. STEPHENSON

Two new Beethoven recordings are deserving of especial note, since both are distinguished achievements. Certainly, there has been no crying need for additional expositions of the Third and Sixth Symphonies; but if they are of the quality of these ventures, there is always a bit more room.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3 — Eroica (Boston Symphony - Erich Leinsdorf) RCA Victor Stereo LSC 2644, Mono LM 2644. This is a linear, precision reading of this towering work, totally different from what the Bostonians have been presenting for the last 25 years or more. A comparison with the Koussevitzky performance (once available on a Camden reissue) makes this abundantly clear. Leinsdorf's Beethoven, like Toscanini's, has a sense of urgency and power, and it depends upon clarity above everything else. Fortunately, the Boston orchestra can provide the type of playing to bring such a conception to full fruition. In truth, it sounds more like the old NBC than anything else. Of the myriad Eroicas now available to the collector, this one takes its place with the very best.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020
OCT 27 1963

Currently

By MICHAEL JEAN ORCEYRE

Erich Linsdorf has held the reins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for about a year now, theoretically time enough to have placed whatever stamp of personality upon them he chooses. That he has in fact remodeled the BSO after his own image is apparent upon first listening to the new RCA recording of the Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) of Beethoven (LM 2644; LSC 2644). Out of loyalty to Charles Munch, an old favorite of ours, we cannot say that the change is for the better, but it seems a small concession to Leinsdorf to admit that it is for the good. Munch is a man of warmth, of heart; his successor is a disciplinarian of warmth and heart.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, November 3, 1963

solid, smooth, forthright account of noble deliberation but something less than the greatest flexibility. A lighter touch in the scherzo wouldn't be amiss, nor a little more buoyancy in the finale. The Boston Symphony, of course, is excellent.

Byron Janis manages to make the two Liszt piano concerti sound more musical than usual on a new Mercury made in Moscow with sympathetic conducting by Messrs. Kondrashin and Rozhdestvensky.—A.B.

SAN FRANCISCO
News Call Bulletin
D. 190,260 SAT. 162,823

NOV 23 1963

Erich Leinsdorf's new Victor recording of Beethoven's "Eroica" is a

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 336,210 S. 507,694

OCT 13 1963

Off the Records

Beethoven's 'Eroica' Tamed by Leinsdorf

By Emerson Batdorff

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have somehow managed to calm down Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, a difficult job indeed.

EMERSON BATDORFF

Of course, there is always the question of whether the "Eroica" should be as brisk and businesslike as most conductors make it. As for me, the only person I can speak for with 100% certainty, I say make it throb like an aching heart.

Once that stupendous beginning sets the pace—two "whumps" as surprising and awe-inspiring as a couple of mortar shells coming in, it is up to the conductor and orchestra to keep going.

On this new Victor record Leinsdorf takes it easy and achieves expression that I can only call languishing, but at the expense of the usually understood tempo.

Particularly is this noticeable in the funeral march, which, as you remember it, starts out slowly, then picks up speed and finally slows again. Leinsdorf is extremely deliberate.

The result is that the record requires changing right in the middle of the funeral march, one of the worst breaks conceivable.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
D. 187,020 S. 220,313

NOV 3 1963

On the turntables—

Leinsdorf, Beethoven

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL,
News music editor

"EROICA" SYMPHONY — The Beethoven symphony that Erich Leinsdorf chose as the first work he conducted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall, with rich sound, linear clarity, sharply etched instrumental detail and a warm string tone, in the superb Dynagroove. Magnificent performance of monumental work. Rembrandt's "Aristotle Contemplating the Bust of Homer" is reproduced on the album cover by special permission of Metropolitan Museum of Art. —(RCA-VICTOR)

LEINSDORF

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
D. 213,617 S. 350,876

NOV 3 1963

NOVEMBER 3, 1963

In the Gro

By HILMAR GRONDAHL

Leinsdorf and "Eroica": Under Erich Leinsdorf the Boston Symphony has recovered the luster it had in the days of Koussevitzky: Once more it is a superbly disciplined ensemble. These are observations which have point as one listens to the new RCA-Victor stereo performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. He plays the score pretty much as written letting the drama of the composer's thought show with especial clarity through the expressive capabilities of his orchestra. This is one of the year's best recordings.

Ghiaurov, Bulgarian Basso: Nicolai Ghiaurov was born thirty-four years ago in a tiny town in Bulgaria, but his musical interest and talent has now made him a favorite basso at the Bolshoi and La Scala. On a new London stereo disc we get the measure of the man as he sings arias from "Boris," "Onegin," "Sadko," "Aleko," "Don Carlos," "Nabucco" and "Don Giovanni." A big voice, rich in quality backed by impressive sensibility, he is a rare addition to the operatic world. He is supported in this program by the London Symphony conducted by Edward Downes.

On the Records

Boston Symphony Under Leinsdorf Excels in 'Eroica'

Classical

BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY No. 3 in E-FLAT MAJOR (EROICA); BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA conducted by ERICH LEINSDORF—RCA VICTOR DYNAGROOVE LM/LSC-2644 (Stereo tape FTC-3006).

The emergence of the titanic musical genius of Beethoven from the traditional classic forms which preceded him is markedly noticeable in the Third Symphony.

Indeed, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony in this lustrous recording, terms the symphony "among the three or four greatest masterpieces of the classic repertoire."

Listeners with a romantic turn of mind may still read Napoleonic and other political connotations into the music if they wish, but this recording seems rather to concentrate on projecting the symphony only as a glorious piece of music.

Maestro Leinsdorf and the orchestra perform their part of this function impeccably. For the rest we can thank Dynagroove engineering which, for one thing, allows the sombre, rolling basses to be heard as never before in the funeral march of the second movement.

The artistic conspiracy continues in the sparkling scherzo where the horn passages are heard with startling purity, and in the complicated variations of the final movement where orchestral sections stand out cleanly.

No matter how often one has listened to recordings of this symphony, the listener is certain to arrive at a new appreciation of a monumental work after playing this truly remarkable record.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605
NOV 10 1963

Music

RECORDS:

Boston Symphony On Two Releases

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, and his predecessor, Charles Munch, direct the orchestra in two recent RCA releases. Leinsdorf conducts the Bostonians in Beethoven's Symphony No. 3. ("Eroica"). Dr. Munch is at the helm for performances on a "two in one" record featuring the young American pianist, Gary Graffman. The contents here are the Chopin Concerto No. 1 and the Capriccio Brillant of Mendelssohn.

Leinsdorf has quite definite if not entirely unshared opinions about this symphony in particular and Beethoven's orchestral music in general. Those here are concerned with doublings, for better balances, and with other matters of tempi and ornamental figures (as in the bass part in the opening of the funeral march). The conductor's ideas are logical and in fact, his whole approach may be so termed categorically. This top orchestra and RCA's top Dynagroove are a combination that's really tops!

Patrons of the Woolsey series are aware that Graffman has been a favored soloist with the Boston Orchestra for some years. The orchestra brought him along for one of its programs here several years ago and his playing then was highly impressive. Graffman has matured into an artist of the first rank which is to say that his expressive powers are now a amtch for his technical virtuosity. He does some brilliant playing in the familiar Chopin opus and in the lesser known Mendelssohn work. The inclusion of the latter may be considered as a welcome "bonus."

fairly good recording of three Wagnerian war horses — The Ride of the Valkyries, The Flying Dutchman overture, the Tannhauser Overture and Venusberg music. For the price, you can't go wrong if you're shopping for these works. The Vienna orchestra is among the world's best.

R.C.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
The Pilot
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 88,877
NOV 30 1963

Rec

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ('Eroica'). Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA stereo or mono 2644).

Few of us, I imagine, will ever be able to replay this performance without recalling the unhappy circumstances in which we heard Mr. Leinsdorf's "Eroica" this week. Originally a manifesto of the conductor's ideals, it has become accidentaly a memento. It is a noble, well-formed interpretation, a thing of Olympian gravity and great splendor. I would like to hear the exposition repeated in the first movement, but very few conductors do this. I would like the scherzo to be more "vivace," but Leinsdorf's tempo is close to Beethoven's metronome marking. These small points should not deter Leinsdorf fans or those who favor a truly majestic approach to the music, however. The best movement is the finale, where the Boston Symphony has a chance to show its full virtuosity.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 25,103
NOV 30 1963

Leinsdorf's performance of the Eroica is as careful and detailed as is usual with his work, and also as steadily pushed and oversharply articulated to insure the sense of increasing forward momentum and cohesion without any particular awareness of individual qualities. The procedure is particularly well calculated for this symphony, since the Eroica will sound like the Eroica regardless of how it is played. The new discipline and precision of the Boston Symphony is unmistakable, even though at the stage when this recording was made they were achieved at the expense of permitting some rather unpolished execution. As far as the development of Dynagroove is concerned, it seems considerably improved in the "spatial" dimension from the early releases (this is also true of the Chicago Orchestra releases discussed below), but the bass still sounds as though produced by oscillators rather than instruments, and loud passages are sometimes quite shrilly distorted.

November 30, 1963

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
DEC 1963

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ("Eroica"); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2644, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2644, $5.98.

SUCH releases as this make any selection of the "best" recording increasingly difficult for the purchaser. Is it really possible for one single Eroïca among so many fine ones to be clearly "the best"? Obviously, no. For the reviewer it becomes a temptation to recommend the oddest version (Scherchen's, for instance, played at a preposterously fast tempo, almost as fast as Beethoven's metronome mark, an effect marred more than a little by his orchestra's inability to keep up), so that a familiar work might be reconsidered from a radically different, if sometimes radically incorrect, viewpoint.

Leinsdorf's version possesses more than usual interest, being his first crack at "standard" repertoire with the Boston Symphony for RCA Victor. It is a predictably sleek, powerful projection, devoid of eccentricities, and therefore recommended. The "Dynagroove" recording is good, maybe a bit shy on highs and definitely, to these ears, lacking in bass. The sound is quite clean, though, and the surfaces are remarkably clean.

—R.J.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 1963

By Sherman Gottesman

Victor's regular release this past month concentrated on two Beethoven Symphonies, the "Eroica," with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony, and the "Pastoral," with Fritz Reiner conducting the Chicago Symphony. Both performances have much to offer with the writer tending to be a bit more prejudiced in favor of the Reiner recording. However, the appearance of these two symphonies for the umpteenth time in the past five years on discs makes one wonder of the value in so many releases of individual works. It is possible to own a dozen copies of these symphonies, including duplications on the same label, and all stereophonic, which means that they were released in the last five or six years. Of course, living in a world that is committed to selling and making a profit, this writer realizes that the potential sale of a "standard" is much greater than that of an esoteric work. But if there is a surfeit of "standards" and the average buyer owns one of these works already, will he go out and purchase another? Or is there always a guaranteed sale when a standard is released. This writer wonders, and wonders when the record companies are going to have pity on the critics. One can take just so much standards—great as they are. It's like writing "I will be a good boy" 100 times on the blackboard (RCA Victor LSC 2644, stereo, and LSC 2614, stereo).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
DEC 1 1963

Records Reviewed

Erich Leinsdorf

ERICH LEINSDORF plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony for an RCA recording (LSC-2644) and on the jacket notes he is quoted, "The 'Eroica,' in my belief, is among the three or four greatest masterpieces of the classic repertoire. Its movements are four great structures —like all of Beethoven, entirely positive. They are grand statements. Beethoven always leads you to a positive conclusion."

His interpretation of the masterpiece bears out his statement. We hear the orchestral sonorities which are so eloquently produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leading to the "positive conclusion" in impressive style.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
DEC 1963

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, (Eroica). The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Conductor. RCA Victor LSC-2644 (Stereo).

Erich Leinsdorf makes it very clear in the notes accompanying the album that this will be no ordinary performance of the Eroica. He has tried to get away from the breast-beating, Sturm und Drang approach to the symphony, and replaces it into its classical context. It is certainly high time someone saw the Eroica in this light, for Leinsdorf's lean and taut reading brings the symphony's harmonic and structural originalities into a much sharper focus than some of the more romantic versions that we are accustomed to. The ordinary modern string complement is used and certain wind doublings are resorted to, and only in this sense is Beethoven "modernized." It would be interesting, if purely academic, to hear the music played with the same number of instruments as the 1804 premiere. However, this is as close as we are likely to get to the composer's actual instrumental requirements. Leinsdorf's performance is not one that will appeal to those who like their Eroica on a grand scale, but as one that returns the music to its proper perspective, it is remarkably convincing. Only the second movement strikes me as not receiving enough weight and tension, a defect detracting somewhat from the overall excellence of the interpretation. The Boston Symphony is never less than first-rate throughout. The recording is brilliant, if a trifle shrill.—Davis

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800
JAN 10 1964

★★ Beethoven: Eroica Symphony (No. 3)—Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony [RCA Victor]. A decade ago Erich Leinsdorf and the Rochester Philharmonic made an exciting recording of the Eroica for the $1.98 Harmony label. In the intervening years, Mr. L. has moved up in conductoral fame, but his way with the Eroica seems to have slipped. What was once vigorous and compelling has become tired and sluggish. The older version remains preferable.

—Roy Hemming

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
SAT. 107,787 SUN. 111,361
OCT 19 1963

Records: RCA Victor has combined two masterpieces in its latest release, a fine Red Seal recording of Beethoven's "Eroica" by the Boston Symphony with Eric Leinsdorf conducting. The album is adorned with a color reproduction of Rembrandt's painting, "Aristole Contemplating the Bust of Homer," recently acquired by the Metropolitan Museum at a record-breaking figure.

RCA Victor's four album release in its low-priced Victrola line for October includes:

David Oistrakh with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony in violin selections by Chausson, Saint-Saens, Leclair and Locatelli; Monteux and the Berlin Philharmonic in Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Gary Graffman and the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch in Chopin's Concerto No. 1 for Piano and Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant, and the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch in D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air (with pianist Nicole Henriot); Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605
NOV 10 1963

Music

RECORDS:

Boston Symphony On Two Releases

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, and his predecessor, Charles Munch, direct the orchestra in two recent RCA releases. Leinsdorf conducts the Bostonians in Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica"). Dr. Munch is at the helm for performances on a "two in one" record featuring the young American pianist, Gary Graffman. The contents here are the Chopin Concerto No. 1 and the Capriccio Brillant of Mendelssohn.

Leinsdorf has quite definite (not entirely unshared) opinions about this symphony in particular and Beethoven's orchestral music in general. Those here are concerned with doublings, for better balances, and with other matters of tempi and ornamental figures (as in the bass part in the opening of the funeral march). The conductor's ideas are logical and in fact, his whole approach may be so termed categorically. This top orchestra and RCA's top Dynagroove are a combination that's really tops!

Patrons of the Woolsey series are aware that Graffman has been a favored soloist with the Boston Orchestra for some years. The orchestra brought him along for one of its programs here several years ago and his playing then was highly impressive. Graffman has matured into an artist of the first rank which is to say that his expressive powers are now a match for his technical virtuosity. He does some brilliant playing in the familiar Chopin opus and in the lesser known Mendelssohn work. The inclusion of the latter may be considered as a welcome "bonus."

Leinsdorf has given us a fairly good recording of three Wagnerian war horses — The Ride of the Valkyries, The Flying Dutchman overture, the Tannhauser Overture and Venusberg music. For the price, you can't go wrong if you're shopping for these works. The Vienna orchestra is among the world's best.

R.C.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 1963

By Sherman Gottesman

Victor's regular release this past month concentrated on two Beethoven Symphonies, the "Eroica," with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony, and the "Pastoral," with Fritz Reiner conducting the Chicago Symphony. Both performances have much to offer with the writer tending to be a bit more prejudiced in favor of the Reiner recording. However, the appearance of these two symphonies for the umpteenth time in the past five years on discs makes one wonder of the value in so many releases of individual works. It is possible to own a dozen copies of these symphonies, including duplications on the same label, and all stereophonic, which means that they were released in the last five or six years. Of course, living in a world that is committed to selling and making a profit, this writer realizes that the potential sale of a "standard" is much greater than that of an esoteric work. But if there is a surfeit of "standards" and the average buyer owns one of these works already, will he go out and purchase another? Or is there always a guaranteed sale when a standard is released. This writer wonders, and wonders when the record companies are going to have pity on the critics. One can take just so much standards—great as they are. It's like writing "I will be a good boy" 100 times on the blackboard (RCA Victor LSC 2644, stereo, and LSC 2614, stereo).

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800
JAN 10 1964

★★ Beethoven: Eroica Symphony (No. 3)—Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony [RCA Victor]. A decade ago Erich Leinsdorf and the Rochester Philharmonic made an exciting recording of the Eroica for the $1.98 Harmony label. In the intervening years, Mr. L. has moved up in conductoral fame, but his way with the Eroica seems to have slipped. What was once vigorous and compelling has become tired and sluggish. The older version remains preferable.

—Roy Hemming

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
DEC 1 1963

Records Reviewed

Erich Leinsdorf

ERICH LEINSDORF plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony for an RCA recording (LSC-2644) and on the jacket notes he is quoted, "The 'Eroica,' in my belief, is among the three or four greatest masterpieces of the classic repertoire. Its movements are four great structures—like all of Beethoven, entirely positive. They are grand statements. Beethoven always leads you to a positive conclusion."

His interpretation of the masterpiece bears out his statement. We hear the orchestral qualities which are so eloquently produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leading to the "positive conclusion" in impressive style.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 25,103
NOV 30 1963

Leinsdorf's performance of the Eroica is as careful and detailed as is usual with his work, and also as steadily pushed and oversharply articulated to insure the sense of increasing forward momentum and cohesion without any particular awareness of individual qualities. The procedure is particularly well calculated for this symphony, since the Eroica will sound like the Eroica regardless of how it is played. The new discipline and precision of the Boston Symphony is unmistakable, even though at the stage when this recording was made they were achieved at the expense of permitting some rather unpolished execution. As far as the development of Dynagroove is concerned, it seems considerably improved in the "spatial" dimension from the early releases (this is also true of the Chicago Orchestra releases discussed below), but the bass still sounds as though produced by oscillators rather than instruments, and loud passages are sometimes quite shrilly distorted.

November 30, 1963

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
SAT. 107,787 SUN. 111,361
OCT 19 1963

Records: RCA Victor has combined two masterpieces in its latest release, a fine Red Seal recording of Beethoven's "Eroica" by the Boston Symphony with Eric Leinsdorf conducting. The album is adorned with a color reproduction of Rembrandt's painting, "Aristole Contemplating the Bust of Homer," recently acquired by the Metropolitan Museum at a record-breaking figure.

RCA Victor's four album release in its low-priced Victrola line for October includes:

David Oistrakh with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony in violin selections by Chausson, Saint-Saens, Leclair and Locatelli; Monteux and the Berlin Philharmonic in Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Gary Graffman and the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch in Chopin's Concerto No. 1 for Piano and Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant and the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch in D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air (with pianist Nicole Henriot); Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
The Pilot
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 88,877
NOV 30 1963

-Rec

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ('Eroica'). Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA stereo & mono 2644).

Few of us, I imagine, will ever be able to replay this performance without recalling the unhappy circumstances in which we heard Mr. Leinsdorf's "Eroica" this week. Originally a manifesto of the conductor's ideals, it has become accidentaly a memento. It is a noble, well-formed interpretation, a thing of Olympian gravity and great splendor. I would like to hear the exposition repeated in the first movement, but very few conductors do this. I would like the scherzo to be more "vivace," but Leinsdorf's tempo is close to Beethoven's metronome marking. These small points should not deter Leinsdorf fans or those who favor a truly majestic approach to the music, however. The best movement is the finale, where the Boston Symphony has a chance to show its full virtuosity.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
DEC 1963

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ("Eroica"); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2644, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2644, $5.98.

SUCH releases as this make any selection of the "best" recording increasingly difficult for the purchaser. Is it really possible for one single Eroica among so many fine ones to be clearly "the best"? Obviously, no. For the reviewer it becomes a temptation to recommend the oddest version (Scherchen's, for instance, played at a preposterously fast tempo, almost as fast as Beethoven's metronome mark, an effect marred more than a little by his orchestra's inability to keep up), so that a familiar work might be reconsidered from a radically different, if sometimes radically incorrect, viewpoint.

Leinsdorf's version possesses more than usual interest, being his first crack at "standard" repertoire with the Boston Symphony for RCA Victor. It is a predictably sleek, powerful projection, devoid of eccentricities, and therefore recommended. The "Dynagroove" recording is good, maybe a bit shy on highs and definitely, to these ears, lacking in bass. The sound is quite clean, though, and the surfaces are remarkably clean.

—R.J.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
DEC 1968

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, (Eroica). The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Conductor. RCA Victor LSC-2644 (Stereo).

Erich Leinsdorf makes it very clear in the notes accompanying the album that this will be no ordinary performance of the Eroica. He has tried to get away from the brass-beating, Sturm und Drang approach to the symphony, and replaces it into its classical context. It is certainly high time someone saw the Eroica in this light, for Leinsdorf's lean and taut reading brings the symphony's harmonic and structural originalities into a much sharper focus than some of the more romantic versions that we are accustomed to. The ordinary modern string complement is used and certain wind doublings are resorted to, and only in this sense is Beethoven "modernized." It would be interesting, if purely academic, to hear the music played with the same number of instruments as the 1804 premiere. However, this is as close as we are likely to get to the composer's actual instrumental requirements. Leinsdorf's performance is not one that will appeal to those who like their Eroica on a grand scale, but as one that returns the music to its proper perspective, it is remarkably convincing. Only the second movement strikes me as not receiving enough weight and tension, a defect detracting somewhat from the overall excellence of the interpretation. The Boston Symphony is never less than first-rate throughout. The recording is brilliant, if a trifle shrill.—Davis

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 127,804 S. 132,035

FEB 2 1964

WAX WORKS

An Aristocratic 'Eroica'

By CHICK OBER
Of The Times Staff

That aristocrat of orchestras, the Boston Symphony, provides an exciting "Eroica" in an RCA Victor dynagroove stereo album. Erich Leinsdorf, a distinguished conductor, considers Beethoven's Third Symphony to be "among the three or four greatest masterpieces of the classic repertoire." His reading of the "Eroica" mirrors that belief in an outstanding performance by the orchestra.

Another fine album by the aristocrat of orchestras — the Boston Symphony — includes Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and the melodic Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. It's also an RCA Victor album with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Erich Leinsdorf

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 20 1963

Robert Taylor's Notes

Boston Symphony Change Pointed Up

By ROBERT TAYLOR

When Erich Leinsdorf assumed the conductorship of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, his first program included Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major. It was a notably fine performance, now repeated on an RCA Victor Dynagroove release adorned by a reproduction of Rembrandt's "Aristotle Contemplating the Bust of Homer."

The relationship between the Rembrandt and the "Eroica" strikes one as mysterious, but there is nothing arcane about Mr. Leinsdorf's approach here.

He is fastidious, proportioned and wonderfully clear, and on the sleeve he supplies a hint of his particular performing recipe: "In this Symphony, the woodwinds ought to be doubled frequently, the horns seldom and the trumpets not at all."

The spirit of Mr. Leinsdorf's conception does not aspire to a fraudulent large scale; he does not romanticize the "Eroica". One may notice how the funeral march attains solemnity and grandeur through precision, and the entire symphony the scope of close and scrupulous observation. A fustian loudness is wanting. In this "Eroica" a textural transparency lends the music a rare economy and propulsive vigor.

The Boston Symphony in its present estate can be heard on this disc, and by way of contrast the recent reissue of three French scores conducted by Charles Munch, on the RCA Victrola series, affords a chance to listen to the previous regime. Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite" and d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air (with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as the pianist) comprise Dr. Munch's program.

The performances are exceedingly French, dry, crisp and brilliant. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer's pianism discloses an authoritative glitter. So Gallic is the orchestral sound, indeed, that one recalls the current character of the Boston Symphony only with an effort.

The capacity of an ensemble to reflect a various palette under various hands may well astonish one, for The Boston Symphony here is an instrument of a different order.

NEW REPUBLIC
WASHINGTON, D.C.
W. 46,792

JAN 11 1964

Erich Leinsdorf has restored to the Boston Symphony the efficiency as a performing instrument that it lost in the years with Munch: it plays once more with precision and tonal beauty. But an orchestra doesn't exist for itself, and the conductor's job isn't merely to get it to play well. It exists as a medium for the performance of music; and his job is to use it to provide the public with effective performances of the orchestral literature. And I must report that the performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony by Leinsdorf and his orchestra on RCA LM- and LSC-2644 is not an an effective one. He is quoted on the record envelope as saying: "I think the title Eroica has misled people over the years, and I wish the very word 'Eroica' would disappear. . . . As for tempi, Beethoven's metronome markings are quite unreliable and . . . are simply impossible in some movements" – which I take to mean impossibly fast. But the title indicates Beethoven's idea of the character of the work; moreover, even if Leinsdorf rejects the metronome markings there are Beethoven's directions of Allegro con brio for the first movement, Allegro vivace for the Scherzo, Allegro molto for the finale; and these call for the energy and animation that are conspicuously absent from the movements as Leinsdorf conducts them; so that we get a first movement without brio, a Scherzo that is not vivace, a finale that is not molto allegro. As for the Marcia Funebre, it begins well, but with its changes of tempo – in the middle section in C major and the passage beginning at bar 209 – it doesn't have the impact it builds up when played in one tempo. Victor LM- and LSC-2673 have Mendelssohn's incidental music for A Midsummer Night's Dream, in which again the orchestra plays beautifully but the Overture, Scherzo and final song are made ineffective by their insufficient animation in Leinsdorf's tempos, and even the Nocturne loses by being taken more slowly than the composer's prescribed Andante.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

MAR 8 1964

ONE'S EARS ARE ON THE STAGE

By MARTIN BOOKSPAN

THE guests had departed, the children were asleep upstairs and there was a general air of contentment hovering over the household. The feeling of well-being stimulated by good food and good conversation recently enjoyed made one loath to leave the living room. Besides, there on the table were the boxes of four-track stereo tapes to be reviewed.

To play them normally—that is, through the two-speaker systems attached to the playback unit — would surely have awakened the sleeping trio above. The obvious solution: headphones. They had not been used for many months simply because protracted exposure to stereo reproduction through headphones spoils one for the more mundane experience of listening to speaker reproduction.

No Alternative

In the given circumstances, however, there was no alternative; out came the headphones from their place in the drawer; into their receptacle in the circuit they were plugged. Then began one of the most exciting listening sessions your reviewer had experienced in months.

The thrill of listening to superb stereo tapes through a fine set of stereo headphones cannot adequately be described; it must be experienced. The listener is lifted from his position as an interested but passive auditor and is propelled directly into the midst of the reproduced sound.

The separation of the stereo channels is extreme but not unnatural and one's ears are suddenly right on the stage with the performers. Subtleties of phrasing, dynamics and balance are heard from the perspective of the podium. All extraneous room noises are eliminated and one's attention is focused on the music.

The first tape auditioned in this manner was RCA Victor's combination of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony and Strauss's Ein Heldenleben (FTC 3006), played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The two works are coupled together on one twin-pack reel, with each score complete and uninterrupted on a single sequence.

Companion

Strauss himself apparently considered "Ein Heldenleben" a latter-day companion piece to the "Eroica." In 1898, he wrote: "Beethoven's 'Eroica' is so little beloved of our conductors and is on this account now only rarely performed, that to fulfill a pressing need I am composing a largish tone poem entitled 'Heldenleben,' admittedly without a funeral march but yet in E flat with lots of horns, which are always a yardstick of heroism."

Whether one views this remark as the height of pretension or facetiousness, the fact remains that Strauss produced a score of impressive eloquence, tinged occasionally with real grandeur and nobility. Rarely can it have sounded more brilliantly extroverted than it does on the new tape as heard through stereo headphones.

The power and intensity of the orchestral performance are overwhelming and the engineering of the sound is a model of clarity and dimension.

The "Eroica" reproduction is on a less exalted plane. This was actually the first recording undertaken by RCA Victor in Boston after Mr. Leinsdorf had succeeded Charles Munch. Not all the problems concerning Symphony Hall's reverberation period had been solved, and there is consequently some muddying of textures in the "Eroica" reproduction. Nevertheless, there is an impact of immensity when the tape is heard through headphones that makes for a unique experience.

MENDELSSOHN: A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

WORLD WEEK
SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,683,758
OCT 11 1963

DISCussions

★★★★ Tops ★★★ Good ★★ Average

RECORD OF THE WEEK

★★★★ Mendelssohn: A Mid-Summer Night's Dream [RCA Victor]. Not only is Erich Leinsdorf a first-rate musician, he is also an imaginative showman. It's his idea for this LP to combine lines from Shakespeare's comedy (read by Inga Swenson) with Mendelssohn's music (performed by the Boston Symphony with chorus and vocal soloists)—and it comes off beautifully. The orchestral performance alone is a magical one, but how much more meaningful it becomes with the poetry added.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 336,210 S. 507,694

SEP 22 1963

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music—but with a difference—is to be found on a Victor record on which Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf, in a moment of inspiration selected certain passages by Puck, Titania and others to be spoken, sometimes over the music. Some passages are sung. All is delicately beautiful and, on the whole, welcome, although the narration has just a touch of sirup.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

SEP 29 1963

★ ★ ★ ★

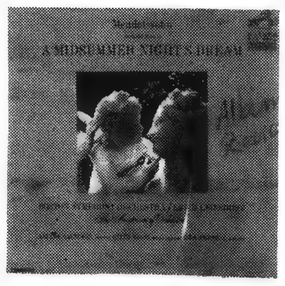
Midsummer Night

The Boston Symphony, with its marvelous strings, would seem a suitable vehicle for Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. With Erich Leinsdorf conducting, such is the case. In addition, there is more than the orchestral suite. Soprano Arlene Saunders, mezzo Helen Vanni, narrator Inga Swenson and a chorus weld together some of the spoken and sung parts of the incidental music for a full-length delight.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

SEP 21 1963

CLASSICAL PICK



"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"—Boston Symphony/Leinsdorf—RCA Victor LM2673
Here is a superb recorded performance of Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" from Victor by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf at the helm. Sopranos Arlene Saunders and Helen Vanni provided the vocals and Inga Swenson the narrations. Artistically executed by all concerned, the set is also available in a deluxe limited edition that includes a pair of Boydell prints and commentary by George Marek. Both the limited and the standard versions are worthy additions to the shelf of the classical devotee.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
SEP 22 1963

Orchestra Has 3 New Recordings

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The imminence of the opening of the Boston Symphony's 83rd season has been presaged by RCA Victor's release of three new Dynagroove recordings featuring the orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Of these the "Midsummer Night's Dream" received brief comment here a fortnight ago. It is a genial recording of Mendelsohn's honeysuckle-and-moonlight music. The ramatic recitative, however, selected from Shakespeare, conjures up a need for another dimension, though pleasantly recited.

The "Ein Heldenleben" of Strauss is a more even success.

"Here Mr. Leinsdorf's affinity for the score—and it has seldom been recorded more meticulously—results in a marvelously-balanced performance. Neither as lush as Ormandy's grandiose as Beecham's or wiry as Dorati's, this reading has an almost miraculous clarity.

The continuity of a musical structure in which each detail has been carefully weighed unfolds resoundingly: the reading is a cumulative experience, and the musical pattern plainly projects the virtues of symmetry as well as the Strauss-ian colors. The exact, crisp tone of a highly rhythmic interpretation represents a solid achievement.

vaults, the masters were recently uncovered through the efforts of those who recalled the enthusiasm aroused by Toscanini's conception of the "Great" over two decades ago. The mechanical imperfections of the original were repaired by electronic transfer techniques after hours of infinite pains.

I'm afraid the restored version fails to provoke in me the eagerness of its adherents, and indeed seems patchy. True, the interpretation declares a certain Olympian amiability, but compared with half-a-dozen others, from Furtwangler's captivating phrase to Walter's profundity to the slow swell of Krips' long line, it is insubstantial.

Toscanini's 'Great'

The same approach distinguishes the collaboration between Mr. Leinsdorf, Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony in the Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1 in B-flat Minor, the first employing these exact forces. Again the interpretation is clean, tidy and musically agreeable. Mr. Rubinstein is certainly no stranger to the score either on records or off.

His approach is in the grand style, but treated with taste. One might ask for a Tchaikovsky of more emotional scope than the result, but the advantages of the Dynagroove process and the sincere straightforward precision of the work, its lack of bombast, more than compensate for what is usually a highly theatrical introspection.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

SEP 5 1963

Record Review

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM — Mendelssohn (Incidental Music) — Boston Symphony/Erich Leinsdorf (RCA-LD/LSCD-2673 Limited Edition-S-2775): The restless souls at RCA have produced another unusual achievement, a single record of incidental music to a Midsummer Night's Dream housed in a container that cannot help but be a conversation piece.

Imagine, if you will, a large folder-like envelope in blue (14 x 17 inches) enriched by an excellent miniaturized reproduction of a scene from this work, and containing not one, but two Fuseli reproductions suitable for hanging.

Oh yes, the music. There is a lift and a sparkle to the score as it is unveiled under the nimble fingers of Leinsdorf. The high professionalism of the three voices—Arlene Saunders, Helen Vanni and Inga Swenson—and the just-right chorous, makes this possibly the best version yet. Musically. Excellent. Technically: Excellent. Stereo: Very good.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

1963

MENDELSSOHN: Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Arlene Saunders (soprano), Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano), Inga Swenson (narrator); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2673, $4.98 or Stereo LSC-2673, $5.98. [See also Note below.]

ⓈLEINSDORF, who performs eight of the twelve pieces of incidental music Mendelssohn wrote for Shakespeare's comedy, plus the Overture, has had the very good idea of using passages from the play spoken by Inga Swenson to introduce each of same. All this should have made for an enchanting recording, but it has not worked out that way. The tempi Leinsdorf employs for the Overture and several of the numbers, and also the color palette he favors, makes Mendelssohn's world of elves and fairies sound anything but buoyant and mercurial. Nor does "The Aristocrat of Orchestras" always play with its accustomed unanimity. Too, the fortes are recorded so that they seem a bit coarse, and there is an absence of really soft tone. But Leinsdorf's idea was still a good one.

—C.J.L.

ASHTABULA, OHIO
STAR-BEACON
D. 17,602 S. 17,623

OCT 5 1963

Concert listening:

Boston Symphony scores 2

The Boston Symphony is the core of two spectacle recordings. In one of Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," the spectacular was provided by the recording engineers. In the other, of Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," it came from the imagination and daring of the Boston's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

"Ein Heldenleben" has been used a number of times to demonstrate advanced recording techniques, of course, and inevitably so. The orchestration is wide, deep and rich, loaded with contrasty dynamics. Its newest use for this purpose is the best so far because no value of the music has been sacrificed to achieve hi-fi and stereo dramatics.

Knowing Leinsdorf, you know he'd have it no other way. With his precise feeling for values, all techniques must serve the music rather that it ever being the other way. He conducted a well-balanced performance of this supercharged score and the achievement of the engineers is that it sounds that way coming from the phonograph.

To Mendelssohn's music Leinsdorf had the daring and imagination to make additions, namely a selection of speeches from Shakespeare's play, declaimed at appropriate points, either above the music or between music by the actress, Inga Swenson. This was one of the high points of the Boston's 1962-63 season and it comes off no less effectively in recording.

Again there is a masterful unfolding of the musical texture by Leinsdorf which comes out always energized, always sensitive and always cohesive and true. His singers were Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo.

PHOTO WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 10,500

SEP 23 1963

MENDELSSOHN'S INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. The classic story of this work, but classic many years after its composer was dead, goes back to the '30s in Germany when Hitler was turned down by Richard Strauss who had been instructed to write new incidental music for Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. Strauss, hardly in favor at the time, worsened his position by refusing on the basis he could not better Mendelssohn's music. The latter had been a Jew. Fortunately, music knows no such petty bounds and the world today, as it did 120 years ago, finds this work as charming and light as any on music's wide palette. Arlene Saunders is the soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo, and Inga Swenson, narrator in this highly excellent offering.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W, 167,032

AUG 24 1963

FROM RCA VICTOR—Arthur Rubinstein will be represented by Tchaikovsky's B-flat Minor Concerto, Van Cliburn by the Beethoven Fourth. A numbered, limited edition of Mendelssohn music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Erich Leinsdorf and the BSO, is also being readied for September release (along with a regular package for buyers on a budget).

MENDELSSOHN: A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

WORLD WEEK
SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,683,758
OCT 11 1963

DISCussions

★★★★ Tops ★★★ Good ★★ Average

RECORD OF THE WEEK

★★★★ Mendelssohn: A Mid-Summer Night's Dream [RCA Victor]. Not only is Erich Leinsdorf a first-rate musician, he is also an imaginative showman. It's his idea for this LP to combine lines from Shakespeare's comedy (read by Inga Swenson) with Mendelssohn's music (performed by the Boston Symphony with chorus and vocal soloists)—and it comes off beautifully. The orchestral performance alone is a magical one, but how much more meaningful it becomes with the poetry added.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
SEP 21 1963

CLASSICAL PICK

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"—Boston Symphony/Leinsdorf—RCA Victor LM2673
Here is a superb recorded performance of Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" from Victor by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf at the helm. Sopranos Arlene Saunders and Helen Vanni provided the vocals and Inga Swenson the narrations. Artistically executed by all concerned, the set is also available in a deluxe limited edition that includes a pair of Boydell prints and commentary by George Marek. Both the limited and the standard versions are worthy additions to the shelf of the classical devotee.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
NOV 1963

MENDELSSOHN: Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Arlene Saunders (soprano), Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano), Inga Swenson (narrator); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2673, $4.98 or Stereo LSC-2673, $5.98. [See also Note below.]

⑧LEINSDORF, who performs eight of the twelve pieces of incidental music Mendelssohn wrote for Shakespeare's comedy, plus the Overture, has had the very good idea of using passages from the play spoken by Inga Swenson to introduce each of same. All this should have made for an enchanting recording, but it has not worked out that way. The tempi Leinsdorf employs for the Overture and several of the numbers, and also the color palette he favors, makes Mendelssohn's world of elves and fairies sound anything but buoyant and mercurial. Nor does "The Aristocrat of Orchestras" always play with its accustomed unanimity. Too, the fortes are recorded so that they seem a bit coarse, and there is an absence of really soft tone. But Leinsdorf's idea was still a good one.
—C.J.L.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 336,210 S. 507,694
SEP 22 1963

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music—but with a difference—is to be found on a Victor record on which Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf, in a moment of inspiration selected certain passages by Puck, Titania and others to be spoken, sometimes over the music. Some passages are sung. All is delicately beautiful and, on the whole, welcome, although the narration has just a touch of sirup.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4300
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
SEP 22 1963

Orchestra Has 3 New Recordings

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The imminence of the opening of the Boston Symphony's 83rd season has been presaged by RCA Victor's release of three new Dynagroove recordings featuring the orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Of these the "Midsummer Night's Dream" received brief comment here a fortnight ago. It is a genial recording of Mendelsohn's honeysuckle-and-moonlight music. The ramatic recitative, however, selected from Shakespeare, conjures up a need for another dimension, though pleasantly recited.

The "Ein Heldenleben" of Strauss is a more even success.

"Here Mr. Leinsdorf's affinity for the score—and it has seldom been recorded more meticulously—results in a marvelously-balanced performance. Neither as lush as Ormandy's grandiose as Beecham's or wiry as Dorati's, this reading has an almost miraculous clarity.

The continuity of a musical structure in which each detail has been carefully weighed unfolds resoundingly: the reading is a cumulative experience, and the musical pattern plainly projects the virtues of symmetry as well as the Strauss-ian colors. The exact, crisp tone of a highly rhythmic interpretation represents a solid achievement.

vaults, the masters were recently uncovered through the efforts of those who recalled the enthusiasm aroused by Toscanini's conception of the "Great" over two decades ago. The mechanical imperfections of the original were repaired by electronic transfer techniques after hours of infinite pains.

I'm afraid the restored version fails to provoke in me the eagerness of its adherents, and indeed seems patchy. True, the interpretation declares a certain Olympian amiability, but compared with half-a-dozen others, from Furtwangler's captivating phrase to Walter's profundity to the slow swell of Kripo' long line, it is insubstantial.

Toscanini's 'Great'

The same approach distinguishes the collaboration between Mr. Leinsdorf, Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony in the Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1 in B-flat Minor, the first employing these exact forces. Again the interpretation is clean, tidy and musically agreeable. Mr. Rubinstein is certainly no stranger to the score either on records or off.

His approach is in the grand style, but treated with taste. One might ask for a Tchaikovsky of more emotional scope than the result, but the advantages of the Dynagroove process and the sincere straightforward precision of the work, its lack of bombast, more than compensate for what is usually a highly theatrical intrespection.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112
SEP 29 1963

Midsummer Night

The Boston Symphony, with its marvelous strings, would seem a suitable vehicle for Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. With Erich Leinsdorf conducting, such is the case. In addition, there is more than the orchestral suite. Soprano Arlene Saunders, mezzo Helen Vanni, narrator Inga Swenson and a chorus weld together some of the spoken and sung parts of the incidental music for a full-length delight.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
SEP 5 1963

Record Review

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM — Mendelssohn (Incidental Music) — Boston Symphony/Erich Leinsdorf (RCA-LD/LSCD-2673 Limited Edition-S-2775): The restless souls at RCA have produced another unusual achievement, a single record of incidental music to a Midsummer Night's Dream housed in a container that cannot help but be a conversation piece.

Imagine, if you will, a large folder-like envelope in blue (14 x 17 inches) enriched by an excellent miniaturized reproduction of a scene from this work, and containing not one, but two Fusell reproductions suitable for hanging.

Oh yes, the music. There is a lift and a sparkle to the score as it is unveiled under the nimble fingers of Leinsdorf. The high professionalism of the three voices—Arlene Saunders, Helen Vanni and Inga Swenson—and the just-right chorous, makes this possibly the best version yet. Musically. Excellent. Technically: Excellent. Stereo: Very good.

ASHTABULA, OHIO
STAR-BEACON
D. 17,602 S. 17,623
OCT 5 1963

Concert listening:

Boston Symphony scores 2

The Boston Symphony is the core of two spectacle recordings. In one of Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," the spectacular was provided by the recording engineers. In the other, of Mendelssohn's music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," it came from the imagination and daring of the Boston's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

"Ein Heldenleben" has been used a number of times to demonstrate advanced recording techniques, of course, and inevitably so. The orchestration is wide, deep and rich, loaded with contrasty dynamics. Its newest use for this purpose is the best so far because no value of the music has been sacrificed to achieve hi-fi and stereo dramatics.

Knowing Leinsdorf, you know he'd have it no other way. With his precise feeling for values, all techniques must serve the music rather that it ever being the other way. He conducted a well-balanced performance of this supercharged score and the achievement of the engineers is that it sounds that way coming from the phonograph.

To Mendelssohn's music Leinsdorf had the daring and imagination to make additions, namely a selection of speeches from Shakespeare's play, declaimed at appropriate points, either above the music or between music by the actress, Inga Swenson. This was one of the high points of the Boston's 1962-63 season and it comes off no less effectively in recording.

Again there is a masterful unfolding of the musical texture by Leinsdorf which comes out always energized, always sensitive and always cohesive and true. His singers were Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo.

PHOTO WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 10,500
SEP 23 1963

MENDELSSOHN'S INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. The classic story of this work, but classic many years after its composer was dead, goes back to the '30s in Germany when Hitler was turned down by Richard Strauss who had been instructed to write new incidental music for Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. Strauss, hardly in favor at the time, worsened his position by refusing on the basis he could not better Mendelssohn's music. The latter had been a Jew. Fortunately, music knows no such petty bounds and the world today, as it did 120 years ago, finds this work as charming and light as any on music's wide palette. Arlene Saunders is the soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo, and Inga Swenson, narrator in this highly excellent offering.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W, 167,032
AUG 24 1963

FROM RCA VICTOR—Arthur Rubinstein will be represented by Tchaikovsky's B-flat Minor Concerto, Van Cliburn by the Beethoven Fourth. A numbered, limited edition of Mendelssohn music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Erich Leinsdorf and the BSO, is also being readied for September release (along with a regular package for buyers on a budget).

278

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WEEKLY-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

SEP 18 1963

In anticipation of the Shakespeare Quadricentennial next year, RCA Victor is releasing this month a recording of "Midsummer Night's Dream" by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf in two editions (a regular LP and a special deluxe, individually numbered limited edition. The limited edition, in folio form, includes two Boydell engravings reproduced from the "Imperial Folio" of Shakespeare's plays originally published in London 150 years ago. It also includes passages from the play and a text piece by George R. Marek, Victor veepee-general manager.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS PRESS
D. 33,516 S. 34,934

SEP 28 1963

RECORD CONCERT

Leinsdorf Energetic In Seeking Audiences

By Donald W. Wieder

The Boston Symphony and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf, already hold top-flight rank internationally, but they seem determined to make sure that, despite such fame, knowledge of that rating spreads.

Part of this insistence on claim to fame has come by energetic planning to attain listeners far from the cultured home base — by extensive tours and by records.

CONTRASTING WORKS

Two recent releases on Dynagroove are of almost diametric viewpoints, yet serve to indicate the depth of this orchestra. One is fluffy Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn (RCA Victor LM 2673) and the other, the massive "Hero's Life" by Richard Strauss (RCA Victor LM 2641).

In the playful Mendelssohn work are a chorus, soprano, mezzo-soprano and narrator. Played frequently and often with varied outdoor backgrounds, this music is timeless in its interest but always refreshing as a balmy breeze. (This reviewer once was in an orchestra which played the work in a dell next to a vale where Shakespearean production was staged and absorbed lots of atmosphere but never got the plot unraveled — but the story except as a springboard is unimportant.)

SCAMPERING MELODY

The Boston Symphony seems to catch the ethereal quality of Mendelssohn so that there are no notes — just scampering melody.

On the ponderous side, but with moments of fun and glamor, is the Strauss album, "Ein Heldenleben," which Strauss composed in 1898 at the age of 35 as a symbolical representation of elements in his own biography. This calls for huge instrumentation yet great delicacy, and the album notes indicate that Leinsdorf and his players were amazed in playbacks that passages which they feared might be covered up or distorted, came through with great clarity against a setting of sonority.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 12,125

DEC 7 1963

DISC GUIDE

mac

If ever music was suitably matched to the gossamer qualities of pure fantasy it's Mendelssohn's incidental music for A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. As realized on RCA Victor by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony the music from first to last is pure enchantment. No other score has ever matched the play so well nor captured its special moonlit qualities. The music shimmers and darts about in fairy-like fashion that leaves the listener spellbound. In this respect the light soprano voices of Arlene Saunders and Helen Vanni are a definite asset, but Inga Swenson's reading of some of the verses (Leinsdorf's idea, not Mendelssohn's) is extraneous to the work. Good as the reading is, it neither adds nor detracts from the score; it's just there. All el se is lovely.

* * *

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,000

DEC 4 1963

Mendelssohn: Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (RCA LSC 2673). With a wealth of recordings of the Mendelssohn score, a logical question would seem to be: "Why another?" The question is answered after the first few bars of music on the record. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have combined with Arlene Saunders, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; and Inga Swenson, narrator, to produce an interpretation of intelligence and full-bodied sound. All of the usual orchestral sections are included in the album, but this is only the third listing in the catalogue which has some of the vocal segments. This most popular of Mendelssohn's writings receives a scintillating rendering at the hands of the artists for this performance.

Tucson Daily Citizen
TUCSON, ARIZ.
D. 45,420

MAR 28 1964

ALBUMS

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM (Mendelssohn). The usual excerpts (overture, nocturne, scherzo, wedding march) are spiced by others with voice and by readings from the Shakespeare text. Erich Leinsdorf's direction of the Boston Symphony is alert and painstaking, but there is more poetry in Inga Swenson's readings. (Victor)

LYONS, ILL.
CITIZEN
W. 3,231

SEP 19 1963

Round 'n' Round with SOUND

Midsummer is long past now, but the dream lingers; in fact what person is there who cannot bear to hear Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" in wintertime?

Regardless of season we delight in it, especially when it is played (as it is in a new Victor recording) by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Featured as soloists are Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vannia, mezzo, plus an extra special feature, Inga Swenson, narrator.

This is the first time we've heard any narration recorded; it is pleasantly appropriate. (After all, the music is "incidental" to the performance of Shakespeare's play.) There is not an awful lot of talk—about a half-dozen brief sections in all—so the dream-like quality of the music is not dispelled by too lengthy interruptions.

Apparently Leinsdorf is getting the terrific recording workout that he is because Victor fears he may stay at Boston no longer than he has for the last several appointments he held.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

APR 1964

MENDELSSOHN: Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream", Opp. 21 and 61; Arlene Saunders (soprano), Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano), Inga Swenson (narrator), Boston Symphony Orchestra and Chorus conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four Track 7½ ips. Stereo Tape, RCA Victor FTC-2119, $8.95.

TAFTER its oddly flat-footed Overture, this performance gradually warms up to its narrative method of short but evocative Shakespearean cues to the musical numbers. Some English critics have understandably reacted "traumatically" to Inga Swenson's American accent, and it is also true that her opening lines evoke more of the elocution class than the theater. In the near-melodrama preceding Ye Spotted Snakes, which should always be done this way if at all, we get more feeling of the fine actress she really is (one of the best Ophelias I have seen, for example). Her almost little-girl delivery of Puck's lines suggests that alternating her voice with a boy's might have been an even better realization of this pregnant idea. Perfect balance of both speaking and singing voices with the orchestra, and superb sound in the tape edition. —J.D.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

OCT 1963

Mendelssohn, Strauss in Boston

MENDELSSOHN: "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Arlene Saunders, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Inga Swenson, narrator. Boston Symphony and Chorus, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor (RCA Victor LSC-2673).

STRAUSS: "Ein Heldenleben." Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor (RCA Victor LSC-2641).

Erich Leinsdorf is essentially a man of the musical theater and it is only natural that he should turn to some of the most fanciful and unabashedly theatrical music ever written: Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." It is heard here complete with brief snippets from Shakespeare's text.

"Is the work still valid?" asks Victor's George Marek in his liner notes. The obvious proof of its validity is in this sumptuous performance which Erich Leinsdorf offers with the help of three talented ladies. It is obvious that the conductor, and all concerned, believed strongly in this magical combine of music and poetry which the Elizabethan Shakespeare created, and which the Victorian Mendelssohn embellished.

Erich Leinsdorf: Man of the Theater

Inga Swenson charmingly reads the lines of Titania, Puck, Theseus, Oberon and assorted sprites. The brief vocal parts—the Fairies' musical sleeping potion for Titania and the final music with chorus—are equally as enchanting, as sung by Arlene Saunders and Helen Vanni.

Leinsdorf's recording of Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" lacks a continual fabric; it is fragmented and sectional. As with Leinsdorf's performances of the work here last spring, "Heldenleben" seems aloof, wanting the continuous tension which carries the work from episode to episode. The orchestral playing, however, is brilliant and clear. —R. J.

278

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WEEKLY-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

SEP 18 1963

In anticipation of the Shakespeare Quadricentennial next year, RCA Victor is releasing this month a recording of "Midsummer Night's Dream" by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf in two editions (a regular LP and a special deluxe, individually numbered limited edition. The limited edition, in folio form, includes two Boydell engravings reproduced from the "Imperial Folio" of Shakespeare's plays originally published in London 150 years ago. It also includes passages from the play and a text piece by George R. Marek, Victor veepee-general manager.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS PRESS
D. 33,516 S. 34,934

SEP 28 1963

RECORD CONCERT

Leinsdorf Energetic In Seeking Audiences

By Donald W. Wieder

The Boston Symphony and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf, already hold top-flight rank internationally, but they seem determined to make sure that, despite such fame, knowledge of that rating spreads.

Part of this insistence on claim to fame has come by energetic planning to attain listeners far from the cultured home base — by extensive tours and by records.

CONTRASTING WORKS

Two recent releases on Dynagroove are of almost diametric viewpoints, yet serve to indicate the depth of this orchestra. One is fluffy Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn (RCA Victor LM 2673) and the other, the massive "Hero's Life" by Richard Strauss (RCA Victor LM 2641).

In the playful Mendelssohn work are a chorus, soprano, mezzo-soprano and narrator. Played frequently and often with varied outdoor backgrounds, this music is timeless in its interest but always refreshing as a balmy breeze. (This reviewer once was in an orchestra which played the work in a dell next to a vale where Shakespearean production was staged and absorbed lots of atmosphere but never got the plot unraveled — but the story except as a springboard is unimportant.)

SCAMPERING MELODY

The Boston Symphony seems to catch the ethereal quality of Mendelssohn so that there are no notes — just scampering melody.

On the ponderous side, but with moments of fun and glamor, is the Strauss album, "Ein Heldenleben," which Strauss composed in 1898 at the age of 35 as a symbolical representation of elements in his own biography. This calls for huge instrumentation yet great delicacy, and the album notes indicate that Leinsdorf and his players were amazed in playbacks that passages which they feared might be covered up or distorted, came through with great clarity against a setting of sonority.

LYONS, ILL.
CITIZEN
W. 3,231

SEP 19 1963

Round 'n' Round with SOUND

Midsummer is long past now, but the dream lingers; in fact what person is there who cannot bear to hear Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" in wintertime?

Regardless of season we delight in it, especially when it is played (as it is in a new Victor recording) by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Featured as soloists are Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vannia, mezzo, plus an extra special feature, Inga Swenson, narrator.

This is the first time we've heard any narration recorded; it is pleasantly appropriate. (After all, the music is "incidental" to the performance of Shakespeare's play.) There is not an awful lot of talk—about a half-dozen brief sections in all—so the dream-like quality of the music is not dispelled by too lengthy interruptions.

Apparently Leinsdorf is getting the terrific recording workout that he is because Victor fears he may stay at Boston no longer than he has for the last several appointments he held.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 12,125

DEC 7 1963

DISC GUIDE

mac

If ever music was suitably matched to the gossamer qualities of pure fantasy it's Mendelssohn's incidental music for A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. As realized on RCA Victor by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony the music from first to last is pure enchantment. No other score has ever matched the play as well. It captured its special moonlit qualities. The music shimmers and darts about in fairy-like fashion that leaves the listener spellbound. In this respect the light soprano voices of Arlene Saunders and Helen Vanni are a definite asset, but Inga Swenson's reading of some of the verses (Leinsdorf's idea, not Mendelssohn's) is extraneous to the work. Good as the reading is, it neither adds nor detracts from the score; it's just there. All else is lovely.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

APR 1964

MENDELSSOHN: Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream", Opp. 21 and 61; Arlene Saunders (soprano), Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano), Inga Swenson (narrator), Boston Symphony Orchestra and Chorus conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four Track 7½ ips. Stereo Tape, RCA Victor FTC-2119, $8.95.

AFTER its oddly flat-footed Overture, this performance gradually warms up to its narrative method of short but evocative Shakespearean cues to the musical numbers. Some English critics have understandably reacted "traumatically" to Inga Swenson's American accent, and it is also true that her opening lines evoke more of the elocution class than the theater. In the near-melodrama preceding Ye Spotted Snakes, which should always be done this way if at all, we get more feeling of the fine actress she really is (one of the best Ophelias I have seen, for example). Her almost little-girl delivery of Puck's lines suggests that alternating her voice with a boy's might have been an even better realization of this pregnant idea. Perfect balance of both speaking and singing voices with the orchestra, and superb sound in the tape edition.

—J.D.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

OCT 1963

Mendelssohn, Strauss in Boston

MENDELSSOHN: "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Arlene Saunders, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Inga Swenson, narrator. Boston Symphony and Chorus, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor (RCA Victor LSC-2673).

STRAUSS: "Ein Heldenleben." Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor (RCA Victor LSC-2641).

Erich Leinsdorf is essentially a man of the musical theater and it is only natural that he should turn to some of the most fanciful and unabashedly theatrical music ever written: Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." It is heard here complete with brief snippets from Shakespeare's text.

"Is the work still valid?" asks Victor's George Marek in his liner notes. The obvious proof of its validity is in this sumptuous performance which Erich Leinsdorf offers with the help of three talented ladies. It is obvious that the conductor, and all concerned, believed strongly in this magical combine of music and poetry which the Elizabethan Shakespeare created, and which the Victorian Mendelssohn embellished.

Erich Leinsdorf: Man of the Theater

Inga Swenson charmingly reads the lines of Titania, Puck, Theseus, Oberon and assorted sprites. The brief vocal parts—the Fairies' musical sleeping potion for Titania and the final music with chorus—are equally as enchanting, as sung by Arlene Saunders and Helen Vanni.

Leinsdorf's recording of Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" lacks a continual fabric; it is fragmented and sectional. As with Leinsdorf's performances of the work here last spring, "Heldenleben" seems aloof, wanting the continuous tension which carries the work from episode to episode. The orchestral playing, however, is brilliant and clear. —R. J.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660

DEC 4 1963

Mendelssohn: Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (RCA LSC 2673). With a wealth of recordings of the Mendelssohn score, a logical question would seem to be: "Why another?" The question is answered after the first few bars of music on the record. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have combined with Arlene Saunders, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; and Inga Swenson, narrator, to produce an interpretation of intelligence and full-bodied sound. All of the usual orchestral sections are included in the album, but this is only the third listing in the catalogue which has some of the vocal segments. This most popular of Mendelssohn's writings receives a scintillating rendering at the hands of the artists for this performance.

Tucson Daily Citizen
TUCSON, ARIZ.
D. 45,420

MAR 28 1964

ALBUMS

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM (Mendelssohn). The usual excerpts (overture, nocturne, scherzo, wedding march) are spiced by others with voice and by readings from the Shakespeare text. Erich Leinsdorf's direction of the Boston Symphony is alert and painstaking, but there is more poetry in Inga Swenson's readings. (Victor)

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

DEC 1963

Ⓢ Ⓜ MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream—Incidental Music, Opp. 21 & 61. Arlene Saunders (soprano); Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano); Inga Swenson (narrator); Boston Symphony Orchestra and Chorus, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR limited edition LSC/D 2673 $7.98, LM/D 2673 $6.98; LSC 2673 $5.98, LM 2673* $4.98.

Interest: Mendelssohnian magic Performance: Crystal-clear
Recording: Excellent
Stereo Quality: Good

All of the Mendelssohn Midsummer Night's Dream score that can stand on its own, with the minor exception of the Pyramus Funeral March (which is included on Klemperer's Angel disc), has been fashioned by Erich Leinsdorf into a concert suite with connecting narration from Shakespeare's text. Leinsdorf has given us the Overture, Scherzo, Fairies' March, "You spotted snakes," Intermezzo, Nocturne, Wedding March, Clowns' Dance, and Finale.

Sparkle, elegance, precision, but also a touch of rigidity, mark Leinsdorf's readings. The vocal solo and choral episodes are done with great verve and imagination, but unhappily, Inga Swenson's narration is rather obtrusive, particularly throughout the first side, where she seems unduly coy and the volume level of her voice sits rather high in relation to the music.

Save for the balance of narrator and music, RCA's recording is of amazing clarity and presence. Had I been a musician on the taping session, I would have been afraid to breathe too loudly. Those who prefer to do without narration should try the London disc with Peter Maag (for stylish interpretation), or Otto Klemperer on the Angel recording (for completeness). RCA Victor's limited-edition version listed in the heading involves some knockout luxury packaging—an oversize "elephant" folio that contains two Boydell engravings from Fuseli's eighteenth-century surrealist paintings illustrating the play. D. H.

Arkansas Gazette.
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 92,176 S. 105,024

MAR 15 1964

Erich Leinsdorf, who has assumed the Munch mantle and added his own luster, conducts the Boston Symphony in Mendelssohn's incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Actress Inga Swenson as narrator, with soloists Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo, recite or sing selected speeches to the accompaniment of this delectable music.

PAINESVILLE, OHIO
TELEGRAPH
D. 19,700

MAR 3 1964

MENDELSSOHN'S familiar incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is augmented by two soloists and narration from Shakespeare's play. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in this recording as well as in Gustav Mahler's "First Symphony" based on melodies from his "Songs of a Wayfarer"—also in the library's collection.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 128,713 S. 191,399

DEC 15 1963

RECORDS

INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO 'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' by Mendelssohn; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. (Victor Dynagroove.)

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music wears well in spite of so many performances of the more familiar passages (Wedding March for example). Mr. Leinsdorf now leads the Boston Symphony in a performance that brings out the essence of this attractive score. The Incidental Music, we are reminded, was written as accompaniment for the play, in contrast to the Overture, which was written 17 years earlier, when Mendelssohn was 17.

In preparing the version used for this performance, Mr. Lensdorf selected passages from the play to be spoken, and these are printed in the album notes. They are spoken with disarming grace by Inga Swenson as narrator. There are also sung passages by Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo.

Mendelssohn himself gets the right of way with his music that so perfectly mirrors the fantasy, the wit and gaiety of the play.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 193,013 S. 156,632

NOV 29 1963

The Record Cabinet

By MILTON BERLINER

ERICH LEINSDORF, new musical director of the Boston Symphony, is fast building a list of distinguished recordings in RCA Victor's new rich Dynagroove sound, bringing this great orchestra fresh prestige.

Among the latest is a stunning performance of Mendelssohn's incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, with Arlene Saunders, soprano; Hanelen Vanni, mezzo-soprano, and, as narrator, Inga Swenson.

This is perhaps the piece de resistance of the new batch of releases. But there are also highly desirable Leinsdorf-Boston albums of—the Tchaikowsky Concerto No. 1 with pianist Artur Rubinstein; Strauss' Ein Heldenleben; the first recording of Dello Joio's Fantasy and Variations for piano and orchestra combined with Ravel's Concerto in G, with the talented young Lorin Hollander as soloist; the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).

HIGH FIDELITY
TRADE NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6.400

NOV 1963

MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream—play and music. Arlene Saunders, sop.; Helen Vanni, mezzo-sop.; Inga Swenson, narrator; Leinsdorf, chorus, Boston Symphony Orch. RCA Victor FTC 2141, $8.95.

Mendelssohn's music was made for Shakespearean drama—and to suit concert hall demands. Leinsdorf has selected passages from the play to go with the music. His choice seems well considered, but is it necessary? Incidental music or no, the Mendelssohn score, played complete in concert, sustains itself exquisitely without such aid. (Indeed, the conductor might have done better to concentrate on his main job; we miss the requisite control in the Overture, lightness in the Scherzo.) Inga Swenson, valiantly speaking several parts, is excellent when avoiding the arch manner; the character Puck (see Wedding March at B 425ff.) bothers her the most. The sound of the orchestra, as of the soloists and chorus, is the most natural evocation of Symphony Hall, Boston, that we have heard. Listen to the hushed opening of the Overture (A 16), the bass tuba.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

MAR 1964

Ⓢ MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream—Incidental Music, Op. 61. Arlene Saunders (soprano), Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano), Inga Swenson (narrator); chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR FTC 2141 $8.95.

Interest: Musical fantasy
Performance: Conscientious
Recording: Satisfactory
Stereo Quality: Fine

The overture and nine of the twelve sections of the score Mendelssohn composed to accompany Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream are offered in this recording, more than in any other version so far on tape. They include the familiar Scherzo—which Erich Leinsdorf conducts with spirit and refinement after a fairly labored reading of the overture—the March of the Fairies, the fairies' song "You spotted snakes," the Intermezzo, the Nocturne—a warm and tender thing in this performance, notable for a glowing horn solo—the Dance of the Clowns, the Wedding March, and the finale. The last, and the song "You spotted snakes," call for vocal soloists and chorus, and both are sung with the appropriate delicacy. The narration by Inga Swenson of lines from the play is likewise effective, imparting some sense of the uses to which the music is put in a stage production. The recorded sound is a little muddy and dynamically constricted in the first sequence of the tape submitted for review, but the second sequence sounds fine. Program notes, promised on the outside of the package, were not enclosed. C. B.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

DEC 1963

Two new RCA Victor releases — Mendelssohn's incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream and Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F, the Pastorale — are cases in point. The Midsummer Night's Dream music is housed in what may well be the largest record album ever issued (LSC/D-2673, stereo; LM/D-2673, monaural). The disc itself is the customary twelve inches in diameter. The blue and gold portfolio-type case, however, measures 17¼ by 13½ inches and opens up to disclose (in addition to the record) two engravings by John Boydell of Midsummer Night's Dream illustrations published in London in 1803 and never previously reprinted. With or without these trimmings (and a standard-size edition is available), the recording itself offers a performance of the Mendelssohn score that is so clear and straightforward that one does not know whether to describe it as beautifully simple or simply beautiful.

The artists involved are Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf has had the interesting idea of presenting not only the orchestral excerpts that are always played and the songs and choruses that are less frequently given, but the spoken passages from Shakespeare that lead into the musical portions. The solo singers are Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; and Inga Swenson, a veteran of the American Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Connecticut, recites the appropriate lines, which, so the brochure says, were selected by Mr. Leinsdorf himself.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

NOV 16 1963

Merchandising Tells the Tale, Marek Says

NEW YORK—"In this highly competitive era, the need has grown for more effective merchandising. The album that attracts the eye is often the album that sells." The speaker is George Marek, RCA Victor chief, who pointed to two of the label's packages as illustrating the point. The releases are Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony"—both limited editions with unique packaging.

The Mendelssohn, released in honor of the forthcoming Shakespeare quadricentennial, features a performance by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with soloists, chorus and narration. The album was designed to simulate an art portfolio, complete with excerpts from the text and two Boydel prints. Released in August, the limited edition (priced $2 over the regular edition) "sold out immediately, indicating the public's interest in such items."

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1963

Ⓢ Ⓜ MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream—Incidental Music, Opp. 21 & 61. Arlene Saunders (soprano); Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano); Inga Swenson (narrator); Boston Symphony Orchestra and Chorus, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR limited edition LSC/D 2673 $7.98, LM/D 2673 $6.98; LSC 2673 $5.98, LM 2673 $4.98.

Interest: Mendelssohnian magic Performance: Crystal-clear
Recording: Excellent
Stereo Quality: Good

All of the Mendelssohn Midsummer Night's Dream score that can stand on its own, with the minor exception of the Pyramus Funeral March (which is included on Klemperer's Angel disc), has been fashioned by Erich Leinsdorf into a concert suite with connecting narration from Shakespeare's text. Leinsdorf has given us the Overture, Scherzo, Fairies' March, "You spotted snakes," Intermezzo, Nocturne, Wedding March, Clowns' Dance, and Finale.

Sparkle, elegance, precision, but also a touch of rigidity, mark Leinsdorf's readings. The vocal solo and choral episodes are done with great verve and imagination, but unhappily, Inga Swenson's narration is rather obtrusive, particularly throughout the first side, where she seems unduly coy and the volume level of her voice sits rather high in relation to the music.

Save for the balance of narrator and music, RCA's recording is of amazing clarity and presence. Had I been a musician on the taping session, I would have been afraid to breathe too loudly. Those who prefer to do without narration should try the London disc with Peter Maag (for stylish interpretation), or Otto Klemperer on the Angel recording (for completeness). RCA Victor's limited-edition version listed in the heading involves some knockout luxury packaging—an oversize "elephant" folio that contains two Boydell engravings from Fuseli's eighteenth-century surrealist paintings illustrating the play. D. H.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 128,713 S. 191,399

DEC 15 1963

RECORDS

INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO 'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' by Mendelssohn; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. (Victor Dynagroove.)

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music wears well in spite of so many performances of the more familiar passages (Wedding March for example). Mr. Leinsdorf now leads the Boston Symphony in a performance that brings out the essence of this attractive score. The Incidental Music, we are reminded, was written as accompaniment for the play, in contrast to the Overture, which was written 17 years earlier, when Mendelssohn was 17.

In preparing the version used for this performance, Mr. Lensdorf selected passages from the play to be spoken, and these are printed in the album notes. They are spoken with disarming grace by Inga Swenson as narrator. There are also sung passages by Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo.

Mendelssohn himself gets the right of way with his music that so perfectly mirrors the fantasy, the wit and gaiety of the play.

HIGH FIDELITY
TRADE NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,400

NOV 1963

MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream—play and music. Arlene Saunders, sop.; Helen Vanni, mezzo-sop.; Inga Swenson, narrator; Leinsdorf, chorus, Boston Symphony Orch. RCA Victor FTC 2141, $8.95.

Mendelssohn's music was made for Shakespearean drama—and to suit concert hall demands. Leinsdorf has selected passages from the play to go with the music. His choice seems well considered, but is it necessary? Incidental music or no, the Mendelssohn score, played complete in concert, sustains itself exquisitely without such aid. (Indeed, the conductor might have done better to concentrate on his main job; we miss the requisite control in the Overture, lightness in the Scherzo.) Inga Swenson, valiantly speaking several parts, is excellent when avoiding the arch manner; the character Puck (see Wedding March at B 425ff.) bothers her the most. The sound of the orchestra, as of the soloists and chorus, is the most natural evocation of Symphony Hall, Boston, that we have heard. Listen to the hushed opening of the Overture (A 16), the bass tuba.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

NOV 16 1963

Merchandising Tells the Tale, Marek Says

NEW YORK—"In this highly competitive era, the need has grown for more effective merchandising. The album that attracts the eye is often the album that sells." The speaker is George Marek, RCA Victor chief, who pointed to two of the label's packages as illustrating the point. The releases are Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony"—both limited editions with unique packaging.

The Mendelssohn, released in honor of the forthcoming Shakespeare quadricentennial, features a performance by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with soloists, chorus and narration. The album was designed to simulate an art portfolio, complete with excerpts from the text and two Boydel prints. Released in August, the limited edition (priced $2 over the regular edition) "sold out immediately, indicating the public's interest in such items."

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAR 1964

Ⓢ MENDELSSOHN: A Midsummer Night's Dream—Incidental Music, Op. 61. Arlene Saunders (soprano), Helen Vanni (mezzo-soprano), Inga Swenson (narrator); chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR FTC 2141 $8.95.

Interest: Musical fantasy
Performance: Conscientious
Recording: Satisfactory
Stereo Quality: Fine

The overture and nine of the twelve sections of the score Mendelssohn composed to accompany Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream are offered in this recording, more than in any other version so far on tape. They include the familiar Scherzo—which Erich Leinsdorf conducts with spirit and refinement after a fairly labored reading of the overture—the March of the Fairies, the fairies' song "You spotted snakes," the Intermezzo, the Nocturne—a warm and tender thing in this performance, notable for a glowing horn solo—the Dance of the Clowns, the Wedding March, and the finale. The last, and the song "You spotted snakes," call for vocal soloists and chorus, and both are sung with the appropriate delicacy. The narration by Inga Swenson of lines from the play is likewise effective, imparting some sense of the uses to which the music is put in a stage production. The recorded sound is a little muddy and dynamically constricted in the first sequence of the tape submitted for review, but the second sequence sounds fine. Program notes, promised on the outside of the package, were not enclosed. C. B.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 193,013 S. 156,632

NOV 29 1963

The Record Cabinet

BY MILTON BERLINER

ERICH LEINSDORF, the new musical director of the Boston Symphony, is fast building a list of distinguished recordings in RCA Victor's new rich Dynagroove sound, bringing this great orchestra fresh prestige.

Among the latest is a stunning performance of Mendelssohn's incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, with Arlene Saunders, soprano; Hanelen Vanni, mezzo-soprano, and, as narrator, Inga Swenson.

This is perhaps the piece de resistance of the new batch of releases. But there are also highly desirable Leinsdorf-Boston albums of—the Tchaikowsky Concerto No. 1 with pianist Artur Rubinstein; Strauss' Ein Heldenleben; the first recording of Dello Joio's Fantasy and Variations for piano and orchestra combined with Ravel's Concerto in G, with the talented young Lorin Hollander as soloist; the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).

Arkansas Gazette.
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 92,176 S. 105,024

MAR 15 1964

Erich Leinsdorf, who has assumed the Munch mantle and added his own luster, conducts the Boston Symphony in Mendelssohn's incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Actress Inga Swenson as narrator, with soloists Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo, recite or sing selected speeches to the accompaniment of this delectable music.

PAINESVILLE, OHIO
TELEGRAPH
D. 19,700

MAR 3 1964

MENDELSSOHN'S familiar incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is augmented by two soloists and narration from Shakespeare's play. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in this recording as well as in Gustav Mahler's "First Symphony" based on melodies from his "Songs of a Wayfarer"—also in the library's collection.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,900

DEC 1963

Two new RCA Victor releases — Mendelssohn's incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream and Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F, the Pastorale — are cases in point. The Midsummer Night's Dream music is housed in what may well be the largest record album ever issued (LSC/D-2673, stereo; LM/D-2673, monaural). The disc itself is the customary twelve inches in diameter. The blue and gold portfolio-type case, however, measures 17¼ by 13½ inches and opens up to disclose (in addition to the record) two engravings by John Boydell of Midsummer Night's Dream illustrations published in London in 1803 and never previously reprinted. With or without these trimmings (and a standard-size edition is available), the recording itself offers a performance of the Mendelssohn score that is so clear and straightforward that one does not know whether to describe it as beautifully simple or simply beautiful.

The artists involved are Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf has had the interesting idea of presenting not only the orchestral excerpts that are always played and the songs and choruses that are less frequently given, but the spoken passages from Shakespeare that lead into the musical portions. The solo singers are Arlene Saunders, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; and Inga Swenson, a veteran of the American Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Connecticut, recites the appropriate lines, which, so the brochure says, were selected by Mr. Leinsdorf himself.

28° SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY # 4

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

JUN 1964

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120
†Beethoven: Leonore Overture, No. 3, Op. 72a

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• RCA VICTOR LM 2701. LP. $4.98.
• • RCA VICTOR LSC 2701. SD. $5.98.

Leinsdorf's Schumann is clean, spirited, and bright, and the orchestral playing on this disc merits the same adjectives. What is lacking, however, is the strong lyric impulse that makes the old Furtwängler or the more recent Klemperer performances so communicative. I find that Leinsdorf's reading of the slow movement is wanting especially in depth and eloquence.

The Leonore Overture is, similarly, strong and clear, though without special pleading. This is not entirely to Leinsdorf's discredit, since performance standards in music like this are pretty well set by now. But I do not see the need for "just another" Schumann Fourth or Third Leonore, which I'm afraid this record is. A.R.

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
SAT. 92,837 SUN. 93,999

APR 18 1964

New Dynagroove Recordings from RCA Victor:

Schumann's Symphony No. 4, played by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. An admirable rendering of a work that was epoch-making in its time (1841), since it foreshadowed both the symphonic poem and the leitmotif idea.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

APR 18 1964

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT
SCHUMANN: SYMPHONY NO. 4; BEETHOVEN: LEONORE OVERTURE NO. 3
Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2701 (M); LSC 2701 (S)
The "Leonore Overture No. 3" has a majestic intensity heightened by Leinsdorf's reading despite many other versions. The Schumann is played as the expression of a man of noble purpose liberated and exalted by the love he had newly found.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

MAY 2 1964

SCHUMANN: Fourth Symphony, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Enrich Leinsdorf (LM or LSC-2701). Leinsdorf's first venture into the "romantic" repertoire for Victor is not an unqualified success. For those acquainted with Furtwangler's old monophonic recording for Decca, this reading is notably lacking in warmth and nobility. Only in the Scherzo does the Boston conductor seem to warm to his task. Victor's Dynagroove Sound is rather lacking in richness and spaciousness. The filler on the second side is the Beethoven Leonore No. 3 Overture.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

MAY 3 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

A New Schumann Disc By Leinsdorf

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Although it is lush compared to Szell's articulation of the same score, Erich Leinsdorf's interpretation of Schumann's D Minor Symphony, which has been paired with Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 on a new RCA Victor Dynagroove recording, comprises a sound, romantic account of a work that towers over the 19th century as a truly innovatory statement.

The Symphony No. 4, even today, is seldom recognized as a progenitor of cyclic form, based as it is on the psychologically well - grounded pattern that one emotional state carries over into another.

It has no formal recapitulation of material. The opening movement begins with a pensive, introspective motive, the orchestra sounding A as the background; this reappears at the start of the slow movement, the romanze; a phrase from the slow movement is employed in the B-flat major trio of the scherzo; while the finale embodies a subsidiary theme of the opening movement which now becomes the dominant element.

CYCLIC FORM principles determine the relationships of the Schumann Fourth, and it is probably the first of the leitmotif symphonies in the true sense, although you will find the beginning of the Finale of Beethoven's Ninth replete with the germ of the idea since one theme after another is presented and then discarded prior to the entrance of the real theme; and these introductory passages derive from the preceding movements.

But Schumann's Fourth is not haunted by the Beethoven Ninth (or, if you will, exalted by it) as Bruckner's creations were later on, as in the finale of the Fifth. It is closer in spirit to the tone poem. So indeed is Mr. Leinsdorf's reading which captures the sparkling glow of this carefully-integrated music, moves easily through its emotional range and attains a lovely fabric of sound. Brilliance is stressed, but this never devolves into sheer tonal engineering, and with a lively and intense Lenore Overture can be recommended as a solid version of Schumann's freely-shaped symphonic fantasia.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,236 SUN. 296,860

APR 25 1964

THE LIMPID sound of The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf is beautifully reproduced in an RCA Victor LP of Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3.

The D Minor Symphony has never been better served on records, its drama and formidable force a factor for those who want to acquire this music in stunning Dynagroove sound. Stereo, mono.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 180,484 SUN. 187,134

APR 26 1964

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
Sun-Telegraph
D. 247,506 SUN. 236,063

APR 25 1964

Beethoven - Leonore Overture No. 3 — Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf — Victor LSC-2701.

★★★★ A stirring performance of one of the four Overtures that Beethoven wrote for "Fidelio." This is the most popular and familiar of the four and is usually played between the scenes of the last act. The Boston Symphony, under its dynamic leader, plays with real gusto and the recording is free and clear. Coupled with Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

MAY 3 1964

By HOWARD KLEIN

LEONARD BERNSTEIN and Erich Leinsdorf have each recently recorded a Schumann symphony, and while the works are not the same, there is enough similarity between the two to make valid and interesting comparisons of the conductor's approaches.

Mr. Bernstein leads the New York Philharmonic in an exuberant performance of the Symphony No. 1 in B flat (Spring) and the disk represents the gifted conductor at his best (Columbia ML 5981; stereo MS 6581). Mr. Bernstein fills out the set of the four Schumann symphonies available by him with this recording.

Mr Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a logically controlled but somewhat stodgy performance of the Symphony No. 4 in D minor (RCA Victor LM 2701; stereo LSC 2701).

The two symphonies were written within months of each other in 1841. Schumann had been married to Clara in September of 1840 and his high spirits are reflected in both works. (The D minor was put aside after its initial failure and taken up 10 years later. During this period the so-called Symphonies No. 2 and 3 were written and published.)

The key of the D minor should not persuade anyone that the work is tragic. In fact the reverse is true. After an ominous opening the first movement works to a triumphant ending in D major. And the fourth movement is bursting with a victorious feeling of joy and conquest. One could read into this Schumann's long, bitter struggle with his father-in-law, which ended happily with his marriage.

Fanfare

The "Spring" came first and is more openly lyrical and joyous. It seems like a fanfare to a celebration of living.

Mr. Bernstein seems to relish this music, for every bar issues forth with a contagious vitality. Orchestral details are not always as precise as they should be, but the ebullience of the performance quells any niggling, and one revels in Mr. Bernstein's ability to convey highly charged emotion with such cavalier dash. The recording captures the healthy sound of the Philharmonic very well.

Mr. Leinsdorf, though, seems to be a victim of his own scrupulous logic. Given the cyclic nature of the Fourth Symphony, one must make sure that equivalent passages are cast in their proper speeds to insure instant identification. Theme "X" cannot swim past langorously the first time, then reappear later in armor on horseback and be recognized.

By striving for this instant identification, Mr. Leinsdorf lets all the steam out of the work, because his choices of initial tempos for the various themes are on the ponderous side. The introduction to the first movement is very slow. And when its motive shows up in the second movement, first as relief then as background for a gracefully tripping violin obbligato, the halting speed it must take makes the episode sound like drudgery.

This same figure, with the obbligato, comes back as the trio to the Scherzo, and here the results are disastrous. To slow down the trio enough for the episode to correspond properly (and even at that it is played a shade faster than its cousins), all the rollicking momentum of the Scherzo gets bogged down in sticky sweetness.

Brooding

Besides these faults, the rhythmic pulse of the sections does not seem to be generally agreed on by the men in the orchestra, for one choir surges forward as another holds the line and yet another lags. The prevailing mood is brooding introspection, which the final joyous movement does not dispel because, once again, the basic pulse is on the moderate side. And the Germanic thoughtfulness and deliberation of Mr. Leinsdorf's conception fail to hold the interest over the long span.

To fill out the remaining side, each conductor has chosen an overture, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 precedes the first movement of Schumann's in the

28° SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY # 4

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

JUN 1964

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120
†Beethoven: Leonore Overture, No. 3, Op. 72a

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• RCA VICTOR LM 2701. LP. $4.98.
• • RCA VICTOR LSC 2701. SD. $5.98.

Leinsdorf's Schumann is clean, spirited, and bright, and the orchestral playing on this disc merits the same adjectives. What is lacking, however, is the strong lyric impulse that makes the old Furtwängler or the more recent Klemperer performances so communicative. I find that Leinsdorf's reading of the slow movement is wanting especially in depth and eloquence.

The Leonore Overture is, similarly, strong and clear, though without special pleading. This is not entirely to Leinsdorf's discredit, since performance standards in music like this are pretty well set by now. But I do not see the need for "just another" Schumann Fourth or Third Leonore, which I'm afraid this record is. A.R.

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
SAT. 92,837 SUN. 93,999

APR 18 1964

New Dynagroove Recordings from RCA Victor:

Schumann's Symphony No. 4, played by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. An admirable rendering of a work that was epoch-making in its time (1841) since it foreshadowed both the symphonic poem and the leit motif idea.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

APR 18 1964

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT
SCHUMANN: SYMPHONY NO. 4; BEETHOVEN: LEONORE OVERTURE NO. 3
Boston Symphony Orchestra (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2701 (M); LSC 2701 (S)
The "Leonore Overture No. 3" has a majestic intensity heightened by Leinsdorf's reading despite many other versions. The Schumann is played as the expression of a man of noble purpose liberated and exalted by the love he had newly found.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

MAY 3 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

A New Schumann Disc By Leinsdorf

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Although it is lush compared to Szell's articulation of the same score, Erich Leinsdorf's interpretation of [illegible] Minor Symphony which has been paired with Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 on a new RCA Victor Dynagroove recording, comprises a sound, romantic account of a work that towers over the 19th century as a truly innovatory statement.

The Symphony No. 4, even today, is seldom recognized as a progenitor of cyclic form, based as it is on the psychologically well - grounded patters that one emotional state carries over into another.

It has no formal recapitulation of material. The opening movement begins with a pensive, introspective motive, the orchestra sounding A as the background; this reappears at the start of the slow movement, the romanze; a phrase from the slow movement is employed in the B-flat major trio of the scherzo; while the finale embodies a subsidiary theme of the opening movement which now becomes the dominant element.

CYCLIC FORM principles determine the relationships of the Schumann Fourth, and it is probably the first of the leitmotif symphonies in the true sense, although you will find the beginning of the Finale of Beethoven's Ninth replete with the germ of the idea since one theme after another is presented and then discarded prior to the entrance of the real theme; and these introductory passages derive from the preceding movements.

But Schumann's Fourth is not haunted by the Beethoven Ninth (or, if you will, exalted by it) as Bruckner's creations were later on, as in the finale of the Fifth. It is closer in spirit to the tone poem. So indeed is Mr. Leinsdorf's reading which captures the sparkling flow of this carefully-integrated music, moves easily through its emotional range and attains a lovely fabric of sound. Brilliance is stressed, but this never devolves into sheer tonal engineering, and with a lively and intense Lenore Overture can be recommended as a solid version of Schumann's freely-shaped symphonic fantasia.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

MAY 3 1964

By HOWARD KLEIN

LEONARD BERNSTEIN and Erich Leinsdorf have each recently recorded a Schumann symphony, and while the works are not the same, there is enough similarity between the two to make valid and interesting comparisons of the conductor's approaches.

Mr. Bernstein leads the New York Philharmonic in an exuberant performance of the Symphony No. 1 in B flat (Spring) and the disk represents the gifted conductor at his best (Columbia ML 5981; stereo MS 6531). Mr. Bernstein fills out the set of the four Schumann symphonies available by him with this recording.

Mr. Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a logically controlled but somewhat stodgy performance of the Symphony No. 4 in D minor (RCA Victor LM 2701; stereo LSC 2701).

The two symphonies were written within months of each other in 1841. Schumann had been married to Clara in September of 1840 and his high spirits are reflected in both works. (The D minor was put aside after its initial failure and taken up 10 years later. During this period the so-called Symphonies No. 2 and 3 were written and published.)

The key of the D minor should not persuade anyone that the work is tragic. In fact the reverse is true. After an ominous opening the first movement works to a triumphant ending in D major. And the fourth movement is bursting with a victorious feeling of joy and conquest. One could read into this Schumann's long, bitter struggle with his father-in-law, which ended happily with his marriage.

Fanfare

The "Spring" came first and is more openly lyrical and joyous. It seems like a fanfare to a celebration of living.

Mr. Bernstein seems to relish this music, for every bar issues forth with a contagious vitality. Orchestral details are not always as precise as they should be, but the ebullience of the performance quells any niggling, and one revels in Mr. Bernstein's ability to convey highly charged emotion with such cavalier dash. The recording captures the healthy sound of the Philharmonic very well.

Mr. Leinsdorf, though, seems to be a victim of his own scrupulous logic. Given the cyclic nature of the Fourth Symphony, one must make sure that equivalent passages are cast in their proper speeds to insure instant identification. Theme "X" cannot swim past langorously the first time, then reappear later in armor on horseback and be recognized.

By striving for this instant identification, Mr. Leinsdorf gets all the steam out of the work, because his choices of initial tempos for the various themes are on the ponderous side. The introduction to the first movement is very slow. And when its motive shows up in the second movement, first as relief then as background for a gracefully tripping violin obbligato, the halting speed it must take makes the episode sound like drudgery.

This same figure, with the obbligato, comes back as the trio to the Scherzo, and here the results are disastrous. To slow down the trio enough for the episode to correspond properly (and even at that it is played a shade faster than its cousins), all the rollicking momentum of the Scherzo gets bogged down in sticky sweetness.

Brooding

Besides these faults, the rhythmic pulse of the sections does not seem to be generally agreed on by the men in the orchestra, for one choir surges forward as another holds the line and yet another lags. The prevailing mood is brooding introspection, which the final joyous movement does not dispel because, once again, the basic pulse is on the moderate side. And the Germanic thoughtfulness and deliberation of Mr. Leinsdorf's conception fail to hold the interest over the long span.

To fill out the remaining side, each conductor has chosen an overture, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3 precedes the first movement of Schumann's in the

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,236 SUN. 296,860

APR 25 1964

THE LIMPID sound of The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf is beautifully reproduced in an RCA Victor LP of Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3.

The D Minor Symphony has never been better served on records, its drama and formidable force a factor for those who want to acquire this music in stunning Dynagroove sound. Stereo, mono.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 180,484 SUN. 187,134

APR 26 1964

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
Sun-Telegraph
D. 247,506 SUN. 236,063

APR 25 1964

Beethoven - Leonore Overture No. 3 — Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf — Victor LSC-2701.

★★★★ A stirring performance of one of the four Overtures that Beethoven wrote for "Fidelio." This is the most popular and familiar of the four and is usually played between the scenes of the last act. The Boston Symphony under its dynamic leader plays with real gusto and the recording is free and clear. Coupled with Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

MAY 2 1964

SCHUMANN: Fourth Symphony, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Enrich Leinsdorf (LM or LSC-2701). Leinsdorf's first venture into the "romantic" repertoire for Victor is not an unqualified success. For those acquainted with Furtwangler's old monophonic recording for Decca, this reading is notably lacking in warmth and nobility. Only in the Scherzo does the Boston conductor seem to warm to his task. Victor's Dynagroove Sound is rather lacking in richness and spaciousness. The filler on the second side is the Beethoven Leonore No. 3 Overture.

MUNCH RECORDINGS

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1964

DEBUSSY: La Mer; RAVEL: Rapsodie espagnole; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victrola VIC-1041, $2.50, or Stereo VICS-1041, $3.

(La Mer)
Ansermet . . . . . London CM-9228/CS-6024

Munch's reading, which dates from six or seven years back, is of moderate pace and much plasticity of rhythm and phrasing. Note, for example, the liberal interpretation of such markings as "cédez un peu" in I and "espressivo" in II. The smothering of brass and wind details in the beginning of II contributes to a general impression that finesse and concentration are lacking in this rough and ready run-through by a conductor and orchestra who seem to feel (not without justice) that they know this music backwards and forwards. A season or so earlier RCA had recorded a BSO La Mer under Monteux, and that performance (once available as LM-1939) was equally rugged and impulsive, but broader and more intense. At any rate, this new pressing of the Munch has been reprocessed in lush, handsome sound save for deafening crescendos of tape hiss whenever the music falls below mf and a similar electronic diminuendo whenever a big climax is in the works. I thought this to be a suppression of dynamic range until I rechecked my copy of LM- and found the original to be equally restricted, and far less brilliant to boot.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

JAN 1964

DAVID OISTRAKH: Violin Recital

Chausson: Poème, Op. 25 (A). Saint-Saëns: Introduction and rondo capriccioso, Op. 28 (B). Leclair: Sonata for Violin and Piano, No. 3, in D (C). Locatelli: Sonata for Violin and Piano, in F minor (arr. Ysaÿe) (D).

David Oistrakh, violin; Vladimir Yampolsky, piano (in C and D); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. (in A and B). [(A) and (B) from RCA Victor LM 1988, 1956; (C) and (D) from LM 1987, 1956]

● RCA VICTROLA VIC 1058. LP. $2.50.
●● RCA VICTROLA VICS 1058. SD. $3.00.

These pieces represent David Oistrakh's very first American-made recordings, yet in one respect the reissue turns out to be better than the initial releases. The originals were recorded on both mono and stereo tapes but issued on discs in mono only. Now they are available both ways and sound excellent. Oistrakh moves along more swiftly and flowingly in the Chausson and Saint-Saëns than almost any other violinist, though he might have dug a little more deeply into the music. On the other hand, he is most expressive in the slow movements of the two sonatas. Victor has succeeded here in distilling the best material from the two earlier discs and combining it on an improved, lower-priced record. P.A.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 347,672 S. 564,337

FEB 2 1964

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with Charles Munch conducting lavishes a rich coloring on the provocative and allusive tone poem by Debussy in which he describes a complex of emotions induced by thoughts of the sea. Music is never descriptive in an explicit sense, so "La Mer" could have been "La Montagne" without leading anybody astray. Nevertheless, the rise and fall of volume and the shifts in instrumentation maintain a kind of parallelism with the changing aspects of the sea. Eric Satie paid a backhanded tribute to the descriptive effectiveness of the music while listening to a rehearsal in Paris. When asked to comment on the section called "From Morn to Midnight," he said it was excellent except for that passage "around quarter to twelve."

The Boston Symphony's performance discloses clearly enough a line of development and a substantial architectural form. It is not just an atmospheric or a descriptive piece.

A vivid, allusive performance of Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" is placed on the reverse side. Ravel never visited Spain but the Spanish concertgoers loved his Spanish music anyhow. The lively, crisp reproduction is favorable to the music and the orchestra. (RCA-Victor, Stereophonic, one record).

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

FEB 1964

RAVEL: Valses nobles et sentimentales; FAURÉ: Pelléas et Mélisande—Suite; BERLIOZ: Excerpts from "La damnation de Faust"; Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. Columbia ML-5923, $4.98, or Stereo MS-6523, $5.98.

Ⓢ THIS superb recording, typical of Columbia's second-to-none product, clearly reveals the incredible responsiveness of the Philadelphia Orchestra to whatever conductor happens to be leading it. The guest director on this occasion is the erstwhile leader of the Boston Symphony. The blends he favors, which are at the expense of linear separation but which are absolutely correct for the music in this recital, are unmistakably his own and far, far from the sounds we are accustomed to hearing from the Philadelphia ensemble. Tonally, one could hardly expect to find a better performance or recording of any of these works. Their pacing—not to mention some nerveless rhythm—is something else again. A number of Ravel's waltzes emerge as neither noble nor sentimentale but rather endormie. Several of the selections from Fauré's delicate and haunting Suite seem to be interminable. And some of the snap and flash of Munch's Berlioz of ten years ago has vanished, if his readings of these snippets are to be accepted as typical. This record turns out to be a satisfying sonic bath, then, if not much else.

—C.J.L.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1963

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓜ BEETHOVEN: Violin Concerto, in D Major, Op. 61. Jascha Heifetz (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 1992 $5.98, LM 1992* $4.98.

Interest: Violin touchstone
Performance: Flawless
Recording: Still very good
Stereo Quality: Good

Reissued in de luxe format with a special biographical brochure by Samuel Chotzinoff and a complete discography of the Heifetz recordings currently available, this 1956 recording of the Beethoven Concerto shows that the old master need defer to no one—not to Oistrakh in technique nor to Menuhin in musicianship—in the interpretation of this, the most beautiful of all violin concertos.

Heifetz is more than usually selfless and communicative in this reading, and this may stem in part from the fact that Charles Munch was himself a first-rate violinist before embarking on a conductorial career in the 1930's. Whether or not this is the reason, the effect of the performance is that of an exquisite chamber-music collaboration, comparable in caliber to that of the acclaimed Cortot-Thibaud-Casals Beethoven trio now to be heard on Angel's Great Recordings of the Century series. It makes for great Beethoven and wonderfully satisfying listening, an experience enhanced to a considerable extent by clear, clean, and unexaggerated sonics. D.H.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

FEB 1 1964

LOW PRICE CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

RACHMANINOFF: PIANO CONCERTO NO. 3

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Munch)
RCA Victrola VIC 1032 (M); VICS 1032 (S)

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 is stirringly performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. Byron Janis conveys brilliantly the majesty of the composer's bittersweet memory of Russia with striking virtuosity. His driving intensity has almost a feverish air, but there is no denying the heady quality of his performance.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

FEB 2 1 1964

★★★ Dukas, Ravel, d'Indy — Boston Symphony, Munch [RCA Victrola]. Since Munch retired in 1962 as the Boston Symphony's conductor, RCA has been transferring some of his mid-1950 recordings to its "budget" Victrola label. They remain excellent performances at any price—especially the three on this disc: Dukas' perky Sorcerer's Apprentice, Ravel's impressionistic Mother Goose, and d'Indy's dramatic Symphony on a French Mountain Air.

★★★ Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 3—Byron Janis [RCA Victrola]. Although Janis does not play this concerto quite so penetratingly or excitingly as Cliburn [RCA Victor], there is enough sweep and fire and technical dazzle to his performance to make this (as part of RCA's "budget" series) a competitive bargain. Moreover, the sound engineering is better than on Cliburn's disc—and the accompaniment (Boston Symphony, Munch) is better than that given Janis (London Symphony, Dorati) on his more recent Mercury edition.

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
Sun-Telegraph
D. 253,393 SAT. 240,752

JAN 31 1964

Rachmaninoff-Piano Concerto No. 3 — Byron Janis and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch — Victor VICS-1032.

★★★This re-issue of the Rachmaninoff Third is made under Victor's revived "Victrola" label which it compares to paperback edition of older hard-cover books. It is rather an exceptional performance by the assured Mr. Janis who plays with true elegance, wit, power and spirit. Mr. Munch and the Bostonians have a properly balanced accompaniment to go with the pianist. Victor labels the recording, Stereo but since there is no acceptable definition of Stereo and this has been added to a previous recording, there may be some question in the minds of possible purchasers. The recording is a good one though and the new Victrola label is very well priced for the modest pocketbook.

Prokofieff-Symphony No. 6 in E Flat Minor, Op. 111—The Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy—Columbia MS 6489.

HIGH FIDELITY
TRADE NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,400

DEC 1963

BEETHOVEN: Violin Concerto. Heifetz, Munch, Boston Symphony. RCA Victor FTC 2152, $8.95.

This is a reissue on 4-track tape of the well-known Heifetz-Munch version of the concerto. It was available on 2-track tape (ACS-25) some six years ago. The sound, wide-spread and generally well balanced, is particularly persuasive in quieter moments, such as the opening of the slow movement (B 38). (We did note a small hiccup, possibly due to a less-than-perfect splice in the master tape, at A 274). For the Heifetz collector especially, but also one that should have broad appeal.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

MAR 1964

RACHMANINOFF: Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor; Byron Janis (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victrola VIC-1032, $2.50, or Stereo VICS-1032, $3.00.

Ⓢ ONE of the most welcome reissues to date in RCA Victor's Victrola series is this brilliantly virtuosic and exciting performance. The sound of the piano after several years is still exceptionally clean and bright, that of the orchestra perhaps a bit less so but certainly good enough. Janis's sensational playing of the first-movement cadenza, in its virtuosic abandon and control over a wide-ranging tonal palette, rivals and in some respects surpasses the composer's own justly-famed RCA Victor recording. At these prices, a fabulous bargain.

—R.K.

MUNCH RECORDINGS

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1964

DEBUSSY: La Mer; RAVEL: Rapsodie espagnole; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victrola VIC-1041, $2.50, or Stereo VICS-1041, $3.

(La Mer)
Ansermet.....London CM-9228/CS-6024

Munch's reading, which dates from six or seven years back, is of moderate pace and much plasticity of rhythm and phrasing. Note, for example, the liberal interpretation of such markings as "cédez un peu" in I and "espressivo" in II. The smothering of brass and wind details in the beginning of II contributes to a general impression that finesse and concentration are lacking in this rough and ready run-through by a conductor and orchestra who seem to feel (not without justice) that they know this music backwards and forwards. A season or so earlier RCA had recorded a BSO La Mer under Monteux, and that performance (once available as LM-1939) was equally rugged and impulsive, but broader and more intense. At any rate, this new pressing of the Munch has been reprocessed in lush, handsome sound save for deafening crescendos of tape hiss whenever the music falls below mf and a similar electronic diminuendo whenever a big climax is in the works. I thought this to be a suppression of dynamic range until I rechecked my copy of LM-[illegible] and found the original to be equally [illegible]ricted, and far less brilliant to boot.

HIGH FIDELITY
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

JAN 1964

DAVID OISTRAKH: Violin Recital

Chausson: Poème, Op. 25 (A). Saint-Saëns: Introduction and rondo capriccioso, Op. 28 (B). Leclair: Sonata for Violin and Piano, No. 3, in D (C). Locatelli: Sonata for Violin and Piano, in F minor (arr. Ysaÿe) (D).

David Oistrakh, violin; Vladimir Yampolsky, piano (in C and D); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. (in A and B). [(A) and (B) from RCA Victor LM 1988, 1956; (C) and (D) from LM 1987, 1956]

• RCA VICTROLA VIC 1058. LP. $2.50.
•• RCA VICTROLA VICS 1058. SD. $3.00.

These pieces represent David Oistrakh's very first American-made recordings, yet in one respect the reissue turns out to be better than the initial releases. The originals were recorded on both mono and stereo tapes but issued on discs in mono only. Now they are available both ways and sound excellent. Oistrakh moves along more swiftly and flowingly in the Chausson and Saint-Saëns than almost any other violinist, though he might have dug a little more deeply into the music. On the other hand, he is most expressive in the slow movements of the two sonatas. Victor has succeeded here in distilling the best material from the two earlier discs and combining it on an improved, lower-priced record. P.A.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 347,672 S. 564,337

FEB 2 1964

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with Charles Munch conducting lavishes a rich coloring on the provocative and allusive tone poem by Debussy in which he describes a complex of emotions induced by thoughts of the sea. Music is never descriptive in an explicit sense, so "La Mer" could have been "La Montagne" without leading anybody astray. Nevertheless, the rise and fall of volume and the shifts in instrumentation maintain a kind of parallelism with the changing aspects of the sea. Eric Satie paid a backhanded tribute to the descriptive effectiveness of the music while listening to a rehearsal in Paris. When asked to comment on the section called "From Morn to Midnight," he said it was excellent except for that passage "around quarter to twelve."

The Boston Symphony's performance discloses clearly enough a line of development and a substantial architectural form. It is not just an atmospheric or a descriptive piece.

A vivid, allusive performance of Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" is placed on the reverse side. Ravel never visited Spain but the Spanish concertgoers loved his Spanish music anyhow. The lively, crisp reproduction is favorable to the music and the orchestra. (RCA-Victor, Stereophonic, one record).

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

FEB 1964

RAVEL: Valses nobles et sentimentales; FAURÉ: Pelléas et Mélisande—Suite; BERLIOZ: Excerpts from "La damnation de Faust"; Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. Columbia ML-5923, $4.98, or Stereo MS-6523, $5.98.

(S)THIS superb recording, typical of Columbia's second-to-none product, clearly reveals the incredible responsiveness of the Philadelphia Orchestra to whatever conductor happens to be leading it. The guest director on this occasion is the erstwhile leader of the Boston Symphony. The blends he favors, which are at the expense of linear separation but which are absolutely correct for the music in this recital, are unmistakably his own and far, far from the sounds we are accustomed to hearing from the Philadelphia ensemble. Tonally, one could hardly expect to find a better performance or recording of any of these works. Their pacing—not to mention some nerveless rhythm—is something else again. A number of Ravel's waltzes emerge as neither noble nor sentimentale but rather endormie. Several of the selections from Fauré's delicate and haunting Suite seem to be interminable. And some of the snap and flash of Munch's Berlioz of ten years ago has vanished, if his readings of these snippets are to be accepted as typical. This record turns out to be a satisfying sonic bath, then, if not much else.

—C.J.L.

HIGH FIDELITY
TRADE NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6.400

DEC 1963

BEETHOVEN: Violin Concerto. Heifetz, Munch, Boston Symphony. RCA Victor FTC 2152, $8.95.

This is a reissue on 4-track tape of the well-known Heifetz-Munch version of the concerto. It was available on 2-track tape (ACS-25) some six years ago. The sound, wide-spread and generally well balanced, is particularly persuasive in quieter moments, such as the opening of the slow movement (B 38). (We did note a small hiccup, possibly due to a less-than-perfect splice in the master tape, at A 274). For the Heifetz collector especially, but also one that should have broad appeal.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1963

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓜ BEETHOVEN: Violin Concerto, in D Major, Op. 61. Jascha Heifetz (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 1992 $5.98, LM 1992* $4.98.

Interest: Violin touchstone
Performance: Flawless
Recording: Still very good
Stereo Quality: Good

Reissued in de luxe format with a special biographical brochure by Samuel Chotzinoff and a complete discography of the Heifetz recordings currently available, this 1956 recording of the Beethoven Concerto shows that the old master need defer to no one—not to Oistrakh in technique nor to Menuhin in musicianship—in the interpretation of this, the most beautiful of all violin concertos.

Heifetz is more than usually selfless and communicative in this reading, and this may stem in part from the fact that Charles Munch was himself a first-rate violinist before embarking on a conductorial career in the 1930's. Whether or not this is the reason, the effect of the performance is that of an exquisite chamber-music collaboration, comparable in caliber to that of the acclaimed Cortot-Thibaud-Casals Beethoven trio now to be heard on Angel's Great Recordings of the Century series. It makes for great Beethoven and wonderfully satisfying listening, an experience enhanced to a considerable extent by clear, clean, and unexaggerated sonics. D.H.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

FEB 1 1964

LOW PRICE CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

RACHMANINOFF: PIANO CONCERTO NO. 3

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Munch)
RCA Victrola VIC 1032 (M); VICS 1032 (S)

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 is stirringly performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch. Byron Janis conveys brilliantly the majesty of the composer's bittersweet memory of Russia with striking virtuosity. His driving intensity has almost a feverish air, but there is no denying the heady quality of his performance.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

FEB 3 1964

★★★ Dukas, Ravel, d'Indy — Boston Symphony, Munch [RCA Victrola]. Since Munch retired in 1962 as the Boston Symphony's conductor, RCA has been transferring some of his mid-1950 recordings to its "budget" Victrola label. They remain excellent performances at any price—especially the three on this disc. Dukas' perky Sorcerer's Apprentice, Ravel's impressionistic Mother Goose, and d'Indy's dramatic Symphony on a French Mountain Air.

★★★ Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 3—Byron Janis [RCA Victrola]. Although Janis does not play this concerto quite so penetratingly or excitingly as Cliburn [RCA Victor], there is enough sweep and fire and technical dazzle to his performance to make this (as part of RCA's "budget" series) a competitive bargain. Moreover, the sound engineering is better than on Cliburn's disc—and the accompaniment (Boston Symphony, Munch) is better than that given Janis (London Symphony, Dorati) on his more recent Mercury edition.

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
Sun-Telegraph
D. 253,393 SAT. 240,752

JAN 31 1964

Rachmaninoff-Piano Concerto No. 3 — Byron Janis and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch — Victor VICS-1032.

★★★This reissue of the Rachmaninoff Third is made under Victor's revived "Victrola" label which it compares to paperback edition of older hard-cover books. It is rather an exceptional performance by the assured Mr. Janis who plays with true elegance, wit, power and spirit. Mr. Munch and the Bostonians have a properly balanced accompaniment to go with the pianist. Victor labels the recording, Stereo but since there is no acceptable definition of Stereo and this has been added to a previous recording, there may be some question in the minds of possible purchasers. The recording is a good one though and the new Victrola label is very well priced for the modest pocketbook.

Prokofieff-Symphony No. 6 in E Flat Minor, Op. 111—The Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy—Columbia MS 6489.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

MAR 1964

RACHMANINOFF: Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor; Byron Janis (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victrola VIC-1032, $2.50, or Stereo VICS-1032, $3.00.

(S)ONE of the most welcome reissues to date in RCA Victor's Victrola series is this brilliantly virtuosic and exciting performance. The sound of the piano after several years is still exceptionally clean and bright, that of the orchestra perhaps a bit less so but certainly good enough. Janis's sensational playing of the first-movement cadenza, in its virtuosic abandon and control over a wide-ranging tonal palette, rivals and in some respects surpasses the composer's own justly-famed RCA Victor recording. At these prices, a fabulous bargain.

—R.K.

282

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1963

Ⓢ Ⓜ TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6, in B Minor, Op. 74 ("Pathétique"). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2683 $5.98, LM 2683* $4.98.

Interest: Staple
Performance: Coarse-grained
Recording: Rather harsh
Stereo Quality: Okay

In this performance Munch and the Boston Symphony add nothing of distinction to the best contributed in the dozen or more available stereo recordings of the "Pathétique." Munch's reading is surprisingly matter-of-fact, even coarse-grained, and only in the great lyrical buildup midway in the final movement does he achieve a measure of genuine communicative power. The Dynagroove recording is no help either: the trumpets are distressingly overprominent throughout the first movement and the famous march-scherzo third movement, and though there is ample presence at the extremes of the frequency range, there is no solid and natural mid-range sonority in the violin register—very much like the recording of Ravel's Boléro from RCA's initial Dynagroove releases.

For the most satisfactory stereo "Pathétique," one that combines drama and a decent measure of refinement in first-rate sound, the choice is Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra on Columbia.

D. H.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1964

CHOPIN: Piano Concerto No. 1; MENDELSSOHN: Cappriccio Brillant; Gary Graffman (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victrola VIC-1030, $2.50, or Stereo VICS-1030, $3.00.

(Chopin)
Lhévinne.....Vanguard 2111
Pollini.....Capitol SG-7241
Novaes.....Vox S10710

Ⓢ OF my preferred performances of the Chopin Mme. Lhévinne's is quite in a class by itself—an immensely lyrical, old-fashioned class that seems to be dying out. Novaes, more delicate and genteel, has inferior orchestral support and so-so sound, while Pollini is spectacularly broad and youthful and plays with a sweeping vigor that is wonderfully supported by Kletzki's orchestra. Graffman, at the time of this recording, played more along the lines of Pollini, if with less than the latter's tremendous personal projection. Graffman's Mendelssohn, however, is all that one could ask. Munch's support is not particularly subtle but it is certainly polished. And RCA Victrola's sound is equal to that of any of the others, despite its age.

Altogether, and most especially in view of the low price, this is easily the "best buy" in listings of either work. —R.J.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 20,570

JAN 15 1964

MENDELSSOHN: Concerto, violin, op. 64, E minor. BRUCH: Concerto no. 1, op. 26, G minor. Laredo, vln.; Boston Sym. Orch.; Munch, cond. (Mendelssohn); National Sym. Orch.; Mitchell, cond.(Bruch). RCA Victrola (S) VICS 1033, $3.; (M) VIC 1033, $2.50

The young Laredo recorded these works about five years ago, but as far as I can determine the record was never released. The sound is very good, and Laredo can certainly handle the instrument. His interpretation, however, does not equal the other assets of this disc. The phrasing is stiff, dynamic changes are practically nonexistent, and the feeling for the music is too cool and underplayed to compete with so many other fine versions.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

MAR 15 1964

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor is worlds apart from the Mozart but a giant in its own sphere — the big, extroverted, romantic concerto. There are any number of fine recordings available, beginning with the composer's and Horowitz's, and including the Cliburn and Gilels versions.

A fine addition to that company is a version by Byron Janis that has recently been rereleased by Victor. He plays it with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony (VIC 1032; stereo VICS 1032).

The original issue, dropped from Schwann's catalogue a year or so ago, was made in 1957. The quality of performance is very high, as is the engineering. Now in a low-price series ($2.50 for the monophonic version and $3 the stereo), it is an excellent buy.

Mr. Janis realizes much of the brooding poetry of the work but does not overdo the highly romantic phrasing. There is great excitement as he presses forward toward the peak moments and his pianism is always penetratingly brilliant. The second movement is especially beautiful, for there the blend of the poetic and rhapsodic with the assertive and aggressive keeps the long lines taut and expressive without losing their sweeping character.

The Boston Symphony is given its head in climactic moments and the balance is integrated so that orchestra and piano often fuse their sonorities, making the high points truly joint efforts.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Wednesday, January 20, 1965

Cello Concerto Recorded Again

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI) — Sir William Walton's 'cello concerto is having another chance on records, and this time it should make a deeper impression. Enough time has passed since its birth to give it that mellowed quality so important for listener acceptance and the player is Gregor Piatigorsky with the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting.

Piatigorsky and the Boston under Munch gave the concerto its first performance, in Boston in 1957. Since then it has achieved no popularity which is undeserved as this rich-toned stereo recording demonstrates. It fits the soul of the instrument as a litany and Piatigorsky's art fully embraces music so congenial. Some contemporary works need only time to catch on and this probably is one of them.

It is on the same record with Bloch's rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra as performed by the same artists and orchestra. This is "Schelomo" which Bloch composed in 1916 and has caught on and unshakably. Now you hear it as you hear a classic, as something both loved and trusted because it is familiar.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

FEB 1965

Ⓢ Ⓜ WALTON: Cello Concerto. BLOCH: Schelomo. Gregor Piatigorsky (cello); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2109 $5.98, LM 2109 $4.98.

BOOSEY AND HAWKES

NED ROREM

Performance: Electrifying
Recording: Fine

It would be all but impossible to deny that Piatigorsky's succulent, virtuoso performance of Bloch's Schelomo is the epitome of the great cellist's manner. His tone is all plush and gold, his phrases are long and flawlessly shaped, and his grasp of the work as a formal entity—no matter how free the given moment—is certain and unassailable. Piatigorsky and Munch, furthermore, set each other off like caviar and champagne. It is most assuredly not the only way to do this work —nor the best way—but the collaboration here is triumphant.

I wish I could work up at least a small enthusiasm for Walton's cello concerto. But unlike the not dissimilar violin concerto that precedes it by just over fifteen years, it seems stale. It would, to be sure, be difficult to fault the work on paper, but then we all know that Sir William can compose impeccably. But that something extra—even a little of it—is missing in this piece. If the work fails, it seems unlikely that it could be due to the Messrs. Piatigorsky or Munch, who are here, as in Schelomo, at peak form. And RCA's recorded sound is splendid in every way.

W. F.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1965

WALTON: Concerto for Cello and Orchestra; BLOCH: "Schelomo", Hebraic Rhapsody; Gregor Piatigorsky (cello); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victor LM-2109, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2109, $5.98. (28½, 22 mins.)

Ⓢ THE monophonic issue of this recording was reviewed in the ARG for October, 1958(!), by David H. Miller, who noted that Piatigorsky is superb in all respects except intonation, and that the orchestral performances are first-rate. It is indeed fortunate that this première recording of the Walton Concerto by the cellist who commissioned it, and the conductor and orchestra with whom he first performed it, should have been preserved on stereophonic tape at the time, so that it can now be commercially issued in stereo as well, along with the Schelomo. Walton's luminous orchestration (here at its best) benefits wonderfully from it. There is one glaring tape splice in the Allegro appassionato. The directionality is not bad, and although the sound of the solo part does not have, in either work, that sense of immersion in the orchestra which some of the best of the more recent stereo recordings of concerted works have provided, the orchestra is not outbalanced by the cello as much as it is in the 1961 Rose-Ormandy version of Schelomo (Columbia ML-5653/MS-6253). This is a welcome coupling, then, of two of the most colorful works in the modern cello literature. —J.D.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

JAN 1965

Walton: Cello Concerto
Bloch: Schelomo

Charles Munch conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist; RCA Victor LSC-2109 (stereo) and LM-2109

All things considered, the cello has fared rather well at the hands of modern composers, possibly because from Casals on there has been a reasonable supply of virtuosos eager to find new material to perform. Sir William Walton's concerto, written in 1956, is dedicated to Piatigorsky. It is a lyric and fairly somber work, whose dark colors seem to shimmer and glow in this sympathetic collaboration between Piatigorsky and Munch. Although it was previously available in monaural, this is the recording's first appearance in stereo. Ernest Bloch's Hebrew rhapsody Schelomo has by now assumed the familiarity of a modern classic, and Piatigorsky plays it here with conviction and suppleness.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 22,050

DEC 15 1964

CHOPIN: Concerto no. 1 in e, op. 11; MENDELSSOHN: Capriccio brillant, op. 22. Gary Graffman, pf.; Boston Sym. O.; Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victor (S) VICS 1030, $3.; (M) VIC 1030, $2.50

Graffman seems to emphasize the more brilliant aspects of the Chopin piece, and he is well recorded in a clear, clean, bright performance of great assurance and élan. There are several versions of this Chopin now available at "bargain" prices, but this is the best. The Mendelssohn work is a brief one that is rarely heard these days. Graffman plays it well, and the orchestra offers fine support in both compositions.

287

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1963

Ⓐ Ⓟ TCHAIKOVSKY: *Symphony No. 6, in B Minor, Op. 74 ("Pathétique"). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA Victor LSC 2683 $5.98, LM 2683 $4.98.

Interest: Staple
Performance: Coarse-grained
Recording: Rather harsh
Stereo Quality: Okay

In this performance Munch and the Boston Symphony add nothing of distinction to the list of contributed in the dozen or more available stereo recordings of the "Pathétique." Munch's reading is surprisingly matter-of-fact, even coarse-grained, and only in the great lyrical buildup midway in the final movement does he achieve a measure of genuine communicative power. The Dynagroove recording is no help either: the trumpets are distressingly overprominent throughout the first movement and the famous march-scherzo third movement, and though there is ample presence at the extremes of the frequency range, there is no solid and natural mid-range sonority in the violin register—very much like the recording of Ravel's Boléro from RCA's initial Dynagroove releases.

For the most satisfactory stereo "Pathétique," one that combines drama and a decent measure of refinement in first-rate sound, the choice is Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra on Columbia.

D. H.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1964

CHOPIN: Piano Concerto No. 1; MENDELSSOHN: Cappriccio Brillant; Gary Graffman (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victrola VIC-1030, $2.50, or Stereo VICS-1030, $3.00.

(Chopin)
Lhévinne.....Vanguard 2111
Pollini.....Capitol SG-7241
Novaes.....Vox S10710

Of my preferred performances of the Chopin Mme. Lhévinne's is quite in a class by itself—an immensely lyrical, old-fashioned class that seems to be dying out. Novaes, more delicate and genteel, has inferior orchestral support and so-so sound, while Pollini is spectacularly broad and youthful and plays with a sweeping vigor that is wonderfully supported by Kletzki's orchestra. Graffman, at the time of this recording, played more along the lines of Pollini, if with less than the latter's tremendous personal projection. Graffman's Mendelssohn, however, is all that one could ask. Munch's support is not particularly subtle but it is certainly polished. And RCA Victrola's sound is equal to that of any of the others, despite its age.

Altogether, and most especially in view of the low price, this is easily the "best buy" in listings of either work. —R.J.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 20,570

JAN 15 1964

MENDELSSOHN: Concerto, violin, op. 64, E minor. BRUCH: Concerto no. 1, op. 26, G minor. Laredo, vln.; Boston Sym. Orch.; Munch, cond. (Mendelssohn); National Sym. Orch.; Mitchell, cond. (Bruch). RCA Victrola (S) VICS 1033, $3.; (M) VIC 1033, $2.50

The young Laredo recorded these works about five years ago, but as far as I can determine the record was never released. The sound is very good, and Laredo can certainly handle the instrument. His interpretation, however, does not equal the other assets of this disc. The phrasing is stiff, dynamic changes are practically nonexistent, and the feeling for the music is too cool and underplayed to compete with so many other fine versions.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

MAR 15 1964

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor is worlds apart from the Mozart but a giant in its own sphere — the big, extroverted romantic concerto. There are any number of fine recordings available, beginning with the composer's and Horowitz's, and including the Cliburn and Gilels versions.

A fine addition to that company is a version by Byron Janis that has recently been rereleased by Victor. He plays it with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony (VIC 1032; stereo VICS 1032).

The original issue, dropped from Schwann's catalogue a year or so ago, was made in 1957. The quality of performance is very high, as is the engineering. Now in a low-price series ($2.50 for the monophonic version and $3 the stereo), it is an excellent buy.

Mr. Janis realizes much of the brooding poetry of the work but does not overdo the highly romantic phrasing. There is great excitement as he presses forward toward the peak moments and his pianism is always penetratingly brilliant. The second movement is especially beautiful, for there the blend of the poetic and rhapsodic with the assertive and aggressive keeps the long lines taut and expressive without losing their sweeping character.

The Boston Symphony is given its head in climactic moments and the balance is integrated so that orchestra and piano often fuse their sonorities, making the high points truly joint efforts.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Wednesday, January 20, 1965

Cello Concerto Recorded Again

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI) — Sir William Walton's 'cello concerto is having another chance on records, and this time it should make a deeper impression. Enough time has passed since its birth to give it that mellowed quality so important for listener acceptance and the player is Gregor Piatigorsky with [illegible] Boston Symphony. Charles [illegible] Boston under Munch gave the concerto its first performance, in Boston in 1957. Since then it has achieved no popularity which is undeserved as this milestone stereo recording demonstrates. It fits the soul of the instrument as a litany [illegible] Piatigorsky's art [illegible] music so congenial [illegible] contemporary work [illegible] any time to catch on and this probably is one of them.

It is on the same record with Bloch's rhapsody for 'cello and orchestra as performed by the same artists and orchestra. This is "Schelomo" which Bloch composed in 1916 and has caught on and unshakably. Now you hear it as you hear a classic, as something both love[illegible] and trusted because it is famil[illegible]

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

FEB 1965

Ⓢ Ⓜ WALTON: Cello Concerto. BLOCH: Schelomo. Gregor Piatigorsky (cello); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA Victor LSC 2109 $5.98, LM 2109 $4.98.

BOOSEY AND HAWKES

NED ROREM

Performance: Electrifying
Recording: Fine

It would be all but impossible to deny that Piatigorsky's succulent, virtuoso performance of Bloch's Schelomo is the epitome of the great cellist's manner. His tone is all plush and gold, his phrases are long and flawlessly shaped, and his grasp of the work as a formal entity—no matter how free the given moment—is certain and unassailable. Piatigorsky and Munch, furthermore, set each other off like caviar and champagne. It is most assuredly not the only way to do this work—nor the best way—but the collaboration here is triumphant.

I wish I could work up at least a small enthusiasm for Walton's cello concerto. But unlike the not dissimilar violin concerto that precedes it by just over fifteen years, it seems stale. It would, to be sure, be difficult to fault the work on paper, but then we all know that Sir William can compose impeccably. But that something extra—even a little of it—is missing in this piece of the work fails, it seems unlikely that it could be due to the Messrs. Piatigorsky or Munch, who are here, as in Schelomo, at peak form. And RCA's recorded sound is splendid in every way.

W. F.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JAN 1965

WALTON: Concerto for Cello and Orchestra; BLOCH: "Schelomo", Hebraic Rhapsody; Gregor Piatigorsky (cello); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. RCA Victor LM-2109, $4.98, or Stereo LSC-2109, $5.98. (28½, 22 min.)

Ⓢ

was [illegible] 1958, [illegible] who noted that Piatigorsky is superb in all respects except intonation, and that the orchestral performances are first-rate. It is indeed fortunate that this premiere recording of the Walton Concerto by the cellist who commissioned it, and the conductor and orchestra with whom he first performed it, should have been preserved on stereophonic tape at the time, so that it can now be commercially issued in stereo as well, along with the Schelomo. Walton's luminous orchestration (here at its best) benefits wonderfully from it. There is one glaring tape splice in the Allegro appassionato. The directionality is not bad, and although the sound of the solo part does not have, in either work, that sense of immersion in the orchestra which some of the best of the more recent stereo recordings of concerted works have provided, the orchestra is not outbalanced by the cello as much as it is in the 1961 Rose-Ormandy version of Schelomo (Columbia ML-5653/MS-6253). This is a welcome coupling, then, of two of the most colorful works in the modern cello literature. —J.D.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,900

JAN 1965

Walton: Cello Concerto
Bloch: Schelomo

Charles Munch conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist; RCA Victor LSC-2109 (stereo) and LM-2109

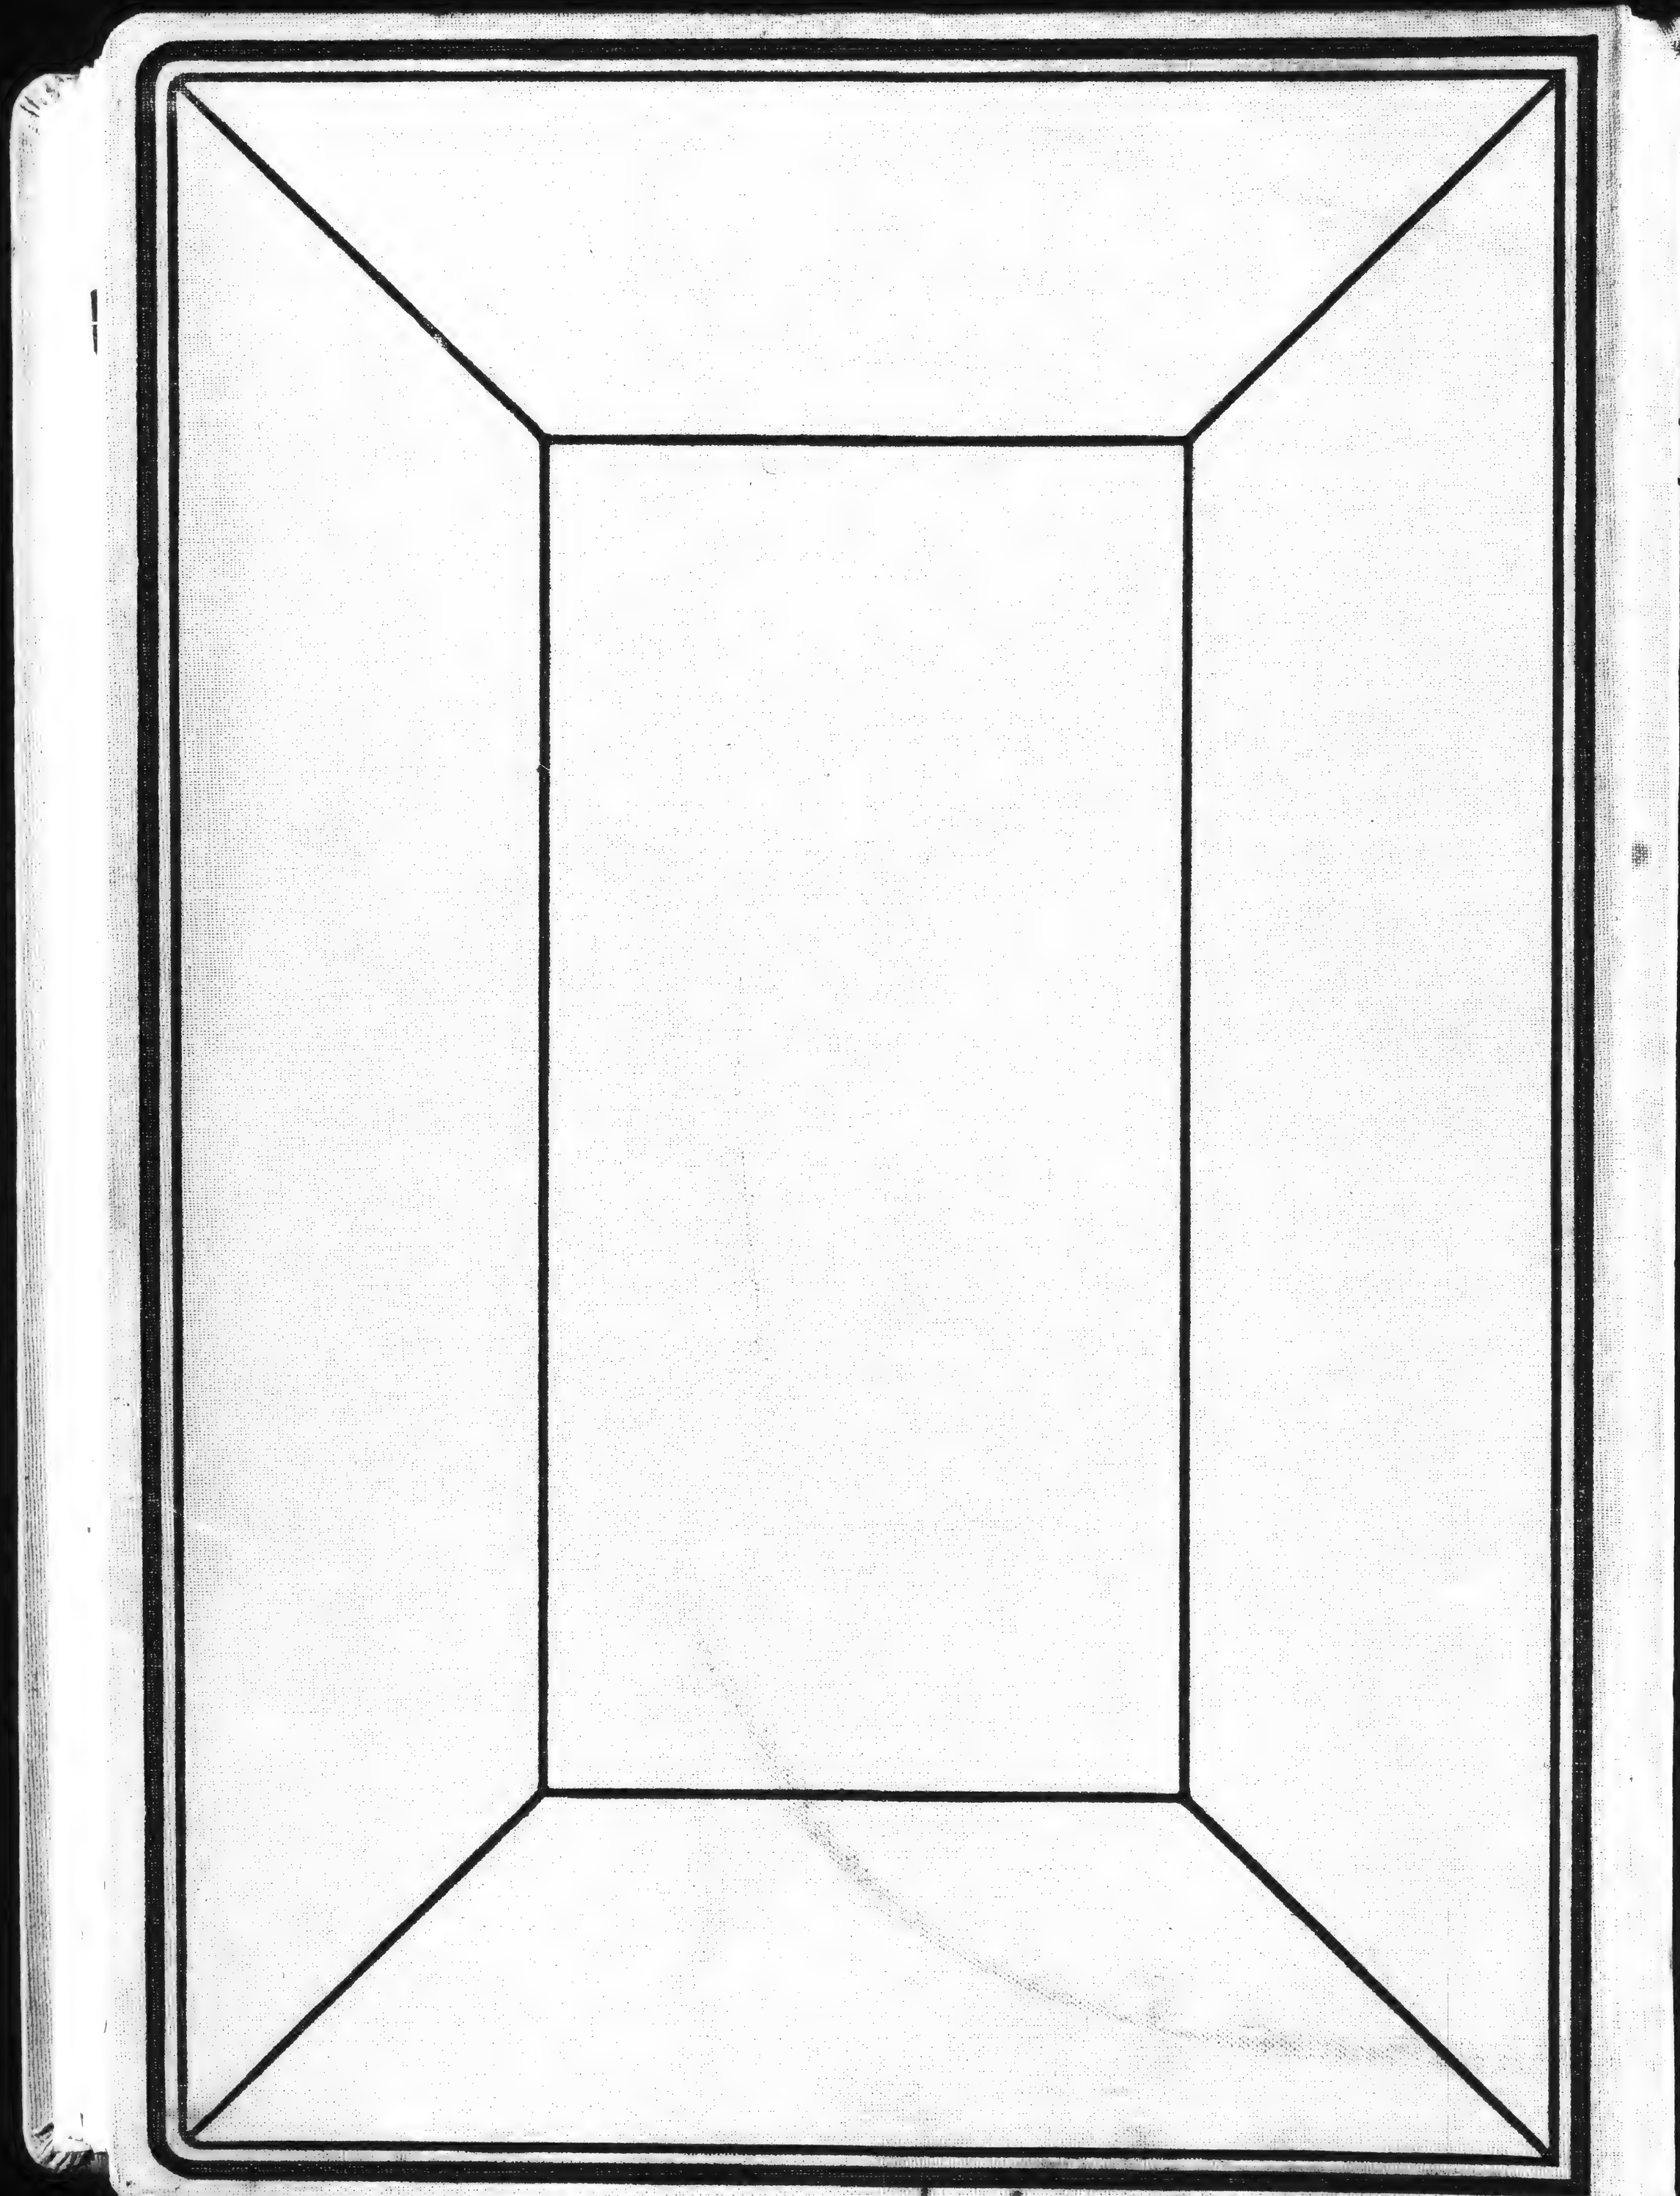
All things considered, the cello has fared rather well at the hands of modern composers, possibly because from Casals on there has been a reasonable supply of virtuosos eager to find new material to perform. Sir William Walton's concerto, written in 1956, is dedicated to Piatigorsky. It is a lyric and fairly somber work, whose dark colors seem to shimmer and glow in this sympathetic collaboration between Piatigorsky and Munch. Although it was previously available in monaural, this is the recording's first appearance in stereo. Ernest Bloch's Hebrew rhapsody Schelomo has by now assumed the familiarity of a modern classic, and Piatigorsky plays it here with conviction and suppleness.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 22,050

DEC 15 1964

CHOPIN: Concerto no. 1 in e, op. 11; MENDELSSOHN: Capriccio brillant, op. 22. Gary Graffman, pf.; Boston Sym. O.; Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victor (S) VICS 1030, $3.; (M) VIC 1030, $2.50

Graffman seems to emphasize the more brilliant aspects of the Chopin piece, and he is well recorded in a clear, clean, bright performance of great assurance and élan. There are several versions of this Chopin now available at "bargain" prices, but this is the best. The Mendelssohn work is a brief one that is rarely heard these days. Graffman plays it well, and the orchestra offers fine support in both compositions.



END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 110

Tanglewood

1963 - 1964

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER

Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
56-032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
56-033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
56-034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
56-036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
56-038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
56-039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
56-041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
56-042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

I N D E X

PRE-SEASON FESTIVAL..... 2

PRE-SEASON MUSIC CENTRE..... 22

1st. WEEK,JUNE 30-JULY 5..... 34

2nd. WEEK JULY 6-12..... 49

3rd. WEEK JULY 13-19.....Eugene Ormandy..... 60

4th WEEK JULY 20-26....William Steinberg.....Van Cliburn..... 69

5th WEEK JULY 2-August 2....Steinberg...Silverstein...DePasquale..... 84

6th WEEK AUGUST 3-9.....R. Burgin...P. Curtin...L. Chookasian, J. Diaz, J. Bolet..... 92

7th WEEK AUGUST 10-16....M. Rudolf...S. Ozawa...L.Hollander...P. Peardon.....102
E. Flagello

8th WEEK AUGUST 17-23...L. Stokowski...R. Burgin...L.Amara...L.Chookasian.G.Shirley.....110

CHAMBER CONCERTS.....120

POPS CONCERT.....133

GALA EVENING.....136

3Day MUSICOLOGICAL SYMPOSIUM.....141

4 WEEK CONTEMPORARY MUSIC SEMINAR.....145

STRING SYMPOSIUM.....147

CONTEMPRARY AMERICAN MUSIC FESTIVAL August 9-13.....150

OBITUARIES.....167

MISCELLANEOUS.....173

POST-SEASON..... 205

2 PRE-SEASON, FESTIVAL

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
NOV 21 1963

Tanglewood Develops Own Top Dressing, Modified Spreader To Vivify Greenery

Bell

TANGLEWOOD LAWN gets careful treatment in quiet months of autumn. Here members of grounds crew are shown applying top dressing to lawn in front of the shed. James Kiley, superintendent of grounds, drives tractor, while Augustus Wehry prods top dressing to encourage its passage through the spreader.

By WILLIAM BELL

LENOX — Those parts of the Tanglewood lawn that see the most foot traffic during the concert season have been getting special treatment during the last few days.

The grounds crew, using a specially modified fertilizer spreader, has been applying top dressing, much as is done on the greens of golf courts. The result will be a greener, more healthy lawn next year.

"We're treating the lawn where it receives the most compaction," James Kiley, superintendent of grounds, said when asked this week about the work his men were doing.

He waved his hand to indicate the large stretch of lawn in front of the Shed and also the area just inside the main entrance. There are the areas where the thousands of Tanglewood concertgoers most frequently pass.

Mr. Kiley said he converted Tanglewood's fertilizer spreader so that it could be used to spread the top dressing. This was done by enlarging the slots through which the fertilizer passes before being flung by the spreader in a centrifugal motion onto the grass.

As a result of the use of the converted spreader, work that formerly required three weeks when done by hand, is now accomplished in a couple of days. Normally, the top dressing filters easily down through the spreader's enlarged holes. When it is damp, however, as it was this week, a second man assists the tractor driver by using a broomstick to loosen the top dressing whenever it packs and refuses to flow.

Composted Soil

The grounds crew developed its own top dressing by generously fertilizing areas of a nearby Tanglewood-owned field, letting vegetation grow up and then plowing it under. When this cycle has been repeated a couple of times, the result is excellent grass food, Mr. Kiley said, "much like composted soil."

Tanglewood has been using the fertilizer spreader for lawn care chores for about a year. Mr. Kiley, who is enthusiastic about the machine, said, "It has paid for itself already."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JAN 16 1964

Tanglewood Plans Include 32 Works New to Festival

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to include during next summer's eight-week season of the Berkshire Festival two American premieres and 30 other works not previously performed at Tanglewood. The season will open July 3.

The American premieres to be heard this summer are Haydn's cantata, "Applausus," with soloists Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler and Donald Bell; and Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann." Strauss' work, based on Molière's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," will be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf and will have as soloists Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni and Mr. Bell.

Two works new to Tanglewood are referred to by Mr. Leisdorf as "music for festivals." They are Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," to be performed with Phyllis Curtin and Justino Diaz as soloists, and "The Death of the Bishop of Bridisi," by Menotti, with Lili Chookasian and Mr. Diaz.

Second Season

Mr. Leinsdorf, who will begin his second season at Tanglewood has also announced that the 1964 Festival will include two weeks of chamber music and six weeks of concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory: music for festivals, contemporary music, Strauss cycle, and music for chamber orchestra.

Celebrating the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss' birth (June 11, 1864) there will be an extensive program of his works, including several lesser known compositions: "Tageszeiten," "Three Hymns," "Die Frau ohne Schatten," "Parergon," and "Berleske."

The concert Friday, July 10, will be in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, founder of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, who died Oct. 22. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in two Schubert compositions new to Tanglewood, Symphony No. 3 and the Great Mass in E flat.

The first concert by the full orchestra Friday, July 17, will be in memory of its former conductor, the late Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct interludes from Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten" and Symphony No. 5 by Gustav Mahler.

Van Cliburn To Return

Van Cliburn, who appeared at Tanglewood for the first time last summer, will return July 25 to perform the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1. Aug. 22, final Saturday evening of the 1964 season, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra, chorus and soloists in the first Tanglewood performance of the Verdi Requiem.

In speaking of the contemporary music to be performed, Mr. Leinsdorf said, "The wide range of styles of composition expresses the catholic taste of the Berkshire Festival's approach to contemporary music." Contemporary composers whose works will be played this summer are Barber, Copland, Menotti, Bartok, Rorem and Hovhaness.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, including the 6 chamber orchestra programs and 9 of the 18 programs by the full orchestra.

Guest Conductors

He has invited Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Max Rudolph, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony; William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony; and Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductors.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will make his annual appearance for the Boston Pops at Tanglewood, a concert for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Among the soloists, not already mentioned, who will appear this summer are Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Joseph Silverstein, Berj Zamkochian, Lucine Amara, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello.

The Berkshire Festival this summer will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first gave concerts in the Berkshires in 1936. Tanglewood became the permanent summer home of the orchestra in 1937.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612
JAN 16 1964

Leinsdorf Confirms Translation of Strauss

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 15 — For lack of a Greek scholar among the press corps at a news conference today, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, dispatched an aide to confirm his translation of "Parergon," a Strauss piano concerto for left hand.

Mr. Leinsdorf called the conference to say that the work would be played next summer at the orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. He said he had interpreted Pareergon to mean a side piece to some main theme.

The side returned to report that she had checked with the Harvard University classics department and that, indeed, he was on the right track. She said it could variously be called, "incidental, secondary or subordinate."

"Ah, let us call it a 'side kick,'" Mr. Leinsdorf said, "and isn't it great to live in Boston and have this a local call?"

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,453 SAT. 294,168
JAN 20 1964

FOSS WILL JOIN SUMMER FACULTY AT TANGLEWOOD

5454

Buffalo Philharmonic Conductor Lukas Foss is announced by the Berkshire Festival as one of four composers to guide the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center next summer in Tanglewood, Mass.

Mr. Foss will be in residence there during the first three weeks in August. Aaron Copland, department head, will be present Aug. 3-16, and composer Gunther Schuller will be acting head for the rest of the session. French composer Pierre Boulez completes the roster.

Mr. Foss and his colleagues will take part in the Festival of Contemporary American Music, Aug. 9-13, one of several projects running concurrently with the summer series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 839,581 S. 1,143,546
JAN 17 1964

Notes of Music and Musicians

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will open July 3 with a Mozart program played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction. There will be 24 performances by the orchestra chosen from music for festivals, contemporary music, a Richard Strauss cycle, and music for chamber orchestra. Guest conductors include Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg, and Leopold Stokowski. Arthur Fiedler will conduct a benefit with the Boston Pops. The festival runs eight weeks.

• • •

The program for Jacques Klein's piano recital Jan. 26 at 3:30 o'clock in Orchestra hall has just arrived. It holds Mozart's Fantasy in C minor, K. 475, Haydn's Sonata in C minor, Beethoven's "Appassionata," and Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,218 S. 82,245
JAN 26 1964

5454

In announcing plans for the 27th Berkshire Festival, opening at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) on July 3, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the festival, stated that the orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory: music for festivals, contemporary music, a Strauss cycle and music for chamber orchestra. There will be 24 concerts by the orchestra during the eight weeks.

From Aug. 9 to 13 the Berkshire Music Center, with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will sponsor a Festival of Contemporv Music—a festival within a festival. Among significant comtemporary compositions to be performed by the orchestra during this time will be Barber's Symphony No. 1, Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra and Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
JAN 21 1964

Erich Leinsdorf Previews Tanglewood Summer Season

LENOX, Mass. — The 27th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer will feature two American premieres, two other works never before performed at the festivals, and an all - Strauss program marking the observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Highlights of the eight-week July and August concert season were announced last week by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eight-week Festival will open Friday, July 3 with an all-Mozart program under the direction of Leinsdorf, who will begin his second season at Tanglewood this summer.

The two American premieres will be performances of Haydn's cantata "Applausus" and Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann" based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." In addition Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" and "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" by Menotti will be heard for the first time at Tanglewood.

A special Festival of Contemporary American Music will be sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, from Aug. 9 to Aug. 13.

Continuing a traditional feature of the Berkshire Festival, the first two weeks (July 3, 4, 5 and July 10, 11, 12) will consist of music for a chamber orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert by the full orchestra on Friday, July 17 will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Among guest conductors who have been invited for the season are Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony; William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony; Leopold Stowkowski and Arthur Fiedler.

Fiedler will make his annual appearance as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra for a Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JAN 16 1964

Program Listed For Summer At Tanglewood

Following is a list of musical works planned for performance at Tanglewood this summer as announced Wednesday in Boston by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The list is subject to change. (See story of Leinsdorf's Tanglewood plans on Page 1.)

Chamber Orchestra

HAYDN: Symphony No. 39, "Applausus" (Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell).

MOZART: March in D, K. 237, Serenade in D, K. 203 (Joseph Silverstein), Piano Concerto, K. 450 (Claudio Arrau), Piano Concerto, K. 451 (Claudio Arrau), Piano Concerto (Malcolm Frager), Symphony in C, K. 425, "Linz", Symphony No. 40, K. 550, Symphony No. 38, K. 504, March, K. 248, Divertimento, K. 247, Aria, K. 505 (Helen Boatwright), Serenade No. 8, Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286, Six German Dances, K. 509.

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 3, Great Mass in E flat (Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, Walter Carringer, Donald Bell).

STRAUSS: Interludes from "Intermezzo," "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," complete three-act concert version (Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Donald Bell).

Full Orchestra

BARBER: Symphony No. 1.

BARTOK: Violin Concerto No. 2 (Joseph Silverstein).

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 4, Symphony No. 7, "Ruins of Athens," complete music (Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz).

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 (Van Cliburn), Symphony No. 1.

COPLAND: Symphony for Organ and Orchestra (Berj Zamkochian).

DEBUSSY: "Nocturnes," "Iberia" Suite.

DVORAK: Symphony No. 6.

ELGAR: Variations on an Original Theme.

GABRIELLI: Canzon Quarti.

HOVHANESS: Prelude and Triple Fugue.

LISZT: Fantasie on Themes from "Ruins of Athens" (Jorge Bolet).

MAHLER: Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 5.

MENOTTI: "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" (Lili Chookasian, Justino Diaz).

RAVEL: "Alborado del gracioso."

ROREM: "The Eagles."

SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 5.

STRAUSS: Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten," "Tageszeiten" (Harvard Glee Club, Elliot Forbes, Director), "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes, "Three Hymns" (Phyllis Curtin), "Parergon" (Jorge Bolet), "Burleske" (Lorin Hollander), "Ein Heldenleben," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quixote."

TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis.

VERDI: Requiem (Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, Ezio Flagello).

WAGNER: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Excerpts from "Siegfried."

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JAN 16 1964

Tanglewood To Have Innovations

BOSTON — Several musical works particularly adaptable for performance at festivals will be presented at Tanglewood this summer, according to Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Four Categories

In announcing his program for the 1964 festival during a press conference in Boston Wednesday, he grouped planned performances (without dates) into four categories: music for festivals, contemporary music, Strauss cycle, music for chamber orchestra.

A fifth category, unnamed by Leinsdorf but implicit in the list (subject to change) of 57 works proposed for the eight-week festival that opens July 3, might be called "standard repertory." (The list is printed on Page 21.)

That category includes at least two dozen familiar works such as Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 1, 4 and 7.

Conductors Listed

Of the 24 concerts scheduled in the Shed, Leinsdorf will conduct 15, including the six chamber orchestra programs that start the season. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolph, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Soloists on the schedule are: vocal, Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell, Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas DiVirgilio, Walter Carringer, Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz, Lili Chookasian, Lucine Amara, George Shirley, Ezio Flagello; violin, Joseph Silverstein; piano, Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Jorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander; organ, Berj Zamkochian.

Of special interest among those pieces scheduled in the "festival" category will be works by Mozart, Haydn, Richard Strauss, Menotti and Beethoven.

Echoing Orchestras

The Mozart piece, "Serenade No. 8, Nocturne for Four Orchestra" (K.286), will split the musical forces into one small central orchestra and three echoing orchestras, probably out of sight.

The Haydn cantata, "Applausus," (55 minutes) involves four soloists and chorus and will be heard live for the first time in America.

The Strauss "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (three soloists) also will be having its American premiere, and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," with two soloists, will be presented in its seldom-heard complete version.

Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," from "Children's Crusade," will require the use of two soloists, two children's choirs and a mixed chorus as well as orchestra.

Contemporary Music

Most of the summer's contemporary music, which Leinsdorf defines as "significant music written in our day" will be presented during a "festival within the festival" from Aug. 9 to 13. Composers to be heard include Barber, Bartok, Copland, Hovhaness, Menotti, Rorem, Schuller and Seidman.

The Strauss cycle will include 11 works by Richard Strauss in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of that composer's birth, June 11, 1864.

In addition to well-known Strauss pieces such as "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," Tanglewood audiences will hear "Tageszeiten" with the Harvard University Glee Club, "Three Hymns" with Phyllis Curtin and "Parergon" (left-hand piano concerto with Jorge Bolet.

2 Chamber Weekends

Music for chamber orchestra will be presented at six concerts during the first two weekends. (There were three opening chamber-orchestra weekends in 1963, one for Bach.) Three concerts will be all-Mozart, one all-Haydn, one all-Schubert and one Mozart-Strauss.

Leinsdorf explained the dropping of the all-Bach concert by saying he wished "to keep Bach intimate" and planned to include Bach's music in chamber group recitals in Tanglewood's theater.

The July 10 concert will be given in memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, founder of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, who died Oct. 22, 1963.

Koussevitzky Memorial

The first concert by the full orchestra, July 17, will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

The 1964 festival will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first gave summer concerts in the Berkshires in 1936.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 65,404 S. 116,733

JAN 19 1964

MUSICAL NOTES

Tanglewood's Season Plans Announced

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was host to a press luncheon in which he announced many of his plans for the 1964 Berkshire Festival during July and August at Tanglewood. The eight-week festival will open Friday, July 3, with an all-Mozart program under his direction, now entering his second season with the orchestra.

The orchestra will present music from four areas of its repertory: (1) Music for Festivals (2) Contemporary Music (3) a Strauss Cycle and Music for Chamber Orchestra.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, including the eight chamber music concerts and nine of the 18 programs by the full orchestra. Guest conductors will include Richard Burgin, Associate Conductor, and retired concertmaster; Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Max Rudolf, of the Cincinnati Symphony; William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and Aeopold Stokowski. Arthur Fielder, Conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra will make his annual appearance at Tanglewood for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Soloists already engaged are Clauio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, and Van Cliburn, pianists; Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and Berj Zamkochian, organist. The major choral work is Verdi's "Requiem, with Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor and Ezie Flagello, bass, and the Chorus pro Mucia of Boston.

The Berkshire Festival this summer will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony orchestra first appeared in the Berkshire Hills of Western Massachusetts in 1936. Tanglewood became the permanent summer home of the orchestra in 1937.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SOUTHBRIDGE, Mass.
Circ. 5,112
JAN 30 1964

Strauss Music To Highlight Tanglewood Music Festival

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

Tanglewood's music festival with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open July 3 this year. Erich Leinsdorf, director, has already announced many of his plans for next summer.

In honor of Richard Strauss' 100th anniversary (he was born June, 1864), they will do a whole Strauss cycle. People of Southbridge will be interested to know that Lorin Hollander, who appeared here recently at a Tri-Community Concerts program, will be soloist in this cycle and will play "Burleske". Jorge Bolet, the other piano soloist with the orchestra, in this series will play "Parergon." Other compositions of Richard Strauss to be played by the orchestra at this summer's festival are "Don Juan", "Till Eulenspiegel", "Rosenkavalier" waltz sequence, "Ein Heldenleben", Interludes from "Intermezzo", "Thus spoke Zarasthustra", and "Don Quixote".

Many people confuse the three Strausses. Richard Strauss is in no way related to Johann Strauss (father), the "Waltz King", or Johann Strauss the son. Richard, who died in 1949, is known for his colorful tone poems and the opera "Der Rosenkavalier" (1911), his most popular and certainly most delightful stage work. His art songs are regarded as highly as Hugo Wolf's. He wrote in every type and form of music, from art song to the symphony.

Honored Composer

One of the many extraordinary things about Richard Strauss is that to the day of his death in his 80's, he was able, active, and honored as composer and conductor. He introduced no great innovations. His contribution was that he built upon the revolutionary structure of others, mainly Wagner and Listz. His masterpieces are played throughout the world as practically the only products of German music since Brahms.

It was not very long ago that the music of Strauss was regarded as the extreme of radicalism; now although it does not seem quite conservative, it is highly individual and has little in common with either the classics or the ultra-modern. Like Tchaikovsky he had a phenomenal mastery of the orchestra, extraordinary vigor and vitality, terrific concept of counterpoint (in which several melodies are considered seperately and played at the same time without respect to their mutual harmony or dissonance).

He was a man of exceptional culture and intellectual range; he read widely and more than dabbled in literature and philosophy. His music was greatly influenced by his intimate asociation with the other arts literature (tone poems) and with philosophic ideas, considered by many to be outside the composer's domain.

He worked sometimes 12 hours a day on his compositions and said: "I have long since learned that in my compositions I am unable to write without a program to guide me". "Don Juan", "Till Eulenspiegel", and "Don Quixote" are marvelous examples of his tonal programs. He remains the perfect tone-poet.

Happy listening!

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
JAN 21 1964

Erich Leinsdorf Previews Tanglewood Summer Season

LENOX, Mass. — The 27th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer will feature two American premieres, two other works never before performed at the festivals, and an all - Strauss program marking the observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Highlights of the eight-week July and August concert season were announced last week by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eight-week Festival will open Friday, July 3 with an all-Mozart program under the direction of Leinsdorf, who will begin his second season at Tanglewood this summer.

The two American premieres will be performances of Haydn's cantata "Applausus" and Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann" based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." In addition Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" and "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" by Menotti will be heard for the first time at Tanglewood.

A special Festival of Contemporary American Music will be sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, from Aug. 9 to Aug. 13.

Continuing a traditional feature of the Berkshire Festival, the first two weeks (July 3, 4, 5 and July 10, 11, 12) will consist of music for a chamber orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert by the full orchestra on Friday, July 17 will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Among guest conductors who haye been invited for the season are Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony; William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony; Leopold Stowkowski and Arthur Fiedler.

Fiedler will make his annual appearance as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra for a Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JAN 16 1964

Program Listed For Summer At Tanglewood

Following is a list of musical works planned for performance at Tanglewood this summer as announced Wednesday in Boston by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The list is subjeca to change. (See story of Leinsdorf's Tanglewood plans on Page 1.)

Chamber Orchestra

HAYDN: Symphony No. 39, "Applausus" (Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell).

MOZART: March in D, K. 237, Serenade in D, K. 203 (Joseph Silverstein), Piano Concerto, K. 450 (Claudio Arrau), Piano Concerto, K. 451 (Claudio Arrau), Piano Concerto (Malcolm Frager), Symphony in C, K. 425, "Linz" Symphony No. 40, K. 550, Symphony No. 338, K. 504, March, K. 249, Divertimento, K. 247, Aria, K. 505 (Helen Boatwright), Serenade No. 8, Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286, Six German Dances, K. 509.

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 3, Great Mass in E flat (Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, Walter Carringer, Donald Bell).

STRAUSS: Interludes from "Intermezzo," "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," complete three-act concert version (Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Donald Bell).

Full Orchestra

BARBER: Symphony No. 1.
BARTOK: Violin Concerto No. 2 (Joseph Silverstein).
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 4, Symphony No. 7, "Ruins of Athens," complete music (Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz).
BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 (Van Cliburn), Symphony No. 1.
COPLAND: Symphony for Organ and Orchestra (Berj Zamkochian).
DEBUSSY: "Nocturnes," "Iberia" suite.
DVORAK: Symphony No. 5.
ELGAR: Variations on an Original Theme.
GABRIELLI: Canzon Quarti.
HOVHANESS: Prelude and Triple Fugue.
LISZT: Fantasie on Themes from "Ruins of Athens" (Jorge Bolet).
MAHLER: Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 5.
MENOTTI: "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" (Lili Chookasian, Justino Diaz).
RAVEL: "Alborado del gracioso."
REREM: "The Eagles."
SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 5.
STRAUSS: Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten," "Tdgeszeiten" (Harvard Glee Club, Elliot Forbes, Director), "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes, "Three Hymns" (Phyllis Curtin), "Parergon" (Jorge Bolet), "Burleske" (Lorin Hollander), "Ein Heldenleben," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quixote."
TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6.
VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis.
VERDI: Requiem (Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, Ezio Flagello).
WAGNER: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Excerpts from

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JAN 16 1964

Tanglewood To Have Innovations

BOSTON — Several musical works particularly adaptable for performance at festivals will be presented at Tanglewood this summer, according to Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Four Categories

In announcing his program for the 1964 festival during a press conference in Boston Wednesday, he grouped planned performances (without dates) into four categories: music for festivals, contemporary music, Strauss cycle, music for chamber orchestra.

A fifth category, unnamed by Leinsdorf but implicit in the list (subject to change) of 57 works proposed for the eight-week festival that opens July 3, might be called "standard repertory." (The list is printed on Page 21.)

That category includes at least two dozen familiar works such as Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 1, 4 and 7.

Conductors Listed

Of the 24 concerts scheduled in the Shed, Leinsdorf will conduct 15, including the six chamber orchestra programs that start the season. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolph, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Soloists on the schedule are: vocal, Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell, Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas DiVirgilio, Walter Carringer, Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz, Lili Chookasian, Lucine Amara, George Shirley, Ezio Flagello; violin, Joseph Silverstein; piano, Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Jorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander; organ, Berj Zamkochian.

Of special interest among those pieces scheduled in the "festival" category will be works by Mozart, Haydn, Richard Strauss, Menotti and Beethoven.

Echoing Orchestras

The Mozart piece, "Serenade No. 8, Nocturne for Four Orchestra" (K.286), will split the musical forces into one small central orchestra and three echoing orchestras, probably out of sight.

The Haydn cantata, "Applausus" (55 minutes) involves four soloists and chorus and will be heard live for the first time in America.

The Strauss "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (three soloists) also will be having its American premiere, and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," with two soloists, will be presented in its seldom-heard complete version.

Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," from "Children's Crusade," will require the use of two soloists, two children's choirs and a mixed chorus as well as orchestra.

Contemporary Music

Most of the summer's contemporary music, which Leinsdorf defines as "significant music written in our day" will be presented during a "festival within the festival" from Aug. 9 to 13. Composers to be heard include Barber, Bartok, Copland, Hovhaness, Menotti, Rorem, Schuller and Seidman.

The Strauss cycle will include 11 works by Richard Strauss in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of that composer's birth, June 11, 1864.

In addition to well-known Strauss pieces such as "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," Tanglewood audiences will hear "Tageszeiten" with the Harvard University Glee Club, "Three Hymns" with Phyllis Curtin and "Parergon" (left-hand piano concerto with Jorge Bolet.

2 Chamber Weekends

Music for chamber orchestra will be presented at six concerts during the first two weekends. (There were three opening chamber-orchestra weekends in 1963, one for Bach.) Three concerts will be all-Mozart, one all-Haydn, one all-Schubert and one Mozart-Strauss.

Leinsdorf explained the dropping of the all-Bach concert by saying he wished "to keep Bach intimate" and planned to include Bach's music in chamber group recitals in Tanglewood's theater.

The July 10 concert will be given in memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, founder of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, who died Oct. 27, 1963.

Koussevitzky Memorial

The first concert by the full orchestra, July 17, will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. The 1964 festival will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first gave summer concerts in the Berkshires in

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 65,404 S. 116,733
JAN 19 1964

MUSICAL NOTES By Edgar S. Van Olinda

Tanglewood's Season Plans Announced

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was host to a press luncheon in which he announced many of his plans for the 1964 Berkshire Festival during July and August at Tanglewood. The eight-week festival will open Friday, July 3, with an all-Mozart program under his direction, now entering his second season with the orchestra.

The orchestra will present music from four areas of its repertory: (1) Music for Festivals (2) Contemporary Music (3) a Strauss Cycle and Music for Chamber Orchestra.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, including the eight chamber music concerts and nine of the 18 programs by the full orchestra. Guest conductors will include Richard Burgin, Associate Conductor, and retired concertmaster; Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Max Rudolf, of the Cincinnati Symphony; William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and Aeopold Stokowski. Arthur Fielder, Conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra will make his annual appearance at Tanglewood for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Soloists already engaged are Clauio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, and Van Cliburn, pianists; Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and Berj Zamkochian, organist. The major choral work is Verdi's "Requiem, with Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor and Ezie Flagello, bass, and the Chorus pro Mucia of Boston.

The Berkshire Festival this summer will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony orchestra first appeared in the Berkshire Hills of Western Massachusetts in 1936. Tanglewood became the permanent summer home of the orchestra in 1937.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SOUTHBRIDGE, Mass.
Circ. 5,112
JAN 30 1964

Strauss Music To Highlight Tanglewood Music Festival

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

Tanglewood's music festival with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open July 3 this year. Erich Leinsdorf, director, has already announced many of his plans for next summer.

In honor of Richard Strauss' 100th anniversary (he was born June, 1864), they will do a whole Strauss cycle. People of Southbridge will be interested to know that Lorin Hollander, who appeared here recently at a Tri-Community Concerts program, will be soloist in this cycle and will play "Burleske". Jorge Bolet, the other piano soloist with the orchestra, in this series will play "Parergon." Other compositions of Richard Strauss to be played by the orchestra at this summer's festival are "Don Juan", "Till Eulenspiegel", "Rosenkavalier" waltz sequence, "Ein Heldenleben", Interludes from "Intermezzo", "Thus spoke Zarasthustra", and "Don Quixote".

Many people confuse the three Strausses. Richard Strauss is in no way related to Johann Strauss (father), the "Waltz King", or Johann Strauss the son. Richard, who died in 1949, is known for his colorful tone poems and the opera "Der Rosenkavalier" (1911), his most popular and certainly most delightful stage work. His art songs are regarded as highly as Hugo Wolf's. He wrote in every type and form of music, from art song to the symphony.

Honored Composer

One of the many extraordinary things about Richard Strauss is that to the day of his death in his 85's, he was able, active and honored as composer and conductor. He introduced no great innovations. His contribution was that he built upon the revolutionary structure of others, mainly Wagner and Listz. His masterpieces are played throughout the world as practically the only products of German music since Brahms.

It was not very long ago that the music of Strauss was regarded as the extreme of radicalism; now although it does not seem quite conservative, it is highly individual and has little in common with either the classics or the ultra-modern. Like Tchaikovsky he had a phenomenal mastery of the orchestra, extraordinary vigor and vitality, terrific concept of counterpoint (in which several melodies are considered seperately and played at the same time without respect to their mutual harmony or dissonance).

He was a man of exceptional culture and intellectual range; he read widely and more than dabbled in literature and philosophy. His music was greatly influenced by his intimate asociation with the other arts literature (tone poems) and with philosophic ideas, considered by many to be outside the composer's domain.

He worked sometimes 12 hours a day on his compositions and said: "I have long since learned that in my compositions I am unable to write without a program to guide me". "Don Juan", "Till Eulenspiegel", and "Don Quixote" are marvelous examples of his tonal programs. He remains the perfect tone-poet.

Happy listening!

4

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 26 1964

Tanglewood Concerts Include Strauss Cycle

The 1964 Berkshire Festival will include a cycle of works by Richard Strauss, in observance of the 100th anniversary of his birth.

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director, announced plans and programs recently for the coming Tanglewood season, which takes the orchestra to its Summer home in Lenox, Mass., for eight weeks of concerts in the 6000 seat Music Shed, beginning Friday, July 3.

Music from three other areas of the repertoire will comprise the Tanglewood programs. Leinsdorf listed them as "music for festivals," contemporary music and music for chamber orchestra.

The conductor explained music for festival as those works which, for practical and esthetic reasons, are seldom on Winter subscription programs.

Works suitable for a festival would include the Mozart Serenade No. 8 and the "Applausus" Cantata of Haydn. The open-sided Music Shed lends itself to off-stage music; the Serenade requires a chamber orchestra on stage, with three distant ensembles for the echoes. As the Cantata calls for a chorus only toward the end of the work, Leinsdorf can call on the students of the Berkshire Music Center.

Festivals, like Tanglewood, draw largely on non-subscription audiences. Leinsdorf feels that Winter season ticket holders should not be faced with programs made up of specialties, concerts devoted, for example, to a single composer or period. Festival audiences, on the other hand, may pick and choose.

Listeners select only the programs in which they have particular interest. Thus, two weekends of music for chamber orchestra will open the Summer season, with music of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Strauss.

The full orchestra will be present for the Strauss cycle. Many first U.S. performances of lesser known works will be heard, as well as all the great tone poems which are excuse enough for maintaining the great symphony orchestras of the world.

Contemporary music will be reprsented in works by Barber, Bartok, Copland, Hovhaness, Menotti, Rorem, Schuller and Sydemann. Composers-in-residence at the Berkshire Music Center, maintained by the orchestra and in session concurrently with the Berkshire Festival, will be Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Pierre Boulez and Lukas Foss. Paul Jacobs will again hold classes in contemporary keyboard performance. They and 10 young composers will participate in a Festival of Contemporary American Music, Aug. 3-9, under the auspices of the Music Center and the Fromm Foundation of Chicago.

Guest conductors at the Berkshire Festival are Richard Burgin and Pierre Monteux, who have served as Boston Symphony conductors over many years; and Philadelphia's Eugene Ormandy, Cincinnati's Max Rudolf, Pittsburgh's William Steinberg and the American Symphony Orchestra's Leopold Stokowski. Instrumental soloists will include violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianists Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Jorge Bolet and Lorin Hollander, and organist Berj Zamkochian.

Music for the six chamber music concerts follows:

Haydn: Symphony No. 30 and "Applausus" Cantata. Mozart: March in D, K. 237; Serenade in D, K. 203 (Silverstein); Piano Concertos, K. 450 and K. 451 (Arrau); Piano Concerto (Frager); Symphonies Nos. 36, 38 and 40; March, K. 248; Aria, K. 505 (Helen Boatwright); Serenade No. 8; Six German Dances, K. 509.

Schubert: Symphony No. 3 and Great Mass in E flat (Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, Walter Carringer, Donald Bell). Strauss: Interludes from "Intermezzo" and complete three-act concert version of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Bell).

Music for the full Boston Symphony follows:

Barber: Symphony No. 1. Bartok: Violin Concerto No. 2 (Silverstein). Beethoven: Symphonies Nos. 1, 4, 7, complete music for "Ruins of Athens" (Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz). Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1 (Cliburn). Symphony No. 1. Copland: Symphony for Organ and Orchestra (Zamkochian). Debussy: "Nocturnes," "Iberia" Suite. Dvorak: Symphony No. 6. Elgar: "Enigma" Variations. Gabrieli: Canzon Quarti. Hovhaness: Prelude and Triple Fugue. Liszt: Fantasie on Themes from "Ruins of Athens" (Bolet). Mahler: Symphonies Nos. 1, 5. Menoti: Cantata, "The Bishop of Brindisi" (Lili Chookasian, Diaz). Ravel: "Alborado del Gracioso." Rorem: "The Eagles." Sibelius: Symphony No. 5. Schuller: Seven Studies of a Theme by Paul Klee.

Strauss: Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten," "Tageszeiten" (Harvard Glee Club); "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes, "Three Hymns" (Curtin); "Parergon" (Bolet), "Burleske" (Hollander), "Ein Heldenleben," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "Don Quixote." Sydemann: Study for Orchestra No. 2.

Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6. Vaughan Williams: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. Verdi: Requiem (Lucine Amara, Chookasian, George Shirley, Ezio Flagello). Wagner: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 16 1964

Tanglewood

Leinsdorf Announces Festival Programs

By MARGO MILLER

Erich Leinsdorf is clearly a conductor who loves a festival.

The Boston Symphony music director announced plans and programs Wednesday for the coming Tanglewood season, which takes the orchestra to its Summer home in Lenox for eight weeks of concerts in the 6000-seat Music Shed. The Berkshire Festival will open Friday evening, July 3, with an all-Mozart program, and conclude Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23.

Music from four areas of the repertoire will comprise the Tanglewood programs. Leinsdorf listed them as music "for festivals," contemporary music, a Strauss cycle and music for chamber orchestra.

He explained music for festivals as those works which, for practical and esthetic reasons, are seldom on Winter subscription programs.

Mozart's Serenade No. 8, for example, is a nocturne for four orchestras. The first performance of the piece was likely in the Mirabelle Gardens in Salzburg, Austria, where niches in the clipped hedges could contain three small ensembles to play echo with the fourth orchestra. Leinsdorf, having experimented last Summer with offstage music at Tanglewood, finds that the open-sided Music Shed is ideal for such performances.

Festivals, like Tanglewood, draw largely on non-subscription audiences. Leinsdorf feels that Winter season ticket holders should not be faced with programs made up of specialties, programs devoted, for example, to a single composer or a single period. Festival audiences, on the other hand, may pick and choose.

Listeners select only the programs in which they have a particular interest. Thus, two week-ends of music for chamber orchestra will open the Summer season, representing music of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Strauss.

During the six weeks, in which the full Boston Symphony will play, Leinsdorf will observe the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss' birth. Many first United States performances of lesser known Strauss works will be heard, as well as all the great tone poems which are excuse enough for maintaining the great symphony orchestras of the world.

Contemporary music will be represented in works by Barber, Bartok, Copland, Hovhaness, Menotti, Rorem, Schuller and Sydemann. Composers-in-residence at the Berkshire Music Center, maintained by the Boston Symphony and in session concurrently with the Berkshire Festival, will be Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Pierre Boulez and Lukas Foss. Paul Jacobs will again conduct classes in contemporary keyboard performance. They and 10 young composers will participate in a festival of contemporary American Music, Aug. 3-9, under the auspices of the Music Center and the Fromm Foundation of Chicago.

Guest conductors at the Berkshire Festival are Richard Burgin and Pierre Monteux, who have both served as Boston Symphony conductors over many years; and Philadelphia's Eugene Ormandy, Cincinnati's Max Rudolph, Pittsburgh's William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski. Instrumental soloists will include violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianists Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Jorge Bolet and Lorin Hollander, and organist Berj Zamkochian.

Music being revived or having first U.S. performances includes Haydn's "Applausus" Cantata, a complete three-act concert version of Strauss' music for "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Beethoven's complete music for the "The Ruins of Athens," and Menotti's cantata, "The Bishop of Brindisi." Verdi's Requiem will haye its first Tanglewood performance.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
JAN 26 1964

Make Ready Strauss' Year

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—So far there's been no whoop-de-doo but all musical ears should brace themselves just the same. During 1964 they're going to be bombarded with just about every note Richard Strauss put on paper.

Year of Strauss

Why? It's a Straussian centennial, that's why.

He was born on June 11, 1864. How performing musicians dote on anniversaries of composers! They are good boxoffice, musicians will tell you. The truth probably is much more personal. Without composers there would be no musicians.

To Strauss present-day musicians can be particularly grateful. He broadened their audience and so added jam to their bread and butter. He did it by putting shock into music—shock for listeners rather than mere technical shocks of which only performers are aware, keep in mind.

He was the first composer to quarrel with his wife in a musical score, obviously and unmistakably. He was also the first to confess musically that in his opinion he, the composer was not a whit short of superman, heroic in his every aspect.

He went far beyond private eccentricities, however. There are marked psychological facets to much of the great music but they are implied. Strauss used music to expound psychological mechanisms with the directness of a textbook, and abnormal ones at that.

To him Freudian psychology can be as grateful as musicians. He hastened the public's understanding of Freudian themes, after an initial period of outraged horror. His opera, "Salome," has the heroine demanding the head of John the Baptist on a silver platter, you'll remember.

Musical Power

His opera, "Electra," gives musical power to the Freudian theory that many people unconsciously harbor murderous thoughts aimed at the parent of the same sex. Now these extreme shockeroes are rarely performed but when they are no one is shocked. The pieces fail because the themes are both unpleasant and old hat.

Strauss added the dimension of thought to music and those works of his which assure his immortality are those which are close to universal and continuing human experiences. They make him a "classic," like Brahms and Wagner. At times he is more often performed than they are which could mean he is closer to present-day states of mind.

The musical group which calls itself "Friends of Live Music" was the first in New York to observe the centennial, by building a concert around two of his flabbiest pieces which would have given him not even an hour of fame if he had composed nothing else. That's the weakness of these centennial outpourings. They make as much of a genius' mediocrity as of his genius.

But in March the "friends" have something to delight a musical audience. They'll perform one behind the other a serenade for 13 wind instruments he composed when he was 80. One suffers from youth, the other from senility. But the performing idea is dramatic.

The big-scale observances will come later in the current season and the first few months of the new season next fall. In its concerts in New York last week the Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, gave a low-keyed preamble by programming his orchestra suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," with Bach, Brahms and Prokofief.

When summer comes the Bostonians will really go to town with the centennial. Leinsdorf plans to make Strauss one of the pillars of their celebrated Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. In addition to the Strauss pieces which are in the standard orchestra repertoire, there will be performances of big-scale works which are not performed often because they require so much effort.

Plans no less elaborate are being made by other orchestral organizations, and by instrumental and vocal soloists. They'll be revealed in the course

MIDWEST NEWSCLIP, INC.
Box 1359, Chicago 90, WEbster 9-5497
Sunday Tribune
Chicago, Ill.
Circ. 1,229,396
047
JAN 26 1964

Tanglewood to Premiere Haydn Cantata

X-27

THE American premiere of a Haydn cantata, a three-act concert version of Strauss' "Der Buerger als Edelmann" music, Menotti's oratorio "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," and Beethoven's complete "Ruins of Athens" music are among major works planned for the 27th Berkshire Music Festival, opening July 3 at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home in Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 concerts during the eight week season. Guest conductors are Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Leopold Stokowski, William Steinberg, and Max Rudolf.

Five pianists are on the soloist list — Van Cliburn, Claudio Arrau, Jorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander, and Malcolm Frager. Phyllis Curtin, Lili Chookasian, Saramae Endich, Charles Bressler, and Donald Bell are among the vocalists to appear.

The Haydn cantata, "Applausus," is scheduled during the two weeks of chamber orchestra concerts opening the season. The "Buerger als Edelmann" score begins a Strauss centennial cycle which offers, among other works, his "Parergon" piano concerto for left hand alone, "Tageszeiten," and interludes from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." The Menotti oratorio takes place in mid-August, when the center sponsors a festival of contemporary American music in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation. Barber's First Symphony and Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra also will be played.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
JAN 16 1964

Leinsdorf Heralds Tanglewood Season

The Boston Symphony will hie itself to Tanglewood, its summer home at Lenox in the Berkshires, for its 27th season in the sun beginning July 3, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, revealed dates and programs when he met the press yesterday at Symphony Hall.

Mr. Leinsdorf, now in his second season with the BSO, said the first six concerts, July 3, 4, 5, and July 10, 11, 12, will be devoted to music for a chamber orchestra comprised of symphony members. The full orchestra will appear for the first time Friday, July 17, at a concert in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, a BSO music director before his death. This program will feature Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5, not previously performed at Tanglewood.

The summer schedule, to run eight weeks through Aug. 23, has been arranged, Mr. Leinsdorf, said, to emphasize four categories: music for festivals, contemporary music, a cycle saluting Richard Strauss on the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11) and music for chamber orchestra.

Under the festival music heading, Mr. Leinsdorf has programmed two American premieres and two works new to Tanglewood. The first of these to be heard at the festival will be the American debut of Haydn's cantata, "Applausus." The soloists will be Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, and Donald Bell. Another premiere will be a concert version of Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann," a three-act opera based on Moliere's classic comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The soloists here will be Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni and Mr. Bell.

In addition, the festival grouping will include Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," with Phyllis Curtin, and Justino Diaz as soloists and Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" with Lili Chookasian and Mr. Diaz as soloists.

A variety of contemporary music will be offered, Mr. Leinsdorf reported, "to express the catholic taste of the Berkshire Festival's approach to contemporary music." The Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago is joining the orchestra in financing a series of contemporary programs between Aug. 9 and 13. Berj Zamkochian will be soloist in a performance of Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Other modern composers to be represented are Samuel Barber (Symphony No. 1) Bela Bartok (Violin Concerto No. 2), Ned Rorem ("The Eagles") and Alan Hovhaness (Prelude and Triple Fugue).

In addition to the Moliere-Strauss opera, other Strauss compositions slated include a choral work, "Tageszeiten," for which the orchestra will be joined by the Harvard Glee Club under the direction of Elliot Forbes.

Three hymns which Strauss set to words by Friedrich Holderlin will be sung by Phyllis Curtin. "Perergon," a left-hand piano concerto which has had only one American performance, in 1934, will feature Jorge Bolet as soloist. Another Strauss piano work, "Burleske," will be performed by Lorin Hollander. Other Strauss compositions to be heard are "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Ein Heldenleben," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Don Quixote," and excerpts from "Der Rosenkavalier," "Intermezzo," and "Die Frau Ohne Schatten."

Last summer, the symphony paid homage to another composer, Serge Prokofiev, in a similar cycle.

The chamber music programs will be highlighted July 10 by a special concert in memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a Berkshire Festival pioneer, who died last year. This program will include Franz Schubert's Symphony No. 3 and his Great Mass in E flat, with Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, and Donald Bell as soloists.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 festival concerts, including all six of the chamber music programs and nine of the 18 programs with the full orchestra. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, BSO associate conductor; Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Max Rudolf of the Pittsburgh Symphony; Pierre Monteux and Leopold Stokowski. Arthur Fiedler will make his annual Tanglewood appearance conducting the Boston Pops at a benefit concert.

Other soloists engaged are Claudio Arrau, to be piano soloist in two Mozart piano concerti July 11, and Van Cliburn, announced as soloist in Brahms' First Piano Concerto on July 25.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will solo in a Mozart serenade July 3 and in the Bartok violin concerto on Aug. 2.

As a special feature of the final Saturday evening concert Aug. 22, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's Requiem Mass. The soloists, all members of the Metropolitan Opera, will be Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, and Ezio Flagello. The chorus will be the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston under the direction of Alfred Nash Patterson.

Mozart is the composer to be heard most often, with 13 works listed. The Strauss cycle accounts for 11 of his works on the programs. Beethoven, the staple of any orchestra, is represented by his first, fourth and seventh symphonies, as well as "The Ruins of Athens."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
JAN 23 1964

Copland to Head Berkshire Faculty

Boston — (UPI) — Aaron Copland will contine as head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in the 1964 season, director Erich Leinsdorf announced yesterday.

He also will remain chairman of the center faculty though actually will not be in residence at Lenox except from Aug. 3-16.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,889
JAN 17 1964
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
JAN 17 1964

Berkshire music features Strauss

BOSTON (UPI) — The 1964 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will stress contemporary muic and observe the centennial of the birth of Richard Strauss, it was announced Wednesday by Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Leinsdorf said the eight-week season will start July 3 and he will conduct 5 concerts.

Guest conductors will be Eugene Ormandy, Pierre Monteux, Leopold Stokowski, William Steinberg, Max Rudolf and Richard Burgin.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 36,240
JAN 16 1964

Tanglewood Plans Four Phases in '64

Three of the modern works scheduled for Tanglewood presentation next summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra," Barber's "Symphony No. 1" and "Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

Contemporary music is one of four areas for programs for the festival at Lenox, Mass., beginning July 3 and ending Aug. 22, will be drawn. The others are music for chamber orchestra, music for festivals and Strauss

The first two weeks will feature music for a chamber orchestra. Composers to be represented are Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss.

Commemorating the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss' birth, the festival will include many of his works including "Tageszeiten," "Parergon" and "Burleske."

Etich Leinsdorf, musical director, has invited Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductors.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JAN 16 1964

Tanglewood preview

By Godfrey John

Erich Leinsdorf's prospective contribution to the cultural afflatus of Tanglewood would have pleased Koussevitzky. An aura of expectancy and new discovery hangs over his plans for the approaching season, opening on July 3.

The Berkshire Music Center director will begin the eight-week festival with an all-Mozart program as part of the chamber music to be offered. Speaking of the complete repertoire, Mr. Leinsdorf referred to his "four prong" approach which, together with the chamber music, includes festival music, contemporary music, and a Strauss cycle. Two American premieres and two other works not previously performed at Tanglewood are planned. The first of these, Haydn's cantata "Applausus," is one of the highlights.

In his all-Strauss program, commemorating the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the American premiere of a three-act concert version of "Der Burger als Edelmann" based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Strauss's "Parergon," which will receive its second performance in this country, was described by the director as the Symphony's "sidekick."

In concerts for the full Boston Symphony, Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," with Phyllis Curtin and Justino Diaz as soloists, will also be heard for the first time.

In the contemporary field, audiences will be introduced to Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi." Of the contemporary works, Mr. Leinsdorf remarked: "For me, what is contemporary is music written today that is significant in expression and address." He dissociated himself from the predilections of any "school" and accented the festival's catholicity of taste.

And as a rationale for the presence on his program of certain less familiar pieces, he affirmed the difference of approach to be recognized between the regular subscription audience and the festival audience. The former is a "captive" audience could not be subjected to any "specialities." "There is so much more you can do at Tanglewood," he pointed out.

When asked what he considered important or monumental in the season's offerings, Mr. Leinsdorf demurred, not wishing to "prejudge" the center's plans. However, he highlighted Strauss's "Applausus" and "Parergon" as well as Menotti's "Bishop."

The Boston Symphony conductor hopes to cover about five different musical styles and approaches. Eighteen concerts are scheduled for full orchestra, and as many as two out of three of the programs will cater for popular repertory taste.

As for opera, since America's finest singers customarily migrate to Europe, and Mr. Leinsdorf's eye is only on the highest representative work, it is expected to remain "suspended in animation!"

Among guest conductors to be invited are Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

This summer's Berkshire Festival will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first gave its first concert at Tanglewood in 1936.

The Hartford Courant
D. 119,274 S. 161,020
JAN 26 1964

The Lively Arts—

Tanglewood 27

By T. H. Parker

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is letting no grass grow under his feet. The orchestra's winter season is hardly more than half over, but he is already looking five months ahead to curtaintime at Tanglewood.

And it is cheerful to report that there will be a lot of fresh material on the programs that Mr. Leinsdorf has outlined for the Berkshire Musical Festival concerts.

★

It's always handy to have something around which to center a summer's music, and Mr. Leinsdorf has chosen the centennial of Richard Strauss' birthday. So we shall have a Strauss festival - within - festival, in which seldom - heard works will be performed, together with the more familiar repertory. Last week at Bushnell Memorial Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony played a suite from the music that Strauss wrote for "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." At Tanglewood they will give the American premiere of a three - act concert version of "Der Burger."

In addition, the Strauss centennial program will include performances of "Tageszeiten," in which the orchestra will be joined by the Harvard Glee Club; "Three Hymns" after the text by Friedrich Hoelderlin; and Interludes from the opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten." "Parergon," a piano concerto for left - hand, based on a theme from the "Symphonia Domestica," and "Burleske" will also be heard.

★

Among the better - known Strauss works to be done at Tanglewood are "Don Juan," "Till Eulenspiegel," the "Rosenkavalier" waltz sequence, "Ein Heldenleben," interludes from "Intermezzo," "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," and "Don Quixote."

Apart from the Strauss works, there is a rather sizable list of compositions being heard at Tanglewood for the first time, through some of them are familiar enough elsewhere. These include:

Haydn's Symphony No. 39 and "Applausus"; the Mozart Piano Concerto K.451, Nocturne for Four Orchestras K.286, Six German Dances, the Aria K.505, and a number of Serenades and Divertimenti; and Schubert's Symphony No. 3, and Great Mass in E Flat.

Also Barber's Symphony No. 1; the Bartok Second Violin Concerto; the complete music from Beethovan's "Ruins of Athens"; Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra; Dvorak's Symphony No. 6; Gabrielli's Canzoni Quarti; Hovhaness's Prelude and Triple Fugue; Liszt's Fantasia on Themes from "The Ruins of Athens"; Mahler's Fifth Symphony; Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi"; Rorem's "The Eagles"; Verdi's Requiem; and excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried."

This year the eight - week season will open on Friday, July 3. Continuing a popular and traditional feature of the Berkshire Music Festival, the first two weeks will be devoted to programs for chamber orchestra. There will be a concentration on Haydn and Mozart, but works by Schubert and Strauss will also be heard at this time.

★

The first concert by the full Boston Symphony will be played on July 17. It will be dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, and Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Interludes from Strauss' "Frau Ohne Schatten" and the Mahler Symphony No. 5.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 festival concerts. Guest conductors will include Richard Burgin, his associate conductor, and Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Leopold Stokowski, Max Rudolf of the Cincinnati Symphony, and William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the festival pops concert.

Among the season's soloists will be Claudio Arrau and Malcolm Frager in Mozart piano concerti. Van Cliburn will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1. Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, will do the Bartok Second Violin Concerto. Berj Zamkochian will be soloist in the Copland Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Jorge Bolet will play "Parergon" and Lorin Hollander "Burleske."

The Berkshire festival this summer will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first gave concerts in the Western Massachusetts uplands, in 1936. Tanglewood became the permanent summer home of the orchestra in 1937.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660

JAN 18 1964

Tanglewood: Music for All

GEORGE SHIRLEY ERICH LEINSDORF CLAUDIO ARRAU PIERRE MONTEUX JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

A look at the projected plans for the Tanglewood Festival for the summer reveals that there are many surprises in repertoire, visiting artists, conductors and types of groups to be included.

Cusick

Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony, announced his plans for the Berkshire Festival and said that four different types of music would characterize the programs from the first week of July until the final week of August. The 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be divided into: (1) Music for Festivals, (2) Contemporary Music, (3) a Richard Strauss cycle and (4) Music for Chamber Orchestra.

Under the Music for Festivals heading are two American premieres and two works not performed previously at Tanglewood. The first of the premieres is that of Haydn's cantata "Applausus," with Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler and Donald Bell as the featured soloists. In an all-Strauss program, beginning an observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864), Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the American premiere of a three-act concert version of the composer's "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Soloists for the performance will be Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni and Mr. Bell.

★ ★ ★

BEETHOVEN'S "Ruins of Athens," with Phyllis Curtin and Justino Diaz, and "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," by Menotti, with Lili Chookasian and Mr. Diaz, will be heard for the first time at Tanglewood.

Mr. Leinsdorf has scheduled a number of significant contemporary works to be performed at the time when the Berkshire Center, with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of American Music from Aug. 9 to 13. The Menotti Chicago, will sponsor a Festival of Contemporary American Music from Aug. 9 to 13. The Menotti composition, along with Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1" and Aaron Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra" will comprise the contemporary section.

Interest in the Strauss Centennial Celebration should run high, considering the breadth of the composer's works to be performed. Among the works scheduled are interludes from "Frau ohne Schatten," "Don Juan," "Til Eulenspiegel," waltzes from "Rosenkavalier," "Three Hymns," which will feature Miss Curtin, "Parergon," with Jorge Bolet in the solo piano spot, and "Burleske," with Lorin Hollander as the piano soloist.

★ ★ ★

THE CHAMBER orchestra recitals, a feature of the Berkshire Festival, will be played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. July 3, 4, 5, 10, 11 and 12 will be given over to these concerts. One change is that they will be held in the Music Shed instead of the usual lawn setting. The growth of interest in the concerts, a healthy sign, has necessitated the change. There will be music by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss used for the chamber orchestra programs.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, including the six chamber programs and nine of the 18 concerts by the full Boston Orchestra. But the list of guest conductors reads like a "Who's Who" of conductorial talent. Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteaux, Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Max Rudolf of Cincinnati, William Stenberg from the Pittsburgh Symphony and Leopold Stokowski all have been requested to take the podium for several of the concerts.

In addition to Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni, Mr. Bressler, Mr. Bell, Miss Curtin, Mr. Diaz, Mr. Bolet, Miss Chookasian and Mr. Hollander, the soloists set for appearances are among the greatest in the world. Violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianist Claudio Arrau, tenor George Shirley, basso Ezio Flagello, pianist Malcolm Frager and organist Berj Zamkochian will all be heard during the two-month season. Arthur Fieldler and the Boston Pops will make their annual appearance at the festival, to play for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

From all advance notices, it looks like a busy and interesting summer at the Tanglewood Shed. Music for all tastes, soloists to please the most discriminating ears and repertoire which reflects the scope of the festival and the history of music itself, are included. It is a highly auspicious undertaking which should hold many rewards.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 298, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Post
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 73,711
JAN 26 1964

It's 100 Years For Strauss

NEW YORK — (UPI) So far there's been no whoop-de-doop but all musical ears should brace themselves just the same. During 1964 they're going to be bombarded with just about every note Richard Strauss put on paper.

Why? It's a Straussian centennial, that's why. He was born on June 11, 1864. How performing musicians dote on anniversaries of composers!!! They are good The truth probably is much more box office, musicians will tell you. personal. Without the composers there would be no musicians.

To Strauss present-day musicians can be particularly grateful. He broadened their audience and so added jam to their bread and butter. He did it by putting shock into music — shock for listeners rather than mere technical shocks of which only performers are aware, keep in mind.

He was the first composer to quarrel with his wife in a musical score, obviously and unmistakably. He was also the first to confess musically that in his opinion he, the composer, was not a whit short of Superman, heroic in his every aspect.

HE WENT FAR beyond private eccentricities, however. There are marked psychological facets to much of the great music but they are implied. Strauss used music to expound psychological mechanisms with the directness of a textbook, and abnormal ones at that.

To him Freudian psychology can be as grateful as musicians. He hastened the public's understanding of Freudian themes, after an initial period of outraged horror. His opera, "Salome," has the heroine demanding the head of John the Baptist on a silver platter, you'll remember.

His opera, "Electra," gives musical power to the Freudian theory that many people unconsciously harbor murderous thoughts aimed at the parent of the same sex. Now these extreme shockeroos are rarely performed but when they are no one is shocked. The pieces fail because the themes are both unpleasant and old hat.

Strauss added the dimension of thought to music and those works o fhis which assure his immortality are those which are close to universal and continuing human experiences. They make him a "classic," like Brahms and Wagner. At times he is more often performed than they are which could mean he is closer to present-day states of mind.

The musical group which calls itself "Friends of Live Music" was the first in New York to observe the centennial, by building a concert around two of his flabbiest pieces which would have given him not even an hour of ame if he had composed nothing lse. That's the weakness of these entennial outpourings. They ake as much of a genius' mediocrity as of his genius.

BUT IN MARCH the "Friends" ave something to titilate a musial audience. They'll perform one ehind the other a serenade for 13 ind instruments which Strauss ran up when he was 17 and a symphony for 16 wind instruments he composed when he was 80. One suffers from youth, the other from senility. But the performing idea is dramatic.

The big-scale observances will come later in the current season and the first few months of the new season next fall. In its concerts in New York last week the Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, gave a low-keyed preamble by programming his orchestra suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," with Bach, Brahms and Prokofief.

When summer comes the Bostonians will really go to town with the centennial. Leinsdorf plans to make Strauss one of the pillars of their celebrated Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Mass. In addition to the Strauss pieces which are in the standard orchestra repertory, there will be performances of big-scale works which are not performed often because they require so much effort.

Plans no less elaborate are being made by other orchestral organizations, and by instrumental and vocal soloists. They'll be revealed in due course.

PANORAMA 2/23/64

Around

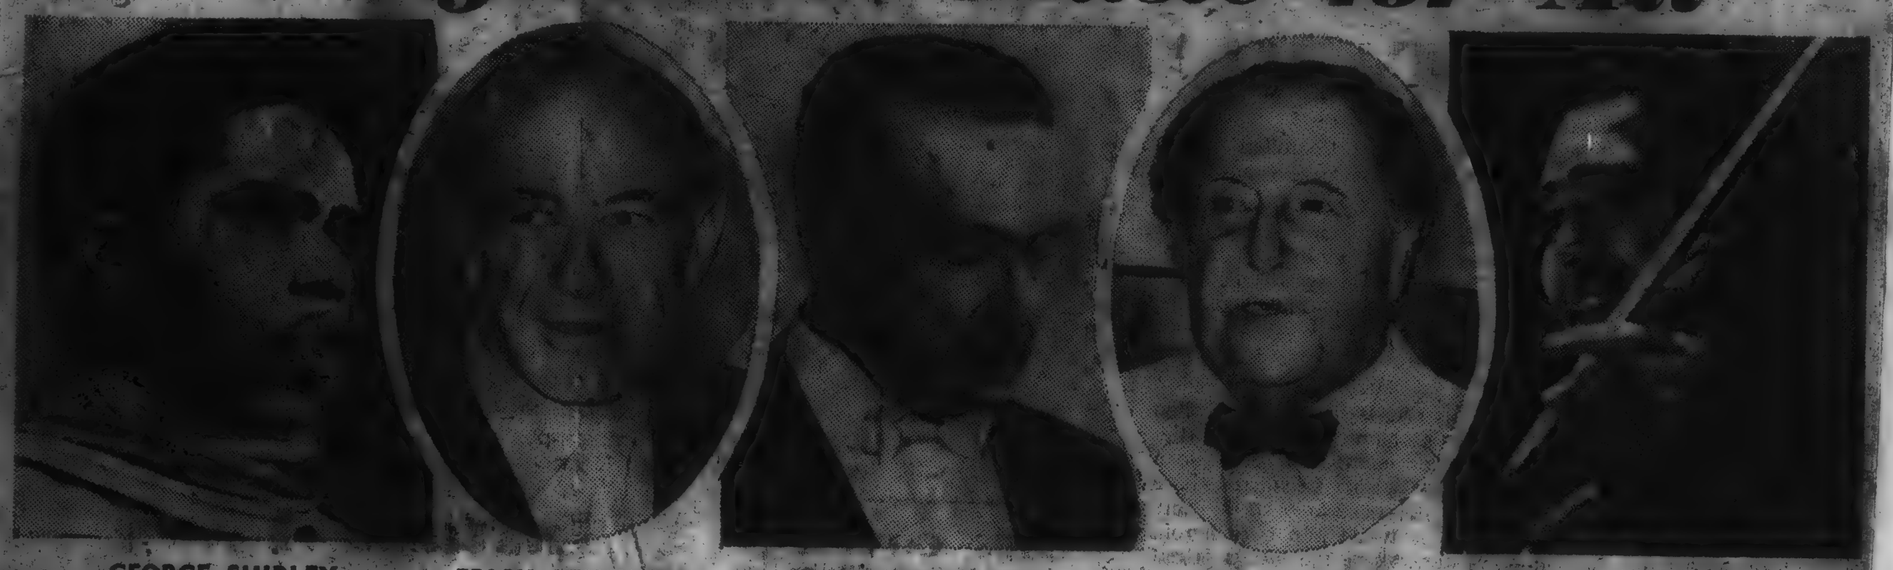
Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced many of his plans for the 1964 Berkshire Festival during July and August at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.). The eight week Festival will open on Friday, July 3, with an all-Mozart program under the direction of Mr. Leinsdorf, who will begin his second season at Tanglewood with this concert.

Mr Leinsdorf stated the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory: 1) Music for festivals; 2) Contemporary music; 3) Strauss cycle; 4) Music for chamber orchestra.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660

JAN 18 1964

Tanglewood: Music for All



GEORGE SHIRLEY ERICH LEINSDORF CLAUDIO ARRAU PIERRE MONTEUX JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

A look at the projected plans for the Tanglewood Festival for the summer reveals that there are many surprises in repertoire, visiting artists, conductors and types of groups to be included.

Cusick

Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony, announced his plans for the Berkshire Festival and said that four different types of music would characterize the programs from the first week of July until the final week of August. The 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be divided into: (1) Music for Festivals, (2) Contemporary Music, (3) a Richard Strauss cycle and (4) Music for Chamber Orchestra.

Under the Music for Festivals heading are two American premieres and two works not performed previously at Tanglewood. The first of the premieres is that of Haydn's cantata "Applausus," with Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler and Donald Bell as the featured soloists. In an all-Strauss program, beginning an observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864), Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the American premiere of a three-act concert version of the composer's "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Soloists for the performance will be Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni and Mr. Bell.

★ ★ ★

BEETHOVEN'S "Ruins of Athens," with Phyllis Curtin and Justino Diaz, and "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," by Menotti, with Lili Chookasian and Mr. Diaz, will be heard for the first time at Tanglewood.

Mr. Leinsdorf has scheduled a number of significant contemporary works to be performed at the time when the Berkshire Center, with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of American Music from Aug. 9 to 13. The Menotti Chicago, will sponsor a Festival of Contemporary American Music from Aug. 9 to 13. The Menotti composition, along with Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1" and Aaron Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra" will comprise the contemporary section.

Interest in the Strauss Centennial Celebration should run high, considering the breadth of the composer's works to be performed. Among the works scheduled are Interludes from "Frau ohne Schatten," "Don Juan," "Til Eulenspiegel," waltzes from "Rosenkavalier," "Three Hymns," which will feature Miss Curtin, "Parergon," with Jorge Bolet in the solo piano spot, and "Burleske," with Lorin Hollander as the piano soloist.

★ ★ ★

THE CHAMBER orchestra recitals, a feature of the Berkshire Festival, will be played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. July 3, 4, 5, 10, 11 and 12 will be given over to these concerts. One change is that they will be held in the Music Shed instead of the usual lawn setting. The growth of interest in the concerts, a healthy sign, has necessitated the change. There will be music by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss used for the chamber orchestra programs.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, including the six chamber programs and nine of the 18 concerts by the full Boston Orchestra. But the list of guest conductors reads like a "Who's Who" of conductorial talent. Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteaux, Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Max Rudolf of Cincinnati, William Steinberg from the Pittsburgh Symphony and Leopold Stokowski all have been requested to take the podium for several of the concerts.

In addition to Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni, Mr. Bressler, Mr. Bell, Miss Curtin, Mr. Diaz, Mr. Bolet, Miss Chookasian and Mr. Hollander, the soloists set for appearances are among the greatest in the world. Violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianist Claudio Arrau, tenor George Shirley, basso Ezio Flagello, pianist Malcolm Frager and organist Berj Zamkochian will all be heard during the two-month season. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will make their annual appearance at the festival, to play for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

From all advance notices, it looks like a busy and interesting summer at the Tanglewood Shed. Music for all tastes, soloists to please the most discriminating ears and repertoire which reflects the scope of the festival and the history of music itself, are included. It is a highly auspicious undertaking which should hold many rewards.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4300
Sunday Post
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 73,711
JAN 26 1964

It's 100 Years For Strauss

NEW YORK — (UPI) So far there's been no whoop-de-doop but all musical ears should brace themselves just the same. During 1964 they're going to be bombarded with just about every note Richard Strauss put on paper.

Why? It's a Straussian centennial, that's why. He was born on June 11, 1864. How performing musicians dote on anniversaries of composers!!! They are good. The truth probably is much more box office, musicians will tell you personal. Without the composers there would be no musicians.

To Strauss present-day musicians can be particularly grateful. He broadened their audience and so added jam to their bread and butter. He did it by putting shock into music — shock for listeners rather than mere technical shocks of which only performers are aware, keep in mind.

He was the first composer to quarrel with his wife in a musical score, obviously and unmistakably. He was also the first to confess musically that in his opinion he, the composer, was not a whit short of Superman, heroic in his every aspect.

HE WENT FAR beyond private eccentricities, however. There are marked psychological facets to much of the great music but they are implied. Strauss used music to expound psychological mechanisms with the directness of a textbook, and abnormal ones at that.

To him Freudian psychology can be as grateful as musicians. He hastened the public's understanding of Freudian themes, after an initial period of outraged horror. His opera, "Salome," has the heroine demanding the head of John the Baptist on a silver platter, you'll remember.

His opera, "Electra," gives musical power to the Freudian theory that many people unconsciously harbor murderous thoughts aimed at the parent of the same sex. Now these extreme shockeroos are rarely performed but when they are no one is shocked. The pieces fail because the themes are both unpleasant and old hat.

Strauss added the dimension of thought to music and those works to this which assure his immortality are those which are close to universal and continuing human experiences. They make him a "classic," like Brahms and Wagner. At times he is more often performed than they are which could mean he is closer to present-day states of mind.

The musical group which calls itself "Friends of Live Music" was the first in New York to observe the centennial, by building a concert around two of his flabbiest pieces which would have given him not even an hour of fame if he had composed nothing else. That's the weakness of these centennial outpourings. They make as much of a genius' mediocrity as of his genius.

BUT IN MARCH the "Friends" ave something to titilate a musical audience. They'll perform one hind the other a serenade for 13 ind instruments which Strauss ran up when he was 17 and a symphony for 16 wind instruments he composed when he was 80. One suffers from youth, the other from senility. But the performing idea is dramatic.

The big-scale observances will come later in the current season and the first few months of the new season next fall. In its concerts in New York last week the Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, gave a low-keyed preamble by programming his orchestra suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," with Bach Brahms and Prokofiev.

When summer comes the Bostonians will really go to town with the centennial. Leinsdorf plans to make Strauss one of the pillars of their celebrated Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Mass. In addition to the Strauss pieces which are in the standard orchestra repertory, there will be performances of big-scale works which are not performed often because they require so much effort.

Plans no less elaborate are being made by other orchestral organizations, and by instrumental and vocal soloists. They'll be revealed in due course.

PANORAMA 2/23/64

Around

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced many of his plans for the 1964 Berkshire Festival during July and August at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.). The eight week Festival will open on Friday, July 3, with an all-Mozart program under the direction of Mr. Leinsdorf, who will begin his second season at Tanglewood with this concert.

Mr Leinsdorf stated the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory: 1) Music for festivals; 2) Contemporary music; 3) Strauss cycle; 4) Music for chamber orchestra.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, January 16, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660
JAN 16 1964

THE SACRAMENTO BEE
SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
D. 172,280 S. 186,756
JAN 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730
JAN 23 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News-Times (e)
DANBURY, Conn.
Circ. 22,407
JAN 22 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,047
JAN 30 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
JAN 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JAN 18 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206
JAN 17 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
JAN 24 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 46,382
FEB 11 1964

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
FEB 1964

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N.Y.
23 TI. A YR. 70,700
FEB 22 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
JAN 17 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 11 1964

Summer 1964

Leinsdorf Outlines Plans For Tanglewood Program

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced many of his plans for the 1964 Berkshire Festival during July and August at Tanglewood, Lenox. The eight-week festival will open Friday, July 3, with an all-Mozart program under the direction of Mr. Leinsdorf, who will begin his second season at Tanglewood with this concert.

Mr. Leinsdorf stated the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory; 1) Music for festivals; 2) contemporary muisc; 3) vals; 2) contemporary music; 3) ber orchestra.

Music for Festivals

Two American premieres and two other works not performed previously at Tanglewood have been included in the area of the repertory designated by Mr. Leinsdorf as "music for festivals." The first of these to be heard at this summer's Berkshire Festival will be the American premiere of Haydn's cantata "Applausus." Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, and Donald Bell.

In an all-Strauss program, beginning an observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11) Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the American premiere of a three-act concert version of Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann" based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The soloists for this performance will be Miss Boatwright, Miss Vanni, and Mr. Bell.

In addition Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," with Phyllis Curtin and Justino Diaz as soloists, and "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" by Menotti, with Lili Chookasian and Mr. Diaz, will be heard for the first time at Tanglewood.

Contemporary Music

Leinsdorf has scheduled a number of significant contemporary compositions to be performed at the time when the Berkshire Music Center, with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will sponsor a Festival of Contemporary American Music from Aug. 9 to 13. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts surrounding this festival within a festival will include performance of Barber's Symphony No. 1, Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, and Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi." Other contemporary composers whose works will be heard this summer are Bartok, Rorem, and Hovhaness.

In speaking of the contemporary music to be performed, Mr. Leinsdorf said, "The wide range of styles of composition expresses the catholic taste of the Berkshire Festival's approach to contemporary music."

Strauss Cycle

In addition to the concert version of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" a number of other important works by Richard Strauss among them several lesser know compositions, have been pro gramed by Mr. Leinsdorf for th Strauss centennial. Notabl among these are the first Berk shire Festival performances o "Tageszeiten," in which the Bos ton Symphony Orchestra will b joined by the Harvard Glee Club Elliot Forbes, director; "Thre Hymns" after the text by Fried rich Holderlin, to be sung b Phyllis Curtin; and Interlude from "Die Frau ohne Schatten."

Strauss' "Parergon," a lef hand piano concerto which ha its only American performanc in 1934, and his "Burleske" wi receive their Tanglewood pre mieres. Jorge Bolet will be soloi with the Orchestra in the "Parer gon" and Lorin Hollander wi play "Burleske." Other composi tions of Richard Strauss to b played by the orchestra are "Do Juan", "Till Eulenspiegel", Ro senkavalier" Waltz sequence "Ein Heldenleben", Interlude from "Intermezzo", "Thus Spak Zarathustra", and "Don Quixote"

Music for Chamber Orchestra

Continuing a popular and tra ditional feature of the Berkshir Festival, the first two week (July 3, 4, 5 and July 10, 11, 12 will consist of music for a cham ber orchestra composed of mem bers of the Boston Symphony Or chestra. In 1960 the growing at tendance at these chamber or chestra concerts caused the shif of the festival's opening program from the theater to the music shed. Mr. Leinsdorf will continue to program lesser known works during the chamber orchestra's concerts. Composers whose music will be heard in this portion of the festival include Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, and Strauss.

The concert Friday, July 10 has been designated in memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, the founder of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, who died Oct. 22. At this concert Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in two Schubert compositions new to Tanglewood, the Symphony No. 3 and the Great Mass in E flat, with Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, and Donald Bell as soloists.

An all-Haydn concert will include the American premiere of the cantata "Applausus" and the Symphony No. 39, also new to the Berkshire Festival repertoire. Many of the Mozart works chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf for the Festival will receive their first Tanglewood performances.

The first concert by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, July 17, will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Interludes from Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten" and the Symphony No. 5 by Gustav Mahler.

Guest Conductors

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts including the six chamber orchestra programs and nine of the 18 programs by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He has invited Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony; William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductors.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will make his annual appearance in the Berkshires for the Boston Pops at Tanglewood, a concert for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Soloists

In addition to those already mentioned, several other soloists will be appearing with the Boston Symphony at the festival. Claudio Arrau will be heard on two occasions. On July 3, the festival's opening concert, Mr. Arrau will play the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 450, and on July 4 he will perform Mozart Concerto, K. 451. The young American pianist Malcolm Frager will return to Tanglewood for the second successive year on July 11 for the performance of a Mozart Piano Concerto. Van Cliburn will also return for the second consecutive season, performing the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 on July 25 with the orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will be heard in Mozart's Serenade in D, K. 203, on July 3 and in the first Tanglewood performance of Bela Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra on Aug. 2. Berj Zamkochian will be the soloist for the Aug. 9 performance of Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra.

On Aug. 22, the final Saturday evening of the 1964 Berkshire Festival, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra with soloists and chorus in the first Tanglewood performance of the Verdi Requiem. Soloists on this occasion will be Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello. The chorus will consist of the Chorus pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, director.

The Berkshire Festival this summer will be the 27th since the Boston Symphony first gave concerts in the Berkshire Hills in 1936. Tanglewood became the permanent summer home of the orchestra in 1937.

Berkshire Music Center opens 'doors for curious'

The audition schedule for the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., has been posted. Boston applicants will be heard at Symphony Hall on March 19.

Erich Leinsdorf, announcing plans for the 22d session, said: "We know that actual teaching cannot be expected . . . But in eight weeks many new doors can be opened for the curious." The session lasts from June 28 to Aug. 23, and is concurrent with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Our contemporary music program will be as wide and inclusive as possible," Mr. Leinsdorf said. "It is my belief that the composer who embarks on his lonely and hazardous quest of creating meaningful musical expression ought to have a full experience with as many branches as the contemporary tree of composition produces. Only then can he find himself and his own personal style.

"Our standards of admission will be stricter. Thus the accomplished string or wind player will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups. Our conducting enrollment will be by invitation only. The vocal department has been enlarged and a special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. The listening and analysis department for teachers, lecturers and amateurs has been widened in scope and strengthened."

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.), beginning July 3 for eight weeks, plans Schubert's Great Mass in E flat and Verdi's Messa da Requiem.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,270
FEB 9 1964

Music

Tanglewood to Stress Strauss

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The music of Richard Strauss will be "specialty of the house" during the 27th Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, and the Boston Symphony will open the festival with an all-Mozart program on Friday, July 3. The final concert will be Sunday afternoon, August 23.

The Strauss cycle will observe the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, June 11, 1864. Highlight will be the American premiere of a three-act concert version of Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Another American premiere will be Haydn's cantata, "Applausus."

Contemporary Music

Music for the eight-week festival will be from four areas of the repertory: music for festivals, contemporary music, Strauss cycle, and music for chamber orchestra. Among the contemporary works are Barber's Symphony No. 1, Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," in addition to compositions by Bartok, Rorem and Hovhaness.

Leinsdorf has invited the following guest conductors: Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Soloists include Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell, Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz, Lili Chookasian, Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, Lucine Amara, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello, all vocalists.

Also pianists Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Jorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander, and Van Cliburn. Joseph Silverstein will be violin soloist, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in 24 concerts. The Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will make its one appearance at Tanglewood for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Family Concerts

The Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira, conductor, will begin a new series of afternoon events called "Family Concerts." All programs are on Sundays at 3:00 p.m., beginning March 8 in East Providence. The same repertory will be repeated in other Rhode Island communities, all in school auditoriums. These communities are Warwick, Cranston, Woonsocket and Providence.

Although the entire series is underwritten by a Providence bank and its branches, an admission of $1.50 will be charged. Format of the program is similar to the Concerts-in-the-Round performed by The Worcester Orchestra in the Auditorium, with Harry Levenson conducting.

The program is as follows: Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture; Suite No. 1 from Bizet's "Carmen"; two movements from Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; Strauss' "Emperor" Waltzes: Anderson's "Syncopated Clock"; "Polka" from "The Age of Gold" by Shostakovich, and selections from Rodgers' "South Pacific."

Festival

"This is so good news that we would like you to know at once," writes the Swedish National Travel Office. "Birgit Nilsson will appear on the famous Scandinavian Festival"!

The festival will take place in Stockholm, May 26 through June 12. Looking over the roster, we came upon two names, personally familiar to Worcester—pianist Jorge Bolet, and conductor Eugen Jochum.

A young Czechoslovakian violinist of impressive musical connection recently made his debut with the Cleveland Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York. Josef Suk was heard in Violin Concerto in A minor, Opus 53 by his great-grandfather, Anton Dvorak. He is also the grandson of the noted Czech composer and violinist, Josef Suk, who was Dvorak's pupil and son-in-law.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164
FEB 11 1964

Berkshire Music Center Plans, Expands For 1964

The Berkshire Music Center's emphasis on professionalism will continue this summer, with stricter admission requirements, an expanding listening and analysis department and panel discussions on composition.

The 1964 Music Center, held concurrently with the Berkshire Festival at Lenox, will be organized in instrumental music, vocal music, composition and listening and analysis departments. Aaron Copeland will continue as faculty chairman and Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the symphony, remains as associate chairman of the faculty.

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director, outlined plans for the 22nd Tanglewood session yesterday at a Symphony Hall news conference with the hope that the June 28 through Aug. 23 courses would "open new doors for the curious."

"Actual teaching cannot be expected" in the eight-week center for advanced music study, Mr. Leinsdorf said, but a wide and inclusive contemporary music background would enable composers to strengthen their personal styles. "The chance of decision, instead of a thoughtless running with the crowd, will strengthen his conviction."

Twenty-two Boston Symphony members will form the nucleus of the instrumental music department, with Mr. Burgin, William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as heads. The department will emphasize chamber music performance, and will form a 60-piece group. There will be seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Bach and a program for keyboard players. Enrollment will be reduced to half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's desire that a musician "meet only his equals."

Mr. Burgin will again lead the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with Mr. Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf, Cincinnati Symphony music director, as guest conductors.

The department of vocal music will be led by Ralph Berkowitz, Phyllis Curtin, Paul Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith in the solo singing division, and Lorna Cooke de Varon, Iva Dee Hiatt, Alfred Nash Patterson and G. Wallace Woodworth in the choral division. The department will hold seminars in vocal repertoire in cantatas, arias, lieder, madrigals and contemporary works.

The composition department, headed by Mr. Copeland with Gunther Schuller acting head, will conduct advanced instruction for a few talented young composers and will center activities on an Aug. 9 through 13 Festival of Contemporary American Music. Concerts will be given by the Fromm Fellows, the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet. Mr. Copeland and Mr. Schuller, with Lukas Foss and Pierre Boulez, will hold several panel discussions with the young composers commissioned to write works for the festival.

The department of listening and analysis introduces a seminar in contemporary music for music educators under the direction of Peter Gram Swing and Mr. Schuller.

No orchestral conducting or opera courses will be offered in 1964, but three young conductors will join Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Burgin as Fellows in Conducting. They will assist the master conductors in residence at Tanglewood this summer.

The Berkshire Music Center was established at Lenox in 1940, with Serge Koussevitsky directing from its founding until his death in 1951. Charles Munch directed the sessions for 12 years, with Mr. Leinsdorf taking over last year.

Instrumentalists and vocalists interested in auditioning for admission to the Berkshire Music Center may write to the center at Symphony Hall. Auditions will be held in 19 cities throughout the country from Feb. 24 to April 3.

The Boston auditions will be held March 19, from 2 to 4 p.m., at Symphony Hall.

Times-Picayune
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
D. 193,514 S. 302,677
FEB 10 1964

ON THE SQUARE

Strauss Year

BY FRANK GAGNARD

A "commemorative year" for a composer means that a date is handy to justify and multiply performances of standard works played without fanfare every other year. The birthdate commemorations are one of the handiest and most transparent gimmicks symphony orchestras and music publishers have. And they are plied with such dignity.

The publishing firm of Boosey and Hawkes, Inc., which can safely be credited with a personal interest, is circulating word of the Richard Strauss Centennial Year, which is 1964. The company apparently is anxious to move some of the rarer scores, and no one can blame them. In fact, their recent announcement of some scheduled Strauss esoterica serves a purpose, by calling attention to the fact that Strauss composed works other than his overly familiar tone poems and that his opera facility did not disappear completely after 'Der Rosenkavalier."

SYMBOLIC FANTASY

Orchestras and festivals might study, and decide to really pay homage to a conductor on his birthday by blowing the dust off those works that have been bypassed in the rush to the symphonic top pops.

Consider Strauss' mammoth and headily melodic opera, "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." Occasionally staged in Europe, this symbolic fantasy, which was first performed in 1921, did not have its United States premiere until 1959, when the San Francisco Opera braved its scenic and musical challenges. Strauss fanciers have known and loved "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" through a complete recording that is several years old.

San Francisco retained the opera for the 1960-61 season, and will offer it with "Der Rosenkavalier" as Strauss recognition in the fall. New York has never heard "The Woman Without a Shadow." The city will hear but not see the scenic wonders of "Frau" in a concert version scheduled March 10 by the Concert Opera Association.

Conveniently labeled "Strauss' 'Magic Flute,'" "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" is filled to bursting with lyricism. Unfortunately, for smaller opera companies, it holds terrors for the set designer, stage director, and sopranos in its large cast. One must wait for a commemoration for "Die Frau Ohne Schatten," but the wait is worth it.

BOSTON PREPARATIONS

Orchestral recognition is being made of the opera by Erich Leinsdorf, who has made an arrangement of its "Interludes." He will play the excerpts this spring at Tanglewood and at the Boston Symphony's home base. The Boston orchestra's Leinsdorf will salvage other Strauss works this year—Three Hymns, Opus 71, for soprano and orchestra; the three-act version of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and Four Interludes from the opera "Intermezzo."

He also will revive the Parergon Zur Symphonia Domestica, Opus 73, not played in the U.S. in 30 years. This work for piano (left hand) and orchestra is dedicated to the one-armed pianist Paul Wittgenstein, a World War I casualty, who also was the recipient of Ravel's Concerto for the Left Hand.

Boston and San Francisco are not the only cities going in for Strauss rarities. The University of Southern California will stage the U.S. premiere of "Die Liebe der Danae" in April. The Friends of Live Music in New York last month gave the first performances in this country of two Strauss works, the "Kraemerspiegel," Opus 66, and the Divertimento, Opus 86, for small orchestra. The former is a cycle of 12 songs in which Strauss bitterly attacked his publishers, quoting with typical ego some of his previous scores.

Serenades and sonatinas also will be played by the Friends of Live Music before the commemoration is over.

A traveler could really hear his Strauss this season, and much of it for the first time. Now this is a commemoration!

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
MAR 1964

SUMMER FESTIVALS

An expanded symphony, opera and drama season highlight the 1964 CHAUTAUQUA FESTIVAL (New York), July 2-August 30. Walter Hendl will return for his 12th year as Musical Director and Conductor of the Chautauqua Symphony of 66 members. The Opera Ass'n received a Ford grant of $100,000; on the agenda this season are Trovatore, The Magic Flute, Cavalleria Rusticana, Gianni Schicchi, Carmen, Martha, The Sound of Music and The Fantasticks. Curtis Haus is Program Director. . . . Erich Leinsdorf has announced that the 22nd session of the BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER will be held from June 28 to August 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. Instrumentalists and vocalists interested in auditioning for admission to the 1964 session should write the Berkshire Music Center at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,270
FEB 9 1964

Music

Tanglewood to Stress Strauss

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The music of Richard Strauss will be "specialty of the house" during the 27th Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, and the Boston Symphony will open the festival with an all-Mozart program on Friday, July 3. The final concert will be Sunday afternoon, August 23.

The Strauss cycle will observe the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, June 11, 1864. Highlight will be the American premiere of a three-act concert version of Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Another American premiere will be Haydn's cantata, "Applausus."

Contemporary Music

Music for the eight-week festival will be from four areas of the repertory: music for festivals, contemporary music, Strauss cycle, and music for chamber orchestra. Among the contemporary works are Barber's Symphony No. 1, Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," in addition to compositions by Bartok, Rorem and Hovhaness.

Leinsdorf has invited the following guest conductors: Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Soloists include Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell, Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz, Lili Chookasian, Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, Lucine Amara, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello, all vocalists.

Also pianists Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Jorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander, and Van Cliburn. Joseph Silverstein will be violin soloist, and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in 24 concerts. The Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will make its one appearance at Tanglewood for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Family Concerts

The Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira, conductor, will begin a new series of afternoon events called "Family Concerts." All programs are on Sundays at 3:00 p.m., beginning March 8 in East Providence. The same repertory will be repeated in other Rhode Island communities, all in school auditoriums. These communities are Warwick, Cranston, Woonsocket and Providence.

Although the entire series is underwritten by a Providence bank and its branches, an admission of $1.50 will be charged. Format of the program is similar to the Concerts-in-the-Round performed by The Worcester Orchestra in the Auditorium, with Harry Levenson conducting.

The program is as follows: Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture; Suite No. 1 from Bizet's "Carmen"; two movements from Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; Strauss' "Emperor" Waltzes; Anderson's "Syncopated Clock"; "Polka" from "The Age of Gold" by Shostakovich, and selections from Rodgers' "South Pacific."

Festival

"This is so good news that we would like you to know at once," writes the Swedish National Travel Office. "Birgit Nilsson will appear on the famous Scandinavian Festival"!

The festival will take place in Stockholm, May 26 through June 12. Looking over the roster, we came upon two names, personally familiar to Worcester—pianist Jorge Bolet, and conductor Eugen Jochum.

A young Czechoslovakian violinist of impressive musical connection recently made his debut with the Cleveland Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York. Josef Suk was heard in Violin Concerto in A minor, Opus 53 by his great-grandfather, Anton Dvorak. He is also the grandson of the noted Czech composer and violinist, Josef Suk, who was Dvorak's pupil and son-in-law.

Times-Picayune
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
D. 193,514 S. 302,572
FEB 10 1964

ON THE SQUARE

Strauss Year

BY FRANK GAGNARD

A "commemorative year" for a composer means that a date is handy to justify and multiply performances of standard works played without fanfare every other year. The birthdate commemorations are one of the handiest and most transparent gimmicks symphony orchestras and music publishers have. And they are plied with such dignity.

The publishing firm of Boosey and Hawkes, Inc., which can safely be credited with a personal interest, is circulating word of the Richard Strauss Centennial Year, which is 1964. The company apparently is anxious to move some of the rarer scores, and no one can blame them. In fact, their recent announcement of some scheduled Strauss esoterica serves a purpose, by calling attention to the fact that Strauss composed works other than his overly familiar tone poems and that his operatic facility did not disappear completely after "Der Rosenkavalier."

SYMBOLIC FANTASY

Orchestras and festivals might study, and decide to really pay homage to a conductor on his birthday by blowing the dust off those works that have been bypassed in the rush to the symphonic top pops.

Consider Strauss' mammoth and headily melodic opera, "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." Occasionally staged in Europe, this symbolic fantasy, which was first performed in 1921, did not have its United States premiere until 1959, when the San Francisco Opera braved its scenic and musical challenges. Strauss fanciers have known and loved "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" through a complete recording [illegible] years old.

San Francisco retained the opera for the 1960-61 season, and will offer it with "Der Rosenkavalier" as Strauss revivals in the fall. New York heard "The Woman Without a Shadow." The city will hear but not see the scenic wonders of "Frau" in a concert version scheduled March 16 by the Concert Opera Association.

Conveniently labeled "Strauss' 'Magic Flute,'" "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" is filled to bursting with lyricism. Unfortunately, for smaller opera companies, it holds terrors for the set designer, stage director, and sopranos in its large cast. One must wait for a commemoration for "Die Frau Ohne Schatten," but the wait is worth it.

BOSTON PREPARATIONS

Orchestral recognition is being made of the opera by Erich Leinsdorf, who has made an arrangement of its "Interludes." He will play the excerpts this spring at Tanglewood and at the Boston Symphony's home base. The Boston Orchestra's Leinsdorf will salvage other Strauss works this year—Three Hymns, Opus 71, for soprano and orchestra; the three-act version of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and Four Interludes from the opera "Intermezzo."

He also will revive the Parergon Zur Symphonia Domestica, Opus 73, not played in the U.S. in 30 years. This work for piano (left hand) and orchestra is dedicated to the one-armed pianist Paul Wittgenstein, a World War I casualty, who also was the recipient of Ravel's Concerto for the Left Hand.

[illegible] and San Francisco are the only cities going in for Strauss rarities. The University of Southern California will stage the U.S. premiere of "Die Liebe der Danae" in April. The Friends of Live Music in New York last month gave the first performances in this country of two Strauss works, the "Kraemerspiegel," Opus 66, and the Divertimento, Opus 86, for small orchestra. The former is a cycle of 12 songs in which Strauss bitterly attacked his publishers, quoting with typical ego some of his previous scores.

Serenades and sonatinas also will be played by the Friends of Live Music before the commemoration is over.

A traveler could really hear his Strauss this season, and much of it for the first time. Now this is a commemoration!

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
MAR 1964

SUMMER FESTIVALS

An expanded symphony, opera and drama season highlight the 1964 CHAUTAUQUA FESTIVAL (New York), July 2-August 30. Walter Hendl will return for his 12th year as Musical Director and Conductor of the Chautauqua Symphony of 66 members. The Opera Ass'n received a Ford grant of $100,000; on the agenda this season are Trovatore, The Magic Flute, Cavalleria Rusticana, Gianni Schicchi, Carmen, Martha, The Sound of Music and The Fantasticks. Curtis Haus is Program Director. . . . Erich Leinsdorf has announced that the 22nd session of the BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER will be held from June 28 to August 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. Instrumentalists and vocalists interested in auditioning for admission to the 1964 session should write the Berkshire Music Center at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164
FEB 11 1964

Berkshire Music Center Plans, Expands For 1964

The Berkshire Music Center's emphasis on professionalism will continue this summer, with stricter admission requirements, an expanding listening and analysis department and panel discussions on composition.

The 1964 Music Center, held concurrently with the Berkshire Festival at Lenox, will be organized in instrumental music, vocal music, composition and listening and analysis departments. Aaron Copeland will continue as faculty chairman and Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the symphony, remains as associate chairman of the faculty.

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony music director, outlined plans for the 22nd Tanglewood session yesterday at a Symphony Hall news conference with the hope that the June 28 through Aug. 23 courses would "open new doors for the curious."

"Actual teaching cannot be expected" in the eight-week center for advanced music study, Mr. Leinsdorf said, but a wide and inclusive contemporary music background would enable composers to strengthen their personal styles. "The chance of decision, instead of a thoughtless running with the crowd, will strengthen his conviction."

Twenty-two Boston Symphony members will form the nucleus of the instrumental music department, with Mr. Burgin, William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as heads. The department will emphasize chamber music performance, and will form a 60-[illegible]. There will be seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Bach and a program for keyboard players. Enrollment will be reduced to half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's desire that a musician "meet only his equals."

Mr. Burgin will again lead the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with Mr. Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf, Cincinnati Symphony music director, as guest conductors.

The department of vocal music will be led by Ralph Berkowitz, Phyllis Curtin, Paul Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith in the solo singing division, and Lorna Cooke de Varon, Iva Dee Hiatt, Alfred Nash Patterson and G. Wallace Woodworth in the choral division. The department will hold seminars in vocal repertoire in cantatas, arias, lieder, madrigals and contemporary works.

The composition department, headed by Mr. Copeland with Gunther Schuller acting head, will conduct advanced instruction for a few talented young composers and will center activities on an Aug. 9 through 13 Festival of Contemporary American Music. Concerts will be given by the Fromm Fellows, the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet. Mr. Copeland and Mr. Schuller, with Lukas Foss and Pierre Boulez, will hold several panel discussions with the young composers commissioned to write works for the festival.

The department of listening and analysis introduces a seminar in contemporary music for music educators under the direction of Peter Gram Swing and Mr. Schuller.

No orchestral conducting or opera courses will be offered in 1964, but three young conductors will join Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Burgin as Fellows in Conducting. They will assist the master conductors in residence at Tanglewood this summer.

The Berkshire Music Center was established at Lenox in 1940, with Serge Koussevitsky directing from its founding until his death in 1951. Charles Munch directed the sessions for 12 years, with Mr. Leinsdorf taking over last year.

Instrumentalists and vocalists interested in auditioning for admission to the Berkshire Music Center may write to the center at Symphony Hall. Auditions will be held in 19 cities throughout the country from Feb. 24 to April 3.

The Boston auditions will be held March 19, from 2 to 4 p.m., at Symphony Hall.

CHARLESTON, S.C.
NEWS AND COURIER
D. 60,053 S. 73,976

FEB 18 1964 Buffalo

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, February 22, 1964

Tanglewood To Open June 28 NE

Boston—Erich Leinsdorf announced yesterday that the 22nd session of the Berkshire Music Center will be held from June 28 to August 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Mr. Leinsdorf is director of the summer center for the advanced study of music.

The work of the Music Center will be organized in four departments, Instrumental Music, Vocal Music, Composition, and Listening and Analysis. Aaron Copland continues to be chairman of the faculty and Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, continues as associate chairman of the faculty.

Mr. Burgin is also chairman of the Department of Instrumental Music with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Mr. Copland is also chairman of the Department of Composition with Gunther Schuller appointed acting head. Ralph Berkowitz has been appointed chairmen of the Department of Vocal Music with Lorna Cooke de Varon as associate head.

Peter Gram Swing continues as head of the Department of Listening and Analysis. Louis Speyer, charter member of the Faculty and English horn soloist of the orchestra for 46 years, has been appointed music coordinator.

In the Department of Instrumental Music, 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form the nucleus of the faculty with Seymour Lipkin, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunter Schuller.

The program of this Department, emphasizing instruction and performance in chamber music, will include a classical-sized orchestra (about 60 players), seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach headed by Paul Ulanowsky and Seymour Lipkin, and a program for keyboard players headed by Seymour Lipkin.

The enrollment in this department will be reduced to about half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's strong desire to enroll only the most excellent young players who apply.

Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605
MAR 29 1964

Two U. S. Premieres At Berkshire Festival Star Helen Boatwright

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

When Spring cometh, can the Berkshire Music Festival be far behind?

Not if the press department of the Boston Symphony can help it! Though this year's festival is some three months away, we have already received a rather full briefing of the schedule and programs to be given at Tanglewood during July and August.

At the outset, it is safe to say that a large complement of New Haveners will be on hand for two of the concerts and not particularly because of the American premieres scheduled for these events!

Rather, music devotees here will be primarily interested in the fact that the New Haven soprano, Helen Boatwright, is to be featured in both of the festival's American premieres. These are to be Haydn's cantata, "Applausus", and the concert version of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme", by Richard Strauss.

Mrs. Boatwright, who is to be heard in two major Woolsey Hall events next month, has a large and enthusiastic following here through her many distinguished performances over the years. As intimated, the versatile and accomplished soprano will be much in the local news for the next few weeks. Her coming Tanglewood appearances are certain to attract many of her admirers hereabouts and elsewhere.

More New Blood

The conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, will continue to inject new programmatic blood into the coming festival's programs. More than half of the works to be heard this summer will be in the nature of "first performances" at the festival! And conforming to the conductor's ideas evidenced in his first season last year as musical director of the festival, both the orchestral programs and those of the Berkshire Music Center (the festival's school) will have a generous sprinkling of contemporary music. Works by Barber, Copland, Menotti, Bartok, Rorem, and Hovhaness will spice up the orchestral fare while the school will sponsor a Festival of Contemporary American Music with the co-operation of the Fromm Foundation.

In observance of the Strauss centennial, a number of his compositions in addition to the American premiere performance mentioned will be featured in the coming festival. First off, most of the composer's popular tone poems (Don Juan, Till Eulenspiegel, Don Quixote, etc.) will be heard. First festival performances of Strauss' music are to include the following: "Tageszeiten" (Harvard Glee Club assisting); "Three Hymns" (soprano Phyllis Curtin); "Die Frau ohne Schatten" (Interludes); "Parergon" and "Burleske", two works for piano and orchestra. (Soloists Jorge Bolet and Lorin Hollander, respectively).

Leinsdorf will conduct 15 of the 24 festival concerts including the six opening chamber music programs and nine of the 18 programs by the full Boston Symphony. The list of guest conductors includes the following: Richard Burgin (former concertmaster and now associate conductor of the Boston Symphony); Eugene Ormandy (Philadelphia Orchestra); Max Rudolf (Cincinnati Symphony); William Steinberg (Pittsburgh Symphony); Leopold Stokowski (last but not least!)

Return of Pianists

Two young American pianists, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager, will return this year following their successful festival debuts last season. Cliburn will be heard in the Brahms Concerto No. 1 and Frager will perform one of the Mozart concertos. Two Mozart concertos — K. 450 and K. 451, are listed for performance with the veteran French piano virtuoso, Claudio Arrau, as the soloist.

Those who missed the Boston Symphony's performance here this season of Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, will have the opportunity of hearing it (and him) at the concert on Aug. 1. The orchestra's brilliant young concertmaster will also perform as soloist in Mozart's Serenade in D (K 2.03) on July 3.

Another Tanglewood "first" this season will be the performance of Verdi's "Requiem," scheduled for the final Saturday evening program of the festival on Aug. 22. The Chorus pro Musica of Boston (Alfred Nash Patterson, director) will assist and the soloists are to be Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, and Ezio Flagello.

* * *

An item of more immediate interest concerning the Boston Symphony has to do with its first concert in the White House on Tuesday afternoon. The Bostonians, with concerts scheduled at Washington's Constitution Hall for tomorrow and Tuesday evenings, will perform the afternoon program on the invitation of the First Lady. The East Room in the White House is to be the scene and the audience will be made up of children of the Embassy delegations to the United States.

Conductor Leinsdorf and President Johnson, it seems, are old friends. The friendship dates from the President's first term in Congress in 1938 when he made the arrangements for the extension of the conductor's visa. During the Boston Symphony's regular visit to Washington last year, the then Vice-President and Mrs. Johnson attended one of the concerts and afterwards entertained the Leinsdorfs and officials of the orchestra at their residence.

Lynda and Luci Johnson, the daughters of President and Mrs. Johnson, will act as hostesses at the White House concert to which some 200 Embassy children between the ages of 13 and 21 have been invited.

* * *

To get back to Mrs. Boatwright's appearances here next month, the first will come with her solo role in the presentation of Bach's B minor Mass by the Vassar Choir and the Yale Glee Club on April 12. The other soloists are to be Blanche Porto, Blake Stern, and David Laurent. Fenno Heath will conduct the performance which is to be one of the highlights of the ceremonies planned for the inauguration of Kingman Brewster as the 17th president of Yale. Tickets for the concert are now available at Loomis' and David Dean Smith's.

Two days later, on April 14, the widely known and highly regarded singer is to be the guest artist in the New Haven Symphony's final Woolsey Hall concert of the season. Mrs. Boatwright will have the solo role in the performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 4. Frank Brieff will conduct. The other offering is to be Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" which was successfully performed for the first time by the New Haven Symphony a few years ago. Tickets for this most promising event may be obtained at the office of the symphony, 254 College St.

* * *

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 20,000 S. 28,100

MAR 29 1964 Buffalo

9

MUSIC NOTES

Shakespeare And

WJ. Melnikoff

The twenty-fifth and penultimate week of the Metropolitan Opera's 79th season will include four performances of three Shakespeare-Verdi operas to celebrate the 400th anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare and the 150th anniversary of the birth of Verdi.

There will be two performances of "Macbeth" and one each of "Otello" and "Falstaff." Although our very favorite Tchaikovsky opera, "Eugene Onegin", will be the bill on Tuesday, at the Met, our choice in this case is the exciting Bencini-Lee Duo-Piano concert in the Memorial auditorium at High Point College on the same date.

Spring is but a week old and summer programs and festivals are being announced all over America. One of the largest is the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Erich Leinsdorf, with guest conductors Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Max Rudolf, Leopold Stokowski and distinguished soloists will give 18 concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus six chamber orchestra concerts of music by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Richard Strauss.

Eminent soloists and ensembles will participate in eight Tuesday evening chamber music concerts.

Some of the outstanding United States festivals for the summer of 1964 will take place in Carmel, Ojai, Los Angeles, Aspen, Santa Fe, Ravinia, Cincinnati, Brevard, Robin Hood Dell, Lewisohn Stadium, American Dance, Jacob's Pillow, Chautauqua, Berkshire, Marlboro and Lake George.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912

APR 15 1964

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — TANGLEWOOD: Berkshire Music Center of Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold auditions for admission to 1964 session (June 28-Aug. 23) in 16 key cities during March. Final auditions for instrumentalists (including pianists and vocalists will take place Apr. 3 in New York City at Carnegie Hall, Studio 856. Applicants should write for further information and catalogs to the Berkshire Music Center at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 330,636 S. 377,788

APR 5 1964 Buffalo

BEST KNOWN of all American festivals is the one in the Berkshire hills at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. For eight weeks beginning July 3, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony will present a fascinating variety of concerts with the assistance of several big-name guest soloists.

American premieres of Haydn's cantata "Applausus" and Strauss's "Burger als Edelmann" are planned along with several other seldom-heard works and 10 compositions by American composers commissioned for the festival.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206

FEB 1 1964

Tanglewood Plans Detailed

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced plans for the music center's composition department session at Tanglewood in Lenox between June 28 and Aug. 23.

Aaron Copland, noted composer, will again be head of the department as well as chairman of the faculty but will be in residence only from Aug. 3 through 16. Gunther Schuller, well-known American composer, will be acting chairman in Copland's absence.

As an adjunct to the programs of the composition department and the department of listening and analysis at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center will sponsor a four-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators from July 27 — Aug. 23.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915

MAY 7 1964

Commissioned Works

On Aug. 22, 1964, the Choru pro Musica and the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, unde the direction of Erich Leine dorf, will perform the Verd Requiem at Tanglewood, du ing the Berkshire Music Fest val. Later, the chorus and th orchestra will record th work for RCA.

In keeping with the choru objective of encouragi young composers to wri choral music, Raymond Wil ing-White, Kulas professor music at the Case Institute Technology in Cleveland, h been commissioned to compo a major work for choru chamber orchestra, and ele tronically prepared tap which will be performed du ing the 15th anniversary se son.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
APR 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, April

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 161,219 SUN. 304,523

APR 19 1964

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N.Y.
SARATOGIAN
D. 10,800

APR 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730

APR 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

APR 8 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

APR 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

APR 1 - 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

APR 4 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

APR 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

APR 4 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

APR 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,085

APR 3 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

APR 26 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

APR 4 1964

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678

APR 11 1964

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 130,954

APR 4 1964

Tanglewood Season To Feature Strauss

15454

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will feature a cycle of the works of Richard Strauss in its Berkshire Festival concerts this summer at Tanglewood near Lenox, Mass.

Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the orchestra and director of the festival, will open the orchestral season July 3, conducting the first two weekends of three concerts each devoted to music for chamber orchestra.

He also will conduct nine of the 18 remaining concerts by the full Boston Symphony. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteaux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Public activities of the festival will open June 30 with the first of the Tuesday evening chamber music concerts. The festival ends Aug. 23.

Tanglewood Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf will be in residence at the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood which gets under way July 3 with a Mozart concert. In addition to the programs listed below, all to take place at the Music Shed, there will be eight chamber music concerts at 8 p. m. Tuesdays starting June 30.

FRIDAY, 8:00	SATURDAY, 8:00	SUNDAY, 2:30
JULY 3 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf MOZART: March in D, K 237 Serenade in D, K. 203 (Silverstein) Piano Concerto in B-flat, K. 450 (Arrau) Symphony in C, K. 425 "Linz"	4 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf MOZART: March in F, K. 248 Divertimento in F, K. 247 Piano Concerto in D, K. 451 (Arrau) Symphony in G minor, K. 550	5 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf HAYDN: Symphony No. 39 in G minor "Applausus" (Boatwright, Vanni, Fressier, Bell) American Premiere
JULY 10 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 3 in D Great Mass in E flat (Endich, Albert, DiVirgilio, Carringer, Bell) In Memory of Gertude Robinson Smith	11 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf MOZART: Symphony in C major, K. 200 Violin Concerto in B flat, K. 207 (Silverstein) Piano Concerto in F, K. 413 (Frager) Aria for Soprano with Piano Obligato, K. 505 (Boatwright and Frager) Six German Dances, K. 509	12 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf MOZART: Serenade for Thirteen Winds, K. 361 STRAUSS: Complete Music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Boatwright, Vanni, and Bell)
JULY 17 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf STRAUSS: Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten" MAHLER: Symphony No. 5 In Memory of Serge Koussevitzky	18 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf SCHUMAN: Overture, Scherzo, Finale, Op. 52 DEBUSSY: "Nocturnes" (Radcliffe Choral Society) STRAUSS: "Tageszeiten" (Harvard Glee Club) WAGNER: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Radcliffe Choral Society)	19 Conductor: Pierre Monteux MILHAUD: Suite Provencale HINDEMITH: Mathis der Maler MOUSSORGSKY: Pictures at an Exhibition STRAUSS: Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome"
JULY 24 Conductor: Eugene Ormandy STRAUSS: "Don Juan" SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 5 DEBUSSY: Ibecia RAVEL: Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2	25 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf MOZART: Serenade for Four Orchestras in D, K. 286 STRAUSS: "Also Sprach Zarathustra" BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 (Cliburn)	26 Conductor: William Steinberg MENDELSSOHN: Symphony So. 4 WAGNER: Rhine Journey and Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung" BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 5
JULY 31 Conductor: William Steinberg PISTON: Toccata STRAUSS: "Don Quixote" (de Pasquale and Mayes) BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1	AUGUST 1 Conductor: Eugene Ormandy BEETHOVEN: Leonore Overture No. BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1 MAHLER: Symphony No. 1	2 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf DVORAK: Symphony No. 6 in D BARTOK: Violin Concerto No. 2 (Silverstein) STRAUSS: Waltz Sequence No. 1 from "Der Rosenkavalier"
AUGUST 7 Conductor: Richard Burgin SCHULLER: Seven Studies on a Theme of Paul Klee TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6	8 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf BEETHOVEN: "Ruins of Athens" (Curtin and Diaz) STRAUSS: "Three Hymns" (Curtin) MENOTTI: "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" (Chookasian and Diaz)	9 Conductor? Erich Leinsdorf SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 4 STRAUSS: "Parergon" (Bolet) LISZT: Fantasy on "Ruins of Athens" (Bolet)
AUGUST 14 Conductor: Max Rudof SMETANA: "From Bohemia's Foresta" BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 2 STRAUSS: "Macbeth" STRAVINSKY: "Firebird" Suite	15 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf SYDEMAN: Study for Orchestra No. 2 STRAUSS: "Burlesque" (Hollander) MENDELSSOHN: Complete Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (soloists and Reardon, narrator)	16 Conductor: Pierre Monteux VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 4 RAVEL: "Alborada del gracioso" ELGAR: Variations on an Original Theme
AUGUST 21 Conductor: Leopold Stokowski MOZART: Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K. 297B (Gemiony, Cioffi, Walt, Stephane) STRAUSS: "Death and Transfiguration" ROREM: Eagles HOVHANESS: Prelude and Quadruple Fugue STRAVINSKY: Suite from "Petrouchka"	22 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf WAGNER: Excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure" (Fiagello) VERDI: Requeim (Amara, Chookasian, Shirley, and Fiagello)	23 Conductor: Erich Leinsdorf BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7 STRAUSS: "Ein Heldenleben"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 16 1964

Tanglewood Sets Summer Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present 24 concerts at the eight-week Berkshire Music Festival this summer. From July 3 through August 23 the orchestra will be heard on Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons in the 6,000 seat Music Shed at Tanglewood. Saturday mornings open rehearsals will be given for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The Orchestra plans to present music from four areas: festival music, contemporary music, a cycle of Richard Strauss works and music for chamber orchestra. The first two week ends of the festival will be devoted to chamber music while the remaining six week-end concerts will be given by the full orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf is the musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Festival. Guest conductors who will appear next summer are: Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg, and Leopold Stokowski. On Tuesday nights during the season, the festival will present soloists and ensembles at the Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concerts.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164

APR 1 1964

Berkshire Festival Lists Special Artists

The New York Pro Musica, Claudio Arrau and the Beaux Arts Trio are among the artists who will perform this summer at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival.

The Tanglewood, Lenox, season will run from July 3 through Aug. 23, with the Boston orchestra heard on weekends and solo and ensemble programs scheduled during the week. The Symphony will present music for festivals, contemporary compositions, a Richard Strauss cycle and chamber compositions.

The New York Pro Musica, directed by Noah Greenburg, will present the first special concert, on June 30. Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony concertmaster, and pianist Ralph Berkowitz, will perform July 7. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes director, will sing July 14. Pianist Claudio Arrau will give a recital July 21.

On July 28, the Beaux Arts Trio will perform, and pianist Jorge Bolet will appear Aug. 4. The Lenox Quartet will give a program of contemporary American music Aug. 11 as part of the Festival of Contemporary American Music sponsored by the Center and Chicago's Fromm Music Foundation. Soprano Phyllis Curtin will present the final special recital, on Aug. 18.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
APR 4

As I Hear It

Tanglewood: 1964

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

ON THE BASIS of the announcement of programs made public this week, Tanglewood should have a fine year. The programs should attract vast audiences. The prospect, however, is one of only modest stimulation.

The artists involved are tiptop, from guest conductors to soloists, but there is little curiosity or audacity displayed in the season's plans.

* * *

EVERY YEAR the announcements reveal a compromise between management (box-office) and music. The trustees of any orchestra, we assume, are concerned with the amount of the deficit, but no one else is. And so there is mild dissatisfaction when one looks at the over-all pattern and discerns little of real excitement. The individual programs are excellently balanced and will delight the thousands who will assemble, drawn by the centripetal forces of the unique institution.

But beyond the undoubted brilliance of the performances there will be little to make this an outstanding season and, mark it well, this is not the year for Tanglewood to pull in its horns. There are envious competitors in the offing.

* * *

HOW SHALL one answer the inevitable preseason questions: "How does Tanglewood look for this year?" or the equally sure midseason query: "How's Tanglewood doin' this year?" One can respond in terms like a General Motors report; Ten, or whatever, per cent ahead, and that will satisfy most people. But it won't satisfy the musical world. Contemporary composers will complain of lack of consideration. True, there will be Gunther Schuller and Sydeman and Menotti, but the front office has not whetted our interest in these novelties.

As in government and most activities, those of us on whom none of the responsibility weighs can tell those devoting their whole days and nights to the matter how to do it. I, for one, can listen to Richard Strauss very willingly on the 100th anniversary of his birth or not. It is a pity that no recognition will be made of another 100th anniversary — that of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge — whose efforts in certain of Tanglewood's activities over the years were of so much benefit, not alone to audiences, artists and composers, but primarily to the student of the Berkshire Music Center.

* * *

THE CONFLICT between the financial and the artistic aspects of any musical venture is formidable and when, and if, the artistic department is given greater dominance, thereby earning greater commendation, the patient can suffer and die of improvements.

In addition to the two great considerations in programmaking, there is the basic and constant necessity of building for the future. It is a moot question whether this factor has been given adequate consideration this season. The chamber music series has patently lost its impetus. The personalities announced are glamorous although not in the realm of chamber music. This is a distinct retreat from the original Koussevitzky aspirations which, I thought, were highly worthy.

* * *

EXCEPT FOR the contributions of the Paul Fromm Foundation, which has taken over where Mrs. Coolidge left off, there is little to focus the attention of the musical world on Tanglewood this year. Van Cliburn in a Brahms concerto and Samuel Mayes and Joseph de Pasquale in "Don Quixote" should be thrilling events among many others of equally anticipated performances. Mr. Leinsdorf has graciously invited a stellar group of the elite among fellow conductors to take a baton one or more evenings, and one of the advantages of guest conductors is that each man usually brings a fresh fillip to his concert by using his personal favorites, which are often not in the normal repertory of the permanent conductor.

The penalty of leadership is eternal discontent.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
APR 28 1964

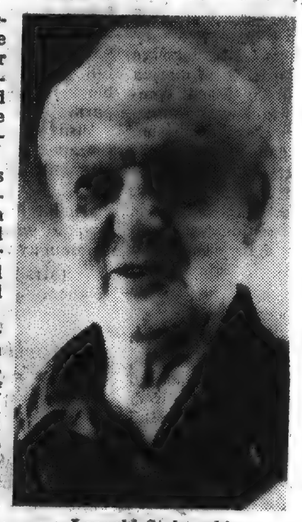
Tanglewood Concerts

Six for the Price of Four Is Berkshire Nights Offer

Six consecutive Friday evening concerts for the same price as a regular subscription to four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being offered subscribers to the 1964 Berkshire Nights at Tanglewood this summer.

And six different conductors will lead the BSO in the Berkshire Nights series, two of whom will be making their Tanglewood debuts, Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra and the famed conductor, Leopold Stokowski.

Announcement of the Berkshire Nights series was made today by the Tanglewood Advisory Committee, made up of Berkshire area residents. When the Berkshire Nights plan was first offered seven years ago, subscribers were offered four concerts for the price of three; two years ago when the Festival season was extended, five concerts were offered for the price of three and this season it was increased to six performances for the price of four.



Leopold Stokowski

Drive Opens Tomorrow

Mrs. John G. W. Mahanna of 20 Warwick St., this city, who has served as chairman of the Berkshire Nights for the past six years, will again head the subscription drive this season. The drive opens tomorrow and will close June 1.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will be on the podium in the Music Shed for the first Friday night concert, July 17, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. He will be followed by Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra and a summer resident of Monterey on July 24.

William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will conduct on July 31. Appearing as soloists with him will be Joseph de Pasquale, principal violist, and Samuel Mayes, principal cellist with the BSO. Both artists are leaving the Boston Symphony at the close of the Tanglewood season to join the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Other Concerts

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra and former concertmaster, will conduct the Boston Symphony Aug. 7, followed the next Friday evening, Aug. 14 by Max Rudolf.

The final Berkshire Nights concert on Friday, Aug. 21, will bring to the Music Shed Leopold Stokowski, who will conduct the BSO at Tanglewood for the first time.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 768,503 SUN 1,094,990
MAY 10 1964

Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 3-Aug. 23. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 24 concerts (music for festivals, contemporary music, Richard Strauss cycle, music for chamber orchestra). First two weekends music for chamber orchestra, other concerts, full orchestra. Conductors: Erich Leinsdorf, Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Leopold Stokowski. Soloists: Claudio Arrau, Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Phyllis Curtin, Jorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander, and others. Eight Tuesday evening chamber concerts. Festival of contemporary Amer-

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
MAY 23 1964

EUGENE ORMANDY, music director of the Philadelphia orchestra has accepted the invitation of Enrich Leinsdorf to conduct the Berkshire Festival concert of Sunday, July 19, at 2 p.m. His program will consist of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture; the Beethoven Symphony No.; 4 "Alborada del gravioso" by Ravel, and Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Ormandy's guest engagement on July 19 will in addition to his two previously scheduled Berkshire Festival appearances on July 24 and Aug. 1.

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Seiji Ozawa, brilliant young Japanese conductor, to conduct the Festival concert on Aug. 16. Winner of the Koussevitsky Memorial scholarship at the Berkshire Music center in 1960, Mr. Ozawa has been appointed assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1964-65 season and will be Music Director of the Ravinia Festival this summer. His program on Aug. 16 will include Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler"; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; and the Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome" by Richard Strauss.

Roger L. Stevens, chairman of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts has been appointed as assistant on the arts to President Johnson. The president, in making the announcement also stated that "to assist Mr. Stevens and to provide a forum for the representation of all the arts of the United States, I shall shortly issue an executive order establishing a Presidential board on the Arts."

NewYorkWorld-Telegram and
The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176
JUN 25 1964

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., continues to be the foremost summer music series in the East, and a target for many travelers.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 25 1964

Arthur Myers Writes Article On Tanglewood

Former Eagle feature writer Arthur Myers has an article in the July issue of HiFi/Stero Review titled "An Impertinent View of Tanglewood, Old-Fashioned Yankee Enterprise Is Keeping the Berkshires Green."

In the article Mr. Myers states the thesis that it is the "heavenly music of the cash register" rather than any esthetic contribution that makes Tanglewood important to the people of Berkshire County.

The article gives a capsule history of Tanglewood, but spends most of its length deseribing alleged lovers and beer drinkers on the lawn, and states the questionable proposition that "most of the state troopers west of Worcester are detailed to keep young people from getting beneath the blankets that are primarily there to sit on."

12

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 8,620
MAY 6 1964

Tanglewood Equals Music For the Summer Traveler

Local residents going up into Northern New England this summer will not want to miss the opportunity to drive to the beautiful Berkshire Hills in western Massachusetts. Right in the heart of the Berkshires is Tanglewood (at Lenox, Mass.), summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, only 2½ hours drive from the Westerly area via excellent highways and an interesting contrast to our coastal area.

At Tanglewood, which has been a mecca for music lovers for twenty-nine years, visitors may spend an evening or a weekend hearing Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, and many distinguished guest conductors and soloists.

The 1964 Berkshire Festival will offer 24 weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 8 Tuesday evening Chamber Music concerts by eminent soloists and ensembles, and 8 Saturday morning Open Rehearsals by the Orchestra for the benefit of their Pension Fund.

The wedge-shaped Music Shed, which is open on three sides to allow a view of stately trees and shrubs, can easily seat 6,000 persons, while the spacious lawns surrounding it accommodate an additional 6,000 to 9,000. Many people prefer to bring blankets and folding chairs and enjoy a concert under the stars, since the excellent acoustical stage canopy in the Music Shed projects the music without amplification throughout the lawns.

Before and after the concerts the lawns and the Hemlock Gardens are favorite picnic and strolling spots, all available at no extra charge. The Berkshire Festival concerts will begin July 3 and continue every Friday and Saturday evening at 8:00 and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 through August 23.

Tanglewood remains essentially what it has always been: a beautiful example of a gentleman's estate, the same kind of summer estate which began to flourish in the Berkshires in the mid 1800's and reached a peak shortly after the turn of the century. Beginning with those early days, the Berkshire Hills were the summer retreat of the wealthy New England merchants, New York financiers, and the great millionnaires of the later 1800's.

Many of these estates exist today, some now as small exclusive resorts and schools. But because the good New Englanders had a great respect for privacy, most of their estates were hidden from the roads and are not accessible as Tanglewood is today.

The 210-acre estate was incorporated in 1849 by William Aspinwall Tappan from several farms which he had recently bought. While the Main House was under construction, the Tappan family lived at the adjoining estate of Highwood.

Being a family of great culture and many literary friends, they were well acquainted with young Nathaniel Hawthorne of Salem and Concord. In the summer of 1850 they invited him and his family to spend some months on their new estate, renting a small red cottage there at a modest fee.

The Hawthornes remained until November 1851, and during that time he produced three of his noted works: "The House of the Seven Gables," "A Wonder Book for Boys and Girls," and "Tanglewood Tales."

The name "Tanglewood" seems to have been invented by Hawthorne to describe the glen which descended from the Little Red House down to the lake now called Lake Mahkeenac, the glen which is still part of the present estate and provides such a splendid view from the Main House. Gradually the family and their neighbors came to call the whole estate "Tanglewood" and today the name is known the world over.

For complete program and ticket information about the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, one may write the Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston Mass. 02115, before June 15; after June 15 address the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

Musical mecca

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 5/10/64

Philadelphians who are making plans to visit the World's Fair will not want to miss the opportunity to drive on to the beautiful Berkshire Hills in western Massachusetts to Tanglewood (at Lenox, Mass.), summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only three hours' drive from New York City via excellent highways, it is an interesting contrast to the excitement and hubbub of the Fair.

At Tanglewood, which has been a mecca for music lovers for 29 years, visitors may spend an evening or a weekend hearing Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, and many distinguished guest conductors and soloists.

The 1964 Berkshire Festival will offer 24 weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eight Tuesday evening chamber music concerts by eminent soloists and ensembles and eight Saturday morning open rehearsals by the Orchestra for the benefit of their pension fund.

The wedge-shaped Music Shed, which is open on three sides to allow a view of stately trees and shrubs, can easily seat 6000 persons, while the spacious lawns surrounding it accommodate an additional 6000 to 9000. Many people prefer to bring blankets and folding chairs and enjoy a concert under the stars, since the excellent acoustical stage canopy in the Music Shed projects the music without amplification throughout the lawns.

Before and after the concerts the lawns and the hemlock gardens are favorite picnic and strolling spots, all available at no extra charge. The Berkshire Festival concerts will begin July 3 and continue every Friday and Saturday evening at 8 and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 through Aug. 23.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., has added much to provide comfort and convenience for Tanglewood visitors. There are five large parking lots, all of which are free and are policed throughout the concerts by experienced parking attendants with the aid of walkie-talkie radios.

On the grounds within easy walking distance of the Music Shed visitors may purchase box lunches and beverages at the open-air cafeteria, browse at the music store for books, recordings and scores, and visit the Glass Reception House at the main gate where representative art exhibits from the local museums and art colonies are always on display.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545
MAY 30 1964

Boston Symphony Slates 24 Tanglewood Concerts

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will present 24 concerts during the eight-week 1964 Berkshire Festival season.

From July 3 through Aug. 23 the Boston Symphony will be heard Fridays and Saturdays at 8 p. m. and Sundays at 2:30 p. m. in the 6,000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate in Lenox which is the Summer home of the orchestra. Music director Erich Leinsdorf also will continue the 10 a. m. Saturday open rehearsals in the Music Shed, given for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The first two weekends (July 3-4-5, July 10-11-12) will be devoted to music for chamber orchestra, including lesser known works of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss. The remaining six weekends of concerts will be given by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the six chamber orchestra programs and nine of the 18 programs by the full orchestra. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

THE 1964 Berkshire Festival will continue to present eminent soloists and ensembles at the 8 p. m. Tuesday chamber music concerts in the theater at Tanglewood: June 30, the New York Pro Musica directed by Noah Greenberg; July 7, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, and Ralph Berkowitz, pianist; July 14, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, directing; July 21, Claudio Arrau, piano recital; July 28, Beaux Arts Trio; Aug. 4, Jorge Boulet, piano recital.

A program of contemporary American music will be given by the Lenox Quartet Aug. 11, as part of the Festival of Contemporary American Music (Aug. 9-13) sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Aug. 18, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, will be heard.

A detailed brochure with program and ticket information may ge obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

The Boston Symphony program:

7-3: LEINSDORF: MOZART March in D, K. 237; Serenade in D, K. 203 (Joseph Silverstein); Piano Concerto in B-flat, K. 450 (Claudio Arrau); Symphony in C, K. 425, "Linz."

7-4 LEINSDORF: MOZART March in F, K. 248; Divertimento in F, K. 247; Piano Concerto in D, K. 451 (Arrau); Symphony in G minor, K. 550.

7-5 LEINSDORF: HAYDN Symphony No. 39 in G minor; "Applausus" (Helen Boatwright, Helen, Vanni, Charles Bressler, Donald Bell) — American premiere.

7-10 LEINSDORF: SCHUBERT Symphony No. 3 in D; Great Mass in E-flat (Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Walter Carringer, Donald Bell).

7-11: LEINSDORF: MOZART Symphony in C major, K. 200; Violin Concerto in B-flat, K. 207 (Silverstein); Piano Concerto in F, K. 413 (Malcolm Frager); Aria for Soprano with Piano Obligato, K. 505 (Boatwright and Frager); Six German Danses, K. 509.

7-12: LEINSDORF: MOZART Serenade for Thirteen Winds, K. 361; STRAUSS Complete Music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Boatwright, Vanni, Bell) — American premiere.

7-17: LEINSDORF: STRAUSS Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten;" MAHLER Symphony No. 5.

7-18: LEINSDORF: SCHUMANN Overture, Scherzo, Finale, Op. 52; DEBUSSY "Nocturnes" (Radcliffe Choral Society); STRAUSS "Die Tageszeiten" (Harvard Glee Club); WAGNER Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhayser" (Radcliffe Choral Society).

7-19: ORMANDY: BEETHOVEN Egmont Overture; BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 4; RAVEL "Alborada del gracioso"; ELGAR Variation on an Original Theme.

7-24: ORMANDY: STRAUSS "Don Juan"; SIBELIUS Symphony No. 5; DEBUSSY "Iberia"; RAVEL Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2.

7-25: LEINSDORF: MOZART Serenade for Four Orchestras in D, K. 286; STRAUSS "Also sprach Zarathustra;" BRAHMS Piano Concerto No. 1 (Van Cliburn).

7-26: STEINBERG: MENDELSSOHN Symphony No. 4; WAGNER Rhine Journey and Funeral March forom "Gotterdammerung"; BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 5.

7-31: STEINBERG: PISTON Toccata; STRAUSS "Don Quixote" (Joseph de Pasquale, Samuel Mayes; BRAHMS Symphony No. 1.

8-1: ORMANDY: BEETHOVEN Leonore Overture No. 1; BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 1; MAHLER Symphony No. 1.

8-2: LEINSDORF: DVORAK Symphony No. 6 in D; BARTOK Violin Concerto No. 2 (Silverstein); STRAUSS Waltz Sequence No. 1 from "Der Rosenkavalier."

8-7: BURGIN: SCHULLER Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee; TCRAIKOVSKY Symphony No. 6.

8-8: LEINSDORF: BEETHOVEN "Ruins of Athens" (Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz); STRAUSS "Three Hymns" (Curtin); MENOTTI "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" (Lili Chookasian, Justino Diaz).

8-9: LEINSDORF: SCHUMANN Symphony No. 4; STRAUSS "Parergon" (Jorge Bolet); LISZT Fantasy on "Ruins of Athens" (Bolet).

8-14: RUDOLF: SMETANA "From Bohemia's Forests"; BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 2; STRAUSS "Mac- Suite.

8-15: LEINSDORF: SYDEMAN Study for Orchestra No. 2; STRAUSS "Burleske" (Lorin Hollander); MENDELSSOHN Complete Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (soloists and Patricia Peardon, narrator).

8-16: OZAWA: HINDEMITH Mathis der Maler; MOUSSORGSKY Pictures at an Exhibition; STRAUSS Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

8-21: STOKOWSKI: MOZART Sinfonia Concertante in E-flat, K. 297b (Ralph Gomberg, Gino Cioffi, Sherman Walt, James Stagliano); STRAUSS "Death and Transfiguration"; ROREM "Eagles"; HOVHANESS Prelude and Quadruple Fugue; STRAVINSKY Suite from "Petrouchka."

8-22: LEINSDORF: WAGNER Excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure" (Ezio Flagello); VERDI Requiem (Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, Ezio Flagello).

8-23: LEINSDORF: BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 7; STRAUSS Ein Heldenleben.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 538,780 SUN. 661,622
JUN 21 1964

BERKSHIRE Festival Program: Guide to an evening or a weekend at the famous festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshire hills in western Massachusetts, three-hour drive from New York City. Concerts by Boston Symphony. Festival Ticket Office, Department S-T, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MANHATTAN TIMES
Wednesday, May 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION-STAR
Friday, May 22, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

OSSINING CITIZEN REGISTER
Wednesday, May 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEWBURGH BEACON NEWS
Wednesday, May 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, May 19, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Tuesday, May 19, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, May 30, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

MAY 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 100,582

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 161,453

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

MAY 22 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 63,635

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,177

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Bulletin (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 144,784

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sentinel (e)
FITCHBURG, Mass.
Circ. 17,998

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 98,547

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
TAUNTON, Mass.
Circ. 12,652

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787

MAY 21 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 8,620

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

MAY 24 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,086

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Union Leader
MANCHESTER, N. H.
Comb. Circ. 51,228

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Kennebec Journal (m)
AUGUSTA, Me.
Circ. 14,156

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,889

MAY 21 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Post (e)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 81,942

MAY 25 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 63,635

MAY 29 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

MAY 31 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932

MAY 22 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

MAY 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580

MAY 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,093

MAY 22 1964

Poughkeepsie Journal
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
D. 31,880 SUN. 33,868

PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

MAY 19 1964

BEACON, N. Y.
NEWS
DAILY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAY 20 1964

Herald Tribune (NEW YORK)
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

MAY 20 1964

WESTPORT, CONN.
TOWN CRIER & HERALD
THURS 6 273 SUN. 7,137

MAY 30 1964

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

MAY 27 1964

NEWBURGH, N.Y.
NEWS
D. 28,800

MAY 20 1964

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

MAY 29 1964

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 831,904 SUN. 1,138,268

MAY 20 1964

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 48,977 SUN. 70,128

MAY 31 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

MAY 30 1964

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009

MAY 22 1964

Monteux Cancels at Tanglewood

Pierre Monteux, conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has canceled his two conducting engagements at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., this summer, Erich Leinsdorf, festival music director, announced today.

Leinsdorf said Monteux has been ordered by his physician to rest for the summer in order to prepare for his conducting classes in Hancock, Maine, and his fall and winter engagements.

Instead, Leinsdorf said, Eugene Ormandy has agreed to conduct the festival concert July 19 and Seiji Ozawa will conduct Aug. 16. Ormandy is conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Ozawa recently was named assistant conductor for the New York Philharmonic for the 1964-65 season.

Ormandy's Program

Ormandy's program will include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the Beethoven "Symphony Number 4," "Alborda del gracoso" by Ravel, and Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme." Ormandy's guest engagement July 19 will be in addition to his two previously scheduled festival appearances July 24 and Aug. 1.

Ozawa, who also will serve as music director of the Ravinia Festival this summer, will conduct Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome" by Richard Strauss.

Other Conductors

Other conductors scheduled for the Berkshire Festival are Leinsdorf, William Steinberg, Richard Burgin, Max Rudolph and Leopold Stokowski.

Artists who will appear during the festival's eight weeks are the New York Pro Musica, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianist Ralph Berkowitz, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, pianist Claudio Arrau, pianist Jorge Bolet, the Lenox Quartet and soprano Phyllis Curtin.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WOODSTOCK PRESS
Thursday, June 4, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SAUGERTIES POST
Wednesday, June 3, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

KINGSTON KINGSTONIAN
Thursday, June 4, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312

JUN 21 1964

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 20,000 S. 26,100

JUN 21 1964

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 417,195

JUN 28 1964

Berkshire Festival Soon at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The 1964 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood here is expected to attract more than its usual share of tourists this season because of the New York World's Fair. This summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is only three hours drive from the New York metropolitan area via excellent highways.

At Tanglewood, which has been a mecca for music lovers for 29 years, visitors may spend an evening or a weekend hearing Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf as music director and many distinguished guest conductors and soloists. The festival this year will offer 24 weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eight Tuesday evening Chamber Music concerts by eminent soloists and ensembles, and eight Saturday morning Open Rehearsals by the Orchestra for the benefit of their Pension Fund. The wedge-shaped Music Shed, which is open on three sides to allow a view of stately trees and shrubs, can easily seat 6,000 persons, while the spacious lawns surrounding it accommodate an additional 6,000 to 9,000.

Many people prefer to bring blankets and folding chairs and enjoy a concert under the stars, since the excellent acoustical stage canopy in the Music Shed projects the music without amplification throughout the lawns. Before and after the concerts the lawns and the Hemlock Gardens are favorite picnic and strolling spots, all available at no extra charge. The Berkshire Festival concerts will begin July 3 and continue every Friday and Saturday evening at 8 and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 through Aug. 23.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. has added much to the original estate to provide comfort and convenience for Tanglewood visitors. There are five large parking lots, all of which are free and are policed throughout the concerts by experienced parking attendants with the aid of walkie-talkie radios. Traffic on the approaching roads is directed by Massachusetts State Police Patrolmen. On the grounds within easy walking distance of the Music Shed visitors may purchase box lunches and beverages at the open-air cafeteria, browse at the Music Store for books, recordings and scores, and visit the Glass Reception House at the Main Gate where representative art exhibits from the local museums and art colonies are always on display. During concerts a First Aid Station is available if necessary. On week days guided tours of the grounds are conducted at frequent intervals, to enable visitors to see the estate without disturbing the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music which runs concurrently with the Berkshire Festival.

Visitors to the Berkshires have long followed the local tradition of taking overnight accommodations in the many guest homes in the area. However, more and more motels and hotels are available. For stays of more than one night in the Berkshires, accommodations may be secured through the Berkshire Hills Conference, 100 North Street, Pittsfield, Mass. Shorter stays may be arranged on arrival through the local information bureaus of Pittsfield, Lee, Lenox, Stockbridge, Great Barrington, North Adams and Williamstown.

For complete program and ticket information about the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, one may write the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 161,453
JUN 9 1964

Berkshire Festival Will Open June 30

The Berkshire Festival in Lenox will open June 30 at 8 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre with the first Chamber Music Concert of the season.

The New York Pro Musica wil be featured at the first concert.

Evening concerts at Tanglewood will begin at 8 p.m. and afternoon concerts will get under way at 2:30 p.m.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
JUN 1964

FESTIVALS The eight-week Berkshire Festival will open July 3 with an all-Mozart program under Erich Leinsdorf, now in his second season at Tanglewood. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct fifteen of the twenty-four Berkshire Festival concerts, including the six chamber orchestra programs and nine of the eighteen programs by the full Boston Symphony. Guest conductors will be Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg, and Leopold Stokowski. Arthur Fiedler will make his annual appearance, directing a concert for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 7 1964

Festival Within Festival: Strauss at Tanglewood

Controversy Surrounds Composer, Not So Much His Music as Political Leaning

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Thursday is the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Georg Strauss, German composer, no relation to the waltzing Strausses.

Richard Strauss lived a long time, 85 years from 1864 to 1949, but not quite long enough to overcome completely the youthful musical reputation he acquired as a follower of Wagner.

On his 100th birthday his person as well as his work are subference of opinion that is more likely serving as a spur than as a deterrent to performances of his music.

Displayed Proudly

Erich Leinsdorf, for instance, has scheduled several Strauss works for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this season in honor of the anniversary.

The controversy generated when Strauss allowed himself to be displayed proudly by Hitler's Third Reich as a proper composer and conductor was largely dissipated when he was graduated honorably by the postwar de-Nazification examinations.

And postwar listeners have been forgiving because it is evident that Strauss was elderly and politically naive during the war.

His work has been mildly controversial because even though he gradually moved away from post - Wagnerian romanticism, he didn't move strongly toward the polyrhythmic and polytonal work of his 20th Century contemporaries.

Major Music

He did not chose to write "new" music.

Be that as it may, his music is the music of a major composer and Tanglewood's picnickers will be offered 14 Strauss works by the orchestra augmented when necessary by chorus and soloists.

We are not able to provide a listing of the Strauss works to be performed by participants in the Music Center at Tanglewood because such a list doesn't exist, but we are reasonably sure that the first Strauss piece to appear in a regular concert will be the E flat minor sonata for violin and piano during the recital July 7 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, accompanied by Ralph Berkowitz as part of the Tuesday night chamber music series in the Theater Concert Hall.

Those Scheduled

Phyllis Ccurtin, soprano, also will offer some Strauss songs during her recital in the chamber music series Aug. 18, but most of the Strauss program will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Shed—as follows:

July 12, incidental music to Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."
July 17, interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten."
July 18, "Tageszeiten" with the Harvard Glee Club.
July 19, Dance of Seven Veils from "Salome."
July 24, "Don Juan."
July 25, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."
July 31, "Don Quixote."
Aug. 2, Waltz Sequence No. 1 from "Der Rosenkavalier."
Aug. 8, "Three Hymns" with Phyllis Curtin, soprano.
Aug. 9, "Parergon" with Jorge Bolet, pianist.
Aug. 14, "Macbeth."
Aug. 15, "Burleske" with Lorin Hollander, pianist.
Aug. 21, "Death and Transfiguration."
Aug. 23, "Ein Heldenleben."

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TABLET
W. 139,600 (C)
JUN 25 1964

Talent at Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf inaugurates the distinguished Boston Symphony concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Friday, July 3. Mozart dominates the opening few programs and throughout the series much will be heard of Richard Strauss, which is to be expected. This year marks the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Leopold Stokowski, William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy complete the roster of guest conductors.

While we're in the area, the swinging set might dig the 11th annual Newport, R. I., Jazz Festival July 2-5. Modernists Dave Brubeck, Thelonius Monk, Dizzie Gillespie, Oscar Petersen and Chet Baker fraternize with such traditionalists as Louis Armstrong, George Brunis, Count Basie, George Wettling, Bobby Hackett and J. C. Higgenbotham.

Let's face it folks, no matter where you are this summer, there's going to be music in the air. Why not take advantage of it? The Beatles? Yeah, yeah, yeah, they're around too (Forest Hills Music Festival). Eh, so I'm a "square"!

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Recorder-Gazette (e)
GREENFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 13,551
JUN 26 1964

Concert-Goers Enjoy Picnic At Tanglewood

For people who like to combine pleasure with more pleasure, to wit, food with good music, here's a suggestion: picnic at Tanglewood.

Concert-goers find it well worth while to arrive early and enjoy the beauty of Tanglewood before concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

And for those who hate lugging picnic baskets, the Tanglewood cafeteria makes box lunches and beverages available at 6 p.m. on concert evenings and noon on Sundays.

After all concerts, while heavy traffic abates, the Tanglewood grounds will remain open for those who wish to browse at the Music Store, Gallery or stroll about the formal gardens.

All evening concerts begin at 8 p.m., afternoon concerts at 2:30; Saturday Open Rehearsal is at 10 a.m. Five large, no charge parking lots are policed by experienced attendants, and the box office is open daily through Aug. 23, 9 a.m. to 6 p.m.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 344,575 SUN. 569,578
JUN 21 1964

American Festivals

MUSIC FESTIVALS and special outdoor programs presented in locations of natural scenic beauty throughout the country will provide enrichment for vacationers this summer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf adjourns each summer to the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass. The program this season will deviate from its traditional conservatism by including a Festival of Contemporary American Music sponsored by the music center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, Aug. 9-13. At the festival 10 compositions commissioned by the music center will receive their world premiere performances.

On Tuesday evenings throughout the Tanglewood season, July 3 through Aug. 23, a series of chamber music concerts will be presented as a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the annual "Boston Pops at Tanglewood" concert July 22 and a gala evening, for which the program has not been announced, Aug. 20.

Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia orchestra, and Seiji Ozawa, young Japanese conductor, among others, will be guest conductors this summer.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPILED BY NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Albany, N.Y.
Saturday 1961

Tunes, Toes of Summer

A rousing season of music and dance is on tap for the Capital District. Here is a schedule of summer offerings:

Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS. — Boston Symphony Orchestra; conductors: Erich Leinsdorf, Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Richard Burgin, Max Rudof, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux. 8 p.m. Fridays and Saturdays; 2:30 p.m. Sundays.

JULY 3: Leinsdorf: All Mozart: March in D, K. 237. Serenade in D, K. 203. Piano Concerto in B-flat, K. 450. Symphony in C, K. 425 "Linz."

JULY 4: Leinsdorf: All Mozart: March in F, K. 248. Divertimento in F, K. 247. Piano Concerto in D, K. 451. Symphony in G minor, K. 550.

JULY 5: Leinsdorf: All Haydn: Symphony No. 39 in G minor. "Applausus." American Premiere.

JULY 10: Leinsdorf: All Schubert: Symphony No. 3 in D. Great Mass in E flat.

JULY 11: Leinsdorf: All Mozart: Symphony in C major, K. 200. Violin Concerto in B flat, K. 207. Piano Concerto in F, K. 413. Aria for Soprano with Piano Obligato, K. 505. Six German Dances, K. 509.

JULY 12: Leinsdorf: Mozart: Serenade for Thirteen Winds, K. 361. Strauss: Complete Music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

JULY 17: Leinsdorf: Strauss: Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten." Mahler: Symphony No. 5.

JULY 18: Leinsdorf: Schuman: Overture, Scherzo, Finale, Op. 52. Debussy: "Nocturnes." Strauss: "Tageszeiten." Wagner: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser."

JULY 19: Monteux: Milhaud: Suite Provencale. Hindemith: Mathis der Maler. Moussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition. Strauss: Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salmome."

JULY 24: Ormandy: Strauss: "Don Juan." Sibelius: Symphony No. 5. Debussy: Iberia. Ravel: Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2.

JULY 25: Leinsdorf; Mozart: Serenade for Four Orchestras in D, K. 286. Strauss: "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1.

JULY 26: Steinberg: Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4. Wagner: Rhine Journey and Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung." Beethoven: Symphony No. 5.

JULY 31: Steinberg: Piston: Toccata. Strauss: "Don Quixote." Brahms: Symphony No. 1.

AUGUST 1: Ormandy: Beethoven: Leonore Overture. Beethoven: Symphony No. 1. Mahler: Symphony No. 1.

AUGUST 2: Leinsdorf: Dvorak: Symphony No. 6 in D. Bartok: Violin Concerto No. 2. Strauss: Waltz Sequence No. 1. from "Der Rosenkavalier."

TRIO AT TANGLEWOOD: Eugene Ormandy, Erich Leinsdorf and Pierre Monteux (from left) will conduct at Tanglewood this season.

AUGUST 7: Burgin: Schuller: Seven Studies of a Theme of Paul Klee. Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6.

AUGUST 8: Leinsdorf: Beethoven: "Ruins of Athens." Strauss: "Three Hymns." Mehotti: "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

AUGUST 9: Leinsdorf: Schumann: Symphony No. 4. Strauss "Parergon." Liszt: Fantasy on "Ruins of Athens."

AUGUST 14: Rudof: Smetana: "From Bohemia's Forests." Beethoven: Symphony No. 2. Strauss: "Macbeth." Stravinsky: "Firebird" Suite.

AUGUST 15: Leinsdorf: Sydeman: Study for Orchestra No. 2. Strauss: "Burleske." Mendelssohn: Complete Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

AUGUST 16: Monteux: Vaughan Williams: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. Beethoven: Symphony No. 4. Ravel: "Alborada del gracioso." Elgar: Variations on an Original Theme.

AUGUST 21: Stokowski: Mozart: Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K. 297B. Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration." Rorem: Eagles. Hovhaness: Prelude and Quadruple Fugue. Stravinsky: Suite from "Petroushka."

AUGUST 23: Leinsdorf: Beethoven: Symphony No. 7. Strauss: "Ein Heldenleben."

In addition to the programs listed above, all to take place at the Music Shed, there will be eight chamber music concerts at 8 p.m. Tuesdays starting June 30.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald
CHICOPEE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,024
JUN 25 1964

Boston Symphony Opens 1964 Berkshire Festival

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) will open this week with concerts by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday (July 3, 4, & 5), and a Chamber Music Concert on Tuesday (June 30) by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, Musical Director. The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will begin its activities at the same time, holding its traditional Opening Exercises this afternoon (Sun., June 28), an event to which the public is cordially invited.

Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his second season as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has planned all-Mozard programs for the Friday and Saturday evening concerts (Juy 3-4, 8 p.m.) and an all-Haydn program for Sunday afternoon (July 5, 2:30 p.m.). Five of the eight Mozart works to be played will be heard for the first time at the Berkshire Festival. All three Haydn works will be new to the Festival, and the final work Sunday afternoon, Haydn's Cantata "Applausus", will be an American premier. Soloists for the weekend will be Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Claudio Arrau, pianist; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass-baritone. The Festival Chorus will perform in the Haydn Cantata. As in the past, next weekend's programs are planned for a chamber orchestra of approximately fifty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will take place in the 6000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood.

The first Berkshire Festival Chamber Music Concert will be given by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, Musical Director, next Tuesday evening (June 30) at 8 p.m. in the 1200-seat Theater. For the Pro Musica's fifth appearance at Tanglewood, Mr. Greengerg has planned a program of Elizabethan music to honor the 400th birthday of William Shapespeare, whose plays contain many allusions to the music of his time.

Tickets for the opening Berkshire Festival concerts are available at the Festival Ticket Office at the Main Gate Tanglewood, which is open every day from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. and from 9 a.m. through the intermission on concert da...

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 49,216
JUN 28 1964

Berkshire Festival Due To Open

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) will open this week with concerts by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday, and next Sunday (July 3, 4, & 5), and a chamber music concert on Tuesday by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, musical director. The Berkshire Music Center, which is the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will begin its activities at the same time, holding its traditional opening exercises this afternoon, an event to which the public is invited.

Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his second season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has planned all-Mozart programs for the Friday and Saturday evening concerts and an all-Haydn program for next Sunday at 2:30 p. m. Five of the eight Mozart works to be played will be heard for the first time at the Berkshire Festival. All three Haydn works will be new to the festival, and the final work Sunday afternoon, Haydn's Cantata "Applausus," will be an American premiere.

Soloists for the week end will be Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Claudio Arrau, pianist; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass-baritone. The Festival Chorus will perform in the Haydn Cantata. As in the past, next week end's programs are planned for a chamber orchestra of approximately 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will take place in the 6,000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood.

The first Berkshire Festival chamber music concert will be given Tuesday evening at 8 in the 1,200-seat theater. For the Pro Musica's fifth appearance at Tanglewood, Mr. Greenberg has planned a program of Elizabethan music to honor the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare, whose plays contain many allusions to the music of his time. The group of six singers and four instrumentalists will perform, in solos and various ensembles, works by William Byrd, John Wilbye, Thomas Morley, John Dowland, Tobias Hume, Robert Jones, Robert White, Thomas Ravenscroft and Orlando Gibbons.

This afternoon at 3:30 the 22d session of the Berkshire Music Center will present its traditional opening exercises in the theater. Members of the Music Center will hear an address by Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager, a greeting from a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Board of Trustees, and the performance of a Handel Sonata for Violin and Piano by Joseph Silverstein and Ralph Berkowitz. After the singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" by all members of the Center, a tradition since the opening of the Center in 1940, Erick Leinsdorf will give the keynote address. Following the exercises, tea will be served in the Formal Gardens.

Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make voluntary contributions to the support of the Center, will have the opportunity to hear two programs by members of the Music Center next Sunday. The first program in a series of music by J. S. Bach will be given Sunday at 10 a. m. in the theater. On Sunday at 8 p. m. there will be a program of chamber music in the theater.

16

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES UNION
JUN 1 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
JUN 1 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUN 1 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,179
JUN 1 2 1964

Office Will Open Monday Morning

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that the Tanglewood box office will open Monday at 9 a.m. It will continue to be open daily through Aug. 23 week days from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., Sundays 10 a.m. through intermission, and from 9 a.m. through intermission on Berkshire Festival concert nights for patrons who wish to purchase reserved seat locations for current and future Festival concerts.

The box office is situated at the main gate of Tanglewood. For additional convenience there will be a second ticket office at the south gate on concert days, which will open at 6 p.m. before evening concerts and at noon before afternoon concerts.

Mr. Perry said that the sale of unreserved general admission tickets will take place at all gates two hours before concert time.

For the convenience of Tanglewood patrons, Mr. Perry reiterated the following points concerning parking procedures, opening hours, and facilities on the grounds:

All evening concerts at Tanglewood will begin at 8:00 p.m., all afternoon concerts at 2:30 p.m. and Saturday open rehearsals at 10 a.m.

There is no charge for parking at Tanglewood. The five large parking lots are policed throughout the concerts by experienced attendants with the aid of walkie-talkie radios. Patrons approaching from Lenox, Pitsfield and points north will enter the east and west lots at the main gate.

The Tanglewood grounds and the cafeteria will open at 6 p.m. on concert evenings and at noon on Sundays. Box lunches and beverages will be available as usual at the cafeteria.

After all concerts, while the heavy post-concert traffic abates, the Tanglewood grounds will remain open for those who wish to browse at the music store or gallery, or stroll about the formal gardens.

Patrons may arrive early to picnic at a spot of their choosing on the spacious Tanglewood grounds.

The Berkshire Festival will open Tuesday, June 30 at 8:00 p.m. in the theater with the first chamber music concert of the season. The New York Pro Musica will be heard at this concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert will take place in the music shed on Friday and Saturday evenings, July 3 and 4 at 8:00 p.m., and Sunday afternoon, July 5 at 2:30 under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, and will continue each weekend through Aug. 23.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, June 9, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, June 10, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Monday, June 15, 1964

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678

JUN 1 0 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

JUN 9 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
W. 15,500

JUN 2 0 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUN 1 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUN 1 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 1 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
JUN 1 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 100,582
JUN 1 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUN 1 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUN 1 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020
JUN 1 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256
JUN 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164
JUN 1 0 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
JUN 1 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
JUN 1 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 2 3 1964

Tanglewood Gets Sunday License

STOCKBRIDGE — The Selectmen Monday night approved a victualer's license and a Sunday entertainment license for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc., at Tanglewood.

A Sunday entertainment license was approved for the BSO for the Sunday of July 5, 12, 19 and 26 and August 2, 9, 16 and 23.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

VALATIE [illegible] NOTES
Friday, June 26, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen (e)
WINSTED, Conn.
Circ. 3,681
JUN 2 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
FRAMINGHAM, Mass.
Circ. 14,497
JUN 3 0 1964

MUSIC SHED AT TANGLEWOOD will be the scene of the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 p.m. (July 3-4) and Sunday afternoon (July 5) at 2:30. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the music of Mozart Friday and Saturday, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist both evenings, and music by Haydn Sunday afternoon, including the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with chorus and soloists. The Berkshire Festival will continue for eight weekends through Sunday, August 23.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK PARK EAST
Thursday, July 2, 1964

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will open its season this Friday night, July 3, with an all-Mozart program. Erich Leinsdorf will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Whitestone Photo

...WS BUREAU
...N.Y.
...DER
...NGS
...YORK

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

JUN 2 8 1964

SCENE AT TANGLEWOOD The music shed at Tanglewood will be the scene of the Berkshire Festival's first weekend of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday evenings and next Sunday afternoon. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
E 124,321

JUN 1 6 1964

TANGLEWOOD OPENING NEAR

Leinsdorf To Be Back To Leed 22nd Year

Lenox, Mass. — The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will hold its traditional opening exercises in the theater Sunday June 28 at 3:30 P. M. This will mark the beginning of the 22 session of the Center and the beginning of Erich Leinsdorf's second season as director.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, with Ralph Berkowitz at the piano, will perform Handel's Sonata No. 6 in E major for violin and piano.

The members of the Berkshire Music Center, conducted by Lorna Cooke de Varon, will join in the traditional performance of Randal Thompson's "Alleluia". This work now a standard part of the contemporary choral literature, was written for the opening session of the Music Center in 1940.

The opening exercises will conclude with Leinsdorf's address, after which tea will be served in the formal garden.

Aaron Copland will continue as chairman of the faculty, and Richard Burgin as associate chairman. Burgin is also head of the department of industrial music, with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Copland is head of the department of composition with Gunther Schuller as acting head.

In addition to daily schedules of classes and rehearsals, the Berkshire Music Center will present approximately 50 public programs during the summer.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

JUL 3 1964

Police to Move Tanglewood Traffic Faster

It may not take so long to get home after Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood this season.

A plan to move traffic faster along West Street in Lenox when the concert programs end was announced following a meeting of Selectmen, and officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Hills Conference.

They said state police cars with two-way radio sets will be stationed at the main Tanglewood gate and at the monument in the center of Lenox in an effort to keep traffic moving.

The new set-up also involves features which will give police better control if some emergency occurs on the usually traffic-choked road. A town fire truck and state trooper on a motorcycle will be stationed at or near the main gate so as to get quickly to any part of West Street if needed. Emergency calls to the Lenox Police Department will be relayed immediately to the state troops at the gate and the center, all traffic out of Tanglewood will be halted and traffic will be cleared out of West Street to give emergency vehicles tht right of way.

...CAPITAL ... BUREAU
...
...YORK
...VICE

Tanglewood Season Opens This Week

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens this week with concerts by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday and Sunday and a Chamber Music Concert tonight, Tuesday by the New York Pro Musica. The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music has begun its activities having held its traditional Opening Exercises Sunday afternoon.

Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his second season as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has planned all-Mozart programs for the Friday and Saturday evening concerts and an all-Haydn program for Sunday afternoon. Five of the eight Mozart works to be played will be heard for the first time at the Berkshire Festival. All three Haydn works will be new to the Festival, and the final work Sunday afternoon, Haydn's Cantata "Applausus", will be an American premiere. Soloists for the weekend will be Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Claudio Arrau, pianist; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni mezzo; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass-baritone. The Festival Chorus will perform in the Haydn Cantata. As in the past, this weekend's programs are planned for a chamber orchestra of approximately fifty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will take place in the 6000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood.

The first Berkshire Festival Chamber Music Concert will be given by the New York Pro Musica tonight, Tuesday evening at 8 p. m. in the 1200-seat Theatre. For the Pro Musica's fifth appearance at Tanglewood, Director Noah Greenberg has planned a program of Elizabethan music to honor the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare, whose plays contain many allusions to the music of his time.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Friday and Saturday at 8 p. m. and Sunday at 2:30. He will present music of Mozart Friday and Saturday evenings, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist at both concerts. Sunday afternoon he will conduct music by Haydn and end the program with the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" for orchestra, chorus and soloists.

PROMENADE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 140,300

JUL 1964

Music Shed at Tanglewood

Berkshire Music Festival

In its 22nd summer session

Visitors in New York—going to or from the Fair—have an abundant choice of fine music (see pp. 10, 11, 12) to hear in, near or a few hours' drive from the city. The classic, best-known, but probably farthest away—the Berkshire Music Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Massachusetts—has prepared an impressive program of important music to be given during July and until the 23rd of August. Evenings, concerts start at 8, afternoons at 2:30; open rehearsals are held Saturday mornings at 10.

In the lovely setting surrounding the Music Shed, Erich Leinsdorf, the Symphony's Music Director, is scheduled to conduct most of the July concerts, and some in August. Guest conductors Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Richard Burgin, Max Rudolf, Seiji Ozawa and Leopold Stokowski appear later.

Soloists of renown will be heard throughout the summer: violinist Joseph Silverstein (the 3rd) and Claudio Arrau, pianist (the 4th), will appear with the orchestra in recitals; the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society jointly present a Chamber Music Concert (the 14th); the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will play the 28th. In August (the 4th), Jorge Bolet gives a piano recital; soprano Phyllis Curtin, assisted by Paul Ulanowsky at the piano, sings in the final Chamber Music Concert (the 18th).

Compositions by Mozart, Haydn, Schubert, Strauss, Mahler and Beethoven, among many others, promise rare enjoyment for music lovers and the double pleasure of hearing them in this perfect setting.

Fort Worth Star-Telegram
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
D. 105,685 SUN. 212,592

JUL 5 1964

TANGLEWOOD: The 22nd session of the Berkshire Music Center, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lenox, Mass., is in progress until Aug. 23. There will be 24 festival concerts by the orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, playing 37 large works, and eight Tuesday night chamber music concerts. Guest conductors will include Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

In connection with the festival the Music Center is the scholastic department, offering instruction and lectures

18

Music

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE JULY 5, 1964

The New Spirit of Tanglewood

by Alan Rich

Take a map of western New England and draw an upside-down right-angled triangle. Put the lowest point at Lenox, Mass. Then trace a line 40 miles due north along U.S. 7 to Bennington, Vt. Make a 90-degree right turn along Vermont 9 and make your third point about 30 miles east at Marlboro. From there you'll need a helicopter to complete the triangle back to Lenox, and when you've finished you will have triangulated the three most fascinating, progressive and important points in summer music east of the Mississippi.

Each of the three points has its own raison d'etre and its own outlook. At Bennington the emphasis is inner-directed; there is a composers' conference for two weeks in August in which some of the country's most active and adventurous spirits come together to discuss their art and their craft, and there are musicians on hand to transform these ideas into sound. Eavesdroppers, formally unwelcome but informally ubiquitous, sense with no difficulty the intensity and seriousness of the occasion; shoptalk is everywhere and sparks fly. It's a unique project as far as this country is concerned, an American version of Darmstadt and immensely important.

Over at Marlboro the order of the day is the musical status quo, but in its noblest and purest state. What happens here is a little hard to define. It is a school where very little teaching takes place, a music festival where programming is strictly on a last-minute hit-or-miss basis, a colloquium where words are external and music is all.

Marlboro is the dream-come-true of Rudolf Serkin, a working farmer (among other things) in nearby Guildford, and is the glorification of the European ideal of chamber-music for the pleasure and uplift of its performers, and listeners be damned. Listeners are not completely damned at Marlboro, since there is a 500-seat concert hall where the best things that have happened informally during the week are repeated on weekends for an audience. But even at these concerts one feels himself almost an eavesdropper. The performances tend to be marvelous, but the spirit they exude is of music-making for its own joy. Perhaps the reason is that nobody at Marlboro is paid; the musicians, some of the finest in the country, are actually paying guests. They pay for the privilege of spending 24 hours each day playing chamber music together. Their sole recompense is the deed itself. They love it.

By comparison with these rural hideaways, Tanglewood is big time. Something about the physical layout inspires a kind of disbelief; you just can't imagine a spot that beautiful, that superbly landscaped, being the product of nature; you suspect that the lake, down there in the valley surrounded by rolling hills, must be a painted backdrop. You have to bend down to reassure yourself that those flawless lawns aren't made of plastic.

They aren't. There has been a lot of new thinking going on at Tanglewood these days, but the basics are still the work of nature at her most benign. Of all major music festivals that go on in this country in the summer, Tanglewood remains the most civilized, the most efficiently run, and the one best designed to please a large crowd without any noticeable amount of condescension. The atmosphere there lacks some of the intensity of Marlboro (or its western counterpart at Aspen, Colorado) and there is less immediate appeal to the intellect than at these two events or at Bennington, but Tanglewood still presents the casual observer with a marvelous impression of being close to music in its most appealing state. The look of the place has much to do with this, but the music itself helps a great deal.

The casual observer is missing a lot, however, these days. Behind the scenes at Tanglewood a subtle but important revolution has been taking place since Erich Leinsdorf assumed the conductorship of the Boston Symphony, and it threatens to create a major upheaval in the concept of the American summer musical event.

From its inception in the late 30s, the Berkshire Festival (to use its official name) has been more than merely a concert series. Sarge Koussevitzky's idea was to take his orchestra out to that idyllic spot, primarily as a teaching force, with a school of hand-picked young instrumentalists brought together from all over to learn their art from the members of the country's foremost ensemble. Over the years, except for the wartime interruption, the importance of Tanglewood's teaching function has grown, and handsome endowments from individuals and foundations have increased its student population enormously.

Nobody knew what would happen to this side of Tanglewood when Leinsdorf took over. His qualities as a conductor were known and respected, but his feelings about education were anyone's guess. There were many who had felt that the school's standards had begun to slide during Charles Munch's tenure, that it had become too big for anything to rub off on a student during the few weeks the school was in session. Few people had any real hopes that Leinsdorf would do anything much about improving matters, at least until he had firmly established himself with the orchestra (a difficult enough task in itself, for a Germanic conductor following after 40 years of Franco-Russian leadership).

Leinsdorf fooled them all. The first thing, or at least the most obvious thing, in his campaign to give Tanglewood a new look concerned the concert programming at the festival. This had come under a great deal of criticism as being nothing but a lot of reruns from the Boston Symphony's winter season, and most of it pretty unadventurous symphonic fare. By introducing Britten's War Requiem, by varying the traditional Bach-Mozart concerts early in the season with a number of unusual works by Haydn, and by instilling similar bursts of adventure throughout the season, Leinsdorf gave the festival's public image a far more interesting look last summer than it had had for years.

This summer's programming is similarly imaginative. Sure, there are a number of fairly ho-hum symphonic programs during the eight weekends, and large chunks of the programming have been heard at the orchestra's Boston and New York concerts during the past winter season. But that's not the whole story, by any means. Today the orchestra and a chorus will give the American premiere of a big Haydn cantata; later on there will be the east-coast premiere of Gian-Carlo Menotti's cantata The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi, and there are quite a number of unusual Richard Strauss works scheduled to mark that composer's centennial.

Even some of the ordinary-looking things on the orchestral programs will be new to Tanglewood, works like the Bartok Violin Concerto, the Verdi Requiem, Schubert's gorgeous E flat major Mass and Mahler's Fifth Symphony. That is simply because these are Leinsdorf repertory pieces, and they weren't Koussevitzky or Munch pieces.

Even more important to the future of music in the land, however, is the remarkable effect Leinsdorf's clear thinking has had on the nature of Tanglewood as an educative force. By a forceful pruning of curriculum, and by directing it clearly toward the real problems that face today's young musician, he has almost overnight turned the Berkshire Music Center into a major meeting ground for the musically superior, the people who can really benefit by what can be offered.

Everything that Leinsdorf has said or done concerning Tanglewood has revealed him as a man who cares deeply about musical values—and realities. Last year, for example, he instituted a symposium on string-playing at the center, out of concern for the current famine of string players in the country's orchestras and the disinclination of young musicians to pursue orchestral careers. This symposium will be held again this summer.

Something decidedly this year will be a three-day musciological symposium, aimed toward narrowing the gap between today's scholar and today's performing musician. It is time, thinks Leinsdorf, that performers be made aware of the enlightened research going on in performance practices. Correct performances of music of the distant and even the recent past are not a matter for the ivory tower; they work for the heightened excitement of the music itself.

Last Sunday Leinsdorf opened the Tanglewood season with a magnificent speech to the student body. In it he stressed time and again the need for brain-power among today's performers, the need for a musician to be a part of the mainstream of Western culture. He couldn't be righter. Our musical life has matured far too much for mere technical dazzlement to insure success, and it is high time somebody put the message across.

"We need a generation of musicians," he said in part, "whose total knowledge and total awareness is greater than heretofore. The problems to be mastered are more than those faced by the generation of your fathers. Simple proficiency could give, in the past, a pleasant life and satisfactory earnings to an instrumentalist. But that belongs, you may say unfortunately, to another era."

Good words, coming from the man who has inherited an orchestra that once stood (magnificently, to be sure) for pure virtuosity at some expense to musical values.

Today Tanglewood stands for something vital and creative, something that reflects strongly the values of music as part of an enlightened world. True, its impact has only eight weeks to make itself felt. But what constitutes that impact might well stand as a model for year-round musical education.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

JUL 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,680

JUL 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

JUL 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 3

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,680

JUL 7 1964

Tanglewood Asks Aid Of Parents, Camps

In order to provide the necessary concert decorum at the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center performances at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., this summer, the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is inviting the cooperation of parents and camp directors in preserving the quiet found in any concert hall. While the activities at Tanglewood are intended primarily for adult audiences, properly supervised children and young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stated in a letter to camp managements, "Being the father of five I know that vitality is what we look for in youngsters. We, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, want more than anything else to have the interest of the young. We welcome to Tanglewood children who are prepared to listen. Once this has been stated, it is necessary to remind their supervisors that everybody attending Tanglewood performances is entitled to listen undisturbed to the music."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, July 7, 1964

Tanglewood Etiquette

ERICH LEINSDORF
Please Mind Your . . .

THOMAS E. PERRY
Dress and Manners

Kids, Bach Don't Mix, Manager Says

Going to Tanglewood? Two suggestions if you do.

Leave your children, who love Granma more than they do Mozart or Erich Leinsdorf, at Grandma's house.

Attend the concert in "appropriate dress."

Not that the Tanglewood management doesn't love children. It's just that they don't want the true Mozart or Bach fan to be disturbed by a bawling infant or your 2-year-old chasing another 2-year-old.

"We are not a babysitter, nor a playground" explained Thomas D. Perry, Boston Symphony Orchestra manager said. "But properly supervised young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome."

Mr. Perry said disturbances have been getting worse in recent years, particularly at the Saturday morning rehearsals.

Mr. Leinsdorf, the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and himself a father of five says that "vitality and exuberance are exactly what we look for in our youngsters."

"We want more than anything else to have the enthusiasm, affection and interest of the young," Mr. Leinsdorf said—but "everybody attending Tanglewood performances is entitled to listen undisturbed to the music."

As for "appropriate concert dress," Mr. Perry said, "we will let the patrons decide for themselves what it should be according to their station in life.

"We hope the people will consider the high standards of the place they are coming to. We aren't laying down any rules. We would be pleased if all Tanglewood patrons would attend the concerts in appropriate concert dress."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435

JUL 5 1964

The first batch of Berkshire Festival (Tanglewood) brochures state that Pierre Monteux is scheduled to conduct on July 19 and Aug. 16. The 89-year-old conductor has been ordered by his doctors to cancel both engagements in order to prepare for his conducting classes in Hancock, Maine, and for his fall and winter engagements.

Eugene Ormandy will conduct the July 19th concert at Tanglewood, and the Aug. 16 program by the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa of Japan.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

[illegible] NOTES
[illegible] 3, 1964

Music

All-Mozart Program At Tanglewood

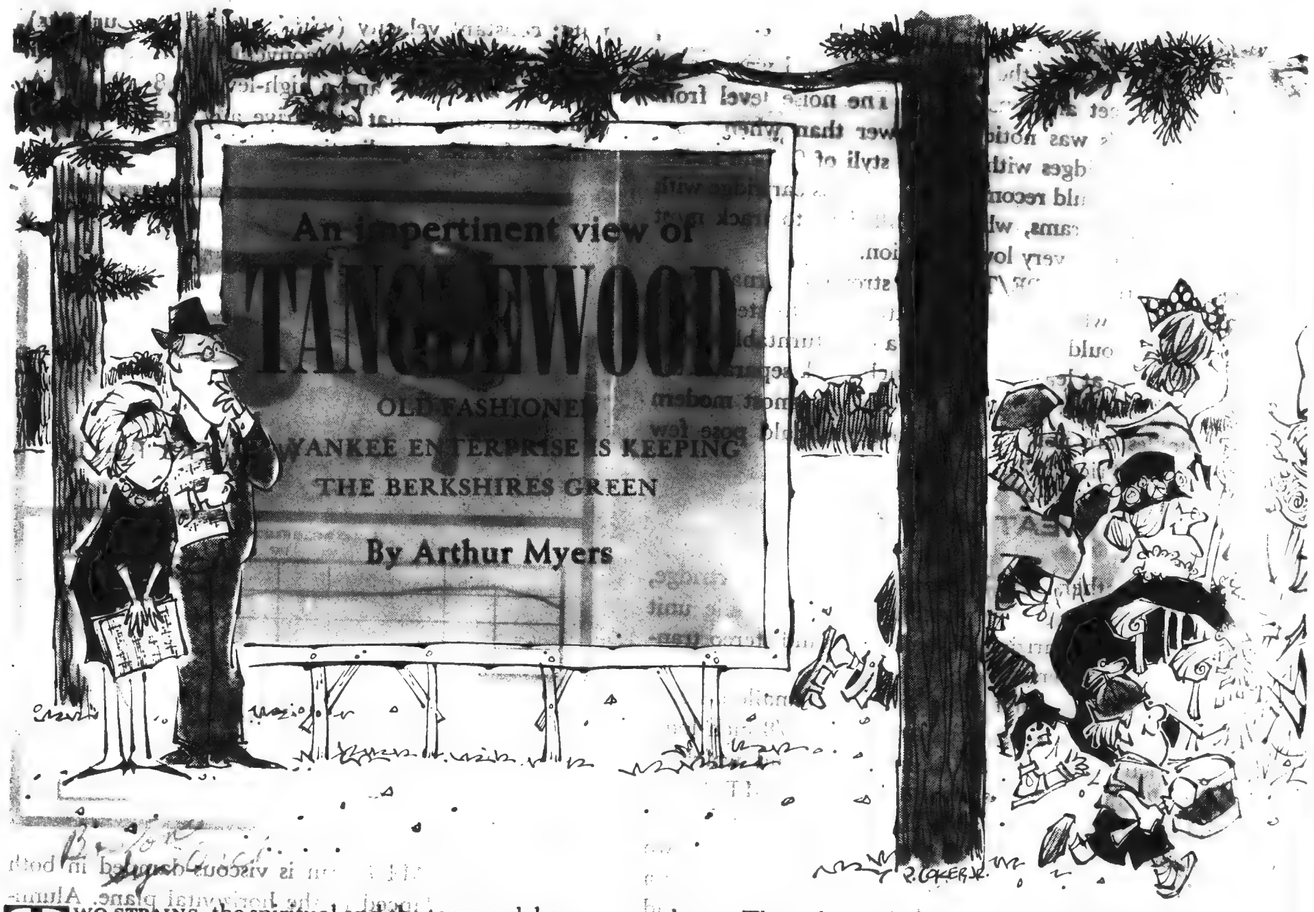
Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival, will continue his intention to emphasize certain areas of the repertory in the Orchestra's concerts next weekend. He will combine Music for Chamber Orchestra with Music for Festivals. The program Friday evening, July 10, will consist of music by Schubert. Saturday evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, will be soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413.

On Saturday, July 4, at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed in an all-Mozart program which will consist of the Divertimento in E major, K. 247; the Piano Concerto in D major, K. 451, with Claudio Arrau as soloist; and the Symphony in G minor, K. 500. Sunday, July 5 at 8:30 he will conduct an all-Haydn program: the Symphony No. 39, in G minor; the Aria of Beatrice from Haydn's setting of Cimarosa's "I due supposti Conti," with Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; and the American premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with Helen Boatwright, soprano; Miss Vanni; Charles Bressler, tenor; Donald Bell, bass; and the Festival Chorus.

20

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JUL 5 1964



TWO STRAINS, the spiritual and the temporal, have been conspicuous in the New England character from the very first. Certainly, few conditions of men have been able to turn a dollar as high-mindedly as the Yankee. Consider, for example, the taking in, in eight weeks, of $568,453 from orchestral concerts of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, et al. One needs the Yankee's peculiarly interwoven senses of culture and commerce to bring off such a marriage of the ethereal and the financial.

But the heavenly music of the cash register rises to a crescendo every summer in the Berkshire Hills at the western end of Massachusetts. Tanglewood, the biggest al fresco musicale in the world, is held in the village of Lenox, only eight miles from the New York State line. Move the festival to wicked New York and it would seem crass, mercenary, but in Massachusetts everybody feels uplifted.

This past summer the turnstiles clicked 235,000 times —a new record. The New York State Thruway and the relatively new Massachusetts Turnpike brought music listeners and nonlisteners pouring into the Berkshires in unprecedented numbers. And, as the state-erected road signs so fervently urge, they surely helped, in their way, to keep the Berkshires green.

Visitors are of two types. First, there are the musical aesthetes. Then there are the simple seekers after an evening's entertainment in the fresh country air. The music lover tends to look with restrained horror upon the banana-peeling, gum-chewing, humming, whistling, foot-tapping horde that spreads out over Tanglewood's lush lawns. How can one appreciate Schubert while swilling a can of beer and munching potato chips? But less lofty types see no contradiction in feeding the body and the soul simultaneously.

An evening concert at Tanglewood is a revelation, particularly if there is a bright moon. Here lies a young couple, she stroking his head in time to the overture to Carmen, never missing a beat. There sits an intellectual youth (you can tell by his beard) nibbling delicately at a bunch of grapes and reading Kirkegaard's Sickness unto Death by flashlight. The wail of a distant infant floats across the crabgrass and into the trees.

To avoid the chill of the ground, an elderly woman pulls up a cot on wheels. Blankets burgeon like puffballs, but in Massachusetts nobody gets under them. The Commonwealth mobilizes most of the state troopers west of Worcester to take care of this kind of traffic: on top of the blankets, okay, but stay out from under. A man with shorts and shaggy legs crunches by on the gravel, carrying a six-pack of Blatz. At intermission there's a rush for the comfort stations.

20

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

JUL 5 1964

TWO STRAINS, the spiritual and the temporal, have been conspicuous in the New England character from the very first. Certainly, few conditions of men have been able to turn a dollar as high-mindedly as the Yankee. Consider, for example, the taking in, in eight weeks, of $368,453 from orchestral concerts of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, et al. One needs the Yankee's peculiarly interwoven senses of culture and commerce to bring off such a marriage of the ethereal and the financial.

But the heavenly music of the cash register rises to a crescendo every summer in the Berkshire Hills at the western end of Massachusetts. Tanglewood, the biggest al fresco musicale in the world, is held in the village of Lenox, only eight miles from the New York State line. Move the festival to wicked New York and it would seem crass, mercenary, but in Massachusetts everybody feels uplifted.

This past summer the turnstiles clicked 235,000 times —a new record. The New York State Thruway and the relatively new Massachusetts Turnpike brought music listeners and nonlisteners pouring into the Berkshires in unprecedented numbers. And, as the state-erected road signs so fervently urge, they surely helped, in their way, to keep the Berkshires green.

Visitors are of two types. First, there are the musical aesthetes. Then there are the simple seekers after an evening's entertainment in the fresh country air. The music lover tends to look with restrained horror upon the banana-peeling, gum-chewing, humming, whistling, foot-tapping horde that spreads out over Tanglewood's lush lawns. How can one appreciate Schubert while swilling a can of beer and munching potato chips? But less lofty types see no contradiction in feeding the body and the soul simultaneously.

An evening concert at Tanglewood is a revelation, particularly if there is a bright moon. Here lies a young couple, she stroking his head in time to the overture to Carmen, never missing a beat. There sits an intellectual youth (you can tell by his beard) nibbling delicately at a bunch of grapes and reading Kirkegaard's Sickness unto Death by flashlight. The wail of a distant infant floats across the crabgrass and into the trees.

To avoid the chill of the ground, an elderly woman pulls up a cot on wheels. Blankets burgeon like puffballs, but in Massachusetts nobody gets under them. The Commonwealth mobilizes most of the state troopers west of Worcester to take care of this kind of traffic: on top of the blankets, okay, but stay out from under. A man with shorts and shaggy legs crunches by on the gravel, cradling a six-pack of Blatz. At intermission there's a rush for the comfort stations.

In spite of all, Tanglewood undeniably has style. On the walls of one of the men's rooms can be found the legend "Ernest Hemingway loves Harold Bell Wright." Even the lavatory authors are culture-oriented.

TANGLEWOOD has been owned and operated since the mid-Thirties by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first under the late Serge Koussevitzky, then under Charles Munch, and since last year under Erich Leinsdorf. The great of the musical world are brought in as guest soloists, and an adjunctive music school trains talented youngsters. The festival was started in 1934, when someone got the idea that it would be nice to listen to music out-of-doors. The Berkshires used to be loaded with Big Money, and even in the 1930's, with That Man in the White House, there was still plenty of medium-size money around. So some medium-size magnates first rented an estate and then imported a pickup team of musicians from the New York Philharmonic. Two years later the concerts were moved to another big house (this one once owned by George Westinghouse), where they were held for one year.

At this point, the Boston Symphony came into the picture, and some rich local residents deeded over the grounds known as Tanglewood. On this estate, almost one hundred years before, Nathaniel Hawthorne had lived for two glorious summers and one awful winter, and it was here that he conceived the children's stories that have since gladdened the hearts of generations of book-sellers—the Tanglewood Tales.

The first year at Tanglewood, a tent was erected, reputed to be the biggest in the world. Unfortunately, it rained that year, and everybody got their feet wet. And so in 1938, the present permanent concert shed was built, and the Berkshires wholeheartedly went into the culture business.

Now the bonanza has spread throughout Berkshire County. The motel business is booming. Restauranteurs barely manage to squeeze through the rest of the year, but those magical six weeks in summer make it all worth while. The golden tide even washes lightly over local industry. General Electric, in nearby Pittsfield, attracts some of its higher-bracket personnel with ads stressing the cultural activities of the area.

So let the dedicated music buffs complain about the ladies in shorts, the lovers on the lawn, the raffles, the hot dogs, and the box lunches. The Yankees of the Berkshire Hills know, in their hearts and in their pocketbooks, that there's absolutely nothing like Tanglewood. When you can gather in the high-brows, the middle-brows, and even a scattering of stray upper-low-brows at one fell swoop, you've got a soap that floats.

22 Pre-Season: Music Centre.

EVANSVILLE COURIER
EVANSVILLE, IND.
D. 62,271

MAR 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

FEB 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

FEB 27 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730

FEB 13 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 12,291

FEB 27 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206

FEB 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

FEB 14 1964

Summer Activities Of Berkshire Music Center Announced

Erich Leinsdorf announced today that the 22nd session of the Berkshire Music Center will be held from June 28 to Aug. 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox. Mr. Leinsdorf is director of the summer center for the advanced study of music and music director of the Boston Symphony.

In 1964 the work of the Music Center will be organized in four departments, instrumental music, vocal music, composition, and listening and analysis. Aaron Copland will continue as chairman of the faculty and Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, continues as associate chairman of the faculty.

Mr. Burgin is also head of the department of instrumental music with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Mr. Copland is also head of the department of composition with Gunther Schuller appointed acting head. Ralph Berkowitz has been appointed head of the department of vocal music with Lorna Cooke de Varon as Associate Head. Peter Gram swing continues as head of the department of listening and analysis. Louis Speyer, charter member of the faculty and English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 46 years, has been appointed music coordinator for the Music Center.

Instrumental Program

In the department of instrumental music, 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form the nucleus of the faculty with Seymour Lipkin, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunther Schuller. The program of this department, emphasizing instruction and performance in chamber music, will include a classical-sized orchestra (about 60 players), seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach headed by Paul Ulanowsky and Seymour Lipkin, and a program for keyboard players headed by Seymour Lipkin. The enrollment in this department will be reduced to about half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's desire to enroll only the most excellent young players who apply.

Richard Burgin will again be in charge of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, joined by Mr. Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, as guest conductors.

In the department of vocal music, Ralph Berkowitz will be joined by Phyllis Curtin, Paul Vlanowsky and Lawrence Smith in the solo singing division. Lorna Cooke de Varon of the New England Conservatory will be joined by Iva Dee Hiatt of Smith College, Alfred Nash Patterson of the Chorus pro Musica, Boston, and G. Wallace Woodworth of Harvard University in the choral division. The work of the department will consist of several seminars in vocal repertoire including operatic arias, vocal ensemble, the great lieder, the cantatas of Johann Sebastian Bach, Baroque, Romantic, and contemporary choral music, and motets and madrigals.

American Music

The activities of the composition department, in addition to its instruction on an advanced level for a limited number of especially talented young composers, will center around a Festival of Contemporary American Music from Aug. 9 to 13, sponsored in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, with concerts by the Fromm Fellows, the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet. The teachers in the department of composition, including Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Lukas Foss and Pierre Boulez, will hold several panel discussions with the young composers who have been commissioned to write works for this festival. The work of the department is also supplemented by the Fromm Foundation which provides fellowships for the Fromm Fellows, a specially selected group of instrumentalists who specialize in the performance of contemporary music.

The department of listening and analysis will expand its activities to include a seminar in contemporary music for music educators, under the direction of Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, made possible by a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education. Mr. Swing will be assisted in the work of the department by Carl Berky of Swarthmore College, Edwin London of Smith College, Florence Dunn, and Einar Hansen and Vladmir Resnikoff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This department is directed toward the understanding of music and the relation of analysis to performance. The course is designed for teachers, amateurs, music-lovers, and those interested in the teaching of music appreciation.

In the 1964 session, no courses in orchestral conducting or opera will be offered. Three gifted gifted young conductors will be invited to join Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Burgin as fellows in conducting and will have great opportunity to conduct and assist the master conductors who will be resident at Tanglewood during the summer.

The Berkshire Music Center was established at Tanglewood in 1940 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in fulfillment of the ambition of Serge Koussevitzky, the music director of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky served as director of the Berkshire Music Center from its founding until his death in the spring of 1951 when he was succeeded by Charles Munch. Erich Leinsdorf has been director since the 1963 session.

Herald Tribune (NEW YORK)
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

OCT 20 1963

Herald Tribune (NEW YORK)
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

OCT 25 1963

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1963

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 249,867 S. 347,167

DEC 8 1963

Young Composer Aid Approved

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago have announced a new Berkshire Music Center program designed to help young composers.

A number of young composers, at least three of whom license their music through BMI, have been commissioned to provide works for a short festival of new music at Tanglewood in August of next year. The composers will come to the center two weeks beforehand to work closely with performers, to attend the rehearsals, and to meet with their colleagues.

The program and festival are designed to help and encourage young composers who are past the student and fellowship stage but have not yet been accepted "into the mainstream of contemporary music." A related aim is to stimulate the development of a creative community at Tanglewood through close musical and intellectual contacts between composers and the performers.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964

The first of the sessions for educators intrigued by the demonstrations will be for young people just entering the field and will be a seminar to be led by Leo Kreter at the University of Wichita. The second, to be led by Powell, will be a nine-week course, starting on June 22, at Aspen, Colorado. The third, a four-week workshop, will be at the Berkshire Music Center, and will be directed by Schuller and Peter Gram Swing. It will begin on July 27.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

FEB 2 1964

BERGEN RECORD
HACKENSACK, N. J.

FEB 1 - 1964

W E D CLIPPING SERVICE
CALDWELL, N. J.
CApital 6-4044

In A New Mold

FEW COMPOSERS rate the honor of a public expression of regret from Leonard Bernstein because they were not represented in a concert sequence by the New York Philharmonic. Being bracketed with the German Karl Heinz Stockhausen in this respect is but one of the honors that has accrued to Gunther Schuller lately.

Another, more substantial one, was his designation as acting head of the Berkshire Music Center's department of composition for the summer of 1964 in the absence of Aaron Copland. This decision, at the instigation of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and thus nominal head of all activities at Tanglewood, foretells a new relationship between Schuller and himself, but hardly the first.

Indeed, one of which I have eye-witness knowledge dates to the late Forties when a record company to which I was serving as consultant organized a recording of Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. Leinsdorf was the consultant's choice for a conductor and did his work with customary thoroughness, even through the difficulties presented by the tricky French horn in solo in the last movement. The middle-aged section leader, who had reputation on his side if no longer the required lip, bogged down in mid-solo and Leinsdorf decided to split the solo with the eager, confident-looking youth on the other stand. When he did it to perfection, I asked Leinsdorf: "Who's he?" He replied: "A boy named Gunther Schuller."

Till that time, the only musician named Schuller I knew in New York was the coleader of the New York Philharmonic's second violin section, Arthur Schuller. As a perceptive father should, he guided his son toward a musical career (on the French horn) in which he would have fewer problems than as just another violinist.

The results brought a debut for Gunther at the age of 20 (in 1945) with the Cincinnati Symphony in a horn concerto of his own composition. The next year brought him to the Metropolitan Opera as a much valued member of its horn section until, a decade later, he had acquired such a varied schedule as a performer, composer, lecturer, teacher, and writer that nightly duties at the Metropolitan were no longer possible.

Along with his indoctrination in traditional music, Schuller has long been on the inner fringe of jazz, as may be judged from a recently reissued recording of Miles Davis ("Birth of the Cool" on Capitol) in which, as of March 1950, he participated on such sides as "Moon Dreams" and "Rocker" with John Lewis, Lee Konitz, Gerry Mulligan, Max Roach, and J. J. Johnson.

In the decade and a half since, Schuller has drawn the several strings of his bow into a new strong thread of musical interest, to which he has given the name of "Third Stream" music.

As such, he typifies a closer rapport of jazz and classical aptitudes than has, probably, cohered in any prior performer-composer - lecturer - teacher - writer. Its expression in the music he has written or directed (he has recently added conducting to his activities) marks him for special interest among musicians here and abroad who are younger than himself, and will doubtless be reflected in the class he attracts in his new assignment at Tanglewood.

— L. K.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

22 PRE-SEASON: MUSIC CENTRE.

THE EVANSVILLE COURIER
EVANSVILLE, IND.
D. 62,271
MAR 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
FEB 11 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
FEB 27 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730
FEB 13 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 12,291
FEB 27 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206
FEB 11 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
FEB 14 1964

Summer Activities Of Berkshire Music Center Announced

Erich Leinsdorf announced today that the 22nd session of the Berkshire Music Center will be held from June 28 to Aug. 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox. Mr. Leinsdorf is director of the summer center for the advanced study of music and music director of the Boston Symphony.

In 1964 the work of the Music Center will be organized in four departments, instrumental music, vocal music, composition, and listening and analysis. Aaron Copland will continue as chairman of the faculty and Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, continues as associate chairman of the faculty.

Mr. Burgin is also head of the department of instrumental music with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Mr. Copland is also head of the department of composition with Gunther Schuller appointed acting head. Ralph Berkowitz has been appointed head of the department of vocal music with Lorna Cooke de Varon as Associate Head. Peter Gram Swing continues as head of the department of listening and analysis. Louis Speyer, charter member of the faculty and English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 36 years, has been appointed music coordinator for the Music Center.

Instrumental Program

In the department of instrumental music, 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form the nucleus of the faculty with Seymour Lipkin, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunther Schuller. The program of this department, emphasizing instruction and performance in chamber music, will include a classical-sized orchestra (about 60 players), seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach headed by Paul Ulanowsky and Seymour Lipkin, and a program for keyboard players headed by Seymour Lipkin. The enrollment in this department will be reduced to about half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's desire to enroll only the most excellent young players who apply.

Richard Burgin will again be in charge of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, joined by Mr. Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, as guest conductors.

In the department of vocal music, Ralph Berkowitz will be joined by Phyllis Curtin, Paul Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith in the solo singing division. Lorna Cooke de Varon of the New England Conservatory will be joined by Iva Dee Hiatt of Smith College, Alfred Nash Patterson of the Chorus pro Musica, Boston, and G. Wallace Woodworth of Harvard University in the choral division. The work of the department will consist of several seminars in vocal repertoire including operatic arias, vocal ensemble, the great lieder, the cantatas of Johann Sebastian Bach, Baroque, Romantic, and contemporary choral music, and motets and madrigals.

American Music

The activities of the composition department, in addition to its instruction on an advanced level for a limited number of especially talented young composers, will center around a Festival of Contemporary American Music from Aug. 9 to 13, sponsored in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, with concerts by the Fromm Fellows, the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet. The teachers in the department of composition, including Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Lukas Foss and Pierre Boulez, will hold several panel discussions with the young composers who have been commissioned to write works for this festival. The work of the department is also supplemented by the Fromm Foundation which provides fellowships for the Fromm Fellows, a specially selected group of instrumentalists who specialize in the performance of contemporary music.

The department of listening and analysis will expand its activities to include a seminar in contemporary music for music educators, under the direction of Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, made possible by a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education. Mr. Swing will be assisted in the work of the department by Carl Berky of Swarthmore College, Edwin London of Smith College, Florence Dunn, and Elmar Hansen and Vladmir Reznikoff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This department is directed toward the understanding of music and the relation of analysis to performance. The course is designed for teachers, amateurs, music-lovers and those interested in the teaching of music appreciation.

In the 1964 session, no courses in orchestral conducting or opera will be offered. Three gifted gifted young conductors will be invited to join Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Burgin as fellows in conducting and will have great opportunity to conduct and assist the master conductors who will be resident at Tanglewood during the summer.

The Berkshire Music Center was established at Tanglewood in 1940 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in fulfillment of the ambition of Serge Koussevitzky, the music director of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky served as director of the Berkshire Music Center from its founding until his death in the spring of 1951 when he was succeeded by Charles Munch. Erich Leinsdorf has been director since the 1963 session.

Herald Tribune (NEW YORK)
D. 355,898 S. 451,270
OCT 20 1963

Herald Tribune (NEW YORK)
D. 355,898 S. 451,270
OCT 25 1963

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 1963

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 249,867 S. 347,167
DEC 8 1963

Young Composer Aid Approved

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago have announced a new Berkshire Music Center program designed to help young composers.

A number of young composers, at least three of whom license their music through BMI, have been commissioned to provide works for a short festival of new music at Tanglewood in August of next year. The composers will come to the center two weeks beforehand to work closely with performers, to attend the rehearsals, and to meet with their colleagues.

The program and festival are designed to help and encourage young composers who are past the student and fellowship stage but have not yet been accepted into the mainstream of contemporary music." A related aim is to stimulate the development of a creative community at Tanglewood through close musical and intellectual contacts between composers and the performers.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
FEB 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
FEB 2 1964

BERGEN RECORD
HACKENSACK, N. J.
FEB 1 - 1964
WEB CLIPPING SERVICE
CALDWELL, N. J.
CApital 6-4044

In A New Mold

FEW COMPOSERS rate the honor of a public expression of regret from Leonard Bernstein because they were not represented in a concert sequence by the New York Philharmonic. Being bracketed with the German Karl Heinz Stockhausen in this respect is but one of the honors that has accrued to Gunther Schuller lately.

Another, more substantial one, was his designation as acting head of the Berkshire Music Center's department of composition for the summer of 1964 in the absence of Aaron Copland. This decision, at the instigation of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and thus nominal head of all activities at Tanglewood, foretells a new relationship between Schuller and himself, but hardly the first.

Indeed, one of which I have eye-witness knowledge dates to the late Forties when a record company to which I was serving as consultant organized a recording of Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. Leinsdorf was the consultant's choice for a conductor and did his work with customary thoroughness, even through the difficulties presented by the tricky French horn solo in the last movement. The middle-aged section leader, who had reputation on his side if no longer the required lip, bogged down in mid-solo and Leinsdorf decided to split the solo with the eager, confident-looking youth on the other stand. When he did it to perfection, I asked Leinsdorf: "Who's he?" He replied: "A boy named Gunther Schuller."

Till that time, the only musician named Schuller I knew in New York was the coleader of the New York Philharmonic's second violin section, Arthur Schuller. As a perceptive father should, he guided his son toward a musical career (on the French horn) in which he would have fewer problems than as just another violinist.

The results brought a debut for Gunther at the age of 20 (in 1945) with the Cincinnati Symphony in a horn concerto of his own composition. The next year brought him to the Metropolitan Opera as a much valued member of its horn section until, a decade later, he had acquired such a varied schedule as a performer, composer, lecturer, teacher, and writer that nightly duties at the Metropolitan were no longer possible.

Along with his indoctrination in traditional music, Schuller has long been on the inner fringe of jazz, as may be judged from a recently reissued recording of Miles Davis ("Birth of the Cool" on Capitol) in which, as of March 1950, he participated on such sides as "Moon Dreams" and "Rocker" with John Lewis, Lee Konitz, Gerry Mulligan, Max Roach, and J. J. Johnson.

In the decade and a half since, Schuller has drawn the several strings of his bow into a new strong thread of musical interest, to which he has given the name of "Third Stream" music.

As such, he typifies a closer rapport of jazz and classical aptitudes than has, probably, cohered in any prior performer-composer - lecturer - teacher - writer. Its expression in the music he has written or directed (he has recently added conducting to his activities) marks him for special interest among musicians here and abroad who are younger than himself, and will doubtless be reflected in the class he attracts in his new assignment at Tanglewood.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

The first of the sessions for educators intrigued by the demonstrations will be for young people just entering the field and will be a seminar to be led by Leo Kreter at the University of Wichita. The second, to be led by Powell, will be a nine-week course, starting on June 22, at Aspen, Colorado. The third, a four-week workshop, will be at the Berkshire Music Center, and will be directed by Schuller and Peter Gram Swing. It will begin on July 27.

e Boston Herald Traveler
s. 100,555

1964

Henry Butler

Berkshire Center Invites Talented

Conductor Leinsdorf Invites Accomplished Musicians To Explore New Fields

The Times

Entertainment Page

A RELEASE from the Boston Symphony's publicity director concerning the orchestra's coming summer concert and school activities at Tanglewood, Mass.

Since 1940, as you may know, the orchestra has sponsored the Berkshire Music Center for advanced students in addition to its Berkshire Music Festival.

IN THAT BEAUTIFUL Tanglewood setting near Lenox, marred only by the intrusion and congestion of numberless automobiles, the center and the festival will operate from June 28 to Aug. 23.

Heading both ventures will be conductor Erich Leinsdorf, who would seem to be as busy as two U. S. Presidents.

As I've noted here before, Leinsdorf is an eminently quotable man. Speaking of the summer center, he says: "To make the best use of eight weeks, we know that actual teaching cannot be expected. For that, there are a number of first-rate music schools and university music departments in the United States.

"But in eight weeks many new doors can be opened for the curious. There are vast fields to be explored for which the normal winter curriculum leaves no time. The Berkshire Music Center opens up the approaches to these areas which will be worth knowing throughout a career as musician and music lover."

APROPOS HIS REFERENCE to university music departments, it's well to note that auditions for the Berkshire Center will be held at Indiana University School of Music, Bloomington, March 6, from 2 to 4 p. m.

Lest the eager but half-trained student get too high hopes, Leinsdorf says: "Our standards of admission will be stricter. Thus the accomplished string or wind player will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups."

He adds: "Our conducting enrollment will be by invitation only. The vocal department has been enlarged and a special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. . . .

"The highly cultured, well-rounded musician who can master two centuries of accumulated repertoire and the composer who will be an independent creative force in our modern world are most needed today. To help the talented young toward this achievement is the program of the Berkshire Music Center."

Besides the performing and composing courses, the center will offer in its Listening and Analysis department a seminar in contemporary music for music educators, directed by Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller.

THE RELEASE SAYS, "The course is designed for teachers, amateurs, music lovers and those interested in the teaching of music appreciation."

I gather you don't have to audition for that course. It's probably well to write the center for further details.

The address is: Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

The release says definitely if you're planning to audition, you must write the center for an appointment.

Other regional auditions will be March 5, 2-4 p. m., at Baldwin Piano Co., 415 Race, Cincinnati, and March 7, 2-4 p. m., at Baldwin Piano Co. 324 S. Wabash, Chicago.

This close connection between one of the nation's top symphonies and musical higher education exemplifies an admirable trend.

Herald Tribune
D. 351,270

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

FEB 1 1 1964

Center Standards More Stringent

Erich Leinsdorf announced yesterday that standards of admission to the Berkshire Music Center will be stricter this year. Enrollment in the Department of Instrumental Music will be cut about in half. Auditions at Symphony Hall are March 19.

At a press conference in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony's music director said "thus the accomplished string or wind player will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups.

Three young conductors will be invited as Fellows in Conducting this summer. The vocal department will be enlarged and will have special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. There will be no courses in orchestra conducting or opera.

"The highly cultured, well-rounded musician who can master two centuries of accumulated repertoire and the composer who will be an independent creative force in our modern world are most needed today.

"To help the talented young toward this achievement is the program of the Berkshire Music Center," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 839,581 S. 1,143,546

MAR 2 2 1964

The Berkshire Music center, teaching wing of the Tanglewood festival, will enlarge its vocal department and widen its listening and analysis program this summer, but offer no courses in opera or conducting. Aaron Copland continues as chairman of faculty and head of the composition department, altho Gunther Schuller is designated "acting head." Richard Burgin will be in charge of the student orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf listed as guest conductors. There will be a special Bach seminar under Paul Ulanowsky and Seymour Lipkin. Lukas Foss and Pierre Boulez are to take part in panel discussions.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 36,240

FEB 1 1 1964

Tanglewood Picks Faculty, Limits Pupils

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., June 28 to Aug. 23 will be organized in four departments, Erich Leinsdorf, director, announced today.

Aaron Copland will be chairman and Richard Burgin associate chairman of the faculty. Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, will be head of the department of music with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Copland will head the department of composition with Gunther Schuller as acting head. Ralph Berkowitz will head the department of vocal music with Lorna Cooke de Varon as associate head. Peter Gram Swing will head the department of listening and analysis. Louis Speyer, English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony for 46 years, will be the center's music coordinator.

The center sessions will run concurently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Enrollment in the instrumental music department will be reduced to about half the size of previous summers' because of Leinsdorf's desire to enroll only the best young players who apply.

Activities of the composition department will center around the festival of contemporary American music Aug. 9-13.

The department of listening and analysis will expand its activities to include a seminar in contemporary music for music educators.

No courses in orchestral conducting or opera will be offered this summer.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,270

FEB 1 6 1964

Music

Move Tanglewood Screening?

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Most of the music by Tanglewood composers performed at the Berkshire Music Center's "Gala Evening" last summer was appallingly dull or daring.

Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf had previously indicated that the standard was to be raised through a screening process.

Leinsdorf announces that Aaron Copland will again head the composition department of the center this summer. The center will operate from June 28 through August 23.

Copland will be in residence only two weeks, beginning Aug. 3. In his absence Gunther Schuller will take over. Other members of the faculty will be Pierre Boulez, French composer; Lukas Foss, now conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic. Paul Jacobs will continue as a teacher of contemporary keyboard performance techniques.

The music of 10 young American composers will be performed during this summer's festival of contemporary American music at the center. Works by seven resident composers were played at last summer's "Gala." None of them is represented on the forthcoming schedule.

Hopefully, next summer's screen will have a finer mesh.

2x

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

FEB 10 1964

Three New Faculty Members Appointed For Berkshire Music Center's Session

Some new faces will be present among faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which will hold its 22nd session from June 28 to Aug. 23, according to an announcement in Boston today by Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony and director of the summer center for the advanced study of music.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin will teach in the solo singing division of the department of vocal music. Pierre Boulez will be one of the teachers in the department of composition, and Paul Ulanowsky, returning to BMC, will take part in a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Mr. Leinsorf also announced that in the 1964 session there will be no courses in orchestral conducting or opera. Three young conductors will be invited to join Mr. Leinsdorf and Richard Burgin as fellows in conducting and will have an opportunity to conduct and assist the master conductors who will be resident at Tanglewood during the summer.

Four Departments

In 1964 the work of the Music Center will be organized in four departments, instrumental music, vocal music, composition, and listening and analysis. Aaron Copland continues to be chairman of the faculty, and Mr. Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, continues as associate chairman of the faculty.

Mr. Burgin is also head of the department of instrumental music, with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Mr. Copland is also head of the department of composition, with Gunther Schuller appointed as acting head. Ralph Berkowitz has been appointed head of the department of vocal music, with Lorna Cooke de Varon as associate head. Peter Gram Swing continues as head of the department of listening and analysis. Louis Speyer, charter member of the faculty and English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 46 years, has been appointed music coordinator for the Music Center.

In the department of instrumental music, 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form the nucleus of the faculty with Seymour Lipkin, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunther Schuller. The porgram of this department, emphasizing instruction and performance in chamber music, will include a classical - sized orchestra (about 60 players), seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach headed by Mr. Ulanowsky and Seymour Lipkin. The enrollment in this department will be reduced to about half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's strong desire to enroll only the most excellent young players who apply.

Richard Burgin will again be in charge of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, joined by Mr. Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, as guest conductors.

In the department of vocal music, Ralph Berkowitz will be joined by Miss Curtin, Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith in the solo - singing division. Lorna Cooke de Varon of the New England Conservatory will be joined by Iva Dee Hiatt of Smith College, Alfred Nash Patterson of the Chorus pro Musica (Boston) and G. Wallace Woodworth of Harvard University in the choral division. The work of the department will consist of several seminars in vocal repertoire, including operatic arias, vocal ensemble, the great lieder, the cantatas of Johann Sebastian Bach, Baroque, Romantic, and contemporary choral music and motets and madrigals.

Contemporary Music

The activities of the composition department, in addition to its instruction on an advanced level for a limited number of especially talented young composers, will center around the Festival of Contemporary American Music, which will be held from Aug. 9 to Aub. 13, sponsord in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, with concerts by the Fromm Fellows, the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet. The teachers in the department of composition, including Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Lukas Foss and Mr. Boulez, will hold several panel discussions wtih the young composers who have been commissioned to write works for this festival. The work of the department is also supplemented by the Fromm Fellows, a specially selected group of instrumentalists who specialize in the performance of contemporary music.

Leinsdorf Comments

The department of listening and analysis will expand its activities to include a seminar in contemporary music for music educators, under the direction of Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, made possible by a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education. Mr. Swing will be assisted in the work of the department by Carl Berky of Swarthmore College, Edwin London of Smith College, Florence Dunn, and Einar Hansen and Vladimir Resnikoff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This department is directed toward the understanding of music and the relation of analysis to performance. The course is designed for teachers, amateurs, music lovers, and those interested in the teachin; of music appreciation.

In establishing the program of studies for this year's Berkshire Music Center; Mr. Leinsdorf said:

"To make the best use of eigh weeks, we know that actua teaching cannot be expecte For that, there are a number o first-rate music schools and uni versity music departments i the United States. But in eigh weeks many new doors can b opened for the curious. Ther are vast fields to be explore for which the normal winte curriculum leaves no time. The Berkshire Music Center opens up the approaches to these areas which will be worth knowing throughout a career as musican and music lover.

"Our contemporary music program — from the very beginning of Tanglewood history a focus of attention and interest— will be as wide and inclusive as possible. It is my belief that the composer who embarks on his lonely and hazardous quest of creating meaningful musical expression ought to have a full experience with as many branches as the contemporary tree of composition produces. Only then can he find himself and his own personal style. The chance of decision, instead of a thoughtless running with the crowd, will strengthen his conviction.

"Our standards of admission will be stricter. Thus the accomplished string or wind player will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups. Our conducting enrollment will be by invitation only. The vocal department has been enlarged and a special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. The listening and analysis department for teachers, lecturers and amateurs has been widened in scope and strengthened.

"The highly cultured, well-rounded musician who can master two centuries of accumulated repertoire and the composer who will be an independent creative force in our modern world are most needed today. To help the talented young toward this achievement is the program of the Berkshire Music Center.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 336,484 S. 370,535

FEB 2 1964

American Music In Spotlight At Tanglewood

(By The Star's Own Service)

Boston — Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music center and the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced plans for the center's department of composition in the 1964 session, June 28 to August 23.

Aaron Copland will continue as head of the department, a post he has held since its inception in 1940. Gunther Schuller has been appointed to act as department head during Copland's absence. Part of the session Pierre Boulez, French composer, and Lukas Foss, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic, will join the other members of the composition faculty.

The four composers will conduct seminars and give individual instruction during the 3-week session, which is concurrent with the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

They also will participate in the festival of contemporary American music scheduled for August 9 through 13, sponsored by the center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The ten young composers whose works will be played during the festival will be at Tanglewood July 27 through August 13.

These composers are Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Calif., and Mario Davidovsky; Harvey Sollberger; David del Tredici; Charles Wuorinen, and William Sydeman of New York.

As an adjunct to the programs of the composition department and the department of listening and analysis, the center is sponsoring a 4-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators, July 27 through August 23. The center has received an $8,000 grant from the M. E. N. C. contemporary music project for creativity in music education for the program.

Schuller, Edwin London and Peter Gram Swing will be in charge of the program, which is expected to attract about 30 music teachers.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, January 19, 1964

Copland Continues In Tanglewood Post

BOSTON (UPI)— Aaron Copland will continue as head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the 1964 season, director Erich Leinsdorf has announced.

Copland also will remain as chairman of the center faculty although he actually will not be in residence at Lenox except from Aug. 3-16.

In Copland's absence, composer Gunther Schuller of New York City will be acting department head.

The composition department faculty also will include Pierre Boulez of France and composer-pianist Lukas Foss, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Monday, January 20, 1964

FOSS WILL JOIN SUMMER FACULTY AT TANGLEWOOD

Buffalo Philharmonic Conductor Lukas Foss is announced by the Berkshire Festival as one of four composers to guide the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center next summer in Tanglewood, Mass.

Mr. Foss will be in residence there during the first three weeks in August. Aaron Copland, department head, will be present Aug. 3-16, and composer Gunther Schuller will be acting head for the rest of the session. French composer Pierre Boulez completes the roster.

Mr. Foss and his colleagues will take part in the Festival of Contemporary American Music, Aug. 9-13, one of several projects running concurrently with the summer session by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
MAY 5 1964

Miss Dunn on Staff Of Tanglewood Seminar

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Erich Leinsdorf, director, will sponsor a four-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators from July 27-Aug. 23. The program is designed primarily for selected secondary-school teachers who direct instrumental or choral groups in their schools, and for music educators at the college level. Scholarships for the seminar are available to qualified applicants

Mr. Leinsdorf has announced the following staff for the Seminar in Contemporary Music: Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, chairmen; Edwin London, instructor in composition; Carl Berky, instructor; and Florence Dunn, formerly of Williamstown, administrative assistant. In addition the following faculty from the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be participating teachers: Mr. Schuller, composition, Lorna Cooke de Varon and Alfred Nash Patterson, choral music; William Gibson, Eugen Lehner, Sherman Walt and George Zazofsky, chamber music.

The schedule of activities will include lectures, class discussions, observation of rehearsals, composition classes and performance workshops. All will be two-hour sessions, with two sessions each day, Monday through Friday. Evenings will be free for attending concerts.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964

****

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER APPOINTMENTS

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced plans for the Music Center's Department of Composition in the 1964 session (June 28-August 23).

Aaron Copland will continue as department head and chairman of the faculty, but will be in residence only from August 3 through 16. GUNTHER SCHULLER has been appointed acting department head in Mr. Copland's absence.

Other members of the Center's Department of Composition will be PIERRE BOULEZ, the prominent French composer, and Lukas Foss, musical director of the Buffalo Philharmonic.

In addition to the composers who will be on the faculty and several other eminent composers who will be invited to participate in discussions, young American composers whose works are to be performed during the Festival of Contemporary Music will be in residence at the Center from July 27 through August 13.

In this number are CHARLES WUORINEN, DONALD MARTINO, and MARIO DAVIDOVSKY.

2x

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

FEB 10 1964

Three New Faculty Members Appointed For Berkshire Music Center's Session

Some new faces will be present among faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which will hold its 22nd session from June 28 to Aug. 23, according to an announcement in Boston today by Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony and director of the summer center for the advanced study of music.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin will teach in the solo singing division of the department of vocal music. Pierre Boulez will be one of the teachers in the department of composition, and Paul Ulanowsky, returning to BMC, will take part in a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Mr. Leinsorf also announced that in the 1964 session there will be no courses in orchestral conducting or opera. Three young conductors will be invited to join Mr. Leinsdorf and Richard Burgin as fellows in conducting and will have an opportunity to conduct and assist the master conductors who will be resident at Tanglewood during the summer.

Four Departments

In 1964 the work of the Music Center will be organized in four departments, instrumental music, vocal music, composition, and listening and analysis. Aaron Copland continues to be chairman of the faculty, and Mr. Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, continues as associate chairman of the faculty.

Mr. Burgin is also head of the department of instrumental music, with William Kroll and Joseph Silverstein as associate heads. Mr. Copland is also head of the department of composition, with Gunther Schuller appointed as acting head. Ralph Berkowitz has been appointed head of the department of vocal music, with Lorna Cooke de Varon as associate head. Peter Gram Swing continues as head of the department of listening and analysis. Louis Speyer, charter member of the faculty and English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 46 years, has been appointed music coordinator for the Music Center.

In the department of instrumental music, 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form the nucleus of the faculty with Seymour Lipkin, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunther Schuller. The porgram of this department, emphasizing instruction and performance in chamber music, will include a classical - sized orchestra (about 60 players), seminars in instrumental technique, a special study of the works of Johann Sebastian Bach headed by Mr. Ulanowsky and Seymour Lipkin. The enrollment in this department will be reduced to about half the size of previous summers because of Mr. Leinsdorf's strong desire to enroll only the most excellent young players who apply.

Richard Burgin will again be in charge of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, joined by Mr. Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, as guest conductors.

In the department of vocal music, Ralph Berkowitz will be joined by Miss Curtin, Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith in the solo - singing division. Lorna Cooke de Varon of the New England Conservatory will be joined by Iva Dee Hiatt of Smith College, Alfred Nash Patterson of the Chorus pro Musica (Bo[illegible] and G. Wallace [illegible] of Harvard University in the choral division. The work of the department will consist of several seminars in vocal repertoire, including operatic arias, vocal ensemble, the great lieder, the cantatas of Johann Sebastian Bach, Baroque, Romantic, and contemporary choral music and motets and madrigals.

Contemporary Music

The activities of the composition department, in addition to its instruction on an advanced level for a limited number of especially talented young composers, will center around the Festival of Contemporary American Music, which will be held from Aug. 9 to Aub. 13, sponsord in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, with concerts by the Fromm Fellows, the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet. The teachers in the department of composition, including Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Lukas Foss and Mr. Boulez, will hold several panel discussions wtih the young composers who have been commissioned to write works for this festival. The work of the department is also supplemented by the Fromm Fellows, a specially selected group of instrumentalists who specialize in the performance of contemporary music.

Leinsdorf Comments

The department of listening and analysis will expand its activities to include a seminar in contemporary music for music educators, under the direction of Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, made possible by a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education. Mr. Swing will be assisted in the work of the department by Carl Berky of Swarthmore College, Edwin London of Smith College, Florence Dunn, and Einar Hansen and Vladimir Resnikoff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This department is directed toward the understanding of music and the relation of analysis to performance. The course is designed for teachers, amateurs, music lovers, and those interested in the teaching of music appreciation.

In establishing the progra[m] of studies for this year's Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Leinsdorf said:

"To make the best use of eig[ht] weeks, we know that actu[al] teaching cannot be expect[ed]. For that, there are a number of first-rate music schools and university music departments in the United States. But in eight weeks many new doors can be opened for the curious. There are vast fields to be explored for which the normal winter curriculum leaves no time. The Berkshire Music Center opens up the approaches to these areas which will be worth knowing throughout a career as musician and music lover.

"Our contemporary music program — from the very beginning of Tanglewood history — focus of attention and interest will be as wide and inclusive as possible. It is my belief that the composer who embarks on his lonely and hazardous quest of creating meaningful musical expression ought to have a full experience with as many branches as the contemporary tree of composition produces. Only then can he find himself and his own personal style. The chance of decision, instead of a thoughtless running with the crowd, will strengthen his conviction.

"Our standards of admission will be stricter. Thus the accom[plished] young composer will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups. Our conducting enrollment will be by invitation only. The vocal department has been enlarged and a special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. The listening and analysis department for teachers, lecturers and amateurs has been widened in scope and strengthened.

"The highly cultured, well-rounded musician who can master two centuries of accumulated repertoire and the composer who will be an independent creative force in our modern world are most needed today. To help the talented young toward this achievement is the program of the Berkshire Music Center."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Monday, January 20, 1964

FOSS WILL JOIN SUMMER FACULTY AT TANGLEWOOD

Buffalo Philharmonic Conductor Lukas Foss is announced by the Berkshire Festival as one of four composers to guide the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center next summer in Tanglewood, Mass.

Mr. Foss will be in residence there during the first three weeks in August. Aaron Copland, department head, will be present Aug. 3-16, and composer Gunther Schuller will be acting head for the rest of the session. French composer Pierre Boulez completes the roster.

Mr. Foss and his colleagues will take part in the Festival of Contemporary American Music, Aug. 9-13, one of several projects running concurrently with the summer session by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER APPOINTMENTS

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced plans for the Music Center's Department of Composition in the 1964 session (June 28-August 23).

Aaron Copland will continue as department head and chairman of the faculty, but will be in residence only from August 3 through 16. GUNTHER SCHULLER has been appointed acting department head in Mr. Copland's absence.

Other members of the Center's Department of Composition will be PIERRE BOULEZ, the prominent French composer, and Lukas Foss, musical director of the Buffalo Philharmonic.

In addition to the composers who will be on the faculty and several other eminent composers who will be invited to participate in discussions, young American composers whose works are to be performed during the Festival of Contemporary Music will be in residence at the Center from July 27 through August 13.

In this number are CHARLES WUORINEN, DONALD MARTINO, and MARIO DAVIDOVSKY.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 336,484 S. 370,535

FEB 2 1964

American Music In Spotlight At Tanglewood

(Kansas City Star Music Service)

Boston — Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music center and the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced plans for the center's department of composition in the 1964 session, June 28 to August 23.

Aaron Copland will continue as head of the department, a post he has held since its inception when Gunther Schuller is expected to act during the session of the center. French composer Pierre Boulez, and Lukas Foss, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic, will be the other members of the composition faculty.

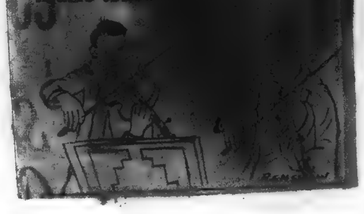
The four composers will conduct seminars and give instruction during the session, which is concurrent with the Boston Symphony, Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

They also will participate in the festival of contemporary American music scheduled for Aug. 9 through 13, sponsored by the center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The ten young composers whose works will be played during the festival will be at Tanglewood July 27 through August 13.

These composers are Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Calif., and Mario Davidovsky; Harvey [illegible]; David [illegible] Tredici; Charles Wuorinen and William Sydeman of New York.

As an adjunct to the programs of the composition department and the department of listening and analysis, the center is sponsoring a two-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators, July 27 through August 23. The center has received an $8,000 grant from the M. E. N. C. contemporary music project for creativity in music education for the program.

Schuller, Edwin London and Peter Gram Swing will be in charge of the program, which is expected to attract about 30 music teach[illegible]



CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, January 19, 1964

Copland Continues In Tanglewood Post

BOSTON (UPI)— Aaron Copland will continue as head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the 1964 season, director Erich Leinsdorf has announced.

Copland also will remain as chairman of the center faculty although he actually will not be in residence at Lenox except from Aug. 3-16.

In Copland's absence, composer Gunther Schuller of New York City will be acting department head.

The composition department faculty also will include Pierre Boulez of France and composer-pianist Lukas Foss, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
MAY 5 1964

Miss Dunn on Staff Of Tanglewood Seminar

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Erich Leinsdorf, director, will sponsor a four-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators from July 27-Aug. 23. The program is designed primarily for selected secondary-school teachers who direct instrumental or choral groups in their schools, and for music educators at the college level. Scholarships for the seminar are available to qualified applicants.

Mr. Leinsdorf has announced the following staff for the Seminar in Contemporary Music: Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, chairmen; Edwin London, instructor in composition; Carl Berky, instructor; and Florence Dunn, formerly of Williamstown, administrative assistant. In addition the following faculty from the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be participating teachers: Mr. Schuller, composition, Lorna Cooke de Varon and Alfred Nash Patterson, choral music; William Gibson, Eugen Lehner, Sherman Walt and George Zazofsky, chamber music.

The schedule of activities will include lectures, class discussions, observation of rehearsals, composition classes and performance workshops. All will be two-hour sessions, with two sessions each day, Monday through Friday. Evenings will be free for attending concerts.

NEW YORK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

MAR 1964

Acting head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center this summer will be Gunther Schuller, this during the absence of the regular head, Aaron Copland. The latter will be in residence from August 3 through 16.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BAY SHORE SENTINEL

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Thursday, May 7, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY RECORD
Monday, May 11, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
PER INGS
YORK
SERVICE

COPD
1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

MAY 9 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200

QUINCY, MASS.
Patriot-Ledger
Eve. Circ. 43,932

MAY 5 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075

MAY 9 1964

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435

MAY 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256

MAY 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

MAY 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

MAY 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483

MAY 11 1964

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

MAY 5 1964

Berger Accepts Composer's Post At Tanglewood

Arthur Berger, composer and critic and recently appointed Walter Naumberg professor of music at Brandeis University, has accepted the invitation of Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, to be composer in residence at the Music Center for the 1964 season. With this appointment he will take the place of Pierre Boulez, who has been forced to cancel his scheduled visit to the United States this summer in order to recuperate from illness..

As composer in residence Mr. Berger will work with Aaron Copland, head of the Composition Department, in residence only Aug. 3-16, Gunther Schuller, acting head in Mr. Copland's absence, and Lukas Foss, in residence only Aug. 1-23, in conducting seminars and giving individual instruction to the young composers who enroll in the Music Center's eight-week summer session concurrent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Mr. Berger studied theory and composition with Nadia Boulanger, Vincent Jones Darius Milhaud and Walter Piston. He received an M. A. from Harvard in 1936. He has taught theory, composition and other musical subjects at Mills College, North Texas State College, Brooklyn College, and the Juilliard School of Music. His critical activities have included editorship of Listen Magazine and the Musical Mercury, reviewer for the Boston Transcript, New York Sun, New York Herald Tribune and the Saturday Review. More recently, he was the co-founder of Perspectives of New Music, the Fromm Foundation semi-annual magazine published by the Princeton Press, and is currently a member of its board.

His works for orchestra include Ideas of Order, Three Pieces for String Orchestra, and a Serenade Concertante; his chamber music includes a string quartet, which will be performed by the Lenox Quartet at Tanglewood this summer, a woodwind quartet and many other works.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Public Spirit
AYER, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,015

MAY 7 1964

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

FEB 1964

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONNTHLY 22,500

FEB 1964

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,700

FEB 1964

Rocky Mountain News
DENVER, COLO.
D. 189,829 S. 187,194

JAN 4 1964

SCHOOL MANAGEMENT
GREENWICH, CONN.
MONTHLY 51,400

FEB 1964

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1964

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

MAR 1964

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
6 TI. a YR. 41,600

JAN 1964

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5,500

FEB 1964

MENC Offers Two Grants for Contemporary Music Seminars

The MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education announces two grants for seminars in contemporary music for the summer of 1964. Recipients are the Aspen Music School, Aspen, Colorado, and the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass. According to Bernard Fitzgerald, director of the project, the grants were approved as part of the six-year project which began in July, 1963, under a grant of $1,380,000 to the Music Educators National Conference from the Ford Foundation.

Aspen Music School will receive a grant of $8,000 in support of a nine-week course in contemporary music for music educators, from June 22 to August 23, 1964. The course will be directed by Mel Powell, distinguished composer and member of the faculty of the School of Music, Yale University, and will emphasize the techniques, analysis, and performance of contemporary music through lectures, laboratory rehearsals, performance and listening experiences.

Berkshire Music Center will receive a grant of $8,000 in support of a four-week workshop for music educators July 27-August 25, 1964. The workshop will be directed by Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, assisted by other members of the faculty. The workshop on contemporary music will emphasize techniques and styles; performance problems; evaluation and understanding through listening. The workshop format will include lectures, laboratory rehearsals, and performance.

For more information write directly to Music Educators National Conference, 1201 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

MAR 1964

25

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

FEB 11 1964

Leinsdorf Plans More Changes In Berkshire Music Center

By A STAFF REPORTER

BOSTON — More changes in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox were announced Monday by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Must Be Repertory Player"

This is Leinsdorf's second year as director of the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music which it operates in conjunction with the music festival during July and August.

Monday he discussed the need for young musicians to acquire an understanding of two centuries of music and said, "A musician must be a repertory player. Otherwise he won't last very long."

He said it is the ultimate aim of the center to increase the awareness of young musicians in what is involved in being a professional musician. The center can serve as a bridge, he said, between the student and professional life.

Instrumental Department Cut

Under way are plans to increase the departments of vocal music and listening-analysis, reduce the instrumental department and eliminate the conducting department. The opera department was dropped last year.

Replacing the conducting department, which had two dozen participants in 1963, will be three young conductors who will participate by invitation.

Enrollment in the instrumental department will be cut in half because of Leinsdorf's interest in accepting only the most accomplished of those who apply.

The center orchestra will number about 60 instead of twice that, as it did in 1963. There will be special studies in the works of J. S. Bach and emphasis on chamber music.

22 From Orchestra

On the instrumental faculty will be 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus Seymour Lipkin, Paul Ulanowsky, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunther Schuller.

The department of vocal music will be in two sections. The faculty of the solo singing division will include Phyllis Curtin, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith.

Choral work will be led by Lorna Cooke deVaron, Iva Dee Hiatt, Alfred Nash Patterson and G. Wallace Woodworth.

The vocal department will be involved with operatic arias, lieder, Bach cantatas and ensemble work and choral motets and madrigals as well as choral music of baroque, romantic and contemporary styles.

New in the listening-analysis department will be a seminar in contemporary music for music educators. On the faculty will be Peter Gram Swing, Gunther Schuller, Carl Berky, Edwin London, Florence Dunn, Einar Hansen and Vladimir Resnikoff.

The listening-analysis department is designed for teachers, amateurs, music-lovers and those interested in teaching music appreciation.

Young composers in the composition department, in addition to attending seminars, will be involved in the Festival of Contemporary American Music to be sponsored by the Fromm Foundation at Tanglewood Aug. 9 to 13.

Boston, New York Auditions

On the composition department faculty will be Aaron Copland, Pierre Boulez, Lukas Foss and Gunther Schuller.

The center was established in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky and is scheduled this year to run from June 28 to Aug. 23.

Auditions for enrollment will be held in 19 cities between Feb. 24 and April 3. Those nearest Springfield will be March 19 from 2 to 4 in Symphony Hall, Boston, and Feb. 28 from 2 to in Carnegie Hall, New York.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256

FEB 10 1964

Erich Leinsdorf announces that the twenty-second session of the Berkshire Music Center will be held from June 28 to Aug. 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox. Mr. Leinsdorf is director of the summer center for the advanced study of music.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

MAR 1964

Acting head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center this summer will be Gunther Schuller, this during the absence of the regular head, Aaron Copland. The latter will be in residence from August 3 through 16.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BAY SHORE SENTINEL
Wednesday, May 6, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Thursday, May 7, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, May 9, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, May 9, 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

MAY 9 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200

QUINCY, MASS.
Patriot-Ledger
Eve. Circ. 48,932

MAY 5 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075

MAY 9 1964

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435

MAY 24 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256

MAY 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

MAY 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

MAY 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483

MAY 11 1964

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

MAY 5 1964

Berger Accepts Composer's Post At Tanglewood

Arthur Berger, composer and critic and recently appointed Walter Naumberg professor of music at Brandeis University, has accepted the invitation of Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, to be composer in residence at the Music Center for the 1964 season. With this appointment he will take the place of Pierre Boulez, who has been forced to cancel his scheduled visit to the United States this summer in order to recuperate from illness.

As composer in residence Mr. Berger will work with Aaron Copland, head of the Composition Department, in residence only Aug. 3-16, Gunther Schuller, acting head in Mr. Copland's absence, and Lukas Foss, in residence only Aug. 1-23, in conducting seminars and giving individual instruction to the young composers who enroll in the Music Center's eight-week summer session concurrent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Mr. Berger studied theory and composition with Nadia Boulanger, Vincent Jones Darius Milhaud and Walter Piston. He received an M. A. from Harvard in 1936. He has taught theory, composition and other musical subjects at Mills College, North Texas State College, Brooklyn College, and the Juilliard School of Music. His critical activities have included editorship of Listen Magazine and the Musical Mercury, reviewer for the Boston Transcript, New York Sun, New York Herald Tribune and the Saturday Review. More recently, he was the co-founder of Perspectives of New Music, the Fromm Foundation semi-annual magazine published by the Princeton Press, and is currently a member of its board.

His works for orchestra include Ideas of Order, Three Pieces for String Orchestra, and a Serenade Concertante; his chamber music includes a string quartet, which will be performed by the Lenox Quartet at Tanglewood this summer, a woodwind quartet and [illegible] other works.

Public Spirit
AYER, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,015

MAY 7 1964

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

FEB 1964

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONNTHLY 22,500

FEB 1964

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,700

FEB 1964

Rocky Mountain News
DENVER, COLO.
D. 189,829 S. 187,194

JAN 4 1964

SCHOOL MANAGEMENT
GREENWICH, CONN.
MONTHLY 51,400

FEB 1964

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1964

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

MAR 1964

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
6 TI. a YR. 41,600

JAN 1964

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5.500

FEB 1964

MENC Offers Two Grants for Contemporary Music Seminars

The MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education announces two grants for seminars in contemporary music for the summer of 1964. Recipients are the Aspen Music School, Aspen, Colorado, and the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass. According to Bernard Fitzgerald, director of the project, the grants were approved as part of the six-year project which began in July, 1963, under a grant of $1,380,000 to the Music Educators National Conference from the Ford Foundation.

Aspen Music School will receive a grant of $8,000 in support of a nine-week course in contemporary music for music educators, from June 22 to August 23, 1964. The course will be directed by Mel Powell, distinguished composer and member of the faculty of the School of Music, Yale University, and will emphasize the techniques, analysis, and performance of contemporary music through lectures, laboratory rehearsals, performance and listening experiences.

Berkshire Music Center will receive a grant of $8,000 in support of a four-week workshop for music educators July 27-August 25, 1964. The workshop will be directed by Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, assisted by other members of the faculty. The workshop on contemporary music will emphasize techniques and styles, performance problems, evaluation and understanding through listening. The workshop format will include lectures, laboratory rehearsals and performance.

For more information write directly to Music Educators National Conference, 1201 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

MAR 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

FEB 11 1964

Leinsdorf Plans More Changes In Berkshire Music Center

By A STAFF REPORTER

BOSTON — More changes in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox were announced Monday by Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Must Be Repertory Player"

This is Leinsdorf's second year as director of the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music which it operates in conjunction with the music festival during July and August.

Monday he discussed the need for young musicians to acquire an understanding of two centuries of music and said, "A musician must be a repertory player. Otherwise he won't last very long."

He said it is the ultimate aim of the center to increase the awareness of young musicians in what is involved in being a professional musician. The center can serve as a bridge, he said, between the student and professional life.

Instruments Department Cut

Under way are plans to increase the departments of vocal music and listening-analysis, reduce the instrumental department and eliminate the conducting department. The opera department was dropped last year.

Replacing the conducting department, which had two dozen participants in 1963, will be three young conductors who will participate by invitation.

Enrollment in the instruments department will be cut in half because of Leinsdorf's interest in accepting only the most accomplished of those who apply.

The center orchestra will number about 60 instead of twice that, as it did in 1963. There will be special studies in the works of J. S. Bach and emphasis on chamber music.

22 From Orchestra

On the instrumental faculty will be 22 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus Seymour Lipkin, Paul Ulanowsky, John Ferris, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Jacobs, Igor Kipnis, Ruth Posselt and Gunther Schuller.

The department of vocal music will be in two sections. The faculty of the solo singing division will include Phyllis Curtin, Ralph Berkowitz, Paul Ulanowsky and Lawrence Smith.

Choral work will be led by [illegible] Cooke deVaron, Iva Dee [illegible] Alfred Nash Patterson and G. Wallace Woodworth.

The vocal department will be involved with operatic arias, lieder, Bach cantatas and ensemble work and choral motets and madrigals as well as choral music of baroque, romantic and contemporary styles.

The listening-analysis department is designed for teachers, amateurs, music-lovers and those interested in teaching music appreciation.

Young composers in the composition department, in addition to attending seminars, will be involved in the Festival of Contemporary American Music to be sponsored by the Fromm Foundation at Tanglewood Aug. 9 to 13.

Boston, New York Auditions

On the composition department faculty will be Aaron Copland, Pierre Boulez, Lukas Foss and Gunther Schuller.

The center was established in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky and is scheduled this year to run from June 28 to Aug. 23.

Auditions for enrollment will be held in 19 cities between Feb. 24 and April 3. Those nearest Springfield will be March 19 from 2 to 4 in Symphony Hall, Boston, and Feb. 28 from 2 to 4 in Carnegie Hall, New York.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256

FEB 10 1964

Erich Leinsdorf announces that the twenty-second session of the Berkshire Music Center will be held from June 28 to Aug. 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox. Mr. Leinsdorf is director of the summer center for the advanced study of music.

26

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Wednesday, March 4, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, March 1, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Friday, February 28, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 29 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
FEB 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 27 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206
FEB 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
ADD 9 OCT

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 15 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 25 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 22 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 5 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 12 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
MAR 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 8 1964

GLOBE-TIMES
AMARILLO, TEXAS
D. 38,707
MAR 5 1964

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 129,288 S. 208,237
MAR 8 1964

The Herald Statesman
YONKERS, N. Y.
D. 43,824
MAR 4 1964

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 36,240
FEB 28 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 65,404 S. 116,733
MAR 1 1964

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER
D. 28,700
MAR 10 1964

BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE-TIMES
D. 28,800
MAR 6 1964

SANTA FE, N. M.
NEW MEXICAN
D. 13,400 S. 15,500
MAR 8 1964

Berkshire Auditions Scheduled

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will hold auditions for admission to the 1964 session in 16 cities during the month of March. One of the cities is Albuquerque. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Music Center, has announced that all prospective members of the Center will be admitted by audition only, and arrangements have been made for auditions in key cities across the country to make it as convenient as possible for applicants to attend the auditions.

In the 1964 session of the Berkshire Music Center, which will run from June 28 to Aug. 23, concurrently with the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, members will be able to enroll in one of four Departments: Instrumental Music, Composition, Vocal Music, and Listening and Analysis. No courses in Orchestral Conducting or Opera will be offered. Erich Leinsdorf has recently stated:

"Our standards of admission will be stricter. Thus the accomplished string or wind player will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups. Our Conducting enrollment will be by invitation only. The Vocal Department has been enlarged and a special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. The Listening and Analysis Department for teachers, lecturers and amateurs has been widened in scope and strengthened."

The regional audition will be: Albuquerque: Marc' 12, 2 - 4 p.m. . . . Cleveland's Piano Co., 5015 Lomas Blvd., N.E.

The final auditions of the season will take place on April 13 in New York City at Carnegie Hall, Studio 856.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
MAR 19 1964

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — TANGLEWOOD: Berkshire Music Center of Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold auditions for admission to 1964 session (June 28-Aug. 23) in 16 key cities during March. Final auditions for instrumentalists (including pianists and vocalists will take place Apr. 3 in New York City at Carnegie Hall, Studio 856. Applicants should write for further information and catalogs to the Berkshire Music Center at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D.C.
D. 408,701 S. 491,212
FEB 26 1964

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112
MAR 23 1964

Music Scholarship Auditions March 30

A full-tuition scholarship for the eight-week course of advanced music study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., will be awarded by Radio Station WGMS. Competitive auditions will be held at 2 p.m. and 7 p.m. March 30 in Constitution Hall.

The competition is open to any vocalist or instrumentalist who is 18 or older. Application blanks and brochures are available by writing Boston Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Fort Worth Star-Telegram
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
D. 105,967 S. 211,467
FEB 23 1964

Auditioners Need To Write to Boston

Instrumentalists and vocalists who are interested in auditioning for admission to the 1964 session of the Berkshire Music Center of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should write to the center at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Auditions for this region will be given at the Wadley Piano Company, 1303 Elm, Dallas, from 2 to 4 p. m. March 14.

The Atlanta Journal
AND
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
SUN. 504,755
MAR 1 1964

Berkshire Center To Audition Here

The Berkshire Music Center has scheduled Atlanta auditions for instrumentalists and vocalists for admission to the 1964 session.

They will be March 17 from 2 to 4 p.m. at the O. M. Tucker Piano Co. Appointments must be made in advance by writing the center at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 195,987 S. 206,275
FEB 13 1964

Berkshire Auditions Dated

Auditions for Dallas area instrumentalists and vocalists seeking admission to the 1964 session of the Berkshire Music Center will be held at Wadley Piano Co., 1303 Elm, from 2 to 4 p.m. March 13.

Auditions will be by appointment only.

The Music Center sessions, June 28-Aug. 23 this year, run concurrently with the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lennox, Mass. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is director of the summer center for advanced study of music.

The Music Center will be organized into four departments: instrumental, vocal, composition, and analysis. Aaron Copeland will be chairman and Richard Burgin associate chairman of the faculty. Burgin will also head the instrumental music department.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 12,291
FEB 27 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
MAR 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
FEB 12 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 11 1964

BMC Schedules Auditions in Boston, N.Y.

The Berkshire Music Center, teaching adjunct of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the dates for auditions in Boston and New York for those interested in attending the session this summer at Tanglewood.

Auditions will be held in New York on Feb. 28 and April 3 and in Boston on March 19.

Instrumentalists and vocalists who are interested in auditioning for admission to the 1964 session of the Berkshire Music Center, should write to the Center at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Auditions will also be held in 16 other cities throughout the country.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980
FEB 22 1964

Auditions Monday For Berkshire Center

Auditions for the 1964 Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will be held Monday from 2 to 4 P. M. at the New School of Music, 1738 Pine st.

Principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the auditions for vocalists and instrumentalists. Harp and percussion auditions will be held at 7 P. M. at the Academy of Music.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 511,457
MAR 31 1964

By Harry Naltchayan, Staff Photographer

Music Hopefuls Audition

Radio station WGMS held musical auditions yesterday at Constitution Hall for area music hopefuls. The prize will be a full tuition scholarship for an eight-week course of advanced music study at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass. In photograph at left, Robert Martin, 3538 13th st. nw. auditions on the clarinet for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Louis Speyer, one of the judges. In picture at right soprano Judith Nilsson, 5709 Sheridan st., Riverdale, Md., tries out for Boston Symphony's Rolland Gagnon at the piano.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Thursday, January 16, 1964

Tanglewood Plans Four Phases in '64

Three of the modern works scheduled for Tanglewood presentation next summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra," Barber's "Symphony No. 1" and "Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

Contemporary music is one of four areas for programs for the festival at Lenox, Mass., beginning July 3 and ending Aug. 22, will be drawn. The others are music for chamber orchestra, music for festivals and Strauss

The first two weeks will feature music for a chamber orchestra. Composers to be represented are Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss.

Commemorating the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss' birth, the festival will include many of his works including 'Tageszeiten," "Parergon" and 'Burleske."

Etich Leinsdorf, musical director, has invited Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductors.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, February 2, 1964

Symphonic Series to Bow on TV

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, will be featured in a new series of 13 weekly one-hour concerts over Channel 5 beginning tonight at 9.

Following the conclusion of this new 13-week cycle, Channel 5 will immediately repeat the original thirteen Boston Symphony concerts telecast on the station during the latter weeks of 1962.

The new concerts will include works of Tchaikovsky, Dvorak, R. Strauss, Beethoven, Schubert, Milhaud, Piston, Mozart, Bach, Shostakovitch, Mahler, Hindemith, Wagner, Bartok, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Brahms, and Rimsky-Korsakov.

As its initial attraction in the new cycle, the world famous 104-piece orchestra, now in its 82nd season, will offer Wagner's "Good Friday Music, Parsifal" and Strauss' "Don Quixote."

Next Sunday, Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Weber" and Schumann's "Piano Concerto."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SOUTHBRIDGE, Mass.
Circ. 5,112
FEB 7 1964

Tanglewood Music Festival Highlights Announced

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

Erich Leinsdorf has already announced the highlights of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 24 Festival concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox, which will open Friday, July 3.

Besides the Strauss cycle, which I wrote about last week, Mr. Leinsdorf will present American premieres and other works not performed previously at Tanglewood. There will be the American premiere of Haydn's cantata "Applauseus", Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens", and Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi", with soloists Lili Chookasian and Justino Diaz.

Also scheduled are a number of significant contemporary compositions (special Festival of Contemporary Music within the Festival Aug. 9 to 13). These include Barber's "Symphony No. 1", Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra", and other moderns whose work will be heard this summer: Bartok, Rorem, and Hovhaness.

Mr. Leinsdorf said about these: "The wide range of styles of composition expresses the catholic taste of the Berkshire Festival's approach to contemporary music." There will be the usual week ends devoted to Mozart's music and an all Haydn concert.

Growing Attendance

Continuing a popular and traditional feature of the Berkshire Festival, July 3 to 5 and July 10 to 12 will consist of music for a chamber orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The growing attendance of these concerts caused the shift of the Festival's opening programs from the small theatre to the larger Music Shed. Mr. Leinsdorf will continue to program lesser known works during the chamber orchestra's concerts. Composers heard in this portion of the Festival include Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, and Strauss.

The concert on Friday, July 10, has been designated as a memorial to Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, the founder of the Berkshire Symphony Festival, who died last October. At this concert Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in Schubert's compositions (new to Tanglewood), "Symphony No. 3" and the great "Mass in E Flat", with Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Nicholas Di Virgilio, and Donald Bill as soloists.

The first concert with the full orchestra on Friday, July 17, will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Interludes from Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten" and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5."

Guest Conductors

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg, and Leopold Stokowski as guest conductors. He himself will conduct 15 of the concerts and most of the chamber music concerts.

Several soloists will be appearing with the orchestra at the Festival. Claudio Arrau will play the Mozart Piano Concertos No. 451 and 450. The young American pianist Malcolm Frager will return to play another Mozart piano concerto July 11. Van Cliburn will also return this year to perform the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 in July 25. Joseph Silverstein will be soloist for Bela Bartok's "Violin Concerto" on Aug. 2, and Beri Lankochin for the Aug. 9 performance of Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra".

Also listed are Phyllis Curtin, Jeorge Bolet, Lorin Hollander and many outstanding singers. A complete listing of music to be performed there this summer will be released later.

Happy listening!

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256
MAR 31 1964

Summer Program For Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, has announced the complete program which the orchestra will present at its 24 concerts during the eight-week 1964 festival season. From July 3 through Aug. 23 the orchestra will be heard on Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. All concerts will take place in the 6000-seat music shed at Tanglewod, the 210 acre estate in Lenox, which is the summer home of the orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf will also continue the Saturday morning open rehearsals in the music shed at 10, which are given for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

During the season the orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory: (1) Music for festivals; (2) Contemporary music; (3) Richard Strauss cycle; (4) Music for chamber orchestra. The first two weekends (July 3-4-5, July 10-11-12) will be devoted to music for chamber orchestra, including lesser known works of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss. The remaining six weekends of concerts will be given by the full orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the six chamber orchestra programs and nine of the 18 programs by the full orchestra. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Festival will continue to present eminent soloists and ensembles at the Tuesday evening chamber music concerts in the theatre at Englewood. There will be eight programs this season, the first concert to be given June 30 by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, director. On July 7 Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph Berkowitz pianist, will be heard. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, will present the program of July 14. Claudio Arrau will be heard July 21 in a piano recital. On July 28 the Beaux Arts Trio will perform, and on Aug. 4 Jorge Bolet will give a piano recital. A program of contemporary American music will be given by the Lenox Quartet Aug. 11, as part of the Festival of Contemporary American Music (Aug. 19-13) sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center with the co-operation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The final Tuesday evening chamber music concert will be given Aug. 18 by Phyllis Curtin, soprano.

A detailed brochure with program and ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115.

28

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY UNION STAR

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Wednesday, June 17, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, June 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, June 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Saturday, June 20, 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422
JUN 20 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
JUN 20 1964

THE REPORTER DISPATCH
WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
D. 35,956
JUN 17 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
JUN 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUN 18 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times
NEW MILFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 4,096
JUN 18 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUN 21 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
JUN 25 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
JUN 27 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
JUN 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUN 25 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
JUL 25 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 44,966
JUN 20 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 23 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164
JUN 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUN 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen (e)
WINSTED, Conn.
Circ. 3,681
JUN 22 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 21 1964

Tanglewood Will Hold Traditional Opening Exercise

LENOX—The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will hold its traditional opening exercises in the theater next Sunday afternoon at 3.30. This will mark the beginning of the 22d session of the center and the beginning of Erich Leinsdorf's second season as director.

Address of Welcome

The opening exercises will begin with an address of welcome by Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following this, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, with Ralph Berkowitz at the piano, will perform Handel's Sonata No. 6 in E Major for Violin and Piano. The audience will then hear remarks by a member of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The members of the Berkshire Music Center, conducted by Lorna Cooke deVaron, will then join in the traditional performance of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." This work, which is now a standard part of the contemporary choral literature, was written for the opening session of the Music Center in 1940.

After the "Alleluia" the faculty, members of the center and audience will hear the keynote address by Mr. Leinsdorf. His speech is expected to define further the aims and purposes of the center, to announce special areas of emphasis for the current session, and to expand on the philosophies and policies which he introduced as the new director of the center last year.

The opening exercises will conclude with Mr. Leinsdorf's address, after which tea will be served in the Formal Garden. The public is invited to both the exercises and the tea.

Faculty Reception

The members of the center will then reassemble privately to meet the faculty of the 1964 session. Aaron Copland continues to be chairman of the faculty and Richard Burgin, associate chairman. Mr. Burgin is also head of the department of instrumental music, with William Kroll and Mr. Silverstein as associates. Mr. Copland is head of the department of composition with Gunther Schuller appointed acting head. Ralph Berkowitz is head of the department of vocal music, with Lorna Cooke deVaron as associate. Peter Gram Swing continues as head of the department of listening and analysis. Louis Speyer, charter member of the faculty and English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 46 years, has been appointed music coordinator for the Music Center.

During the introduction of the approximately 30 faculty members of the four departments, the young musicians will meet Thomas A. Sokol, director of choral music at Cornell University, who has been appointed to the choral division of the center in the place of Alfred Nash Patterson, who has been forced to cancel his assignments this summer because of illness.

In addition to its full schedule of classes and rehearsals, the Berkshire Music Center will present approximately 50 public programs during the summer, including forums, panel discussions, symposiums and programs of vocal, orchestral and chamber music. All these events will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a contribution toward the support of the center. Contributions may be made at the Friends Office, which is located at the Main Gate of Tanglewood.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 83,193
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
JUN 29 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
JUN 30 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 29 1964

Leinsdorf Stresses Musical Needs As Berkshire Music Center Opens

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf launched the 22nd session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon by telling this year's 245 members he hoped the center would give them "more insight, a broader outlook, and sufficient stimulation to continue the study of music" throughout their lives.

Deals With Aim

His address dealt with the center's aim—"to build a bridge between school and professional life" for composers, performers and listeners—and was the principal event on the opening-day program.

His address was heard by about 1,000 members of the public, the orchestra and the center's faculty as well as the members of the center and came in the middle of the program.

2 Works Performed

It was preceded by a performance of Handel's Violin Sonata No. 6 by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and followed by Randall Thompson's choral "Alleluia" sung by the center members conducted by Lorna Cooke deVaron.

Leinsdorf told the performers in his audience, "We need a generation of musicians whose total knowledge and total awareness is greater than heretofore. The problems to be mastered are more than those faced by the generation of your fathers . . .

"When an instrumentalist joins a symphony orchestra he will be faced with over 100 (and in the busier orchestras with well over 200) different works in a single season. Only a brilliant sight-reader who can absorb music quickly is able to stand up under the impact of having to digest that much new material.

Public Alienation

To the composers among the center's members he said, "It is my own avowed purpose to come to grips here at the Berkshire Music Center with the foremost problem which has beset music in the last few decades, and that is the alienation of the public from the work of the contemporary composer . . .

"The philosophical problem of the creative artist is how to find the proper way of expressing himself without indulging in ways unintelligible to contemporary ears."

To the members registered in the center's listening and analysis department he said, "We need high standards of appreciation. It is not enough that our professional critics should have high standards. We need critical ability in our public . . .

"The ultimate aim is to bring the public of this country to a keener awareness of quality—because only through public pressure will our entire musical establishment improve."

Punch was served in the formal gardens following the program, and at 5 the center's participants gathered again in the theater to meet members of the faculty and receive administrative instructions.

Reception Held

Aaron Copland again will be chairman of the center's faculty, and Richard Burgin, associate chairman.

In addition to their full daily schedule of classes and rehearsals, center members will present about 50 public programs including forums, panel discussions, symposiums and performances of vocal, orchestral and chamber music.

These events will be open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a contribution to the support of the center.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 7 1964

Quotes

It is my own avowed purpose to come to grips here at the Berkshire Music Center with the foremost problem which has beset music in the last few decades, and that is the alienation of the public from the work of the contemporary composer.

—Erich Leinsdorf, BSO conductor, speaking to the Berkshire Music Center students.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

5 1964

MUSIC FOR NOW

By MILES KASTENDIECK

CONCERNED about the gap between contemporary composers and the public Erich Leinsdorf made some pertinent observations recently in his opening talk to the students of the Berkshire Music School.

"With all the attention to creative efforts in the last 25 years, it is a curious symptom, of a yet undiagnosed cause, that composers are turning rapidly away from the traditional performance medium. . . . Professional performers know that they can subject their public to a certain amount of experimentation, and beyond this they must perform works which are meaningful, not only to themselves and the composers but to the public as well . . .

●

"WHEN COMPOSERS today are faced with public non-acceptance, we hear references to later generations who will understand, thus implying that the contemporaries do not understand. This may, once in a blue century, be the case; but as a rule, to be applied generally, the argument will not hold water. Composers always work for their contemporaries, and worrying about immortality is rare."

Mr. Leinsdorf points to the separation of creative and performing musicians as a disturbing element. It may very well explain at least part of the dilemma. This lies in the unusual complexities in contemporary composition, an observation I have made here on numerous occasions. How can composers expect their work to be performed when the difficulties they create for interpreters do not justify the exertion demanded?

When a work is meaningful, however, it gets performed in spite of great difficulties. Mr. Leinsdorf cites the success of Britten's "War Requiem" the American premiere of which he gave at Tanglewood last Summer. In its first year 75 performances have occurred and a quarter-million records sold. Critical reservations about its emotional depth must diminish in the face of this success. Obviously the public has found it "says something."

●

TO REACH CONTEMPORARY ears remains a challenge for every composer of his time. He cannot mortgage the present. In last Winter's Philharmonic series the avante-gardists alienated audiences too quickly. Their intellectual preoccupation did not touch the spring of human response, which has remained the same through the centuries; namely, the human heart.

It was Edmund Spenser's counsel to the poet "to look into his heart and write." The advice covers all the arts; it still holds good four centuries later.

Miles Kastendieck reviews musical events in weekday issues of the Journal-American.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435
JUL 12 1964

29

Music

Little Experimentation at Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

In his address before the membership of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood a couple of weeks ago, Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf again scored the hue and cry over neglect of contemporary music.

We don't refer to "students" of the center any longer because the Boston Symphony's summer "school" is now identified as a "bridge between school and professional life."

Leinsdorf made this pertinent comment which illustrates the prudent selection of repertory for the Berkshire Music Festival, now in progress:

"The charge that performers do not champion contemporary music is as superficial as any slogan. Professional performers know that they can subject their public to a certain amount of experimentation and beyond this they must perform works which are meaningful not only to themselves and the composers, but to the public as well."

Beginning Friday of this week, there will be heavy concentration on the music of Richard Strauss in the Tanglewood programs. This is to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

There are also generous servings of Debussy, Ravel, Mahler, Bartok, Hindemith and early Stravinsky. These are now considered "quasi contemporary," and have been superseded by a new era of cacophony.

Exactly six new works of contemporary "experimentation" will be distributed among the festival's last four weekends, beginning July 31.

These are Piston's Toccata, Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee," Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2," Hovhaness' "Prelude and Quadrupel Fugue for Orchestra, Opus 128," and Rorem's "Eagles."

Conservative Venture

The entire festival consists of some 80 works. So the six "experiments" are certainly a conservative venture. Leinsdorf made another significant remark in his Berkshire center address:

"It is my own avowed purpose to come to grips here at the Berkshire Music Center with the foremost problem which has beset music in the last few decades, and that is the alienation of the public from the work of the contemporary composer."

There is no real risk involved. Programs of the Berkshire Music Center are open to those "friends" who contribute toward its support. It has no box office per se.

Whatever sifts through the center's programs and lands on friendly ears will be comparatively safe material to offer Berkshire Festival audiences, who to put it bluntly — want their money's worth.

Composers Speak

For the past several months, two New York ladies have been engaged in a cause that must come as "manna from heaven" to the composer who has been bemoaning his neglect with cries in the wilderness.

Judith Blinken and Alice L. Everitt have instituted a lively campaign under the aegis of "The Composer Speaks, Inc.," with offices at 75 E. 55th St., New York City.

The first tour consisted of 34 lecture-demonstrations by Karlheinz Stockhausen, who is considered "avant-avant-garde" in the field of electronic music.

A dozen "far-out" composers form an international stable which tours colleges, universities, and other institutions, spreading the gospel of their tenets and goals.

Speaking for the impresarias, Mrs. Everitt says: It's so inspiring to work for composers. They respond so warmly. They're unlike performing artists."

They should be grateful!

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312
JUL 5 1964

Some Meaningful Words From Erich Leinsdorf

That conductor Erich Leinsdorf, with the same sense of discipline and dedication he has brought to the Boston Symphony, also intends to strengthen and make more intensive the work of advanced music students this Summer at the Berkshire Music Center is evident in the speech he made last Sunday at Tanglewood to the Center's 241 registered students.

Mr. Leinsdorf noted, "The Berkshire Music Center is organized and will be run with one principal aim: To build a bridge between school and professional life. Crossing this bridge during the next eight weeks, you will have ample opportunity to ask questions, to get answers, and, more significantly, you may recognize the value of being well informed not only in music but in the full spectrum of our civilization."

The dynamic conductor also outlined the need for the Musicological Symposium, a new project for this Summer, to be held at Tanglewood from July 13-15, by stating that "Musicologists are making a life study of the conditions during specific periods in which they specialize, and it can only benefit performers to consider these findings as an essential part of their own preparation."

With the typical Leinsdorf display of the importance of thoroughness, he concluded, "We need a generation of musicians whose total knowledge and total awareness is greater than heretofore. Studying a composer in depth is of great importance to your understanding. Your authority, your mastery of the expressive content and of the deeper meaning of any music can only manifest itself if you have a total knowledge of the composer's output and a complete understanding of the atmosphere in which he existed and from which he took his inspiration."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUN 28 1964

From Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf Stresses A Broader Musical View

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

STEINBERG

This afternoon the opening excercises of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood take place, and as is the custom, the music director will address students, faculty, and guests with an appropriate homily. In his talk, Erich Leindorf has many interesting and provocative—even some provoking—things to say.

The separation of creative and performing musicians, the perception of greatness by contemporaries, the charge that performers do not champion contemporary music, the relation of musicology and performance, all these are among the topics that Leinsdorf touches on.

One point strikes me as something that students cannot have pounded into their heads too often, and here I should like to quote Leinsdorf in full:

"Studying a composer in depth is of great importance for your understanding. You may wonder how a clarinetist could benefit from knowing the poetry which Brahms chose for his songs, or how a singer might benefit from being acquainted with Brahm's chamber music. Your authority, your mastery of the expressive content and of the deeper meaning of any music can only manifest itself if you have a total knowledge of a composer's output and a complete understanding of the atmosphere in which he existed and from which he took his inspiration."

To Be Implemented

That is well said, though perhaps it comes dangerously close to the optimistic-inspirational language that is too familiar to the students from their college and conservatory catalogues. In other words, it may sound too familiar to warrant much attention. I hope, though, that they will pay attention, and that the teaching they are offered at Tanglewood and at their home schools will implement in practice and in close detail the important idea behind Leinsdorf's words.

Performers' interests are notoriously parochial: tuba players only go to the opera when Wagner is played, flutists only listen to wind quintets and "Afternoon of a Faun," and many a violinist would accept the contention that Diabelli wrote the "Goldberg Variations."

The performer's training leads him to allot say, four-fifths of his attention to making his instrument produce beautiful sounds. Anything that is left over goes to the music. To begin with, then, musical comprehension is apt to be shallow—it is deeply fallacious to suppose that either talent or experience at performing is a guarantee of an ability to understand music—and it will be the more shallow if the musical experience is limited to the performer's own active repertory.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUN 28 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

Berkshire Center On Right Track Under Leinsdorf

By ROBERT TAYLOR

This afternoon Erich Leinsdorf will give the opening address, and The Berkshire Music Center will begin its second year under his energetic direction. It is a significant event, indeed one of the outstanding in the yearly calendar of U. S. musical events.

Although the remarks of Mr. Leinsdorf are not formally released until the exercises, a copy of the text of his speech has been in our possession for several days, and we have pondered the conductor's words at length. Plainly, he intends to pursue the policies that he launched so vigorously last summer.

Perhaps more than any other conductor of The Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf has involved himself with the Berkshire Music School and its activities. He considers the role of the school to be of major importance, as pertinent in its way to the orchestral structure as performance itself.

..WHAT IS THE future of The Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood as envisioned by Mr. Leinsdorf? I would say that he conceives of it as an examplary force, a kind of cultural moral power; a school where musical learning creates knowledge and standards. Furthermore, he is aware that in an increasingly complex cultural scene, intricate and profound pressures are the lot of the average player.

Mr. Leinsdorf, I'd say, believes that musicians must adapt to the total demands of their craft as never before in history. The man who graduated from a conservatory, then auditioned and got hired by a symphony orchestra, could, in the past live quite comfortably off a certain skill. Today, proficiency alone is not enough.

THE PRESSURES felt by the performer are not too unlike those in business in a world that consumes change. There are subscription seasons and Pope seasons; chamber music seasons for members of the ensemble and summer seasons. The player in the little court orchestra at Esterhazy, say, had no obligation to meet so many bewildering challenges; but, as more and more orchestras follow the lead of The Boston Symphony in supplying a year-round season for their men, a string player may find himself in a Strauss Festival one week, a Bach Brandenburg the next, and on the third, find himself flying to San Diego for a West Coast tour.

Thus the player today not only must possess a basic instrumental skill, but have a knowledge of the repertoire that enables him to meet its demands stylistically. Music, no less than the latest scientific area, is a field in which one can rapidly fall out of touch because there is so much to be constant-constantly absorbed.

LOOKING OVER Mr. Leinsdorf's speech, it seems not inappropriate to mention that he discusses the alienation of the general public from contemporary composition. The relationship of creator, interpreter and public is again exceedingly complex today—far more so than it was during the era of courtly, cultivated patronage.

But one aspect is not included by Mr. Leinsdorf (you cannot, after all, include everything) and that is the way a conductor must master repertory. I speak not of the established men, but of the young generation, of whom Schippers and Maazel seem to be the sole representatives at all well-known.

THE WAY mastery was clearly defined in pre World War II Europe: a conductor usually served his apprenticeship in opera and then, starting with guest appearances at various halls, moved into the perilous eminence of a semi-permanent post. During his long apprenticeship, he was expected to pick up (a.) a knowledge of the capacities of each instrument (b.) a complete knowledge of harmony, counterpoint, composition and orchestration (c.) a musical memory of total recall (d.) sight transposition, piano technique, etc., etc.

Today there is little enough time for such procedure, and one of the glories of the Berkshire Music School may well be that it provides the time. Conductors are not made overnight. Time: As Mr. Leinsdorf opens the school season this afternoon, he bestows on the student a gift beyond price.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUL 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUL 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 2 1964

Tanglewood Takes Over Monteux Classes

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, announces the addition of a course for orchestral conductors to the Music Center's schedule at Tanglewood this summer.

The fatal illness of Pierre Monteux forced the cancellation of his masters' classes at the Domaine School of Conductors in Hancock, Maine. His conductorial colleagues agreed to open a conducting course at Tanglewood as a tribute of friendship to Mr. Monteux.

Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra will be the chairman of this program which will last for three weeks, from Sunday, Aug. 2, to Sunday, Aug. 23.

Open to All

The course will be open to all applicants and will include seminars and discussions with Erich Leinsdorf, Richard Burgin, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Max Rudolf, and Gunther Schuller; classes in solfege and baton technique; and observation at Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals and concerts under Messrs. Leinsdorf, Burgin, Seiji Ozawa, Rudolf and Leopold Stokowski. Other activities will be arranged depending on the size and skills of the enrollment.

The fee for the three-week course is $310, which includes tuition, dormitory, and miscellaneous fees. Those interested in attending should write immediately to the Registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIE
July 5 1964

Leinsdorf Continues To Streamline Center

Conducting Department Accepts Four New Members On Scholarship; Reduces Total

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Erich Leinsdorf's efforts to streamline the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood were somewhat modified last week when the conducting department was re-established without ever really having been discontinued. The decision was influenced strongly, if not determined, first by the serious illness and then Wednesday by the death at 89 of Pierre Monteux, beloved conductor of international standing who, at one time or another, led all of the great orchestras. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919 to 1924 and was its guest conductor 92 times.

Streamlined Department

Last summer, Leinsdorf discontinued the opera department at the center, the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, so that the faculty and facilities could concentrate more strongly on instrumentalists and chamber music.

This summer he further streamlined by eliminating the conducting department and accepting four young conductors on fellowship and by reducing the overall participation from about 300 to 240 members ("from quantity toward quality").

That was how things stood when the center had its opening ceremonies a week ago. Then Monteux died and with him died the seminar for aspiring conductors he had led several summers at his home in Hancock, Me.

Thus it was partly out of sympathy for their colleague's doomed seminar that the already busy BMC faculty decided to resume the conducting department for three weeks (Aug. 2 to 23) for qualified applicants.

Daily Sessions

In the meantime, four fellows in conducting have joined nearly 240 other musicians from 33 states and the District of Columbia and eight foreign countries in a round of rehearsals, seminars, discussions, practice sessions and performances scheduled for seven or eight hours daily, six days a week.

Of the 17 BMC members from foreign countries, six are from Canada, four from Japan, two from Iceland and one each from France, India, Mexico, Luxembourg and The Netherlands.

New York sent the largest state contingent, 54, and Massachusetts was next with 38. Other large contributors are Pennsylvania, 19; New Jersey, 14; California, 13; Illinois, 11, and Connecticut, nine.

Largest Group

Pittsfield with nine made the largest contribution to the Massachusetts group, which includes six from Boston and three from Lee. Seventeen other Massachusetts towns and cities (Adams, Becket) contributed one or two each.

Thirteen of the 240 are in the composing department; nearly 30 in the choral and solo vocal department; nearly 40 in the listening - analysis department (which lends its members to the vocal departments to make up the festival choir and chorus) and 20 will attend the music educators seminar in contemporary music July 27 to Aug. 23.

That leaves about 100 instrumentalists, not counting the 13 Fromm Fellows who are supported by the Fromm Foundation to study and perform contemporary music.

The instrumentalists make up the center's symphony orchestra, which will give three or four concerts, and the many chamber-music groups scheduled to perform two or three times a week.

Morning Program

Already the young musicians are deeply involved in stretching their talents to accommodate the center's increasing requirements. They hurry along the gravel paths laden with musical scores and their practicing can be heard from the windows of a couple of dozen studios.

Today some of them will give a performance of Bach's music at 10 this morning and others a chamber music concert at eight tonight. Another chamber music concert is scheduled Wednesday and Thursday, 10 days from opening day when the BMC orchestra will give its first full length concert.

The audiences for the BMC concerts as well as its public seminars and forums (almost 50 events in eight weeks) are made up of contributors to the support of the center.

They are called Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and they share a special knowledge. They have found the biggest musical bargain in the district.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 2 4

Free Tuition Is Offered For Music Center Courses

Free tuition at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox is offered any Berkshire County resident who is accepted for the Tanglewood choir of the Department of Listening and Analysis.

Choir Work

The Tanglewood Choir is made up of experienced choral singers selected after audition. The choir follows an intensive schedule of rehearsals and performance, taking part in several Boston Symphony concerts, giving several performances of music prepared in the choral seminars and acting as the nucleus of the large festival chorus.

The Department of Listening and Analysis offers a course of study directed to the understanding of music and the relevance of analysis, through which such understanding is gained, to performance. It is designed for teachers, amateurs and music lovers who have attained proficiency in an instrument or voice sufficient to participate in chamber music and choral singing and for those interested in the teaching of music appreciation.

Anyone interested should call Miss Edith Bossler at 637-1600.

The following county residents are already enrolled at the Music Center:

Linda L. Fohrhaltz, George Fulginiti, George R. Fulginiti, Raymond E. Hunkins, Marjorie Kember, Peter B. Knott, Suzanne C. LePrevost, Marion E. Maby, Dennis G. Najoom, Catharine C. Parker, Freda C. Sass, Mark F. Schlawin, Andrea M. Sparks and Thomas C. Tootill.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
MAY 7 1964

Vivian Wood To Sing at Tanglewood

After a highly successful audition at Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 3, Vivian Wood has just been awarded a full scholarship as solo vocalist for the eight-week Summer session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass.

Auditions for acceptance to the Music Center were conducted in eighteen cities all over the United States. Only a limited number of solo singers have been accepted. At Tanglewood they will participate in active and intensive work at various seminars and will give several public performances during the two-months' period starting on June 28.

Vivian Wood has been a resident of Lakeville for the last eighteen months. She is here on a fellowship to study musicianship and seventeenth and eighteenth centuries repertoire with Denise Restout. For several years Vivian Wood has been coached by Paul Ulanowsky who will be on the faculty at the Berkshire Center.

OIL CITY, PA.
DERRICK
D. 13,500
MAY 2 1 1964

Oil City Native Awarded Scholarship

Grace DiBattista, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lorenzo Butiste of Oil City, has received a scholarship to attend the eight-week session at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

The Oil City native, who is married to Charles J. Hepburn, is known professionally as Grace DiBattista. She lives with her husband and two children in Elnora, N. Y.

Mrs. Hepburn was one of a select number of singers chosen for the scholarship with the Department of Vocal Music at the Lenox, (Mass.) Music Festival. She will study in various seminars and will give several public performances.

Erich Leinsdorf is director of the Music Center and Composer Aaron Copland is the chairman of the faculty.

This past season Miss DiBattista performed the roles of Despina in "Cosi Fan Tutte," Musetta in "La Boheme," and Gretel in "Hansel and Gretel" with the Doris Goldovsky lecture series at the Metropolitan Museum in New York.

She also sang the role of Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" with the Goldovsky Opera Company. As a member of the Goldovsky Institute, she also sang in a Carnegie Recital Hall in New York.

Her concert work included a joint recital in New York's Town Hall under the sponsorship of the Concert Artists Guild.

Miss DiBattista's next performance will be for the Schenectady Opera Company where she will sing the role of Monica in Menotti's "The Medium."

GRACE DI BATTISTA
To study at Tanglewood

BAY SHORE, N. Y.
SENTINEL
W. 3,500
MAY 6 1964

Barbara Benary Wins Scholarship In Tanglewood

Bay Shore — Barbara Benary 18-year-old violinist, has been awarded a full tuition scholarship to study at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. The center is conducted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf is director and Aaron Copeland chairman of the faculty.

Miss Benary, a senior at Bay Shore High School, has been concert mistress of the school orchestra and first violinist of the Bay Shore High School String Quartet. She studied violin with Howard Koch of Brightwaters and composition with Dr. Fritz Kramer of New York City.

In the fall, Miss Benary plans to attend Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, N. Y., and to continue her violin studies with Raphael Bronstein of the Manhattan School of Music. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Benary of Bay Shore.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal & Chronicle
FARMINGTON, Maine
Semi-Wkly. Circ. 2,975
JUL 7 1964

Kenton Steward of Malden, Mass., who has been visiting his mother, Mrs. Hilda Steward, has gone to Lennox, Mass., where he will be at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center and summer home of the Boston Symphony. He has an eight-week full scholarship and will be working with choral conducting. He will also sing tenor with the Tanglewood chorus. Recordings will be made for a leading recording company, the first to be, Requiem by Verdi. There are four full scholarships given each year, one of which is to a student in the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. This is the one received by Steward. During the summer session, he and his family will tent by the lakefront at Tanglewood.

Mr. and Mrs. Harold Dill of

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WATERVILLE, ME.
Sentinel
Morn. Circ. 19,703
JUN 30 1964

Kenton Steward of Malden, Mass., who has been visiting his mother, Mrs. Hilda Steward, left over the weekend to go to Lenox, Mass. There for eight weeks with full scholarship, he will be at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center, and summer home of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Steward will be working with Choral Conducting, and will sing tenor with the Tanglewood Chorus. Recordings will be made for RCA Victor, the first to be the Verdi Requiem. During the summer session, Mr. Steward and his family will tent by the lake front at Tanglewood.

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONNTHLY 22,500
JUL 1964

Marilyn Mason is shown at the University of Michigan with three of her students who have won important awards. Carol Teti, at the console, has been awarded two scholarships — a Boston Symphony award for study at Tanglewood and a Fulbright for study in Vienna. Robert Town won a scholarship to Tanglewood and Jane Schatkin will study in Vienna on a Fulbright. Misses Teti and Schatkin are candidates for the MMus degree in organ; Mr. Town is working toward the DMA degree.

Not shown is Tom Warburton whose Fulbright grant will take him to Holland; he received the MMus degree in May.

RIVERSIDE, ILL.
CITIZEN
W. 766
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

JUN 2 5 1964

Virginia Sindelar, 8112 West 27th st., North Riverside, received her bachelor of music degree from the Juilliard School of Music in New York City.

The commencement was held on May 29. On May 28 Virginia appeared in a commencement concert by the Juilliard Symphony orchestra.

She was awarded a scholarship to Tanglewood Music camp in Lenox, Mass. for eight weeks beginning June 27 and ending Aug. 27.

Richmond Times-Dispatch
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 143,437 SUN. 192,499
JUN 2 4 1964

RichmonderWins Scholarship

Carol Paige Phillips, a member of the choir at St. Paul's Episcopal Church, will leave this week for Tanglewood, Mass., for eight weeks of study at the Berkshire Music Center.

Miss Phillips, who appeared as the nun in this year's Lenten concert at St. Paul's, was awarded a scholarship for the summer study.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 15 1964

Cellist Rosenfeld Is Fromm Fellow At Tanglewood

Peter J. Rosenfeld, son of Eagle music critic and Mrs. Jay C. Rosenfeld of 173 South Mountain Road, is a cellist with the Fromm Fellows at Tanglewood this summer.

A graduate of Swarthmore College and the Juilliard School of Music in New York, Mr. Rosenfeld plays during the winter season with the orchestra at the New York City Ballet and freelances with concert groups.

Mr. Rosenfeld and his wife, the former Lucy Davidson, are living in Glendale for the summer.

University of Chicago
Magazine
Chicago, Ill.
Nov. 1963

—John MacIvor Perkins, instructor in the Department of Music, has been awarded a chamber music commission by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago and the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music. Mr. Perkin's composition, currently titled Night Music for Soprano and Twelve Instruments, will be given its premiere performance at a Festival of Contemporary American Music in Lenox, Massachusetts, in August, 1964. Ten commission recipients for the Festival were selected from a field of 54 composers.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 25 1964

Free Tuition Is Offered For Music Center Courses

Free tuition at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox is offered any Berkshire County resident who is accepted for the Tanglewood choir of the Department of Listening and Analysis.

Choir Work

The Tanglewood Choir is made up of experienced choral singers selected after audition. The choir follows an intensive schedule of rehearsals and performance, taking part in several Boston Symphony concerts, giving several performances of music prepared in the choral seminars and acting as the nucleus of the large festival chorus.

The Department of Listening and Analysis offers a course of study directed to the understanding of music and the relevance of analysis, through which such understanding is gained, to performance. It is designed for teachers, amateurs and music lovers who have attained proficiency in an instrument or voice sufficient to participate in chamber music and choral singing and for those interested in the teaching of music appreciation.

Anyone interested should call Miss Edith Bossler at 637-1600.

The following county residents are already enrolled at the Music Center:

Linda L. Fohrhaltz, George Fulginiti, George R. Fulginiti, Raymond E. Hunkins, Marjorie Kember, Peter B. Knott, Suzanne C. LePrevost, Marion E. Maby, Dennis G. Najoom, Catharine C. Parker, Freda C. Sass, Mark F. Schlawin, Andrea M. Sparks and Thomas C. Tootill.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
MAY 7 1964

Vivian Wood To Sing at Tanglewood

After a highly successful audition at Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 3, Vivian Wood has just been awarded a full scholarship as solo vocalist for the eight-week Summer session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass.

Auditions for acceptance to the Music Center were conducted in eighteen cities all over the United States. Only a limited number of solo singers have been accepted. At Tanglewood they will participate in active and intensive work at various seminars and will give several public performances during the two-months' period starting on June 28.

Vivian Wood has been a resident of Lakeville for the last eighteen months. She is here on a fellowship to study musicianship and seventeenth and eighteenth centuries repertoire with Denise Restout. For several years Vivian Wood has been coached by Paul Ulanowsky who will be on the faculty at the Berkshire Center.

OIL CITY, PA.
DERRICK
D. 13,500
MAY 21 1964

Oil City Native Awarded Scholarship

Grace DiBattista, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lorenzo Butiste of Oil City, has received a scholarship to attend the eight-week session at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

The Oil City native, who is married to Charles J. Hepburn, is known professionally as Grace DiBattista. She lives with her husband and two children in Elmora, N. Y.

Mrs. Hepburn was one of a select number of singers chosen for the scholarship with the Department of Vocal Music at the Lenox, (Mass.) Music Festival. She will study in various seminars and will give several public performances.

Erich Leinsdorf is director of the Music Center and Composer Aaron Copland is the chairman of the faculty.

This past season Miss DiBattista performed the roles of Despina in "Cosi Fan Tutte," Musetta in "La Boheme," and Gretel in "Hansel and Gretel" with the Doris Goldovsky lecture series at the Metropolitan Museum in New York.

She also sang the role of Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" with the Goldovsky Opera Company. As a member of the Goldovsky Institute, she also sang in a Carnegie Recital Hall in New York.

Her concert work included a joint recital in New York's Town Hall under the sponsorship of the Concert Artists Guild.

Miss DiBattista's next performance will be for the Schenectady Opera Company where she will sing the role of Monica in Menotti's "The Medium."

GRACE DI BATTISTA
To study at Tanglewood

BAY SHORE, N. Y.
SENTINEL
W. 3,500
MAY 6 1964

Barbara Benary Wins Scholarship In Tanglewood

Bay Shore — Barbara Benary 18-year-old violinist, has been awarded a full tuition scholarship to study at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. The center is conducted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf is director and Aaron Copeland chairman of the faculty.

Miss Benary, a senior at Bay Shore High School, has been concert mistress of the school orchestra and first violinist of the Bay Shore High School String Quartet. She studied violin with Howard Koch of Brightwaters and composition with Dr. Fritz Kramer of New York City.

In the fall, Miss Benary plans to attend Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, N. Y., and to continue her violin studies with Raphael Bronstein of the Manhattan School of Music. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Benary of Bay Shore.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal & Chronicle
FARMINGTON, Maine
Semi-Wkly. Circ. 2,975
JUL 7 1964

Kenton Steward of Malden, Mass., who has been visiting his mother, Mrs. Hilda Steward, has gone to Lennox, Mass., where he will be at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center and summer home of the Boston Symphony. He has an eight-week full scholarship and will be working with choral conducting. He will also sing tenor with the Tanglewood chorus. Recordings will be made for a leading recording company, the first to be, Requiem by Verdi. There are four full scholarships given each year, one of which is to a student in the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. This is the one received by Steward. During the summer session, he and his family will tent by the lakefront at Tanglewood.

Mr. and Mrs. Harold Dill of

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4283
WATERVILLE, ME.
Sentinel
Morn. Circ. 19,703
JUN 30 1964

Kenton Steward of Malden, Mass., who has been visiting his mother, Mrs. Hilda Steward, left over the weekend to go to Lenox, Mass. There for eight weeks with full scholarship, he will be at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center, and summer home of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Steward will be working with Choral Conducting, and will sing tenor with the Tanglewood Chorus. Recordings will be made for RCA Victor, the first to be the Verdi Requiem. During the summer session, Mr. Steward and his family will tent by the lake front at Tanglewood.

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONNTHLY 22,500
JUL 1964

Marilyn Mason is shown at the University of Michigan with three of her students who have won important awards. Carol Teti, at the console, has been awarded two scholarships — a Boston Symphony award for study at Tanglewood and a Fulbright for study in Vienna. Robert Town won a scholarship to Tanglewood and Jane Schatkin will study in Vienna on a Fulbright. Misses Teti and Schatkin are candidates for the MMus degree in organ; Mr. Town is working toward the DMA degree.

Not shown is Tom Warburton whose Fulbright grant will take him to Holland; he received the MMus degree in May.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 15 1964

Cellist Rosenfeld Is Fromm Fellow At Tanglewood

Peter J. Rosenfeld, son of Eagle music critic and Mrs. Jay C. Rosenfeld of 172 South Mountain Road, is a cellist with the Fromm Fellows at Tanglewood this summer.

A graduate of Swarthmore College and the Juilliard School of Music in New York, Mr. Rosenfeld plays during the winter season with the orchestra at the New York City Ballet and freelances with concert groups.

Mr. Rosenfeld and his wife, the former Lucy Davidson, are living in Glendale for the summer.

RIVERSIDE, ILL.
CITIZEN
W. 788
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
JUN 25 1964

Virginia Sindelar, 8112 West 27th st., North Riverside, received her bachelor of music degree from the Juilliard School of Music in New York City.

The commencement was held on May 29. On May 28 Virginia appeared in a commencement concert by the Juilliard Symphony orchestra.

She was awarded a scholarship to Tanglewood Music camp in Lenox, Mass. for eight weeks beginning June 27 and ending Aug. 27.

Richmond Times-Dispatch
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 143,437 SUN. 192,499
JUN 24 1964

RichmonderWins Scholarship

Carol Paige Phillips, a member of the choir at St. Paul's Episcopal Church, will leave this week for Tanglewood, Mass., for eight weeks of study at the Berkshire Music Center.

Miss Phillips, who appeared as the nun in this year's Lenten concert at St. Paul's, was awarded a scholarship for the summer study.

University of Chicago
Magazine
Chicago, Ill.
Nov. 1963

—John MacIvor Perkins, instructor in the Department of Music, has been awarded a chamber music commission by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago and the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music. Mr. Perkin's composition, currently titled Night Music for Soprano and Twelve Instruments, will be given its premiere performance at a Festival of Contemporary American Music in Lenox, Massachusetts, in August, 1964. Ten commission recipients for the Festival were selected from a field of 54 composers.

32

PENNSBURG, PA.
TOWN AND COUNTRY
W. 4,425
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
JUN 11 1964

Mrs. Jacobs Awarded Tanglewood Grant

Mrs. Nora M. Jacobs, vocal music supervisor at Upper Perkiomen High School, has been granted a full tuition scholarship to study at the summer session at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Tanglewood, an estate of 210 acres, is situated between Lenox and Stockbridge, in the Berkshire hills. It was the meeting place of Emerson, Holmes, and Melville. It was on these grounds that Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables." In 1936, Tanglewood was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a home for the Berkshire Music Festival. The orchestra presents a full schedule of concerts at the music center during the summer.

MRS. NORA JACOBS

During Easter vacation, Mrs. Jacobs traveled to Washington, D. C. to audition for the Berkshire Music Center. She will major in choral conducting and will also sing in the Tanglewood choir and the festival chorus. The choir is an ensemble made up of experienced choral singers. This choir follows an intensive schedule of rehearsals and performances, taking part in several major concerts at the center. The festival chorus is the largest performing group at the center.

Mrs. Jacobs was graduated from Temple University in 1961. She is presently taking credits toward her master's degree. While at college, she sang with the women's glee club, and the Temple University concert choir. After graduation, Mrs. Jacobs sang with the alumni choir which performs regularly with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Last year Mrs. Jacobs was a member of the cast of the Abington Music Theater's production of "Kismet," and last summer she was musical director for Abington Music Theater's summer workshop. Mrs. Jacobs teaches general music at Upper Perkiomen High School, and is also director of the junior and senior high choruses and the concert choir.

Mrs. Jacobs and her husband, the Rev. Donald R. Jacobs, pastor of St. Paul's Lutheran Church, Red Hill, will travel to Massachusetts on June 25 so that Mrs. Jacobs can register for the summer sessions. They will then return to Red Hill so that Mrs. Jacobs can conduct a concert given by the Upper Perkiomen High School concert choir on June 28 at Dillingersville. Mrs. Jacobs will then return to Massachusetts on June 29 and remain there for eight weeks, returning home on Aug. 24.

WILLMAR, MINN.
WEST CENTRAL TRIBUNE
D. 12,300
APR 27 1964

Young Musician of Willmar Wins Scholarship

Another recognition has come to a young well-known musician of this city, this time in the form of a scholarship. He is Lowell Lindgren, son of Mr .and Mrs. Edwin Lindgren, 620 East 2nd street, who is currently engaged in studies for his master's degree at the University of Minnesota.

LOWELL LINDGREN

Lindgren has been notified of his formal acceptance for admission to the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Massachusetts for the summer season of 1964. With the admission to the music center comes a scholarship award of $700.

The summer festival at Berkshire, extending from June 28 to August 23, has, since 1940, been a center for young musicians to continue their professional training and to add to their artistic experience under the guidance of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and other eminent musicians. Erick Leinsdorf is the director and Aaron Copeland is the faculty chairman.

This year, 1964, the instrumental program is limited to 60 orchestral musicians, and 12 performing pianists in the United States. Lindgren is one of the chosen pianists and will attend Berkshire Music Center on a full scholarship grant.

The Tanglewood Festival is the best known of all summer festivals, and acceptance as a performer is coveted by all college musicians.

Pianist Lindgren was awarded his B.A. degree Summa Cum Laude, last June at the University of Minnesota, where he majored in piano and music theory. He appeared in a U of M recital on March 1, and also appeared as a feature artist in the program by the Willmar Philharmonic Orchestra in this city on Sunday, April 12.

SOUTHFIELD, MICH.
RECORD
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
JUL 1 1964

64

Juillard Student Awarded Scholarship

David Levine, 'cellist, of 2564 Woodstock, Detroit, age 20, was awarded a scholarship to the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be a member of the student orchestra — one of the finest (if not the finest) youth groups of its kind ever assembled — which will play under such prominent conductors as Eric Leinsdorf, Leopold Stokowski, Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg.

Two prominent former Detroiters — Joseph Selverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, and Seymour Linkin, concert pianist and conductor, will teach and conduct at the Berkshire Music Center this summer.

David Levine has made a number of solo appearances and has won competitions here and in the East. He received his early training in Detroit with Paul Olefsky and attended Cass High School. He is now attending the Juilliard School of Music, New York City, where he is studying with the eminent 'cellist, Leonard Rose.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
GARDNER, Mass.
Circ. 7,341
NOV 23 1964

Columbia Names Composer, Former Gardner Resident

Charles Wuorinen, a former resident who is considered one of America's foremost young composers, has been commissioned to furnish a compostion for the Tanglewood Music Festival, to be performed in July, and also will attend the Bennington Composers' Conference in August where he will be in charge of the Composers' program.

Mr. Wuorinen, son of Dr. John H. Wuorinen, head of the Columbia University History Department, and Mrs. Wuorinen, who reside at 137 Elm Street, also has been appointed Instructor in the Department of Music at Columbia effective July 1. He is Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Columbia and received his Master's in Music last year.

For the past two years he has been Director of the Contemporary Music Concert Series at Columbia and will serve in the same capacity next year.

Among his 35 compositions, all of which have been performed here or abroad, are three symphonies. He has been the recipient of more than a score of prizes or citations, the latest being the recent Broadcasting Music, Inc. Prize, for the fourth time, announced in New York earlier this month.

Outstanding among the others is the Bearn Prize, won three times, and the Nadia Boulanger Prize.

Mr. Wuorinen also conducts and is a highly rated pianist. In a recent Composers' Forum held at the Donnell Library Auditorium the New York Times had this to say of Mr. Wuorinen: "A magnificent solo performance offered by Charles Wuorinen, pianist, in Mr. Stewart's "Five Miniatures."

BLANK PAGE

34

1ST. WEEK JUNE 30TH. - JULY 5TH.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176

JUN 2 7 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF is music director of the Boston Symphony which opens the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood Friday.

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500

JUN 2 4 1964

Berkshire Festival Opens Next Week

THE MUSIC SHED AT TANGLEWOOD will be the scene of the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 p. m. (July 3-4) and Sunday afternoon (July 5) at 2:30. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, will conduct the music of Mozart Friday and Saturday, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist both evenings, and music by Haydn Sunday afternoon, including the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with chorus and soloists. The Berkshire Festival will continue for eight weekends through Sunday, August 23.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

JUN 2 8 1964

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its Tanglewood season on Friday and Saturday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 194,795

JUN 2 8 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts on Friday, Saturday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Review
DARIEN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,690

JUN 2 5 1964

Music Director

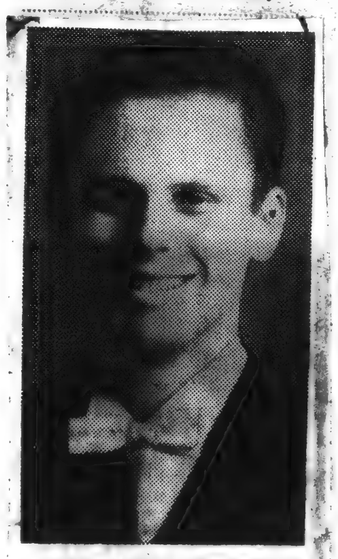
ERICH LEINSDORF

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood July 3 and 4 at 8 p.m., and Sunday, July 5, at 2:30 p.m. He will present music of Mozart Friday and Saturday evenings, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist at both concerts. Sunday afternoon he will conduct music by Haydn, with Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni as soloists, and end the program with the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" for orchestra, chorus and soloists.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 194,795

JUL 5 1964



PIANIST Malcolm Frager is soloist with Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Saturday, starting at 2:30.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 1, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Citizen (e)
WINSTED, Conn.
Circ. 3,681

JUN 2 4 1964

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. —Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood next Friday and Saturday at 8 p. m. (July 3-4 and Sunday at 2:30 (July 5). He will present music of Mozart Friday and Saturday evenings, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist at both concerts. Sunday afternoon he will conduct music by Haydn, with Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni as soloists, and end the program with the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" for orchestra, chorus and soloists.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

RAVENNA HERALD
[illegible] 26, 1964

Berkshire Festival Opens Next Week

THE MUSIC SHED AT TANGLEWOOD will be the scene of the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 p. m. (July 3-4) and Sunday afternoon (July 5) at 2:30. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, will conduct the music of Mozart Friday and Saturday, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist both evenings, and music by Haydn Sunday afternoon, including the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with chorus and soloists. The Berkshire Festival will continue for eight weekends through Sunday, August 23.

5 TH.

35

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN. 1,283,785

5 1964

FESTIVAL TIME IN THE BERKSHIRES—A picnic-like atmosphere prevails outside the Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., where an overflow crowd, complete with blankets, chairs, babies and food, gathers on the lawn to listen to concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The festival, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, will continue through August 23.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 6 1964

BSO President at Tanglewood

BSO PRESIDENT of the board of trustees Henry B. Cabot and Mrs. Cabot of Dover in the box section at Tanglewood for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUL 12 1964

Tanglewood Broadcast Sat., July 18

WCBR will broadcast the opening 1964 Tanglewood concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday, July 18, in stereophonic sound beginning at 8:25 p.m. The concert, given July 3 in the Music Shed at the Berkshire Festival, is an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The program opens with the March in D, K. 237, followed by the Serenade in D, K. 203, with Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. After an intermission, the program will offer the Piano Concerto number 15 in B-flat, K. 450, with Claudio Arrau as soloist and the Symphony in C number 36, K. 425, the "Linz" symphony. Both the March and the Serenade were played for the first time at the Festival in this concert.

36

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, July 2, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE LOCAL
[illegible]

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, July 4, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

047
PORT JERVIS UNION GAZETTE
Thursday, June 25, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MIDDLETOWN RECORD
Thursday, June 25, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

[illegible] UNION
[illegible], 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

JUL 4 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUN 28 1964

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 161,219 SUN. 304,523

JUN 28 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

JUN 27 1964

PORT JERVIS, N.Y.
UNION GAZETTE
D. 4,100

JUN 25 1964

CAIRO, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

JUL 2 1964

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105

JUN 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 92,729

JUN 27 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,047

JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUN 27 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUN 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787

JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

R. I. Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 12,221

JUN 26 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

JUN 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 168,428

JUN 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 2 1964

wEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News
AGAWAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,300

JUN 25 1964

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) will open this week with concerts by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday (July 3, 4, & 5), and a Chamber Music Concert on Tuesday (June 30) by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, Musical Director. The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will begin its activities at the same time, holding its traditional Opening Exercises this afternoon (Sun., June 28), an event to which the public is cordially invited.

Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his second season as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has planned all-Mozard programs for the Friday and Saturday evening concerts (Juy 3-4, 8 p.m.) and an all-Haydn program for Sunday afternoon (July 5, 2:30 p.m.). Five of the eight Mozart works to be played will be heard for the first time at the Berkshire Festival. All three Haydn works will be new to the Festival, and the final work Sunday afternoon, Haydn's Cantata "Applausus", will be an American premier. Soloists for the weekend will be Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Claudio Arrau, pianist; Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass-baritone. The Festival Chorus will perform in the Haydn Cantata. As in the past, next weekend's programs are planned for a chamber orchestra of approximately fifty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will take place in the 6000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood.

The first Berkshire Festival Chamber Music Concert will be given by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, Musical Director, next Tuesday evening (June 30) at 8 p.m. in the 1200-seat Theatre. For the Pro Musica's fifth appearance at Tanglewood, Mr. Greengerg has planned a program of Elizabethan music to honor the 400th birthday of William Shapespeare, whose plays contain many allusions to the music of his time.

Tickets for the opening Berkshire Festival concerts are available at the Festival Ticket Office at the Main Gate Tanglewood, which is open every day from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. and from 9 a.m. through the intermission on concert day.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248

JUN 26 1964

Berkshire Festival

Concerts of the 1964 season will take place in the 6,000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

The 1964 Berkshire Festival tarnoon, July 5, at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will open with concerts by by the New York Pro Musica Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, July 3, 4, and 5, and a chamber music concert on Tuesday, June 30, by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, musical director.

The Berkshire Music Center, which is the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will begin its activities at the same time, holding its traditional opening exercises on June 28, to which the public is cordially invited.

Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his second season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has planned all-Mozart programs for the Friday and Saturday evening concerts, July 3-4, 8 p.m., and an all-Haydn program for Sunday afternoon, July 5, at 2:30 p.m.

The chamber music concert by the New York Pro Musica will be the Pro Musica's fifth appearance at Tanglewood. A program of Eliabethan music will honor the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare.

Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make voluntary contributions to its support, will have the opportunity to hear two programs by members of the music center next Sunday, July 5. The first in a series of music by J. S. Bach will be Sunday morning at 10 a.m. in the theatre. On Sunday evening at 8 p.m. there will be a program of chamber music in the theatre.

Tickets are available at the Festival Ticket Office at the Main Gate of Tanglewood, open every day from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. and from 9 a.m. through the intermission on concert days.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, July 11, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

[illegible] RECORD
[illegible], 1964

CHATHAM, N. Y.
COURIER
W. 3,900

JUL 2 1964

Music

All-Mozart Program At Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival, will continue his intention to emphasize certain areas of the repertory in the Orchestra's concerts next weekend. He will combine Music for Chamber Orchestra with Music for Festivals. The program Friday evening, July 10, will consist of music by Schubert. Saturday evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, will be soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413.

On Saturday, July 4, at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed in an all-Mozart program which will consist of the Divertimento in F major, K. 247; the Piano Concerto in D major, K. 451, with Claudio Arrau as soloist; and the Symphony in G minor, K. 500. Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 he will conduct an all-Haydn program: the Symphony No. 39, in G minor; the Aria of Beatrice from Haydn's setting of Cimarosa's "I due supposti Conti," with Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; and the American premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with Helen Boatwright, soprano; Miss Vanni; Charles Bressler, tenor; Donald Bell, bass; and the Festical Chorus.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

JUN 28 1964

Strauss at Tanglewood

Many musical programs in recent years have been wholly or partially commemorative. Anniversaries of famous composers born, or who died, 100 or 150 years previously have been numerous. The list has included Verdi and Wagner, Liszt and Chopin, Mahler, Debussy, MacDowell, Brahms and Schumann, and during the appropriate period more of their music than usual has been performed in concerts and recitals.

At Tanglewood, as elsewhere, tribute has been paid to these men. This year it is Richard Strauss. A dozen or more of his compositions are to be presented in the Music Shed, where concerts start this week, the 27th series at the present location. It was 30 years ago this summer that the first Berkshire Music Festival, directed by Henry Hadley in its "tentative" stage, took place at the Hanna Farm in Stockbridge.

Strauss was born in Munich, June 11, 1864. Though he lived until 1949, most of his best work had been completed by the time he was 50; after that he sometimes rewrote himself. The colorful symphonic poems were composed before he was 35; five of them are on the Tanglewood programs — "Don Juan," "Don Quixote," "Death and Transfiguration," "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and "Ein Heldenieben," with which Erich Leinsdorf will conclude this year's festival. The operas, from which several excerpts will be presented, came later.

Richard Strauss, though unrelated to the waltz king Johann, turned out some lilting rhythms of his own in three-quarter time, particularly in "Der Rosenkavalier," the waltz sequence from which will regale an August Sunday afternoon audience. Among his other works, some seldom heard, will be "Burleske," with Lorin Hollander at the piano, and "Die Tageszeiten," featuring the Harvard Glee Club.

Other outstanding pianists to appear include Malcolm Frager, Claudio Arrau, Jorge Bolet and Van Cliburn, the latter in the Brahms first concerto, in D minor; last year he played the second, in B flat. The veteran conductor Leopold Stokowski is to make his first appearance at Tanglewood. Eugene Ormandy is another of several guest conductors; Mr. Ormandy will be music director of the new summer center for the performing arts at Saratoga, N. Y., to open in 1966, with the Philadelphia Orchestra in residence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the keystone of the whole Tanglewood structure. Yet Tanglewood is more than the magnificent concerts in the Shed. It is a music center unsurpassed, not only for hearing the best of Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner and other masters at its best but also for the serious study of music in many forms under expert guidance. Tanglewood always generates expectancy, and redeems the pledge.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678

JUL 2 1964

A Salute to Monteux at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will dedicate a portion of its opening concert at Tanglewood to the memory of Pierre Monteux. Tomorrow night's concert will include the "Kyrie" from Mozart's "Mass in C Minor" in honor of the conductor, who died Monday.

Mr. Monteux was music director of the orchestra from 1919 to 1924 and had appeared with the group, as its guest conductor, 61 times since then.

Soloist for the "Mass" will be soprano Helen Boatwright. The Berkshire Festival Chorus will be used for the choral sections of the performance. Mr. Monteux conducted the summer concerts at Tanglewood on 31 occasions, the last Aug. 4, 1963.

Erich Leinsdorf, present conductor of the Boston Symphony, said "Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music. An irreplaceable element of music has left us." Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Mozart work tomorrow night.

The president of the Boston Symphony trustees, Henry B. Cabot, said of Mr. Monteux: "He had, and will continue to have, a prominent place in the hearts of all of those connected with the Boston Symphony." And Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops and longtime associate of Mr. Monteux said, "It has been my honor to have known Pierre Monteux since 1918. To me he was a real musician's musician. The entire world will mourn the passing of this great conductor and gentleman."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
JUL 2, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
SERVICE

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
FRIDAY, JULY 3, 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

JUN 30 1964

Buffalo Evening News
D. 233,236 SUN. 296,860

JUL 3 1964

Berkshire Festival Opens Tonight; Concert in Delaware Park Sunday

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf will open the Berkshire Festival this evening with an all-Mozart program, the first in a series of musical "one-man shows," in the music shed at Tanglewood, Mass.

The opening program will feature pianist Claudia Arrau in the Mozart Concerto K450. Mr. Arrau also will be soloist in the Independence Day program, another all-Mozart event.

Music of Haydn will be presented Sunday afternoon at 2:30, with the Festival Chorus and soloists in the little-heard cantata, "Applausus." Ensuing programs:

Tuesday, 8 PM, chamber program with pianist Ralph Berkowitz; Wednesday, 8 PM, Friends of Music concert; Thursday, 8 PM, Berkshire Music Center concert, conductor Richard Burgin.

Friday, all-Schubert program, Mr. Leinsdorf, Festival Chorus and soloists in the Mass in E Flat; Saturday, all-Mozart program, Mr. Leinsdorf, pianist Malcolm Frager in the Concerto K413.

ERICH LEINSDORF
Boston Symphony Maestro

38

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 12,100

JUL 4 1964

Weekend Concert

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tangelwood, has planned an all-Mozart program for tonight's July 4th, 8 p.m. concert. An all-Haydn program is planned for Sunday, July 5th, at 2:30 p.m.

All three Haydn works will be new to the Festival, and the final work Sunday afternoon, Haydn's Cantata "Applausus," will be an American premiere.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435

JUN 28 196

Berkshire Music Festival Will Open on Tuesday

MUSIC LOVERS EVERYWHERE are familiar with the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox. The summer residence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its summer center for the advance study of music is located on a 210-acre estate overlooking Lake Mahkeenac, between Lenox and Stockbridge.

A series of concerts by a chamber orchestra, made up of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given on Friday and Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. and again on July 10, 11, and 12. Eighteen concerts by the full orchestra will be presented on Fridays and Saturdays at 8 p.m. and on Sundays at 2:30 p.m., beginning July 17 through Aug. 23, and the popular chamber music presentations again will be given on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m., beginning this week until Aug. 18.

Annual highlights of the Tanglewood schedule include the appearance of Arthur Fiedler in the "Boston Pops at Tanglewood" concert on July 22 and the Gala Evening for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center on Aug. 19. This summer's session will include the Festival of Contemporary American Music from Aug. 9 to 13 for the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Many prominent guest artists will appear throughout the season. As in the past eight open rehearsals of the orchestra will be held on Saturday mornings at 10 a.m. during the festival.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

JUL 5 1964

American Premiere Today Planned at Tanglewood

Season's First Sunday Afternoon Concert to Feature Haydn's 'Applausus'

LENOX—Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct an all-Haydn program this afternoon in the Music Shed at Tanglewood starting at 2.30. The selected program for the first Sunday afternoon concert in the 22d season of the Berkshire Music Festival includes: Symphony No. 39 in G minor; the Aria of Beatrice from Haydn's setting of Cimarosa's "I due supposti Conti," with Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; and the American premiere of Haydn's cantata "Applausus" with Helen Boatwright, soprano, Miss Vanni, Charles Bressler, tenor, Donald Bell, bass, and the Festival Chorus.

Emphasize Areas

Mr. Leinsdorf will continue his intention to emphasize certain areas of the repertory in the orchestra's concerts this week. He will combine music for chamber orchestra with music for festivals. Mr. Leinsdorf has defined his term "music for festivals" as that which is out of the ordinary and more suited to a summer festival performance than to a regular winter season concert. The concerts wil take place in the Music Shed next Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 and next Sunday afternoon (July 12) at 2.30.

The program Friday evening will consist of music by Schubert. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin with the Symphony No. 3, in D Major. After an intermission he will conduct Schubert's Mass in E-flat Major, No. 6, D. 950, with Saramae Endich, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena, tenors; Donald Bell, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt. Both of the Schubert works will be performed for the first time at the dicated to the memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith(July 13, 1881 — Oct. 9, 1963,) who founded the Festival and was a key figure in plans for building the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

The Saturday morning open rehearsal, which is held for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, will begin at 10 in the Music Shed.

Saturday Evening

Saturday evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, will be solist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F Major, K, 413.

Mr. Frager won the coveted Leventritt Award in 1959 and the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium Competition in 1960. He is making his second appearance at Tanglewood. Helen Boatwright, soprano, will be heard in Mozart's Scene ("Ch'io me scordi di te") with Rondo ("Non temer, amato bene") for Soprano and Piano Obbligato, K. 505. Mr. Frager will join the orchestra in the Piano Obbligato. The piano concerto and the Scene and Rondo will be first festival performances. The program will begin with the Serenade in B-flat Major for 13 wind instruments, K. 361, and the Six German Dances, K. 509.

Next Sunday afternoon (July 12) Joseph Silverstein, who is completing his second season as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1 in B-flat Major, K. 207, which will be new to the festival programs. Mr. Leinsdorf will close the program with the American premiere of Richard Strauss' complete incidental music to "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's comedy-ballet, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Op. 60.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra performed excerpts from this work at a White House concert March 31, when Lynda and Luci Johnson were hostesses to some 200 teen-age children of the embassy delegations.

For the complete work Sunday afternoon the orchestra will be joined by soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Donald Bell, bass; Mac Morgan, narrator; and by the Tanglewood Choir, prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt. The program will open with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

The Tuesday evening chamber music concert at 8 in the theater will be a violin recital by Joseph Silverstein with Ralph Berkowitz at the piano. They will perform Schubert's Rondo Brillante, Op. 70; the Sonata in E-flat Major by Richard Strauss; and Beethoven's Sonata in G Major. All the Tuesday evening chamber music concerts are presented for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center's Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund.

Six programs by members of the Berkshire Music Center will be open this week to friends of the Music Center, those who contribute to the support of the center with a voluntary contribution. At 10 this morning the first program in a series of music by J. S. Bach will take place in the theater. At 8 p. m. there will be a chamber music program in the Chamber Music hall.

On Wednesday at 8 p. m. the music center will present a chamber music concert in the Chamber Music hall, and Thursday evening at 8 the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, will give its first concert of the season in the theater. Next Sunday (July 12) at 10 a. m. there will be music of J. S. Bach in the Theater and a chamber music program at 8 p. m. in the Chamber Music Hall.

Pop Concert Tickets Go on Sale Monday

LENOX—Tickets for the annual Tanglewood concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra will go on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office Monday morning. The concert will take place Wednesday evening, Jul y22, at 8 in the 6000-seat Music Shed. General admission tickets to the lawns will not be sold in advance but will be available two hours before concert time.

This will mark Mr. Fiedler's 11th annual visit to Tanglewood to conduct a Boston pops concert. He is celebrating his 35th year as conductor of the pops. Proceeds from the sale of tickets will go to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension institution.

The Herald Statesman
YONKERS, N. Y.
D. 47,418

JUL 2 1964

Music Festival Opens Tomorrow At Tanglewood

By JEAN SUTTI

The Berkshire Festival will begin its annual summer season this weekend with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts featuring works by Mozart and Haydn.

Tomorrow and Saturday evening programs will be devoted to Mozart, and Sunday afternoon the orchestra will present three works by Haydn, one of which will make its American premiere at that time. Joseph Silverstein, Claudio Arrau, Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler, and Donald Bell will be soloists concerts at 2:30 p.m., the Festival will present soloists and ensembles in a series of Tuesday evening chamber music programs, held in the theater at Tanglewood. And on Saturday mornings at 10 a.m., the public will be able to hear the orchestra in open rehearsal in the Music Shed, proceeds to benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Mr. Leinsdorf, a former resident of Larchmont, will conduct six chamber music programs and nine of the eighteen programs by the full orchestra. Appearing as guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski.

Arthur Fiedler, now in his 35th year as conductor of the Pops Orchestra, will be making his eleventh visit to Tanglewood, for the annual Boston Pops concert July 22. Proceeds from the concert will go to the Boston Symphony's pension fund.

Full information concerning tickets and programs may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Musicology

The Festival, in addition to its concert schedule, will present a number of programs for students of music this summer. From July 13-15, eleven distinguished American musicologists will appear at a symposium to discuss trends, techniques and the historical background of eighteenth and nineteenth-century music.

The participants will deliver papers on various topics at each of six sessions, and a panel and audience discussion will follow. The symposium is open to members of the Music Center, faculty and general public.

Secondary school and college music teachers have been invited to attend a four-week seminar in contemporary music which the Festival will sponsor from July 27 to Aug. 23. Scholarships are available for the seminar, which will include lectures, classes, observation of rehearsals and performance workshops.

Faculty for the seminar will include Peter Gram Swing, Gunther Schuller, Edwin London, Carl Berky, Alfred Nash Patterson, William Gibson and George Zazofsky. The program is being financed by a grant from the Music Educators National Conference, which in turn received a million dollar grant from the Ford Foundation to conduct a six-year Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education.

Information and applications should be directed to Harry J. Kraut, Administrator, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

A three-week course in conducting has been added to the Music Center's schedule this summer, and qualified applicants will have the opportunity to study technique with and observe the work of Mr. Leinsdorf, Richard Burgin, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Max Rudolf and Gunther Schuller.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal Record
AMHERST, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,205
JUL 2 1964

39

Tanglewood Opens 22nd Season; Leinsdorf and Copeland At Lenox

THE MUSIC SHED AT TANGLEWOOD will be the scene of the first weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 p.m. (July 3-4) and Sunday afternoon (July 5) at 2:30. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, will conduct the music of Mozart Friday and Saturday, with Claudio Arrau as guest pianist both evenings, and music by Haydn Sunday afternoon, including the American Premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with chorus and soloists. The Berkshire Festival will continue for eight weekends through Sunday, August 23.

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., has begun its 22nd season and will present an ambitious schedule of musical works through the summer months.

The Berkshire Music Center is the Boston's Symphony orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music. In addition to the scheduled orchestral and chamber music concerts students, many of them highly skilled professionals, will participate in seminars and classes to further their knowledge of the musical world. In his opening remarks on Sunday Erich Leinsdorf, who is in his second season as music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, told the 245 student members that the center's aim was "to build a bridge between school and professional life."

To the performers in his audience Leinsdorf urged them to become more totally aware of the scope of musical endeavor.

To the composers among the center's members he said, "It is my own avowed purpose to come to grips here at the Berkshire Music Center with the foremost problem which has beset music in the last few decades, and that is the alienation of the public from the work of the contemporary composer."

ERICH LEINSDORF, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cites Philosophical Problem

"The philosophical problem of the creative artist is how to find the proper way of expressing himself without indulging in ways unintelligible to contemporary ears."

To the members registered in the center's listening and analysis department he said, "We need high standards of appreciation. It is not enough that our professional critics should have high standards. We need critical ability in our public...

"The ultimate aim is to bring the public of this country to a keener awareness of quality—because only through public pressure will our entire musical establishment improve."

Director of the music school at Tanglewood is famed composer Aaron Copeland. Associate director is the long-time first violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin.

From July 3 through August 23 the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard on Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 o'clock and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. All symphonic concerts will take place in the 6000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate in Lenox, which is the summer home of the orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf will also continue the Saturday morning open rehearsals in the Music Shed at 10 a.m., which are given for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

During the 1964 Festival season the Boston Symphony orchestra will present music from four areas of the repertory: 1) music for festivals; 2) contemporary music; 3) Richard Strauss cycle; 4) music for chamber orchestra. The first two weekends, July 3-4-5, July 10-11-12, will be devoted to music for chamber orchestra, including lesser-known works of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss. The remaining six weekends of concerts will be given by the full Boston Symphony orchestra.

Boston Pops Tickets On Sale July 6

Tickets for the annual Tanglewood concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra will go on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office Monday morning, July 6, at 9 a.m. The concert will take place Wednesday evening, July 22, at 8 p.m. in the 6000-seat Music Shed. General admission tickets to the lawns will not be sold in advance but will be available two hours before concert time.

This will mark Arthur Fiedler's eleventh annual visit to Tanglewood to conduct a Boston Pops concert. He is celebrating his 35th year as conductor of the Pops. Proceeds from the sale of tickets will go to the Boston Symphony orchestra's pension institution.

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 194,795
JUN 28 1964

Berkshire Festival Begins at Tanglewood

THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL, which begins its 27th season this week, gets under way officially on Friday with an all-Mozart concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the program.

Leinsdorf, who begins his second season at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home, said that this year's eight-week series of concerts in the Berkshire hills may be roughly categorized into four areas. They are music for festivals, contemporary music, the Strauss cycle and music for chamber orchestra.

In the first area, two American premieres and two other works that have not been performed at Tanglewood previously have been included. The first of these will be the American premiere of Haydn's cantata "Applausus." Soloists for this program, to be held at the Music Shed next Sunday, will be Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bressler and Donald Bell. The second is an all-Strauss program July 11 that features his three-act concert version of "Der Burger als Edelmann" based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

In the second area, contemporary music, Leinsdorf has scheduled a number of significant contemporary compositions with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago from Aug. 9 to 13. Included in these concerts will be performances of Barber's "Symphony No. 1," Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra" and Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

In addition to the concert version of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," a number of other important works by Richard Strauss, among them several lesser known compositions, have been programmed for the Strauss centennial. Notable among these are the first Berkshire Festival performances of "Tagesgeiten," in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be joined by the Harvard Glee Club; "Three Hymns" after the text by Friedrich Holderlin to be sung by Phyllis Curtin; and Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten." Strauss' "Parergon," a left-handed piano concerto that had its only American performance in 1934, and his "Burleske" also will have their Tanglewood premieres.

Music for chamber orchestra, the fourth area, will receive equal exposure by chamber orchestras composed of members of the Boston Symphony. Composers whose music will be heard in the portion of the festival include Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Strauss.

Also highlighting this season's festival will be the annual "Boston Pops at Tanglewood" concert that will be conducted by Arthur Fiedler and the annual "Gala Evening" for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer center where young artists may continue their professional training under the guidance of eminent musicians. Programs for both of these concerts have not been announced as yet.

THE MUSIC SHED at Tanglewood is the scene of the Berkshire Festival which begins Friday, lasts eight weekends.

40 REVIEWS.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

JUL 5 1964

Music: At Tanglewood

Small Orchestra Opens Berkshire Festival

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 3—Rain threatened, but an audience of 5,045 came to the Shed at Tanglewood anyway for the opening concert Friday night of the Berkshire Music Festival.

As usual in the early weeks of the festival, a curtailed Boston Symphony was present, since part of the orchestra is home playing the Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River.

Consequently, Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston's conductor, again had the welcome necessity of reaching into the fresh realm of small orchestra literature for his opening night. He came up with a program all by Mozart, just as tomorrow night's will be, and Sunday afternoon's will be all by Haydn.

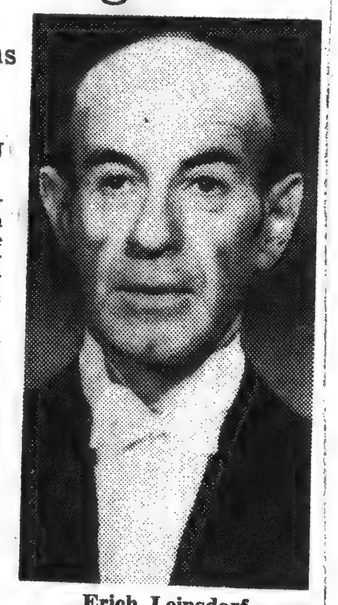
The novelties Friday night were a brief curtain raiser, the March in D (K. 237) and an eight-movement Serenade in the same key (K. 203).

The soloist of the evening was Claudio Arrau, playing the familiar B flat Piano Concerto (K. 450).

As a whole, Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra were firm, assured and always rich in tone. They were a little diffident, however, during the serenade, but then it is quirky, with turns of phrase that sound as though they're trying to be un-Mozartian.

The serenade is more direct—and has less mystery and complexity hidden between the lines—than usual for Mozart. Nevertheless, it is engaging music and would benefit from a more emphatic style of playing than it received tonight.

There is a small violin concerto buried in the midst of the serenade making up movements two, three and four. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was the soloist, and he played sweetly, in a restrained manner that was highly affecting.



Erich Leinsdorf

In the piano concerto, Mr. Arrau did not bother with the silken-toned, silvery fingered stereotype that many pianists try for. His was articulate, clearly spoken Mozart, communicated with care.

His tone was bright, sometimes even hard, but everything about his playing was to a musical purpose. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra, in support, were tenderer than their soloist. The contrast was fascinating.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra also gave a joyous reading of the "Linz" Symphony (K. 425).

There was an unscheduled event at the concert, a sad and moving one. Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra and the Berkshire Festival Chorus and Helen Boatwright, soprano, in the Kyrie from Mozart's Mass in C. It was given in memory of Pierre Monteux, who was one of the festival's most beloved conductors. Mr. Monteux died Wednesday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

JUL 5 1964

MOZART WORKS DRAW APPLAUSE AT TANGLEWOOD

Two Concertos Played By Arrau Cheered By 6943

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Claudia Arrau's view of Mozart with the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Erich Leinsdorf drew more cheers Saturday night on his second appearance this season with the orchestra at Tanglewood.

Written Rapidly

Shouted approval followed their performance of the 16th Piano Concerto (K451) as it had when they played the 15th (K450) Friday.

The concertos are two of four written rapidly in 1784 for performance at a series of subscription concerts and apparently were calculated to be crowd-pleasers because of the brilliant pianistic display they demand.

Arrau's experience, skill and good taste were equal to the task. Saturday night he gave the jaunty first movement in the 16th less percussiveness than he did the beginning of the 15th Friday, but the piano sound was always in the foreground. The subtle delicacy he gave to the dynamic changes rather than in variance of phrasing and, of course, in a nearly intuitive collaboration provided by Leinsdorf and the orchestra.

Dynamic Subtlety

Although this dynamic subtlety was evident all through, it was most noticeable during the placid second movement. The exceptions, of course, came during the cadenzas when, without the orchestra, he gave the phrasing a more variable, less rigorous timing.

Before and after the concerto were displays of Mozart at his most playful and most passionate—most playful with a divertimento (K247) which opened the program and passionate with Symphony No. 40 (K550) after intermission.

The divertimento, six movements introduced by a little march (K248) was 36 minutes of cheerful party music from a 20-year-old composer and played with a velvety feel and liquid motion.

Supple, Silky

It was supple and silky, as nimble as chamber music and graced by a pair of mellow French horns that added filling to the polished chords produced by the 37 string players.

The Symphony No. 40 was written by a different Mozart (age 32), a disappointed genius writing his next to last symphony.

He chose to put it in a minor key and left out the drums and trumpets. But even though the composer's irrepressible capriciousness shows through, the general atmosphere is one of sadness.

Most Popular

The 40th is one of music's most popular symphonies and Leinsdorf's augmented chamber orchestra sent it floating with calm assurance over the heads of 6943 listeners in the Shed and (in spite of the chill) on the lawns.

This afternoon at 2.30 the orchestra, four soloists and the festival chorus will give an all-Haydn program including the first performance in America of the cantata "Applausus."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 9 1964

REVIEW
MUSIC MOUNTAIN

GRACE NOTES: MUSIC IN TANGLEWOOD

By C. N. D.

About 5000 listeners defied threatening weather on Friday evening to attend the first summer concert at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, in an all-Mozart program departed from the printed schedule to pay tribute to the late Pierre Monteux, who had often directed the Tanglewood concerts in the past decade, with a moving performance of the Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass.

The first half of the program consisted of "early Mozart," a March in D Major and a Serenade in D Major. The serenade was interesting because three of its movements approximate a violin concerto with many tricky but cliche-ridden cadenzas. Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, played them magnificently.

The high point of the work and of the evening, for that matter, was the fifth movement, which was dominated by the oboe in a melody of uncommon beauty against a murmuring accompaniment of the orchestra.

After the intermission Claudio Arrau was the soloist in the B Flat Major Piano Concerto (K. 450). The concerto was ably played, and the orchestra background was magnificent. The program ended with the Linz Symphony, a work which Mozart wrote in five days.

Saturday Evening

Saturday evening's Mozart program was planned very much like the preceding evening. An early work, another piano concerto, and one of the great late symphonies. As on Friday evening, Claudio Arrau was the soloist, this time in the D Major (K. 451) Concerto. His playing was always accurate and dependable. The sound that came from the piano, however, in those single note melodies found in all the Mozart piano concertos, was inclined to be wooden.

Mr. Leinsdorf's setting for the concerto was perfect. Where else in the world is there a combination of orchestra and conductor that can furnish such a background for a solo concerto?

The Divertimento and March in D, written for strings and two horns has that disarming simplicity of all the early "party music" that Mozart created on order, and it was given just the right amount of verve and color to make it ingratiating. After the intermission came the G Minor Symphony. This was taken at a very leisurely tempo with plenty of time to underline all of its many beauties.

A somewhat larger audience than on the previous evening applauded the conductor and soloist with rapture, and called them back many times.

Sunday Afternoon

On Sunday afternoon, the orchestra, conductor and soloists distinguished themselves in an all-Haydn program of works, played at Tanglewood for the first time. The first number, an early Haydn Symphony in G Minor had drama and drive that was a revelation to those who had heard only the long-accepted Haydn works. Long, eloquent pauses in the first movement paced a dynamic equality in the music that never let up during the entire program.

An aria which Haydn added to a performance of an opera by Cimarosa when he conducted it in Eisenstadt in 1789 was a fine vehicle for the lovely high notes of the mezzo-prano, Helen Vanni.

After the intermission came the first performance in America of a Cantata Applausus, a work dedicated to an Austrian monastery. It consists of eight movements and employs an orchestra, four soloists and a chorus. The opening Sinfonia, for orchestra is a rousing piece and the final number for orchestra and chorus might become a favorite "concert number."

The middle movements are arias and duets for the soloists with obligatos for the violin and harpsichord. The remarkable thing about each vocal solo is that each singer has one or more florid cadenzas written in an instrumental idiom which takes immense vocal technique. The four singers, Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass, handled their parts with great success, and covered themselves with glory.

40 REVIEWS.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
JUL 5 1964

Music: At Tanglewood

Small Orchestra Opens Berkshire Festival

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 3—Rain threatened, but an audience of 5,045 came to the Shed at Tanglewood anyway for the opening concert Friday night of the Berkshire Music Festival.

As usual in the early weeks of the festival, a curtailed Boston Symphony was pres[illegible] the orchestra is home playing the Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River.

Consequently, Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston's conductor, again had the welcome necessity of reaching into the fresh realm of small orchestra literature for his opening night. He came up with a program all by Mozart, just as tomorrow night's will be, and Sunday afternoon's will be all by Haydn.

The novelties Friday night were a brief curtain raiser, the March in D (K. 237) and an eight-movement Serenade in the same key (K. 203).

The soloist of the evening was Claudio Arrau, playing the familiar B flat Piano Concerto (K. 450).

As a whole, Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra were firm, assured and always rich in tone. They were a little diffident, however, during the serenade, but then it is quirky, with turns of phrase that sound as though they're trying to be un-Mozartian.

The serenade is more direct—and has less mystery and complexity hidden between the lines—than usual for Mozart. Nevertheless, it is engaging music and would benefit from a more emphatic style of playing than it received tonight.

There is a small violin concerto buried in the midst of the serenade making up movements two, three and four. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was the soloist, and he played sweetly, in a restrained manner that was highly affecting.

Erich Leinsdorf

In the piano concerto, Mr. Arrau did not bother with the silken-toned, silvery fingered stereotype that many pianists try for. His was articulate, clearly spoken Mozart, communicated with care.

His tone was bright, sometimes even hard, but everything about his playing was to a musical purpose. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra, in support, were tenderer than their soloist. The contrast was fascinating.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra also gave a joyous reading of the "Linz" Symphony (K. 425).

There was an unscheduled event at the concert, a sad and moving one. Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra and the Berkshire Festival Chorus and Helen Boatwright, soprano, in the Kyrie from Mozart's Mass in C. It was given in memory of Pierre Monteux, who was one of the festival's most beloved conductors. Mr. Monteux died Wednesday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUL 5 1964

MOZART WORKS DRAW APPLAUSE AT TANGLEWOOD

Two Concertos Played By Arrau Cheered By 6943

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Claudia Arrau's duo of Mozart with the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Erich Leinsdorf drew more cheers Saturday night on his second appearance this season with the orchestra at Tanglewood.

Written Rapidly

Shouted approval followed their performance of the 16th Piano Concerto (K451) as it had when they played the 15th (K450) Friday.

The concertos are two of four written rapidly in 1784 for performance at a series of subscription concerts and apparently were calculated to be crowd pleasers because of the brilliant pianistic display they demand.

Arrau's experience, skill and good taste were equal to the task. Saturday night he gave the jaunty first movement in the 16th less percussiveness than he did the beginning of the 15th Friday, but the piano sound was always in the foreground. The subtle delicacy he gave to the dynamic changes rather than invariance of phrasing and, of course, in a nearly intuitive collaboration provided by Leinsdorf and the orchestra.

Dynamic Subtlety

Although this dynamic subtlety was evident all through, it was most noticeable during the placid second movement. The exceptions, of course, came during the cadenzas when, without the orchestra, he gave the phrasing a more variable, less rigorous timing.

Before and after the concerto were displays of Mozart at his most playful and most passionate—most playful with a divertimento (K247) which opened the program and passionate with Symphony No. 40 (K550) after intermission.

The divertimento, six movements introduced by a little march (K248) was 36 minutes of cheerful party music from a 20-year-old composer and played with a velvety feel and liquid motion.

Supple, Silky

It was supple and silky, as nimble as chamber music and graced by a pair of mellow French horns that added filling to the polished chords produced by the 37 string players.

The Symphony No. 40 was written by a different Mozart (age 32), a disappointed genius writing his next to last symphony.

He chose to put it in a minor key and left out the drums and trumpets. But even though the composer's irrepressible capriciousness shows through, the general atmosphere is one of sadness.

Most Popular

The 40th is one of music's most popular symphonies and Leinsdorf's augmented chamber orchestra sent it floating with calm assurance over the heads of 6943 listeners in the Shed and (in spite of the chill) on the lawns.

This afternoon at 2.30 the orchestra, four soloists and the festival chorus will give an all-Haydn program including the first performance in America of the cantata "Applausus."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 9 1964

REVIEW
MUSIC MOUNTAIN

GRACE NOTES: MUSIC IN

TANGLEWOOD
By C. N. D.

About 5000 listeners defied threatening weather on Friday evening to attend the first summer concert at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, in an all-Mozart program departed from the printed schedule to pay tribute to the late Pierre Monteux, who had often directed the Tanglewood concerts in the past decade, with a moving performance of the Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass.

The first half of the program consisted of "early Mozart," a March in D Major and a Serenade in D Major. The serenade was interesting because three of its movements approximate a violin concerto with many tricky but cliche-ridden cadenzas. Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, played them magnificently.

The high point of the work and of the evening, for that matter, was the fifth movement, which was dominated by the oboe in a melody of uncommon beauty against a murmuring accompaniment of the orchestra.

After the intermission Claudio Arrau was the soloist in the B Flat Major Piano Concerto (K. 450). The concerto was ably played, and the orchestra background was magnificent. The program ended with the Linz Symphony, a work which Mozart wrote in five days.

Saturday Evening

Saturday evening's Mozart program was planned very much like the preceding evening. An early work, another piano concerto, and one of the great late symphonies. As on Friday evening, Claudio Arrau was the soloist, this time in the D Major (K. 451) Concerto. His playing was always accurate and dependable. The sound that came from the piano, however, in those single note melodies found in all the Mozart piano concertos, was inclined to be wooden.

Mr. Leinsdorf's setting for the concerto was perfect. Where else in the world is there a combination of orchestra and conductor that can furnish such a background for a solo concerto?

The Divertimento and March in D, written for strings and two horns has that disarming simplicity of all the early "party music" that Mozart created on order, and it was given just the right amount of verve and color to make it ingratiating. After the intermission came the G Minor Symphony. This was taken at a very leisurely tempo with plenty of time to underline all of its many beauties.

A somewhat larger audience than on the previous evening applauded the conductor and soloist with rapture, and called them back many times.

Sunday Afternoon

On Sunday afternoon, the orchestra, conductor and soloists distinguished themselves in an all-Haydn program of works, played at Tanglewood for the first time. The first number, an early Haydn Symphony in G Minor had drama and drive that was a revelation to those who had heard only the long-accepted Haydn works. Long, eloquent pauses in the first movement paced a dynamic equality in the music that never let up during the entire program.

An aria which Haydn added to a performance of an opera by Cimarosa when he conducted it in Eisenstadt in 1789 was a fine vehicle for the lovely high notes of the mezzo-prano, Helen Vanni.

After the intermission came the first performance in America of a Cantata Applausus, a work dedicated to an Austrian monastery. It consists of eight movements and employs an orchestra, four soloists and a chorus. The opening Sinfonia, for orchestra is a rousing piece and the final number for orchestra and chorus might become a favorite "concert number."

The middle movements are arias and duets for the soloists with obligatos for the violin and harpsichord. The remarkable thing about each vocal solo is that each singer has one or more florid cadenzas written in an instrumental idiom which takes immense vocal technique. The four singers, Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass, handled their parts with great success, and covered themselves with glory.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JUL 6 [illegible]

Opening at Tanglewood

Leinsdorf's direction spirited, refined

By John Marshall Cuno

Lenox, Mass.

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood opened Friday night in a manner both spirited and refined. Erich Leinsdorf chose the music of Mozart and Haydn for three concerts with instrumentalists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The small ensemble, under knowledgeable conductorship, gave full and appreciative audiences a lively, classical welcome to the festival as well as a taste of music both familiar and remote by these two 18th-century men of genius.

Familiar to most listeners are the "Linz" and the G minor symphonies which impart strength and incisiveness through the composer's skill in emphasis, grouping, and color, rather than in any over-all power. The orchestra's combined strengths were heard and felt in both numbers, rendered precisely, definitely, and with persuasive authority.

Two piano concertos were played—the B flat, K. 450, and K. 451 in D—on Friday and Saturday evenings respectively, with Claudio Arrau as the able solist. In the concertos, one is constantly aware of the brightness and spontaneity of Mozart gained in a variety of ways.

In the first, it is partly the way in which the orchestra supports the soloist with light mellow chords and sustaining horns, excelling the piano in beauty if not in brightness.

In the second, it is the keyboard detail and display, together with the brilliance of the orchestra, which give evidence of a carefully designed and fully developed work of strength and grandeur.

Let it be said that Mr. Arrau comprehended these works and traversed them with concentrated exactness, but he left this listener's heart longing for a little more grace, a little more love.

* * *

The inclusion of a portion of the C minor Mass in a program with the Piano Concerto No. 15 and the Serenade in D major with its corresponding March (K. 237), served to underline also the musical versatility of Mozart who could provide, when requested, any and every sort of music from the most religious to the lightest and most popular of the day—without losing the refinement of his art.

Most immediately appealing and delightful was the entertainment music — the Serenade in D and the Divertimento in F, K. 247, with its March, K. 248. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein demonstrated his deftness and devotion to the violin in movements that virtually constituted a solo part. But as a soloist Mr. Silverstein did not touch or enthrall this listener with his intellectually bright and knowledgeable playing any more than did Mr. Arrau.

* * *

The most intensely dramatic selection of the weekend came in Haydn's cantata, "Applausus" (an American première), composed for a birthday celebration at an Austrian monastery. Written for five solo singers, chorus, and orchestra, the cantata musically endorses certain virtues seen as part of the monastery life: temperance, prudence, justice, and fortitude. One of the parts—that of the head theologian—was omitted in this performance.

Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass, formed a splendid quartet, each encompassing the peculiar attributes of his part and each taking on rather formidable vocal cadenzas.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUL 5 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

Optimism and Sorrow In Opening Concert

By McLAREN HARRIS

The opening concert in the weekend series at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Friday night contained both a glimpse of future spirits and a parting acknowledgment of the past—the optimistic renewal of the summer festival environment and a remembrance of the late and beloved Pierre Monteux.

Though the remembrance was inevitably colored with sorrow over the loss of an associate, it was the optimism which prevailed, for memory brought realization of the conductor's enduring legacy to his art. As part of an all Mozart program by Erich Leinsdorf and the Symphony, the same composer's Kyrie from the Mass in C Minor was chosen for a memorial; soaring soprano lines by Helen Boatwright in the Christe and striking, solid statements from the festival chorus built a majestic plea for mercy in the composer's language and a moving tribute for the occasion, expanded in meaning by a conception of Mr. Monteux' own lifelong devotion to the enhancement of artistic and human standards.

All-Mozart Program

The regular program consisted of Mozart's works in a more medium category — somewhat less than the greatest and greater than the least, if such as the latter are recognized. About the March in D, K. 237 and the Serenade in D, K. 203, everyone probably has his private sentiments, which may be extended to include divertimentos in general; I have mine, not wholeheartedly approving but resigned and appreciative.

Being forced to swallow in a short time what was intended to be an entire evening's fare, one comes to rest on the brighter gleams of genius, apparent perhaps in only a few movements among many. In the Serenade they arrive in the three "violin concerto" sections where Joseph Silverstein provided sufficient grace and tenderness for the principal solo passages and some labor in the cadenzas, and in the second andante, combining Ralph Gomberg's equisite oboe lines and arcs with like complement from the strings. Though the original nature of occasional pieces is rather divergent from concert performance their absence from repertoire would cause such moments to be keenly missed.

Arrau Is Soloist

Claudio Arrau was soloist for the Piano Concerto in B Flat, K. 450, an energetic and demanding work for the keyboard with sustained activity in running figures in the opening allegro and a sort of pinpoint brilliance to the finale. Mr. Arrau was definitely up to and on top of it all; his approach extracts the full tonal spectrum from his instrument, albeit at the occasional expense of sensitivity and dynamic contrast. His control seemed complete, and his intentions made up the points in question.

The orchestral story remained similar for the concerto and the concluding "Linz" symphony, No. 36 in C. Everywhere there was direction and purpose, through an effusively radiant adagio to a bright and emphatic presto accompanied by a slippage here or there in technical precision. The program as a whole seemed to tread the middle of the road from many angles; yet its substance remained esthetically intact. It is, after all, a beginning and not an end.

The Program

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, presented the season's first Berkshire Music Festival Concert at Tanglewood Friday night. Claudio Arrau was piano soloist. The Kyrie from Mozart's Mass in C Minor; with soprano Helen Boatwright and the Festival Chorus assisting, was performed in memory of Pierre Monteux.

The regular program consisted of works by Mozart: March in D Major, K 237; Serenade in D Major, K 203; Piano Concerto No. 15 in B Flat, K 450; and Symphony No. 36 in C Major, K 425, "Linz."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 4 1964

Monteux Tribute Is Offered At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Brave music lovers, who, unfrightened by early evening showers filled 5045 seats in the shed at Tanglewood Friday night for the first 1964 Berkshire Festival performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were rewarded by a profoundly moving memorial to Pierre Monteux, former Boston conductor, who died Wednesday.

All-Mozart Program

Following the first half of the all-Mozart program, the orchestra was joined by Helen Boatwright, soprano, and the 100-member Tanglewood chorus. They performed the kyrie from Mozart's C minor Mass with a depth and breadth entirely appropriate to the depth and breadth of feeling musicians and music lovers the world over had for Monteux.

He was 89, had conducted most of the world's great orchestras, was conductor of the Boston orchestra from 1919 to 1924, had guest-conducted it 92 times and was scheduled to lead it twice this summer. The orchestra and audience stood in silence with bowed heads for a moment following the kyrie.

Then, after intermission, the audience heard a superlative performance of Mozart's 15th Piano Concerto (K450) by Claudio Arrau, an old pro from Chile who is famous for his pianistic versatility.

Mozart himself considered the K450 concerto one of his most difficult. It is certainly one of the brightest and most scintillating. It seems to require 20 fingers and three arms.

Arrau began it with a tonal quality that was somewhat on the hard side, rather brittle. But it mellowed as the first movement progressed, and though still bright, was not inoffensive.

He gave the leisurely second movement a personal and sensitive quality, the third burst forth packed with joy and good cheer. At the end, some of the audience let loose a few cheers, also.

The program had opened with a five-minute march for strings of the sort Mozart wrote to start and finish his long garden party serenades and it was followed by one of the serenades, an eight-movement 40-minute piece (K203) with a delightful built-in violin concerto.

Three of the eight movements (second, third, fourth) called for much violin work which, beautifully performed by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, caused the audience to interrupt the serenade with applause.

The most satisfying movement, however, perhaps, was the sixth. It presented some virtuoso oboe solo work of great subtlety by Ralph Gomberg, who also was amply rewarded with applause.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,680
JUL 4 1964

Tribute Paid To Monteux

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival Friday night with an all-Mozart program before 5,045 who defied a heavy rainstorm.

Mozart's mass in c minor was played in tribute to the late Pierre Monteux, frequent guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. Monteux died Wednesday in Hancock, Maine at the age of 89. The soprano soloist for the performance was Helen Boatwright.

The festival at Tanglewood will continue for eight weeks.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 92,729
JUL 6 1964

Good Turnout At Opening Of Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KEYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Business was good at Tanglewood for the opening weekend of the Berkshire Festival, as 50 players of the Boston Symphony under Eric Leinsdorf played music of Mozart and Haydn. Claudio Arrau soloed in Mozart concertos on Friday and Saturday. Sunday brought the first performance in America of Haydn's 18th century cantata, "Applausus," with four soloists and the Festival Chorus.

High box office came on Saturday, when 6,943 occupied the music shed and lawns. This program included some of Mozart's "party music," written for social functions, also the first Tanglewood performance of the Piano Concerto in D major, No. 16, K. 451, ending with the very familiar and beloved Symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550.

Gazette Review

That Arrau used a score was no indication that he lacked mastery of this less familiar concerto. He was a vital part of its sustained mood of joy in the first movement, and in the second he took the lead in making phrases glow with noble sentiment and rich sympathy. The rapid third movement brought a tasteful display of fireworks. Both the long cadenza in the first movement, and the shorter one in the finale, revealed a prodigious ability to shape phrases without awkwardness or bombast.

Uneasy Spirits

It was well that the concerto opened with a long orchestral introduction; it gave several hundreds uneasy spirits (in a usually well-behaved audience) time to decide to seat themselves after intermission.

An ensemble of strings and two horns played the Divertimento in F and March in F, K. 247 and 248, as seven consecutive movements. The March, though emphatic and precise, was far more dainty in its approach than what we call march music. Leinsdorf used the Divertimento to showcase ten first violins, astonishingly accurate in phrasing. The horns were seldom heard alone, but their tone was prominent in the first Menuertto. This music remained light, though performed in terms of high technical skill.

The symphony, often called on the somber side, was not in the least melancholy on Saturday. Leinsdorf was at his happiest in the unfolding of budding themes into full bloom, then moving with utter logic and simplicity into fresh developments. The music glowed with spontaneity and naturalness, and such tricks of composition as the myriad separately articulated phrasings in the "Andante" were not allowed to overshadow the strong and vital moods of the work. The evening left the primary impression of a beauty that anyone could appreciate and treasure on the way home.

42

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,673

JUL 6 1964

Woodwinds, Strings Superb In Concert at Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf was a happy man, indeed, at the conclusion of the Friday concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood. The Boston woodwind section was in excellent form and the strings responded with more warmth and lustre than is their accustomed manner.

This was the first concert of the summer, by the orchestra, and was an all-Mozart program, chosen, in part, because of the unavailability of some of the regular Symphony players, who are still playing at the Esplanade concerts in their home town. But the men who were on-stage for the Friday concert provided the sell-out audience with a lovely evening of music.

Mozart's "March in D Major (K.237)" was the leadoff number and was dispatched with a brisk rendering by conductor Leinsdorf.

Pitch Problem

The composer's "Serenade in D Major," with violin solo played by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, was given a sensitive reading by the orchestra and Mr. Silverstein, who had a pitch problem in the second of the eight movements.

The damp weather, and not the soloist was the culprit for the intonation difficulties.

The orchestra has come to play Mozart's music much better in the last two years, thanks to the Leinsdorf concern with details of accuracy and familiarity with style.

The "Piano Concerto in B-flat No. 15" brought Claudio Arrau to the soloist's position for a spectacularly executed duet between piano and orchestra.

Arrau has that elusive quality of "taste" when it comes to playing such works. This was a full-blooded playing, not the usual delicate approach to the subject.

Mr. Leinsdorf provided a sympathetic backing for the soloist's declamations and the whole effect was one of complete empathy between all concerned.

Worth the Listening

The concerto is not one of the composer's best, the second period of the final movement being weak and ineffectual. But even bad Mozart is fair music and, provided with the interpreters like Leinsdorf and Arrau, the results can be worth the listening.

As a finale, the "Linz Symphony, No. 36" was given the added instrumentation of natural forces outside the Tanglewood shed. At one part, which is repeated later, a roll of thunder preceded the roll of the tympani by two beats and, at the repeat, was exactly that much ahead of cue again. The same happened as birds and flutes carried on an impromptu dialogue.

Well Rehearsed

Unhampered by the extraneous sounds, Mr. Leinsdorf showed that his men were able to realize the full import of the splendid score.

At the last movement, almost as though planned for the effect, the conductor rested his left hand behind his back. The orchestral players, in spite of the lack of dynamic level direction at that moment, sounded as well as they had during the previous sections of the concert.

Here was an orchestra so well rehearsed for a concert that they could play through a program though the conductor had his hands behind his back.

CLAUDIO ARRAU

Immediately before the intermission, the Kyrie from the "Mass in C minor" was played as a stirring and sad memorial to Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's former leader who died only two days previously.—(D. C.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855
JUL 6 1964

Tanglewood--I

Mozart, Haydn Open Concerts

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—In spite of rain until just minutes before the concert, Tanglewood's Boston Symphony concerts opened Friday evening before a crowd of 5045. All the music for the first week-end was by Haydn and Mozart, and I must report the presence Sunday afternoon of a group of three pickets carrying a sign, "Bring Back Bach."

Friday and Saturday there was Mozart, Sunday Haydn, all of it, of course, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf (maroon on Friday, white Saturday, and dove-grey from top to toe Sunday). Leinsdorf has done a wonderful job of enlivening the opening, small orchestra, period of Tanglewood repertory. His explorations of out-of-the-way classic music are almost without exception worthwhile, and along with the familiar beauties of Mozart's Linz and G minor symphonies, audiences this week-end were able to become acquainted with much rarer Mozart, some of it truly remarkable.

Without question the richest music played was in two piano concerts, K.450 in B flat and K.451 in D, which were performed upon the Claudio Arrau player-piano. In many respects Mr. Arrau is a player of a musical culture far ahead of most of his colleagues. His many intelligent perceptions about the music he plays are, however, realized in such ugly terms that while he can often suggest the music's interest he is incapable of suggesting also its beauty.

The large articulations are often good, but the detail is mechanical. Melodies are square and unsinging — he plays even with a kind of anti-cantabile — and regardless of phrase structure and rhythmic context, he makes entrances with the force, and often the effect, of a wrecking ball. His choice of piano is no help: I should perhaps not mention the brand name, but I do wish he would play a Steinway.

The D major Concerto, K.-451, is a much maligned work. The standard "idee recue" on it is that is is coldly brilliant and superficial. True, its language is a quasimilitary operatic one, but there is not an idea in it that is not freshly and beautifully invented. It is a less tender work than its immediate neighbors, but in excellence it is in every way their peer. I hope it will enter the repertory with greater regularity.

On Friday and Saturday respectively, Leinsdorf led the D major Serenade, K. 203 and the B flat Divertimento for Strings and a pair of horns, K.247/8. The Serenade is built much like the more celebrated "Haffner," K.250. It too has the usual serenade layout of symphony-with-extra-minuet, plus an inserted three-movement violin concerto.

It showed again that the works with names or nicknames have it all over the merely numbered ones. K.203 is consistently a work that is far superior than its far more famous counterpart. It is full of extraordinary orchestral invention — the anticipation in the second Andante of "Soave sia il vento" from "Cosi fan tutte," for example—and there are many turns of phrase and of harmony that look ahead to the ripest Schubert.

By contrast, the Divertimento is simpler, more immediately engaging, full of sharp wit and jokes almost Haydnesque in their epigrammatic point. Except when the rhythm in the Serenade finale began to get away from him a bit, Leinsdorf conducted both works aptly and much of the time quite beautifully. Joseph Silverstein's violin solo in the Serenade seemed inhumanly bland, in contrast to the many incidental oboe solos by Ralph Gomberg which were unmercifully fussy.

The Linz Symphony went well, especially its first movement in which Leinsdorf made many good points, notably the powerfully thrusting secondary accent's in the closing theme. The G minor Symphony was still slower and more contemplative than at Symphony Hall in April: it was sometimes lovelier for the greater freedom, but it occasionally hovered on the edge of nervelessness.

Before intermission Friday Leinsdorf, as a memorial for Pierre Monteux who died Wednesday, conducted the Kyrie from Mozart's C minor Mass, with the Festival Chorus and Helen Boatwright, soprano.

More tomorrow, about Haydn on Sunday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

JUL 6 1964

Striking Changes Noted In Program As Berkshire Festival Opens Season

The Berkshire Festival opened at Tanglewood at Lenox with a weekend of concerts distinguished by the performance of several works never before heard there. This is conductor Erich Leinsdorf's second season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and sovereign of Tanglewood, and he has made striking changes in programming.

On Friday night, an all-Mozart program boasted Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Claudie Arrau, pianist, as soloists. First performances at Tanglewood were March in D. K. 237 and Serenade in D, K. 203. Arrau played the Piano Concerto in B Flat. The Symph- only in C "Linz" completed the program.

Saturday evening another Mozart program included the Symphony in G. minor, and three compositions new to Berkshire audiences: March in F., K. 248; Divertimento in F., and Piano Concerto in D, with Arrau as soloist.

Sunday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf conducted an all-Hadyn program introduciing the cantata "Applausus" in its American premiere. This old work, lost for many years, has a chorus and quartet and in this concert a harpsichord was used with amplification. The program also included Haydn's Symphony No. 39, and two arias, sung by Helen Beatright, soprano In the cantata these two artists were joined by Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass, and the Berkshire Festival Chorus. Everything on the program was new to Tanglewood.

In the past, Berkshire Festival programs have been dominated by major works very familiar to concert-goers, especially regulars at Boston's Symphony Hall, with occasional adventures into 20th Century compositions. Mrs. Leinsdorf is introducing much classical music that is not so frequently heard, while leaving room for many old favorites.

Next weekend the Friday night concert will be all-Schubert, including the Symphony No. 3 and the Mass in E flat, both played for the first time at Tanglewood. Saturday's concert will be devoted to Mozart, and Sunday's will present the American premiere of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Strauss.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUL 7 1964

T-U AT THE CONCERT

Excellent Omen for Tanglewood

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

A record total of 20,315 paid admissions for the opening of the first week's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, augurs well for a successful continuation of the Berkshire Festival. The Festival is in its 30th year and the 28th with participatiion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Messrs. Koussevitzky, Munch and Erich Leinsdorf.

Series A was devoted to the music of Mozart in the Music Shed. The gaiety of Friday night's opening concert was tempered by the inclusion of the Kyrie from the Mass in C-minor as a memorial to the late Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the orchestra who passed away last week.

It was my privilege, last month, to visit the musical capital of Austria during which I trod the sacred precincts of Mozart's birthplace and his home. I received a tremendous emotional thrill to listen to the spirit of the composer, re-materialized on the stage of the Tanglewood music shed in all its pristine elegance under the consummate artistry of Mr. Leinsdorf, undoubtedly influenced by his own early directional experiences in the city of Salzburg, before he elected to become an American citiizen and resident.

Great Reception

The dapper Mr. Leinsdorf, showing no staleness after a full season of concerts in Boston and other major cities, received heart-warming reception as he took his place on the podium to conduct the opening work, Mozart's "Serenade in D-major." The maestro's graceful body stance and articulate hands and fingers, communicated the composer's message, as a skillful puppeteer controls the actions of his mari onettes.

Three superlative soloists were acclaimed: Joseph Silverstein, concert-master of the orchestra who played the incidental solos in the Serenade; Helen Boatwright, whose beautiful soprano lent authority to the portion of the Mass, and Claudio Arrau, who gave a superb reading of the piano concerto in B-flat major.

The music of Mozart, during his earlier years, is destitute of nuances as the pieces were written for the clavesin, forerunner of today's greatly improved concert grand pianos. The music demands perfect equality of the fingers, a gift which is one of the many attributes of the Chilean-born, American pianistic master.

Immaculate Rendition

Saturday night's concert also engaged the artistry of Mr. Arrau with his immaculate rendition of the Concerto in D-major. The program also included the "Divertimento" and the Symphony in G-minor.

Sunday afternoon the motivation shifted from Mozart to Joseph Haydn with the inclusion of Symphony, No. 3; an aria from Cimarosa's opera, "The Two Pseudo Counts" with Helen Vanni, scoring in the mezzo-soprano solo. The high point of the afternoon was the cantata, "Applauses" in which a quartet consisting of Miss Boatwright, soprano; Miss Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor; Donald Bell, bass; Mr. Silverstein violinist; Mrs. Irma Rogell, harpsichordist, and the Festival Chorus brought the first Tanglewood weekend to a glorious conclusion.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855

JUL 7 196-

Tanglewood--II

Haydn Program Offers An American Premiere

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—After two evenings of Mozart, Erich Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon turned to Haydn. Sadly enough, and predictably enough, this meant a falling off at the box office, from an enormous 6943 for Saturday's Mozart concert to 1974. Haydn is a man whose hour has not yet come. For too many people his name still suggests a rather inconsequentially pretty music, something not quite worthy of really serious attention.

Leinsdorf is a man who knows better. Boston and Tanglewood have been fortunate in the Haydn performances Leinsdorf has given, and there is every reason to foresee that he will continue to fight for the cause of the greatest of classical symphonists and choral composers.

Furthermore, Leinsdorf is a man who knows that Haydn wrote more than just a half-dozen symphonies (all with numbers from 88 on up); in fact, it is pleasantly reassuring to walk into the conductor's room at the Music Shed here and first thing to see the Van Hoboken Thematic Catalouge of Haydn's music.

For his program Sunday, Leinsdorf chose all more or less unfamiliar music. He began with the Symphony No. 39 in G minor, which he had played previously in Boston. Its finale is stormy and in mood similar, and not coincidentally either, to Mozart's little G minor Symphony, K. 183, written 5 years later. Most of Haydn's Symphony, his first in a minor key, is elegiac rather than angry. It represents the soft, even the sentimental, side of the emotional disturbances of around 1770. It begins incidentally with the phrase Mozart was to pick up still later for his G minor Quintet, K.516. The performance was very beautiful.

1768, the date of the Symphony No. 39, seems terribly early for anything by Haydn, yet in that year Haydn was older than Mozart ever lived to be. From early Haydn, the program moved on to the maturity of 1789, though that too is a date earlier than that of the most familiar symphonies. Helen Vanni sang a fine aria Haydn wrote for insertion into Cimarosa's "I due supposti conti."

After the intermission came the major work, the Cantata "Applausus," another work from 1768 and written for a ceremony at the Zwettl monastery in Lower Austria. The four cardinal virtues of temperance, prudence, justice and fortitude, praise the monastery, which, for its part, is represented by the Head Theologian. This was the work's American premiere.

If Leinsdorf had sneaked any one of the eight arias from "Applausus" onto a program, there would have been an immediate clamor—led, no doubt, from this column—to have the whole work performed. Well, the whole work was performed, and there was some dissatisfaction.

It consists of eight arias, separated by recitatives, preceded by a two movement overture, and followed by a chorus. The arias are long and elaborate, mostly in da capo form, and containing fanciful cadenzas for the singers and, in two instances, for obbligato instruments also. Most of the arias are slow, and, while they are beautifully made, they are also quite impersonal.

Part of the trouble lies in the text. There just is no getting excited over something like "Prosperous is the outcome of projects maturely weighed and temperately undertaken. More secure is our progress and rarer are our failures when we make haste slowly." Moreover, Haydn, who developed slowly, was in 1768 nowhere near ready to treating the recitative-cum-aria convention with the fantasy he could bring to bear on the problem 30 years later in "The Creation."

The result of it all was a certain tedium from the cumulative effect of more than 70 minutes of 18th century politeness. This was so in spite of the excellent performance the work received from Leinsdorf, the orchestra, the Festival Chorus and soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano, Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano, Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass. Miss Vanni actually had little to do here; her moment had come in the extra aria before intermission. Bell, a first-rate artist, is not quite ideal for this music only because his voice is too vibrant for it always to be quite evident just what pitch he is on. The work of Miss Boatwright and of Mr. Bressler was of perfect stylishness, virtuosity, elegance and beauty.

That the smoothness of Joseph Silverstein's violin playing is not quite adequate for 18th century music was made dramatically evident when in the second of the arias for Justitia it could be heard duetting with the extraordinary intensity of Bressler's superlative singing. The harpsichord obbligato in the first Justitia aria was played by Irma Rogell, stiffly even when accurately.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 6 1964

Music Review

Mozart and Haydn Works Open Tanglewood Season

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

The opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's weekend concerts at Tanglewood reaffirms the curious but laudable results of last year's season under Erich Leinsdorf.

Three-quarters of the dozen works heard this weekend were new to Tanglewood and one, a lovely Haydn Cantata, an American premier. There is thus far the similar restraint and frank readings Mr. Leinsdorf was so apt to create in last year's programs. But with a conservative as subtle as Mozart, the conservatism that Leinsdorf adds to it often results in a rather small sum. One might say for a July 4 weekend, there was not a great deal of independence, nor much in the way of fireworks.

Gentle Party Music

The gentle party music of Mozart's Divertimento, K247, and Serenade, K 203, with its open score and popularized style of the late 1700s, seems today to need another diversion to produce its likely success. The careful turning of each ornament and guiding of each solo-like passage made one feel the conductor was trying to be Mozart rather than to feel him. Being the composer rather than interpreting him is a rare experience for the musicological mind, but it seems some little injustice to the music.

The two Mozart piano concerti in D and B flat were more stirring. They are better works by far, but they also had the thrust of the brilliant playing of Claudio Arrau. Mr. Arrau's tone and drive was in strong contrast to the orchestra, and though it seemed perhaps raucous, it was refreshingly positive.

The two Mozart Symphonies (Linz and G minor) were most carefully performed. There is an excellence of technique in the orchestra that is described in only one word — perfect, but there was, despite the music's innate invention and persuasion, again a lack of freshness, a kind of rippleless pool in a sylvan setting.

Friday night's concert included an unscheduled performance of the Kyrie from Mozart's Mass in C minor with the Festival Chorus and soloist, Helen Boatwright. The performance was in memory of Pierre Monteux who died July 1. Much has been said of this most modest master of music, so unruffled by personal misadventure or by music's peculiar progress. We can but hope that there may be a successor in our day. It would seem such a man must be of the rarest modesty who can achieve the pinnacle of respect and admiration with qualities of intelligence, restraint, fearlessness and phenomenal artistic acumen.

Sunday's Concert

Sunday's all Haydn concert might alone have been grandly noted for the performance of the G Minor Symphony, No. 39. It has enough surprise in its controlled romance to raise by itself the question of the composer's resurgence.

The cantata "Applausus" is composed for orchestra, four soloists and a chorus for its final choral prayer. It applauds four virtues found in a monastery; Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude. In an amazing letter by the composer to the original performers (he never met), Haydn lists 11 points of advice. This list concludes with, "—for the sake of my reputation as well as your own, be as diligent as possible." The advice was surely no more closely followed than almost 200 years later when Leinsdorf led Sunday's group through the virtues that indeed appear honey-sweet in musical fragrance. The duet of Temperance and Prudence sung beautifully by Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano, added an unlisted but inevitable virtue of grace. The necessity of continuo harpsichord, especially in prominence with the exuberance of tenor Charles Bressler, was as real to the work as it was to relaxed but grateful ears.

It would appear that while some forgotten pieces uncovered by diligent search and hard work may only show a listener why the same pieces were lost in the first place, works as Haydn's "Applausus" make the light well worth the candle.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

JUL 6 1964

43

Music: Haydn Cantata at Tanglewood

Leinsdorf Is Conductor of 'Applausus' Debut

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 5—Haydn's cantata, "Applausus," is a ravishingly beautiful work. It has a calm inner glow and a sunny exterior, and it is written so that the human voice sounds almost divine. Given by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, this afternoon, it thoroughly retrieved what up to now has been a rather thin opening weekend at the Berkshire Festival.

•

The "Applausus" performance was its first in America. It was written in 1768 for a birthday celebration of an Austrian monastery.

"Applausus" celebrates the four major virtues as practiced at the monastery: Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude.

Each of the four is represented by a soloist. Temperance was sung by Helen Boatwright, soprano; Prudence by Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Justice by Charles Bressler, tenor, and Fortitude by Donald Bell, bass. The cantata ends with a mighty chorus, affirming in mood, sung by the large Berkshire Festival Chorus.

In between are arias and recitatives, just over an hour's worth. Some are peaceful, some turbulent. One, a duet between Temperance and Prudence, is of angelic beauty and can easily become a treasure of the repertory.

In it, as well as in solo arias, there were unaccompanied cadenzas that kept to the spirit of the cantata and provided time and space for the beauty of the human voice to descend perfectly on the senses. Miss Boatwright and Miss Vanni, particularly, and Mr. Bressler and Mr. Bell, too, sang in that happy way in which inner meaning, expressed with conviction, converges with beauty of outer sound.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted "Applausus" so that the orchestra played with the quick emphases and minute responses that it had merely skirted in the earlier concert of the weekend. It was a triumphant occasion.

Mr. Leinsdorf used a harpsichord (played by Irma Rögell) to excellent effect in "Applausus." If a harpsichord can sound lush, this one did, and one suspects that the microphone poked at its innards was responsible. Mr. Leinsdorf had said that the artificial amplification was an experiment, and that on it rested his decision whether to play Bach in the huge open-sided Tanglewood Shed. The experiment worked.

Today's concert opened with Haydn's G minor Symphony (No. 39), a concise, eloquent work. Miss Vanni then sang (beautifully) an aria Haydn wrote for an opera by Cimarosa.

•

Last night's concert, just as Friday night's, was all Mozart. Claudio Arrau repeated his Friday appearance with another piano concerto, No. 16 in D major, just as the night before, he played with clear articulation and a rather hard tone.

The Divertimento in F (K 247) was joined to the March in F (K 248), said to have been one piece originally, and Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra played them chastely, though the detail was not always sharply etched.

A technically smooth but interpretatively uninteresting performance of the famous G minor Symphony rounded out yesterday's concert.

4 Soloists Are Heard at Tanglewood Fete

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 24,059

JUL 7 1964

Tanglewood Program Has More Variety

LENOX, MASS. — The first week end of the eight - week Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood brought two programs of Mozart on Friday and Saturday evenings and a Sunday afternoon of Haydn music all under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. The opening concert on Friday night brought a moving performance of the Kyrie from Mozart's "Mass in C Minor," with the Festival Chorus of some 125 voices and Helen Boatwright assisting, in memory of Pierre Monteux who died on Wednesday.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919 to 1924 and its guest conductor for many years, the venerable Pierre Monteux died in his 89th year and for the thousands who looked forward to seeing him at Tanglewood each summer something went with his passing. When the Kyrie was performed at the conclusion of the first part of Friday night's program, the entire orchestra and chorus stood in silence and they were joined a minute later by the entire audience standing in rapt silence. It was a moving tribute to the memory of the man who only last summer had conducted so brilliantly on a Sunday afternoon in the Music Shed.

For the opening concert Joseph Silverstein, concertmeister, performed the violin solo in the Mozart "Serenade in D Major," given its first performance at the Festival. Leinsdorf is scheduling a number of musical selections not previously heard at the concerts and is thus continuing his purpose of introducing music not usually heard here in order to broaden the repertoire of both performers and listeners. Claudio Arrau, pianist, was heard Friday night in a brilliant performance of the Mozart "Piano Concerto No. 15 in B-flat Major" and on Saturday night he gave a first Tanglewood performance of the Mozart "Piano Concerto No. 16 in D Major." Friday night's concert also included the playing of the 'Linz' Symphony in C Major."

All Haydn

The Sunday afternoon program brought all Haydn music being given its first performance at Tanglewood. It included the "Symphony No. 39, in G Minor," the Aria of Beatrice from Cimarosa's " Due Supposti, Conti, Ossia Lo Sposo Sensa Moglie" with Helen Vanni as mezzo soprano soloist. The Cantata "Applausus" was given its first performance in America with Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass. Joseph Silverstein was violin soloist.

Before the opening of the week-end program there was a special program on Tuesday night of music of Shakespeare's time in honor of the 400th anniversary of the birth of the Bard. This was presented by the New York Pro Musica group under the direction of its musical director, Noah Greenberg. It brought the singing of many old madrigals and the playing of early music on many early instruments.

This week the programs will include music of Schubert on Friday night at 8 o'clock and music of Mozart on Saturday night. Sunday afternoon the music will be the Strauss complete music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." It is easy to see that Leinsdorf is changing the first two week-end series of the usual Mozart and Bach to something with much more variety and a good deal of innovation. Music listeners at Tanglewood are sure to broaden their knowledge through his innovations and no doubt will augment their listening pleasure. The Tanglewood Festival Season is in full force. Need one say more?

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932

The Sound of Music

Tanglewood Firsts

CLAUDIO ARRAU

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf believes a music festival should offer something special—works not generally heard during the usual winter season.

Thus the opening concerts by the Boston Symphony over the weekend at the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival included seven compositions by Mozart and Haydn heard for the first time at Tanglewood.

Sunday's all-Haydn program featured something extra special — the American premiere of the cantata, "Applausus," apparently written in 1768 by Haydn and found by the Haydn scholar, H. C. Robbins-Landon, of Boston. A smallish audience of 4,974 came bundled against a cloudy, chilly day to hear the work performed by Mr. Leinsdorf and the symphony, the festival chorus and soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass.

"Applausus" was written by Haydn for the monastery at Zwettl in Lower Austria, apparently for a birthday celebration, according to musicologists. The work "applauds" monastery life and the virtues practiced therein — temperance, prudence, justice and fortitude.

The cantata consists of a series of recitatives and arias, with an opening "sinfonia" or overture, and a closing chorus. The score is as ornate as some of the old baroque Austrian monasteries themselves, abounding in decorative embellishment and cluttered with trills.

There are moments of sublimity — the aria for soprano (Temperance) toward the end is lovely, as are the harpsichord obbligato in the first tenor solo (Justice) and the rousing final chorus. But there are also tedious patches, and most of the arias could be cut without much loss for future performance. Haydn really went to excess with some of the musical decoration. Nearly every aria, for example, contains an unaccompanied cadenza, mostly vocal.

The arias are not for the novice; they demand impeccable technique and control. Miss Vanni and Mr. Bressler traversed the cruel florid lines stylishly, and the latter even managed to make the Latin text distinguishable in his two long solos. Mr. Bell sang with power and accuracy, but his heavy voice tended to bleed and blur the notes of the florid passages. Miss Boatwright found it all simply too much to cope with, wandering off pitch and running out of gas in the midst of phrases.

The orchestral part is festive and interesting. At times, the score is broad and Handelian. Mainly, though, Haydn's accompaniments are choppy, thumping string figurations a la Vivaldi. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the orchestra scampered, burbled and gurgled good-naturedly while the singers extolled the cosmic virtues.

Two other curiosities by Haydn were on the program—the Symphony No. 39 in G minor, a strange little experimental symphony from Haydn's "storm and stress" period, and an aria supplied by Hayda for Cimarosa's opera, "I Due Supposti Conti, Ossia Lo Sposo Senza Moglie" ("The Two Fake Counts or The Husband Without A Wife"), a pleasant bit of vocalism sung with professional gloss by Miss Vanni. In the symphony, the elegant strings of the Boston Symphony especially sparkled in the Vivaldian first movement, and the stormy finale.

Both orchestra and conductor were in top form for Saturday evening's all-Mozart program, heard by 6,943 shivering, breeze-swept patrons.

The soloist was Claudio Arrau, performing the Piano Concerto No. 16 in D, K. 451, sequel to the concerto No. 15 in B flat, K. 450, which he essayed the previous evening. Fortunately, Mr. Arrau had a happier time with Saturday's concerto.

On Friday night, there was little to be said for Mr. Arrau's heavy-handed and icy approach. While the B flat concerto contains a largesse of brilliance for the soloist, Mr. Arrau's bravura style completely erased the bubbling spontaneity of the score. In the delightful rondo movement, the subtle phrasing and dynamic modulation which lies at the heart of the score were replaced by a brittle, disjointed, inflexible technique.

If the Concerto in D went better the following night, it was because the Chilean born pianist relented somewhat and followed more gentle contours. Some color and shading were allowed to creep in. Yet his tone remained steely and his trills clangorous. He made hash of the cadenzas of both concerti.

Judging from the applause, there were many in the audience who do not mind their Mozart performed in this strong armed manner. Nor were they disturbed by Mr. Arrau's use of the score, with a comely page-turner bobbing up and down with predictable regularity.

In both the early and late works of Mozart that comprised the remainder of Saturday's program the Boston Symphony showed how far it has come during Mr. Leinsdorf's tenure in grasping the Mozartean style. There were the delights of deft phrasing (the "lean-and-slide" in the appogiaturas, the dramatic crescendi of ascending lines) in the six-movement Divertimento in F, K. 247 for Strings and Two Horns—a happy blend. At one point, Mr. Leinsdorf took the orchestra down to a trembling triple piano, yet there was perfect articulation of the parts. The divertimento was preceded by the little March in F, K. 248, marred by some shrillness in the violins.

And, in the closing Symphony in G minor, No. 40, K. 550, Mr. Leinsdorf's prodigious knowledge of the Salzburg master left no detail uncovered. There was lightness, but a strong rhythmic drive underneath. The development section of the first movement and the finale smoldered with energy. At the end, there was an ovation for orchestra and conductor.

The Symphony and Mr. Leinsdorf paid a glorious musical tribute to a friend, the late Pierre Monteux, in Friday night's opening concert. Conductor of the BSO from 1919 to 1924 and a frequent guest director in recent years, Mr. Monteux led the orchestra last summer at Tanglewood, and was scheduled to appear again this year before fatigue caused him to cancel.

For the memorial to the beloved maestro, Mr. Leinsdorf chose the opening "Kyrie" section of Mozart's Mass in C minor, a work that ranks with the Requiem in exalted musical expression. Joining the Symphony were the Berkshire Festival Chorus and Miss Boatwright.

With its grave, mysterious opening, the powerful contrapuntal unfolding of the somber choral theme, and the relief from the dark masses of sound achieved through the lighter soprano solo, the Kyrie was a moving elegy for Mr. Monteux. Mr. Leinsdorf matched the young, strong voices of the chorus with a rock-solid orchestral accompaniment, building towers of magnificent sonority.

Miss Boatwright lacks the power and the range to do full justice to the soprano part. She also is given to the swaying, tormented-expression kind of emoting that adds nothing to her vocalism. But she sang sweetly and securely overall.

The weatherman did not co-operate for opening night. Thunderstorms added some off-stage percussion and the grounds were soggy and misty, holding attendance to 5,045. The foggy, foggy dew and an occasional cool breeze were treacherous for string players, and the violins (and the reeds) had obvious difficulties.

The lush, silky tone of the BSO really did not appear until the final work of the all-Mozart program, the Symphony in C, No. 36, K. 425, the "Linz." Here, too, the largish string orchestra, which tended to overwhelm the baroque delicacies of the earlier works, seemed ideal for the requirements of the Linz.

With Mr. Leinsdorf's coherent and energetic direction, and the crisp playing of his musicians, the performance was the kind of gem we have come to expect from the Symphony and its gifted conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf chose quite rapid tempi and took all repeats, yet did not neglect the fine details—like the slyly-accented "Scotch snaps" of the minuet movement's trio.

The rest of the concert was on a less exalted plane. There were problems of precision and pitch in the peppy March in D, K. 237, that opened the evening. The lengthy Serenade in D, K. 203, was gracious and entertaining but somewhat uneven in performance.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein did extraordinarily well, on this drippy evening, with his solo parts in the middle sections. Mr. Silverstein's tone was never lovelier, nor his treatment of the melodic line more fluid, than in the andante section. Oboist Ralph Gomberg was as classy as usual in his solo

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678
JUL 6 1964

Tanglewood Hears A Haydn Cantata

By THEODORE STRONGIN

Lenox, Mass. — Haydn's cantata, "Applausus," is a ravishingly beautiful work. It has a calm inner glow and a sunny exterior, and it is written so that the human voice sounds almost divine.

Given by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, it thoroughly retrieved what up to then had been a rather thin opening weekend at the Berkshire Festival.

The "Applausus" performance was its first in America. It was written in 1768 for a birthday celebration of an Austrian monastery.

"Applausus" celebrates the four major virtues as practiced at the monastery: Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude.

Each of the four is represented by a soloist. Temperance was sung by Helen Boatwright, soprano; Prudence by Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Justice by Charles Bressler, tenor, and Fortitude by Donald Bell, bass. The cantata ends with a mighty chorus, affirming in mood, sung by the large Berkshire Festival Chorus.

In between are arias and recitatives, just over an hour's worth. Some are peaceful, some turbulent. One, a duet between Temperance and Prudence, is of angelic beauty and can easily become a treasure of the repertory.

In it, as well as in solo arias there were unaccompanied cadenzas that kept to the spirit of the cantata and provided time and space for the beauty of the human voice to rescend perfectly on the senses. Miss Boatwright and Miss Vani. particularly, and Mr. Bressler and Mr. Bell, too, sang in that happy way in which inner meaning, expressed with conviction, converges with beauty of outer sound.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted "applausus" so that the orchestra payed with the quick emphases and minute responses that it had merely skirted in the earlier concert of the weekend. It was a triumphant occasion.

Yesterday's concert opened with Haydn's G minor Symphony (No. 39), a concise, eloquent work. Miss Vanni then sang (beautifully) an aria Haydn wrote for an opera for Imarosa.

(c) 1964 New York Times News Service.

(A review by Dan Cusick Knickerbock News music critic of the Friday night concert is on Page 7-A.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 6 1964

Haydn's Work Heard at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There may have been several among the 4794 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon who decided that the world would have been just as happy if Haydn's cantata "Applausus" had remained undiscovered.

Impressive Moments

For most of the 180 years since it was written to celebrate an official installation or birthday, the score lay unknown in the archives of a South Austrian monastery.

Performance at Tanglewood Sunday was the first in America and although it received fair and sometimes superior treatment in the hands of the four soloists, 42-voice chorus and orchestra and therefore provided several impressive moments, it seems unlikely that the piece will shake up the music world.

There was a joyful quartet at the beginning (following a happy symphonic introduction), a wondrous soprano and mezzo-soprano duet near the beginning and a high spirited chorus at the end, 72 minutes after the first downbeat.

Soloists Roles

In between were several recitatives and arias for the soloists who were assigned the characterizations of the four cardinal virtues attributed to the monastery which had commissioned the work: Prudence (mezzo-soprano), Temperance (soprano), Justice (tenor) and Fortitude (bass). The bass also sang the role of the head father at the monastery.

The soloists were Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass. Miss Boatwright's efforts seemed to be directed to the production of lovely tone rather than precise articulation; Bressler's tone quality was erratic; Bell produced a strong quality of authority and virility which was appropriate to both characters he was asked to personify, and Miss Vanni was not required to solo.

However, before intermission she had sung an aria Haydn wrote for insertion in an opera by Cimarosa and at that time displayed a voice of strong bell-like quality, clean and clipped articulation and pitch control of great security.

Pleasing Duets

She contributed these qualities to the opening quartet and the duet with Miss Boatwright, both of which were highly pleasing, although the male voices were overshadowed by the women's and the orchestra during the quartet.

In sum it might be said that the cantata, although offering many moments of great pleasure, probably has too few such moments to attract continued and repeated attention.

Before intermission in addition to Miss Vanni's aria the orchestra played Haydn's Symphony No. 39 in G Minor, a symphony interesting because it was written at the beginning of the composer's first five years of so-called musical "storm and stress."

To listeners in 1964, however, most of them having heard a good amount of wild music, Haydn's "stress" does not seem very stormy. Now the 39th symphony is polite and stylish, polished and orderly, and that is the way Leinsdorf conducted it. Very nice.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200

Tanglewood Gets Off To Good Start

LENOX, MASS. — The first week end of the eight - week Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood brought two programs of Mozart on Friday and Saturday evenings and a Sunday afternoon of Haydn music all under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. The opening concert on Friday night brought a moving performance of the Kyrie from Mozart's "Mass in C Minor," with the Festival Chorus of some 125 voices and Helen Boatwright assisting, in memory of Pierre Monteux who died on Wednesday.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919 to 1924 and its guest conductor for many years, the venerable Pierre Monteux died in his 89th year and for the thousands who looked forward to seeing him at Tanglewood each summer something went with his passing. When the Kyrie was performed at the conclusion of the first part of Friday night's program, the entire orchestra and chorus stood in silence and they were joined a minute later by the entire audience standing in rapt silence. It was a moving tribute to the memory of the man who only last summer had conducted so brilliantly on a Sunday afternoon in the Music Shed.

For the opening concert Joseph Silverstein, concertmeister, performed the violin solo in the Mozart "Serenade in D Major," given its first performance at the Festival. Mr. Leinsdorf is scheduling a number of musical selections not previously heard at the concerts and is thus continuing his purpose of introducing music not usually heard here in order to broaden the repertoire of both performers and listeners. Claudio Arrau, pianist, was heard Friday night in a brilliant performance of the Mozart "Piano Concerto No. 15 in B-flat Major" and on Saturday night he gave a first Tanglewood performance of the Mozart "Piano Concerto No. 16 in D Major." Friday night's concert also included the playing of the 'Linz' Symphony in C Major."

All Haydn

The Sunday afternoon program brought all Haydn music being given its first performance at Tanglewood. It included the "Symphony No. 39, in G Minor," the Aria of Beatrice from Cimarosa's " Due Supposti, Conti, Ossia Lo Sposo Sensa Moglie" with Helen Vanni as mezzo soprano soloist. The Cantata "Applausus" was given its first performance in America with Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass. Joseph Silverstein was violin soloist.

Before the opening of the week-end program there was a special program on Tuesday night of music of Shakespeare's time in honor of the 400th anniversary of the birth of the Bard. This was presented by the New York Pro Musica group under the direction of its musical director, Noah Greenberg. It brought the singing of many old madrigals and the playing of early music on many early instruments.

This week the programs will include music of Schubert on Friday night at 8 o'clock and music of Mozart on Saturday night. Sunday afternoon the music will be the Strauss complete music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." It is easy to see that Mr. Leinsdorf is changing the first two week-end series of the usual Mozart and Bach fo something with much more variety and a good deal of innovation. Music listeners at Tanglewood are sure to broaden their knowledge through his innovations and no doubt will augment their listening pleasure. The Tanglewood Festival Season is in full force. Need one say more?

S.M.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 6 1964

45

Tanglewood Opens With Mozart, Haydn Premieres

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

FOR THE PROGRAMS of the first weekend of the season at Tanglewood Friday and Saturday evenings Erich Leinsdorf uncovered a great many Mozart compositions which had never been heard there before, and yesterday came an entire afternoon of Haydn which, too, was completely new to that concert stage.

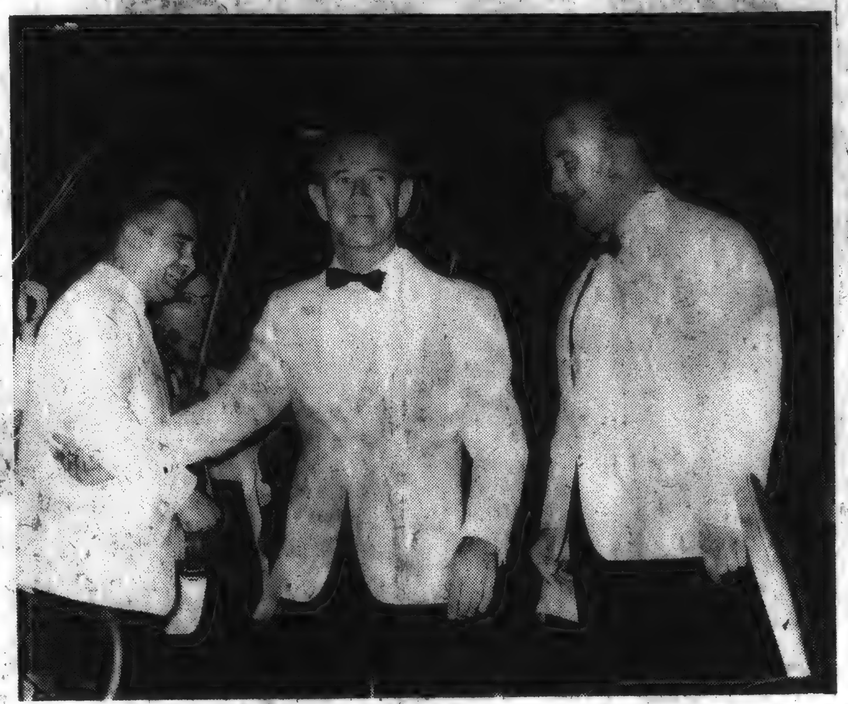
The programs were particularly well adapted to the small forces from the Boston Symphony Orchestra which always supply the first two weeks of the Tanglewood season.

* * *

LEINSDORF chose the end of the first half of the initial concert to insert a memorial to Pierre Monteux, the former Boston conductor, who passed away July 1. A double choir from the Festival Chorus and Helen Boatwright, soprano, joined the orchestra in the Kyrie from Mozart's Mass in C Minor, a moving choice. Miss Boatwright's anguished plea for mercy was compatible with Mozart's method of expressing reverence. At the conclusion Leinsdorf asked the orchestra to join the vocalists standing, and the audience of more than 5,000 voluntarily stood to participate in the tribute of respect to the late 89-year-old master.

* * *

YESTERDAY afternoon the Haydn Symphony, No. 39, in G Minor, was played with the fastidious style which Leinsdorf has with music of that period. It is a simple, gay and small symphony in which practically all the material of interest is given to the violins. The strings in the lower registers have little to express. Their role is completely in support. The winds, two oboes and four horns, get the trio of the minuet, a lovely contrasting mood, and the finale is a crisp, spirited frolic.



Whitestone

BSO CONDUCTOR Erich Leinsdorf extended a friendly arm to his concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as he and pianist Claudio Arrau took their bows during the opening weekend concerts at the Tanglewood festival. Mr. Arrau performed in concerts on both Friday and Saturday. Mr. Silverstein was soloist Friday night.

But it can now again be placed in storage and marked "quaint."

* * *

THE ARIA that Haydn inserted in the opera of his contemporary Cimarosa, "The Two Pseudo Counts," was an exciting vehicle for mezzo soprano Helen Vanni. Haydn's vocal writing was full of daring and florid acrobatics, and Miss Vanni was more than at ease, and in the vein, in the rewarding lament of a vow to the ghost of her father. After intermission, Miss Vanni was joined by Miss Boatwright, Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass, and the Festival Chorus prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt, in the American premiere of the cantata "Applausus."

It proved to be a long series of vocal solos, sung in Latin, after an overture by the orchestra, at the conclusion of which the choirs, seated at the rear of the stage, were signaled to rise after an hour on the bleachers to sing a relatively short concluding chorus.

* * *

THE SOLOISTS, however, were splendid. Leinsdorf kept the instrumental accompaniment in remarkable restraint and the quartet romped with abandon together and alone through fields of vocal clover. Haydn didn't hesitate to give a bass nearly as pyrotechnical a display as a voice in a less cumbersome register. Each soloist, in addition to solo allocations, had unaccompanied cadenzas which, we assume, were inscribed, although they might have been devised on impulse or by improvisation. Haydn, as did all others of his day, provided these moments to allow the performers to show their flexibility and compass, certainly here without regard for the four major virtues which are the essence of this thesis.

There was a plethora of superb singing, but, strange as it may seem, a bit in excess of one's auditory capacity.

* * *

LEINSDORF'S way with the more substantial Mozart symphonies is one of the most satisfying examples of orchestral music-making. The "Linz" C Major (K425) Friday night and the G Minor (K550) Saturday night were pure joy. Every detail joins its adjacent phrases so meticulously and the dynamic indications are followed so faithfully (there is such a tangible difference between the gradations of forte) that one needs seek no further for true Mozart. In the introduction of the "Linz" the second violins are allowed to express their fourth bar theme without being weighted under in the following entrance of the firsts. Instances of that kind of penetration abound in Leinsdorf's reading. The half-tone descent of the strings in the second theme of the G Minor was handed over, as in a relay race, to the reeds, and reversed in the recapitulation, with a rare appreciation of the intent of the composer and the potentialities of an orchestra as an instrument.

* * *

BOTH MOZART programs began with serenades: The D Major (K203) Friday and the F (K274) on Saturday. They abound in lovely graceful turns and dances. Leinsdorf observes repeat marks scrupulously. Friday night concertmaster Joseph Silverstein took full advantage of the opportunities three of the movements provide for what amounts to a violin concerto. His smooth suavity is a constant joy. He plays with immaculate refinement, and his nonchalant mastery does not reveal the pitfalls which might concern anyone in less complete command of the instrument.

* * *

CLAUDIO ARRAU played a piano concerto each evening. The B Flat (K450) on Friday and the D Major (K451) Saturday. His center slow movements were extremely effective. He gave them tender and warm sympathy and his tone was maturely far-reaching in grace and nuance. In the outside allegros he was less subtle, the percussiveness of his nimble fingers affected his tone here, and it was less distinguishable as Mozart.

The weather was not entirely favorable at any of the three concert times, yet threats of rain and storm and low temperatures did not deprive a total of some 17,000 people from enjoying three fine programs.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

JUL 6 1964

Inviting Opening by Leinsdorf

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 6—Has Erich Leinsdorf set out to rediscover Haydn? The all-Haydn program offered in the Music Shed yesterday afternoon had an air of invitation and of novelty. The first American performance of the cantata "Applausus" certainly suggested it.

This score, composed for the Zwettle Monastery in lower Austria, somewhat lengthily applauds the four virtues—Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude—practiced there.

Its eight arias on a very moral text naturally show partiality to the tenor and bass soloists, but that for soprano gets an elaborate harpsichord obbligato by way of compensation.

To have a violin obbligato for "Justice" also gives it prominence among the virtues.

What singles out this thoroughly Haydnish work is his vocal writing with special cadenzas for each soloist, even to the point of giving coloratura to the soprano.

They also have their share of trills. Those who participated in the birthday celebration, for which the work was composed, had to be skilled vocalists.

★

BY COINCIDENCE (?) The Symphony No. 39, in G Minor, opened the concert. Possibly composed in the same year as the cantata, it prepared the listener for this music.

Just as the finale of the symphony recalled the Gluck of "Orfeo," the recitatives for "Fortitude" reflected a similar musical trend. Other likenesses prevailed which place the "classic" framework which Haydn composed.

Yet the relatively unfamiliar symphony marks a departure in Haydn's writing, something which must have jolted an 18th century audience. It is not so much the minor key (which was a surprise) but also the whole character (almost romantic) of the piece.

The juxtaposition of these works therefore supplied an intensive insight into an aspect of Haydn's music not too well known.

For this, Mr. Leinsdorf deserves thanks. And if gradually he starts a movement for a Haydn revival, more power to him. The two preceding programs this weekend were devoted to Mozart.

More people showed interest in Mozart, but then the programs were less venturesome even though they had their share of "first Tanglewood performances."

★

OF THE FOUR soloists in the cantata, Helen Vanni had a negligible assignment. She had her moment earlier however in singing an interpolated aria for a Simarosa opera. The warmth and quality of her voice made this "Aria of Beatrice" a highlight of the concert.

Helen Boatwright, soprano, Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass, tackled the difficult cantata solos successfully if not exceptionally. Irma Rogell played the harpsichord, Joseph Silverstein, the violin obbligatos, with notable skill.

Mr. Leinsdorf gave a more business like performance of the symphony than I like, yet it had the requisite rhythmic precision and clarity.

He observed Haydn's pauses more meticulously than those natural pauses at the end of phrases that punctuate all kinds of music. The momentum of the stormy finale, however, had its effect.

This was an unusually interesting concert. It brought the Berkshire Festival's first weekend a different kind of distinction.

The attendance of 4,974 was exactly comparable to the 6,943 who heard the Saturday night concert with Claudio Arrau as soloist, the weekend crowd of 16,692 indicated, however, that Tanglewood has opened strong.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

JUL 6 1964

Two Dissimilar Stages—Superb Music at Both

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL
MARLBORO, VT.
Festival Chamber Orchestra, Pablo Casals and Alexander Schneider, conductors; Rudolf Serkin, Peter Serkin and Mieczyslaw Horszowski, pianists. Program of Brandenburg Concertos and Piano Concertos by Bach.

and

TANGLEWOOD
LENOX, MASS.
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with the Festival Chorus; soloists: Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Charles Bressler, tenor; Donald Bell, bass. Symphony No. 39 in G minor; Aria di Cardellino; Aria di Beatrice; Cantata, "Applausus" (American premiere) ..... Haydn

By Alan Rich

LENOX, Mass.

At Tanglewood the orchestra plays on a solid stage, in front of a handsome and efficient acoustical backdrop, and into an audience area that seats 6,000.

At Marlboro, about 80 miles away, the orchestra plays in a converted college gymnasium that seats 500, on a makeshift stage covered with someone's grandmother's old rugs, and backed with unpainted pine boards, knotty but nice. The physical surroundings may be disparate, but the music at both places is superb.

On Saturday night there was a Bach program at Marlboro, one of three given over the week end that were dedicated to the memory of President Kennedy. As it happened, Saturday's concert marked the first anniversary of President Kennedy's announcement of the Freedom Medals, and three of the medalists were involved in the concert: Pablo Casals, who conducted part of it; pianist Rudolf Serkin, who played in part of it, and photographer Edward Steichen, who was in the audience.

Casals contribution was a taut, vibrant performance of the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, a reading so intense and so full of original and meaningful touches that one forgot to worry about such finicky matters as authenticity. Certainly the Casals approach to Bach was formed when attitudes toward Bach interpretation were tinged with some odd ideas.

PHRASING

One could get upset today, perhaps, by the phrasing in the last movement, which was overstressed and fussy, and by the literal reading of the "affettuoso" indication for the slow movement. What mattered far more, however, was that the music came alive, and the quest for beauty and variety that has been Casals' credo for longer than most of us have been alive was everywhere apparent.

Serkin's playing of the important keyboard part was fluent and imaginative, and so was the work of the other soloists, the violinist Alexander Schneider and the flutist Ornulf Gulbransen.

Earlier on the program there were performances by other members of the dedicated Marlboro community of the Two-Violin Concerto and a Trio Sonata in C. It was a buoyant, joyous evening. The quality was pure Marlboro, which means pure delight. There will be more Bach, again with Casals, this coming week end, and six more varied week ends after that. Varied musically, but not qualitatively.

TANGLEWOOD

Then back to Tanglewood for a busy Sunday. In the morning there was more Bach, the first in a series of student performances devoted to cantatas, open to friends of Tanglewood (i. e., donors of anything from $2 up) that will make it worthwhile getting up early on Sunday mornings for the next few weeks. It took place in the intimate theater-concert hall, with its marvelous little Noack portative organ, and included perfectly elegant performances of two sublime works, "O Ewigkeit" (No. 60) and "Ich Gehe und Suche" (No. 49), both marvelously executed by inspired forces conducted by the extremely able Seymour Lipkin.

Pablo Casals conducts the Festival Chamber Orchestra, Marlboro Music Festival.

One could sense from these performances the new spirit at Tanglewood, the expansion of attention to performance values of music outside the normal symphonic sphere that Erich Leinsdorf is working so hard to impart to young musicians here.

MISH-MASH

In the afternoon there was Haydn in the shed. The big news was the first American performance of "Applausus," a long cantata composed around 1768 of which the original score and parts have only recently been exhumed. Hayden wrote the work for some sort of birthday celebration at a small Austrian monastery; judging from the length of the work (45 minutes, even with a few discreet cuts), it must have been quite a party.

The text of the work is one of those fanciful mish-mashes that passed for uplifting poetry at the time: sixteen short horrors of symbolic balderdash that purport to extoll the four cardinal virtues. The virtues will outlive the words and so, fortunately, will the music.

It is earmarked with gentle cliches of the rococo manner that Haydn had not yet outgrown, but is full of the original touches that stamp the great composers of the time from the hordes of busy craftsmen around them. If its obtaining a renewed lease on life doesn't exactly constitute a major contribution to the fund of the world's masterpieces, it still stands as a noble and worthwhile event.

Actually, the virtue the work extolls most palpably (although at some excessive length) is Haydn's skill at realizing the expressive values of harmony and tone color. Throughout the cantata there are marvelous touches where a sudden change of major to minor, or a new instrumental texture, seizes the wandering attention and rivets it to the music.

This virtue was strongly underlined by Leinsdorf in his altogether sympathetic performance, and was sung with almost equal fervor by a quartet of exceptional soloists: Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Charles Bessler and Donald Bell. They had some extremely difficult music to sing, including some outrageous coloratura passages and horrendous cadenzas; but they kept, with few exceptions, to the music's thorny path.

The program included two other Haydn pieces, both unfamiliar and equally adventurous. It began with the wonderfully intense and often furious Symphony No. 39 (which Leinsdorf had conducted in Boston and New York earlier this season) and was rounded out with a ravishing work from the composer's later years, an aria he had written to be interpolated into a Cimarosa opera he produced at Eisenstadt.

Helen Vanni sang the aria with beauty of tone and thorough grasp of style, and the orchestra and its conductor gave of themselves in a way that ideally suited the occasion.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483
JUL 6 1964

SYMPHONY

Tanglewood Devotes Weekend To Classicists Mozart, Haydn

By McLAREN HARRIS

Saturday's and Sunday's concerts made up the middle and concluding portions of the first weekend series at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, a weekend devoted to classicists, specifically Mozart and Haydn.

Friday night brought a memorial to the late Pierre Monteux. Mozart's Kyrie from the Mass in C minor, along with the regular program of a symphony, a concerto and two occasional pieces; Saturday evening's fare consisted of works similar to Friday's genres. Yesterday it was Haydn's turn, affording an American audience a first hearing of his Cantata, "Applausus," composed in 1768 for a birthday celebration at an Austrian monastery.

Four Virtues

Written for solo quartet with chorus and orchestra, this sixteen number work indulges in sober revelry and testimonials to the joys and benefits of monastic life, as voiced by the four cardinal virtues: Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude.

The atmosphere reveals a conservative approach, for by his own statement Haydn was acquainted with neither the gentlemen for whom he wrote nor their musical tastes. Thus dramatic measures of religious fervor are found in relatively few sections, notably the opening sinfonia, the concluding chorus and the bass aria of Fortitude.

The arias themselves, each separated by a recitative, contain vocal cadenzas sometimes fiercely demanding and seemingly out of place. Otherwise they exhibit little of the surface brilliance associated with later choral works, though retaining textual relation and a tuneful appeal.

Quartet singers Helen Boatwright, soprano, Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano, Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass, acquitted themselves nobly for the most part, Mr. Bressler's tonal purity and faithful intonation being noteworthy. The Festival Chorus rose with conviction to its only opportunity and Erich Leinsdorf led his Symphony members in a successful effort.

Miss Vanni gained her first laurels earlier in an area which Haydn composed for an Esterhaz performance of Cimarosa's opera, "I Due Supposti Conti." This mezzo soprano combines a bell-like quality and strong projection with an ample range, all evident to a warmly appreciative audience.

The Symphony No. 39 in G minor, Haydn's first in that mode, began the program, exhibiting a gently solemn air, quite sublime for its simple thematic and harmonic materials; expertly tapered phrases from the violins, high-register accuracy in the horns and robust sonorities in lower strings were keynotes in a polished interpretation.

Saturday night's Mozart program belonged for excellence entirely to the strings, whose total precision was marred but slightly and rarely. For the Adagio from the Divertimento in F, K. 247, they spun lines of pure silver; one could hardly have asked for more perfect nuance and dynamic proportion in the G minor Symphony, and the strings even shared muscular approach of Claudio Arrau to the Piano Concerto in D, K. 451. In truth the interest they sustained was punctuated only by something extra-musical: the distant boom of holiday fireworks.

The Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the second and third concerts in the 27th season of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Saturday night and Sunday. Claudio Arrau was piano soloist on Saturday night. Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano, was soloist for the Haydn aria and Helen Boatwright, soprano. Miss Vanni, Charles Bressler, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass, were the quartet for the cantata on Sunday. Saturday's program consisted of Mozart's Divertimento in F, K. 247; March in F, K. 248; Piano Concerto No. 16 in D, K. 451; and Symphony in G minor, K. 550 (No. 40). Sunday's program consisted of Haydn's Symphony No. 39 in G minor; Aria to Cimarosa's "Il Due Supposti Conti, ossia Lo sposo senza moglie;" and the Cantata, "Applausus."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

JUL 3

Weekend Music: Programs at Tanglewood and Norfolk

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

Lenox, Mass. — Erich Leinsdorf in the first Sunday concert at Tanglewood paid his respects to the classical mastery of Haydn by devoting his program primarily to that composer. All of the works were new to the Festival and one of them was an American premiere.

And once again the listener could relish the immaculate polish that Mr. Leinsdorf brings to everything he programs. Although he used a reduced chamber orchestra, the full-bodied, yet suave tonal quality was exhilarating and particularly appropriate to Haydn.

* * *

THE SYMPHONY No. 39 the first of the compos works in this form to be in a minor key. Although it lacks the pathos of "La Passione" (No. 49), it has an emotional intensity that is sustained throughout the entire symphony. For those who like to categorize everything, it belongs to his so-called "Sturm und Drang" period.

In the precision attacks and releases, in the expressive dynamic range that Mr. Leinsdorf evoked from his players, there was a fine example of the style galant, something that the Boston orchestra under this conductor handles superbly.

* * *

CIMAROSA appeared briefly on Sunday's program when Helen Vanni of the Metropolitan offered a nicely controlled version of the aria of Beatrice from an unfamiliar opera "I Due Supposti Conti." Miss Vanni's voice is not sumptuous but it is evenly produced throughout and is of pleasant timbre.

For his American premiere Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the long cantata, "Applausus," which Haydn wrote for an unidentified Austrian monastery. It extols the four important virtues as practiced in the monastery — temperance, justice, prudence, and fortitude — and consists of eight arias and ends with a choral prayer. And it requires soloists with a firm command of the baroque style.

* * *

HELEN BOATWRIGHT, well-known for her work at Norfolk and in New Haven, was a paragon of this style, although both she and the tenor, Charles Bressler, have voices lighter than we are accustomed to hearing in the Tanglewood Shed. Miss Vanni was the mezzo and Donald Bell was the able basso. All things considered, it was a first-rate quartet. The excellent Festival Chorus had been prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt.

The audiences for the opening concerts have been larger than usual but the festival spirit has been dampened for this listener (and for many others, I'm sure) by the knowledge that Pierre Monteux, who died last week, will no longer lend his genial and unique talents to these concerts.

A year or so ago one of the Norfolk Chamber Music concerts was disturbed by a terrific thunderstorm that continued throughout the whole program. Last Friday night the music in the Norfolk Shed had to compete with the climax of a fireworks display in the town.

In fact, there were intermittent explosions while Aldo Parisot was performing the Debussy Cello Sonata in collaboration with pianist Ward Davenny. Occasionally the Musical beat synchronized with a detonation but more often the effect was syncopated. Add new hazards to the list for Summertime entertainment.

MR. PARISOT was the anchor man for Friday night's program. Besides the Debussy sonata, he played Bach's Sonata No. 3 (originally for viola da gamba and clavier) with Mr. Davenny and the Schumann Cello Concerto with the student orchestra under the direction of Gustav Meier. It was a challenging assignment on a muggy, humid evening.

In the Bach sonata the French cellist drew forth a beautiful legato tone in the adagio and proved himself a fine Bach stylists in the outer movements. The Debussy sonata came off reasonably well, particularly in the "Serenade and Finale," where Mr. Parisot's resilient phrasing was a highlight.

Schumann's melodic and ingratiating concerto came off rather unevenly Friday night. At his best, Parisot offered some superlative playing (in the middle movement and the cadenza of the finale) but there was a great deal of slurred playing. The weather, I'm sure, had something to do with it.

47

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

JUL 4 1964

TANGLEWOOD: TRIBUTE TO THE UNFORGETTABLE

TANGLEWOOD Inside what will be a busy [illegible] summer.

There was another dampening to this opening concert, however; the death last Wednesday of Pierre Monteux. He had been a friend to many Tanglewood audiences. In his memory, Leinsdorf added to his opening program the somber and haunting Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass, with the orchestra joined by the student chorus and the soprano Helen Boatwright. At its conclusion the orchestra, chorus and audience stood in absolute silence. It was an unforgetable moment to honor an unforgetable man.

Otherwise, the program was pure joy. Mozart programs during the early weeks of summer, Tanglewood have been traditional for many years, but this was a different kind of program (as will tonight's). It went far beyond the usual orchestral repertory to include a long and unfamiliar serenade (K. 203), a lighthearted, uncomplicated and still enormously imaginative work. How little Mozart really needed to touch the heart. In this work there are moments when the simplest unadorned melody from a solo oboe, with the most unobtrusive kind of accompaniment, seems to speak more poignantly and meaningfully than all the symphonic apparatus of romanticism.

It got a ravishing performance. Leinsdorf is beyond question the finest Mozart conductor in charge of a major orchestra in this country, a stylist with verve and imagination, and with the energy to search out such treasures as this serenade proved to be. For it has used an orchestra somewhat reduced from usual symphonic size (four double basses, for example, and four stands of cellos).

It was still large by Mozartean standards, perhaps, but the conductor's superb sense of balance made everything seem exactly in place. The long violin solos in three of the work's eight movements were played with the elegance by the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and Ralph Gomberg illuminated the solo oboe lines with tones of pure gold. If the performance had been any better, the orchestra would probably have exploded.

The storms returned at the end of the program, including a thunderclap that was perfectly synchronized to an ominous major-to-minor modulation in the slow movement of Mozart's "Linz" symphony. The symphony, and the B Flat Piano Concerto (K-450) that preceded it are, like the works on the first half of the program, far too seldom heard in the symphonic season. Aldo's the many things that Leinsdorf is obviously out to prove: the wealth of unexplored riches that can snap an orchestra—any orchestra—out of its programming doldrums. He is proving it handsomely.

Claudio Arrau's performance of the concerto was not everybody's kind of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor

48

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 132,657

JUL 1 3 1964

Mrs. Boatwright To Sing Saturday

Soprano Helen Boatwright, wife of Syracuse University School of Music's new dean Howard Boatwright, will appear Saturday at the Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, Mass.

Mrs. Boatwright will sing in an all-Mozart program Saturday and the following day will appear in the American premiere of "The Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Strauss.

CAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE

...Mail Union News
...day, July 3, 196...

MUSIC MAKER: Malcolm Frager, young American pianist, examines the score of Mozart's "Piano Concerto No. 11 in F Major" which he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the July 11 concert at Tanglewood. Helen Boatwright will be the soprano soloist with Mr. Frager and conductor Erich Leinsdorf in a performance of Mozart's "Scene with Rondo for Soprano and Piano and Piano Obbligato" for the same event. The composer's "Serenade in B-flat Major for 13 Wind Instruments" will complete the program, for which tickets are still available at the Tanglewood box office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Chronicle
HAMDEN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 5,050

JUL 9 1964

HELEN BOATWRIGHT

Helen Boatwright To Be Featured At Music Festival

Soprano Helen Boatwright will be featured twice this weekend with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Music Festival. Saturday, she sings Mozart's Aria for Soprano with Piano Obligato. Sunday, she takes part in the American Premiere of "Le Borgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss.

This will be Mrs. Boatwright's second straight weekend at Tanglewood. She sang in Haydn's "Applausus" Sunday and also sang in a memorial to the late conductor Pierre Monteux Friday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4209

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

JUL 11 1964

Whitestone

IN TRIBUTE to the late Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, last night's Tanglewood concert was dedicated to her. Here conductor Erich Leinsdorf greets Mrs. Lyman Beecher Stowe, who occupied the box her sister had used since the Shed was built in 1938 through her efforts.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUL 1 3 1964

TU AT THE CONCERT

Strauss Honored at Tanglewood

By EDGAR VANOLINDA

Tanglewood—The 100th anniversary of the birth of the contemporary German composer, Richard Strauss was fittingly observed at Tanglewood, yesterday afternoon, in the second weekend series of concerts, traditionally devoted to the works of Bach and Mozart with a generous interlarding of Haydn and Schubert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the dynamic direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

In line with the announced plans of Mr. Leinsdorf before taking over the Bostonians, the "Little Napoleon of the Orchestra World," has, indeed, "explored" many interesting works not previously available to Tanglewood audiences, in many instances, first performance at the Berkshire Music Festival and several American premieres. This was the case Sunday afternoon with a magnificent performance of the incidental music to Strauss' setting of Moliere's text of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The orchestra was assisted by a solo quartet, consisting of Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni, sopranos; Donald Bell and Mac Morgan, basses (with the latter doubling as narrator) and the Festival Male Chorus.

The concert featured the playing of the Mozart Violin Concerto No. 1 by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, a young man who has enhanced the famed quality of the string section, who has and evolved into one of the most promising solo violinists of this generation. The Silverstein technic and tone were in evidence throughout his brilliant performance. The overture to Mozart's comic opera, "The Marriage of Figaro" was the proper apertif to the musical feast of the afternoon.

Friday evening's concert programmed Schubert's Mass in E-flat as a tribute to the memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival, who passed away last November. The work was enthusiastically applauded in contrast to a similar memorial a week earlier for Pierre Monteux which was preceded and followed by impressive periods of reverential silence.

Saturday night's concert segued back to Mozart with the performance of his "Serenade," featuring the superb wind choir of the orchestra. The guest soloist was the sensational young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, who was immediately re-engaged for 1964 after his exciting debut with the Bostonians at Tanglewood, last summer.

2nd WEEK JULY 6TH - 12TH.

49

ewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
JUL 9 64

Berkshire Series To Hear Pianist Frager July 11

Berkshire Music Festival concerts will take place in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Friday and Saturday evenings, July 10-11 at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon, July 12, at 2:30 p.m.

Program Friday evening will consist of music by Schubert. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf will begin with the Symphony No. 3, in D major and also include Schubert's Mass in E-flat major, No. 6, D. 950, with Saramae Endick, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena, tenors; Donald Bell, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt.

The Saturday morning Open Rehearsal, which is held for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, will begin at 10 a.m. in the Music Shed.

Saturday evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, will be solist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413. Helen Boatwright, soprano, will be heard in Mozart's Scene ("Ch'io me scordi di te") with Rondo ("Non temer, amato bene") for Soprano and Piano Obbligato, K. 505. Mr. Frager will join the Orchestra in the Piano Obbligato. The piano concerto and the Scene and Rondo will be first Festival performances. The program will begin with the Serenade in B-flat major for Thirteen Wind Instruments, K. 361, and the Six German Dances, K. 509.

Sunday afternoon, July 12, Joseph Silverstein, who is completing his second season as Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1 in B-flat major, K. 207. Mr. Leinsdorf will close the program with the American premiere of Richard Strauss' complete Incidental Music to "Der Burger als Edelmann." The Orchestra will be joined by soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo; Donald Bell, bass; Mac Morgan, narrator and the Tanglewood Choir. Program will open with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

The Tuesday evening Chamber Music Concert, July 7, 8 p.m. in the Theatre will be a violin recital by Joseph Silverstein with Ralph Berkowitz at the piano. They will perform Schubert's Rondo Brillante, Op. 70; the Sonata in E-flat major by Richard Strauss; and Beethoven's Sonata in G major. Concerts are presented for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center's Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund.

This Saturday, July 4 at 8 p.m. will be an all-Mozart program which will consist of the Divertimento in F major, K. 247; the Piano Concerto in D major, K. 451, with Claudio Arrau as soloist; and the Symphony in G minor, K. 500. Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 an all-Haydn program will include the Symphony No. 39, in G minor; the Aria of Beatrice from Haydn's setting of Cimarosa's "I due supposti Conti," with Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; and the American premiere of Haydn's Cantata "Applausus" with Helen Boatwright, soprano; Miss Vanni; Charles Bressler, tenor; Donald Bell, bass; and the Festival Chorus.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200
JUL 9 1964

Strauss, Mozart, Schubert Music At Tanglewood

Music by Schubert, Mozart, and Strauss will be presented at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, this weekend.

The concerts will take place in the Music Shed at the Tanglewood in Lenox tomorrow (Friday) and Saturday evenings at 8:00 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m.

The program tomorrow evening will consist of music by Schubert. Leinsdorf will begin with the Symphony No. 3, in D major. After an intermission he will conduct Schubert's Mass in E-flat major, No. 6, D. 950.

Saturday evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, will be soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413. Helen Boatwright, soprano, will be heard in Mozart's Scene ("Ch'io me scordi di te") with Rondo ("Non temer, amato bene") for Soprano and Piano Obbligato, K. 505. Frager will join the Orchestra in the Piano Obbligato. The program will begin with the Serenade in B-flat major for Thirteen Wind Instruments, K. 361, and the Six German Dances, K. 509.

Sunday afternoon Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1 in B-flat major, K. 207. Leinsdorf will close the program with the American premiere of Richard Strauss' complete Incidental Music to "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's Comedy-Ballet, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Op. 60. The program will open with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

On Sunday also at 10 a.m. there will be Music of J.S. Bach in the Theatre and a chamber music program at 8 p.m. in the Chamber Music Hall, and tonight (Thursday) at 8:00, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, will give its first concert of the season in the Theatre.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923
JUL 8 1964

Schubert, Mozart Works Slated at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony will feature the music of Schubert and Mozart in its concerts this weekend at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

* * *

ERICH LEINSDORF will conduct the orchestra in Schubert's Symphony Number 3 in D Major in the Friday concert, beginning at 8 p.m. After intermission the orchestra will play Schubert's Mass in E Flat Major, Number 6, D. 950, accompanied by the festival chorus.

Friday's concert will be dedicated to the memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, who founded the original Berkshire Symphonic Festival and was a key figure in plans for building the 6,000-seat music shed at Tanglewood.

* * *

SATURDAY evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. Malcolm Prager will be soloist in the Piano Concerto Number 11 in F Major, K. 413. He won the Leventritt award in 1959 and the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium competition in 1960. The young American pianist is making his second appearance at Tanglewood.

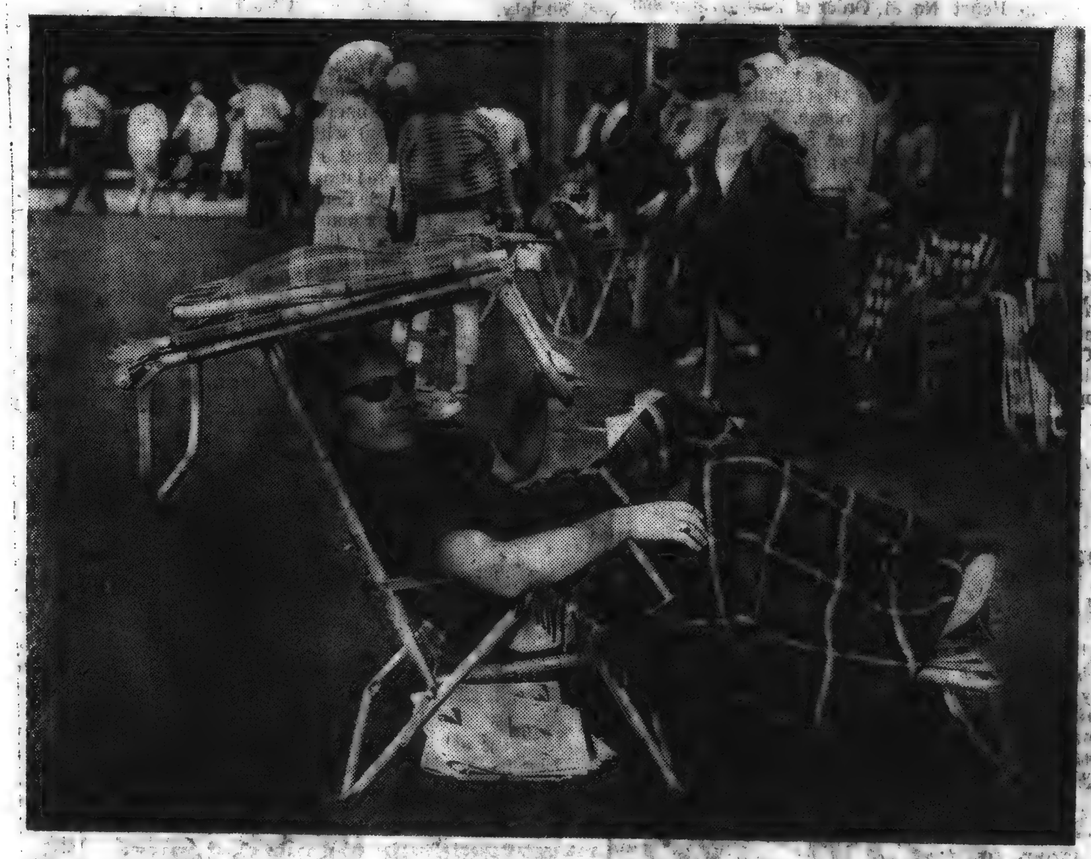
Helen Boatwright, soprano, will be heard in the Sceno and Rondo for Soprano and Piano Obligato, K. 505. The program will begin with the Serenade in B Flat Major for 13 Wind Instruments, K. 361, and the Six German Dances, K. 509.

* * *

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, who is completing his second season as concertmaster, will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 7 in B Flat Major, K. 207, which will highlight the Sunday concert at 2:30 p.m. The program will also include the American premiere of Richard Strauss' complete incidental music to "Der Burger als Edelman," which is based on Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The program opener will be Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 11 1964

MUSIC poured from the Shed at ~~Tanglewood~~ last Sunday as the Berkshire Music Festival came back to life again. Rain threatened, and the crowd on the great lawn was agreeably moderate. The music of Haydn was played.



RAIN started to fall at Tanglewood and it produced this counter measure by a music lover unequipped with umbrella or raincoat but ready with two chairs.

Eagle Eye

By William Tague

BLANKET PARTY unfolds at Tanglewood as group of teen-agers arrives on the lawn. It took some time to get arranged and then it was discovered that the blanket was too small.

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

JUL 9 1964

Second Week of Berkshire Festival

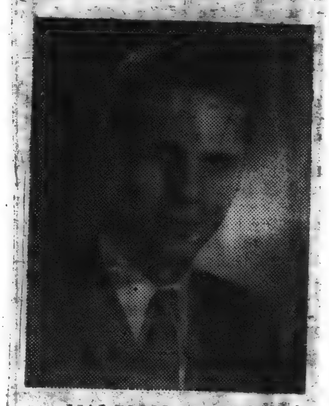
Eric. Leinsdorf, Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival, will continue his intention to emphasize certain areas of the repertory in the orchestra's concerts next weekend. He will combine Music for Chamber Orchestra with Music for Festivals. Mr. Leinsdorf has defined his term "Music for Festivals" as that which is out of the ordinary and more suitd to a sum-festival performance than to a regular winter season concert. The concerts will take place in the Music Shed next Friday and Saturday evening at 8 p. m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p. m.

The program Friday evening will consist of music by Schubert. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin with the Symphony No. 3 in D major. After an intermission he will conduct Schubert's Mass in E-flat major, No. 6, D. 950, with soloists.

The Saturday morning's Open Rehearsal, which is held for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, will begin at 10 a. m. in the Music Shed.

Saturday evening's concert will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, will be soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413. Mr Frager won the coveted Leventritt Award in 1959 and the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium Competition in 1960.

Helen Boatwright, soprano, will be heard in Mozart's Scene ("Ch io me scordi di te") with Rondo



MALCOLM FRAGER

("Non temer, amato bene") for Soprano and Piano Obbligato, K. 505. Mr. Frager will join the Orchestra in the Piano Obbligato. The piano concerto and the Scene and Rondo will be first Festival performances. The program will begin with the Serenade in B-flat major for Thirteen Wind Instruments, K. 361, and the Six German Dances, K. 509.

Sunday afternoon Joseph Silverstein, who is completing his second season as Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1 in B-flat major, K. 207, which will be new to the Festival programs. Mr. Leinsdorf will close the program with the American premiere of Richard Strauss' complete Incidental Music to "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's Comedy - Ballett, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Op. 60. Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra performed excerpts from this work at a White House concert on March 31 when Lynda and Luci Johnson were hostesses to some two hundred teenage children of the Embassy delegations.

Four programs by members of the Berkshire Music Center will be open this week to Friends of the Music Center, those who contribute to the support of the Center with a voluntary contribution. On Wednesday at 8:00 the Music Center will present a chamber music concert in the Chamber Music Hall, and Thursday evening at 8:00 the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, will give its first concert of the season in the Theatre. Next Sunday at 10 a. m. there will be Music of J. S. Bach in the Theatre and a chamber music program at 8 p. m. in the Chamber Music Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
JUL 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 49,216
JUL 5 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
JUL 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 3 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
RAVENA NEWS HERALD
Friday, July 10, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 8, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, July 9, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, July 9, 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075
JUL 11 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
JUL 5 1964

RAVENA, N.Y.
NEWS-HERALD
W. 1,800
JUL 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
JUL 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
JUL 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUL 5 1964

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678
JUL 13 1964

REVIEWS

Sunday Concert Memorable

Symphonic Tribute in Tanglewood Shed

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid tribute to the late Gertrude Robinson Smith during their concert at the Tanglewood Music Shed Friday evening.

With the playing of the Schubert "Mass in E-flat," the players honored the woman who was "one of the prime movers" of the original Tanglewood idea.

The soloists were adequate but unimpressive in their sections of the work. The one exception was Jerold Siena, a tenor whose short moments of singing alone and with Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Walter Carringer and Donald Bell were rewarding for the clarity and warmth of tone.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

Plays with Fervor

The orchestra, on the other hand, played with fervor, Leinsdorf carving hands full of sound from the group.

A large chorus, prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt, responded well to the direction of the conductor, adding a full-bodied sound to complement the orchestral sections.

The "Third Symphony" of Schubert was treated to a spritely rendering by the BSO for the first half of the show. Maestro Leinsdorf allowed his men a breadth in which to expand on their own ideas about the composition, which is an early and unpretentious work of the German Romanticist.

The four movements proceeded at a lively and interesting pace with no "heavy" material to bog down the sparkling tunes throughout the course.

Memorable Concert

The Sunday afternoon concert was a memorable event for listeners and musicians, alike, at the shed. Richard Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann," or "Incidental Music to Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," was given its first complete performance in this country.

As an accompaniment to, and divertisment for, Moliere's comedy of the same name, the music is more than successful. It encompasses the basic lines of humor while commenting on the vanity of the situation.

As played by the orchestra for this concert, it had a splendid reading, the Boston musicians and their conductor being noted for their interpretations of the Strauss literature.

The many subtleties of the score were accomplished with wit and insight. The halting rhythms, the dissonant brayings and the overriding sonorities in many of the sections found find interpretors for the premiere.

Added Humor

As narrated by bass Mac Morgan, the story was given added humor. Morgan spoke each line with an ear for what ever laughs there might be and inspired the singers; Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni and Donald Bell, to extend their best performances.

This broad wit, coupled with the ingenious Strauss orchestrations, resulted in a most auspicious introduction to the listeners present.

Joseph Silverstein, the BSO concertmaster, was soloist for the Mozart "First Violin Concerto," playing with style and grace to exact every lovely phrase from the solo line. Leinsdorf's accompaniment with the concerto and the playing of the "Overture to the Marriage of Figaro" were further examples of that conductor's virile approach to the Mozartian repertoire.

(D. L. C.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 13 1964

Concert Review

Conspicuous Absence Of Bach at Tanglewood

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

There has been a conspicuous absence of music by Bach in the oft called "Bach-Mozart Chamber Music Concerts" that open the initial programs at Tanglewood each season. True, there has in the past occurred an occasional Handel or Haydn chamber concert, but seldom does a Romanticist such as Schubert find space in the company of the broad shouldered and austere classicists. The music of this teen-age romanticist, which even then included such items as symphonies, a few masses and hundreds of songs, is of such gentle nature one is likely little shaken by his inclusion.

Warmly Disarming

The 3rd Symphony, like most of Schubert's works, is simple, unpretentious and warmly disarming. Mr. Leinsdorf gave the work a remarkable opportunity to speak as indeed he allowed for much of the 6th Mass in E-Flat Major. However, the Mass was the less convincing of the two works heard Friday evening. The chorus ladies, despite sweetness, lacked some conviction found in voices of more professional brilliance. Also, to some extent the men lacked this same bite of professionalism, though certainly not spirit.

The problem seems basically rooted in the composition itself and not one of performance. The Mass is written in almost secular style with contrast of the ritual sections treated as movements of a symphony. The kyrie is an andante, the gloria and allegro, the credo a moderato and so forth; yet the whole result is reminiscent of mission furniture and a kind of milk Victorian propriety. The chorus was deftly prepared by Miss Hiatt.

Saturday's Mozart concert with the Serenade in B-Flat for 13 Wind Instruments may, with all repeats, appear long-winded, but careful listening promotes more reward here than the surface listening of reedy, almost characterless, woodwind sounds seem to promise. The frame of mind one needs for optimum enjoyment of the work might be defined as a kind of intellectual entertainment approach.

Much of Mozarts music might be classified as intellectual, but it is seldom academic. This almost flawless performance may have made it sound more academic than it should. Mozart, wrote that his 11th Piano Concerto (played with masterful taste by Malcolm Frager) was 'natural without being empty." Such might also be said of the Scena "Ch'io mi scordi di te" sung by Helen Boatwright with piano obligato played by M. Frager. This was plain delight as were the six surprising and attractive German Dances that concluded the program.

Greatest Surprise

The weekend's greatest surprise, however, was Sunday's Incidental Music to "Der Burger als Edelmann" based on Moliere's Comedy-Ballet, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Leinsdorf has done more for Strauss with this amusing performance than he may likely do all summer. And there are at least a dozen works by Strauss (born 1864) scheduled for this season.

The work is frivolous and perhaps at times slapstick, but one cannot object to the composer's rather obvious intent to be less than profound. MacMorgan, narrator, assured the audience that they were expected to laugh outright and the notion was underlined when near the opening of the work, the concertmaster and assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra bowed at mention of the part they would play. There was considerable description in musicese of all that went on during the comedy and Strauss made the most that he could out of it. A dinner that includes "tongue of lark spiced with thyme" is, in music, a most tasty repast for the ear.

This was, no doubt, the best program of the season thus far. Perhaps all due to the opening number, a Leinsdorf favorite, Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" in his best bright and scintillating fashion.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
JUL 11 1964

Music: Two Schuberts

Early and Late Works Led by Leinsdorf

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 10—Erich Leinsdorf began tonight the second week of the Berkshire Festival with a program that must have taken everyone who heard it a little more deeply into the heart of Schubert.

This was so not only because the works performed were relatively unknown, but also because they revealed with such sympathy the composer at the start and at the end of his life.

Saramae Endich

The opening work was the Symphony No. 3 in D major, which Schubert wrote when he was only 18. It was brimming with melody and was wonderfully fresh and untroubled in spirit. And if it did not go deep, one did not mind. Instead, one enjoyed its youthfulness and rejoiced in its uncomplicated charm.

This was possible because Mr. Leinsdorf led it with honesty. There was no attempt to inflate it beyond its intrinsic proportions, and its sweetness and vivacity were allowed to unfold without self-consciousness.

Then came the last of Schubert's masses. The E-flat Major that he wrote in the last year of his life. When one heard its dark, grave, opening measures, with the sounds of the symphony's Vivace still fresh in one's ears, the effect was almost unbearably poignant. Only 13 years had passed, but a lot of suffering had come into the composer's life for his music to be so different.

•

With this insight, one could follow the rest of the mass, hearing in one turn of phrase after another what Schubert's religion meant to him. Hearing, for instance, how truly he felt the glory of God; and, especially in the "Misereres," how deeply he felt the need for a God merciful to the husciousness. The performance by the Boston Symphony, too, despite its beautiful discipline, was clear, light and spontaneous.

The mass calls for five soloists. They are used relatively infrequently but always either in a trio or a quartet. Thus the work is carried chiefly by the choristers, who in this case were the 100 young men and women that Ida Dee Hiatt has molded into the Festival Chorus.

The mass's music is particularly accommodating to the words. One hears them with unusual clarity, and the orchestral accompaniment helps establish their meaning. Again and again one was struck by how direct and sincere Schubert was in setting them.

•

On the whole the effect is lyrical, bu tthere are intermittent outcries in the brasses that intensify the poignancy of the darker moments. The performance was a fine one, and the assisting soloists were Saramae Endich, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena, tenors, and Donald Bell, bass.

The mass was given in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival at Hanna Farm, Stockbridge, in 1934. Miss Smith, who died last October, deserved the honor, for she remained one of the festival's most loyal supporters and did much to see that the Shed was built at Tanglewood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUL 14 1964

Tanglewood Concerts

The second half of the Friday concert of the second week of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood was dedicated to the late Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Festival at Hanna Farm in Stockbridge in 1934, and subsequently one of its most interested and active supporters.

Schubert was the featured composed, his charmingly embullient third symphony in D major, finished when he was just 18, the opening number. Mr. Leinsdorf imbued its performance with graceand lightness, and although he overdid the molding a bit, one could not help being capitivated with the friendly, simply stated work, and the orchestra's incomparable transmission.

In moving contrast& and a product of Schubert's last months, he died at age 31, was his glorious Mass in E flat major, one of six, with impressive bases, particularly the trombones, deeply spiritual in effect. Words and music are clearly complementary, the five soloists heard infrequently but in trio or quartet. The brilliantly trained chorus of about 100, rehearsed by Smith's Iva Dee Hiatt, carrying the major part of the vocal score, responded with distinctly enunciated mood and musical line. Equally responsive were soprano Sarae Mae Endich, contralto Eunice Alberts, tenors Walter Carringer, and Jerold Siena, and Donald Bell, bass.

Clear skies continued for Saturday's program, all-Mozart, which opened with his serenade for 13 winds, embellished by a double bass, originally scored, and eventually replaced by a contra-basson. Graphically enjoyable, at first rather colorless, which Leinsdorf did little to dispel, it gradually begins to dance and titillate the receptor, ending with a distinctly tarantella-inspired rondo. Orchestra and conductor gave it a beautifully restrained and clarified reading.

Although not noted for great warmth or particular challenge, Mozart's Piano Concerto in F.K. 413, was a thing of rare beauty and musical insight, as played by the youthful Malcolm Frager, who seems to know what he wants to project with this composer, and has a way of infecting and coaxing the orchestra to follow him along these lines. One felt that Leinsdorf, although naturally in control, had little to say about tempo and color. The audience was enthusiastic in its applause, in which the conductor encouraged Mr. Frager to star.

Two more first performances (the piano concerto was one) followed, to finish the second half. An utterly charming and graciously sung "Scena with Rondo," K. 505, an aria with piano obligato, from the opera "Idomeneo," Helen Boatwright lendling the just right dramatic and vocal coloring, tenderly scoffing and tragically resolved and Mr. Frager supplying the intermittent piano line.

Six German dances, K 509, one of several sets written by Mozart for court functions in Vienna, completed the evening's program. MdeR.B.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
ORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
JUL 11 1964

Music: Tanglewood Presents Chamber Program

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Last night's Tanglewood audience of 4,111 persons gave hearty endorsement to conductor Erich Leinsdorf's premise that neglected music for chamber orchestra is necessary to a comprehensive Berkshire Music Festival.

For the opening concert of the festival's second weekend, Leinsdorf conducted 50 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all - Schubert program — Symphony No. 3 in D Major, and Mass in E Flat Major, No. 6. For the Mass, the festival's 100 - voice chorus had been prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt. Soloists were Saramae Endich, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena, tenors; Donald Bell, bass. Both were first performances at Tanglewood.

The Mass was given in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, who died Oct. 9. She founded the original Berkshire Symphonic Festival and was a key figure in plans for building the music shed at Tanglewood.

In organizing an all-Schubert program for purposes of general acclamation, most conductors would have remained in the safe terrain of the composer's tested successes.

Remained in Barrel

Schubert's Third Symphony is too little known to be either shunned or used as a guaranteed attraction. For 66 years after its completion in 1815 (Schubert was 18) it remained in a barrel of such items that Schubert had written for informal gatherings of his cronies.

After its "public premiere" in England, few conductors have been willing to risk it. Last night's performance was anything but a condescending "labor of love" by Leinsdorf or the orchestra compared with Schubert's powerful "Unfinished" and "Great" symphonies (Nos. 8 and 9) the Third wove the impression of slightness, with charm, winding in a madcap finale.

Despite the almost naive(or at least derivative) material in the introduction to the first movement, Leindsdorf brought out warm and gentle shadings, compensating thereby for its limitations. He also stressed the piquancy of the movement's last portion.

Melody Over Interest

Dynamics were instantly effected and fine technical work come from the string section focussed against lyrical solos in winds. Above all, melody dominated interest, even during lapses where the movement is rutted in a standard classical form.

Leinsdorf kept the second movement (allegretto) light, fanciful and dance-like, although Schubert obviously intended it for a much smaller ensemble. By contrast, the minuet was heavier, virile and sharply - accented. The trip portion had a beautifully delivered duet by oboe and bassoon.

The finale went full-speed ahead with brilliantly delivered dialogue in which all sections participated. It sounded driven and somewhat impatient, but was articulate and tonally brilliant.

Schubert's Mass in E Flat Major (finest of his six settings) was a stirring blend of exalted liturgy, choral beauty and instrumental color. So far as last night's performance is concerned. Leinsdorf deserves credit for discipline of phrasing, attacks, balances, tempos, and other factors that made for a high standard.

However, the highways to religious fulfillment, the most important essence last night, were paved by Miss Hiatt of Smith College, who guided the chorus' groundwork.

Unlike the monumental masses of Bach and Beethoven, Schubert sought to paint images of adoration and peace — not the sin and suffering of mankind.

Conspicuous Moments

Glowing highlights last night were "Et Incarnatus Est," "Crucifixus" from the "Credo," "Sanctus" and "Agnus Dei." Conspicuous moments among these were shuddering rhythms in strings in the "Crucifixus"— and gently intoned Miserere Nobis after the huge masses of choral and instrumental sound in the "Agnus Dei."

The chorus gave the Kyrie a hushed, fervent quality. A good ensemble balance emerged from the unusual placement of the singers — all women to the left and men, right. This may have given women's voices, occasionally, a slight domination in the heavier portions of the Christe Eleison.

"Gloria" brimmed with chorus elation at the offset, followed by manifold changes of spirit and shadings. Women's pronunciation of the latin was, by far, the clearer.

Solidly Merged

Leinsdorf took the fugues that concludes the Gloria at a slow, decisive pace. Voices were solidly merged and created a grandiosity when fully supported by the orchestra. The Credo was unfolded as a close-knit narrative with continuity, thoroughly allied to the text.

The solo trio of the Credo, for two tenors and soprano, continued the mood established by the chorus.

Tonight, Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program. The repertory: Serenade in B Flat for 13 Wind Instruments, K361; Piano Concerto No. 11 in F Major, K413, with Malcolm Fagar as soloist; Aria for Soprano with Piano Obligato and Orchestra in E Flat K505—soloists, Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Frager; Six German Dances, K059.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JUL 11 1964

Music by Schubert Played at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—To begin his second week-end of Tanglewood concerts, Erich Leinsdorf chose a program of music by Schubert. He began with the early Symphony No. 3 in D major, and gave over the bulk of the program to the great Mass in E Flat, composed in the last year of Schubert's life. Its performance was dedicated to the memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, the leading spirit behind the foundation of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, who died in October of last year.

It is astounding that Schubert managed to progress so far and so rapidly from the facile imitation Classicism of his youth to the extraordinary and originality of the E-flat Mass. In 1828, his 31st and last year, Schubert was productive to an almost unbelievable degree. It is the year also of the C-major symphony, the cello quintet in the same key, the three last piano sonatas, the F minor fantasy for piano duet, and some of the greatest songs.

Among these masterpieces the Mass is the most problematic. Schubert treated the text oddly in all six settings he made of it. He left things out, for example the "patrem omnipotentem" at the beginning of the Credo, and his arrangement of the text seems curiously thoughtless sometimes. He becomes caught up in disturbing remnants of habit calling for purely formal repetition, and they lead him into strange predicaments. It is most peculiar, even dismaying, that after the Crucifixion, death, burial of Christ, to be plunged back into the sunny lyricism of the Incarnatus.

The work abounds in great inventions, the a cappella opening of the Gloria, or the tremendous series of harmonic taken at the beginning of the Sanctus which were later on remembered so well by Bruckner. This striding, chromatic widely modulating style, is carried to the most daring point in the magnificent Agnus Dei. Much of Schubert's invention is more accurately described as his intelligent and attentive absorption of certain of Beethoven's procedures in both his Masses.

In performance, Leinsdorf twice indulged most wantonly his occasional taste for blood letting. The crown of the Gloria is a fugee beginning with the words "Cum sancto spiritu." Its subject is one of the traditional and much used ones. Schubert uses it to build one of his most grandly planned and confidently executed structures, with a sense of timing and a masterful spacing of graduated climaxes such as he rarely achieved.

Leinsdorf nonetheless chose to omit a sizeable chunk out of the middle of this fugue, and he exhibited the same kind of impatience later on with the one on the words "Et vitam venturi" at the end of the Credo.

Now there is no disputing that the Mass has its problematic lengths. The problems are, however, of such a kind that could be solved only by the most basic rethinking of the whole design. To tamper with what is there solves nothing, and the effects of Leinsdorf's brutal surgery were the worst of occuring in passages where the music progresses according to the vigorous dramatic plan.

Leinsdorf is a puzzling man. Even in something as casual as Schubert's juvenile D major symphony, it seems that no repeat is so unimportant that it can be left out, but in the mature and well considered mastery of the E flat Mass he exhibits it once again the distressing lack of sense for musical continuity that has so often been the weakest aspect of his work.

In justice it must be reported that the cuts in this performance were less lavish than those on the recording Leinsdorf made in Berlin some years ago. Perhaps in time he will see his way clear to giving us all of the E flat Mass.

In other respects the performance both of the Mass and of the pleasant little symphony was for the most part satisfactory. In the Mass, Lainsdorf and the orchestra ajoined by the Festival Chorus, prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt, and by Saramae Endich, soprano, Eunis Alberts, contralto, Walter Carringer and Gerold Siena, tenors, and Donald Bell, bass. Except for the beautiful trio, the soprano and two tebors in the Incarnatus, the solo parts are not especially prominent. They were well done, and I thought that the work of Carringer and especially that of Miss Endich was most distinguished.

In spite of beautiful weather there was a rather modest crowd of 4111. Schubert evidently is another among the composers who have not yet quite arrived. The remainder of the week-end is devoted to Mozart and Richard Strauss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-42
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 11 1964

Schubert Mass Honors Founder Of Lenox Fete

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — As a memorial for Gertrude Robinson Smith, who founded the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., in 1934, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the festival chorus of 100 voices and five soloists presented a thoughtful, subdued mass Friday night for 4111 listeners at Tanglewood.

Much Chorus Work

It was Schubert's Mass No. 6 in E flat major, a mass which gives the chorus a lot of work, includes two sections for solo quartet and one for solo trio, both accompanied by the chorus and puts the orchestra largely in the position of accompanist.

The mass is long on melody and short on drama. There is much opportunity for majesty, however, and the conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, missed no opportunity to recreate such full, cathedral-like sounds as seem appropriate to religious work.

The chorus and orchestra sounded best during the opening kyrie and gloria, long before the 57-minute work began to sound a bit too long.

Worth Waiting for

Most moving moment came with the fugal trio for soprano and two tenors during the credo. It was sung with significance by Jerold Sienan, Walter Carringer and Saramae Endich, who sent their voices soaring with purity of expression and tone.

It was a moment worth waiting for and it made the rest of the mass anticlimatic, even though Eunice Alberts, contralto, and Donald Bell, bass, joined Miss Endich and Carringer for a fine quartet during the benedictus.

The only other work on the program was Schubert's Symphony No. 3 which opened the program with a few more than 20 minutes of delightful froth.

Written When 18

The symphony was one out of a half dozen the young Schubert wrote for his amateur and semi-pro friends to perform in the privacy of their homes. This one was written when he was 18 and, as one historian has said, composing immature symphonies and mature songs.

The symphony is simple and lyrical. It is, as the saying goes, a pieces of cake, a tasty tidbit tossed off by Boston's superb musical machine without effort.

It was melodic and meticulous by and expertly performed, pleasing, not intended to be emotionaliy moving, a nice combination of prelude and program.

Tonight Malcolm Frager is scheduled to play the solo part of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 11 (K413). The Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments by Mozart (K361) is scheduled to open the program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-42
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 92,729
JUL 11 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

Cool Weather Thins Crowd For Schubert

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Weather cut down attendance last night at the all-Schubert program opening the second weekend of the 50-piece Boston Symphony ensemble at Tanglewood under Eric Leinsdorf.

Throngs are expected tonight for Malcolm Frager's playing of the Mozart Piano Concerto in F major, and on Sunday for the Mozart Violin Concerto in B flat major with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, as soloist.

Last night's first Tanglewood hearing of the Schubert Mass in E flat major was dedicated to the memory of Miss Gertrude Robison Smith, who died last fall at the age of 82. She played a major part in the founding of the Festival and construction of its music shed.

Gazette Review

Schubert's Symphony No. 3 in D major, also new to Tanglewood, was a lively curtain-raiser. Composed when Schubert was 18, it alternates boyish confidence with mature and novel twists.

Leinsdorf's flair for clean phrasing and bright tone kept matters at a high level in spite of some breathy moments in the horns. The "Allegretto" was rich in daintily accented, lyric material. The most unique device was the intentional heavy accenting of the third beat of many measures in the "Minuetto."

Schubert Mass

In the Mass, written mostly for chorus, the 100 voices prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt of Smith College did splendid work, ranging from the fervent flow of tone in the "Agnus Dei" to lovely soft passages in the "Kyrie." Often, however, the tonal quality seemed less focused and expressive than the text would warrant. The long fugal episode in the "Gloria" was somewhat tedious, but the "Benedictus" was stirring and alive.

Saramee Endich, soprano and Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena, tenors, had a wonderful trio, and Eunice Alberts, contralto, performed limited tasks in the quartets with her usual competence. Donald Bell, bass, was seldom audible.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932
JUL 11 1964

The Sound of Music

Choral Difficulties Mar Schubert Mass

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — One good Austrian leads to another in the opening weekends of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. From last weekend's Mozart and Haydn programs Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony progressed to the music of Franz A. Schubert to open the second weekend last night.

The bulk of the program, heard on a pleasant evening by 4,111 listeners, was given over to Schubert's last and finest mass, the E Flat Major, No. 6. Mr. Leinsdorf and the symphony were joined by the festival chorus and a quintet of soloists.

Written in the waning months of Schubert's life, the mass belongs to the strongest of his music. Basically lyrical in mood, the few dark and brooding moments are quickly swept away on the wings of Schubertian song. A bit of mysticicism is allowed to creep in; there is despair in the threatening intensity of the concluding Angus Dei. But Schubert's E Flat Mass is mostly serene, peaceful, often rejoicing. It often seemed during last night's performance as if the graceful flow of much of Schubert's melodious lines were being held too tightly in check by Mr. Leinsdorf. Certainly the impression was of control; often a little more motion was urgent. Yet there was no denying the basic beauty of the chorus, their general precision (except for a raw entrance by the basses in the concluding movement and their splendid diction)—a tribute to their preparation by Iva Dee Hiatt. At the same time the male voices were thoroughly overwhelmed by the women. Either the men should have let loose some more or the ranks of sopranos and altos should have been thinned and probably both would have improved the balance.

The E Flat Mass is mainly a choral work, giving only three opportunities to the soloists, and then only in combination. More flow and projected conviction would have helped last night's soloists—Saramae Endich, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena, tenors, and Donald Bell, bass.

While skimping on the amount of solo work, Schubert was not niggardly with the lovely melodies given the solo groups, especially in the "Et Incaranatus" portion of the credo. For the tenors and soprano the finest in Agnus Dei, in which the contralto was unfortunately inaudible.

Schuberts E flat Mass is heard all too seldom. Because of its lyricism, formal solidity and tonal splendor, the work deserves better, although it by no means digs very deeply into religious experience. Among its highlights are the serenity of the Kyrie, the marvelous structure of the Gloria, with its moments of sweet melodic reverence contrasted with powerful trombone work, and fugal wizardry that concludes the credo.

The Agnus Dei is regarded by many as the finest part of the mass.

But last night its force failed to erupt. There were choral difficulties and the tenors and basses never seemed more forlorn struggling against the phalanx of ladies than in this section in which they were required to provide the hard iron. And the problems spread to the orchestra, with the outbursts of brass sounding more petulant than impressive.

Overall, though, one could rejoice in the splendor of sound that Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians provided. The mass was dedicate dto the memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, credited with being the "prime moving spirit" in the origination of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the construction of the shed in 1938, when she was the president of the festival's trustees.

The concert opened with a rather ragged and heavy-handed performance of Schubert's Symphony No. 3 in D composed by Schubert at 18 and showing the traces of classicism. There is a great deal of sunny charm here, an infectious joy transferred through a free-flowing style.

But much of it sounded soggy until the Boston Symphony became warmed up for the evening around the last movement. The development section of the first movement in particular heard some scrubby playing.

But to compensate, there was the romping merriment of the last movement. A swift section with lots of busy work for the strings, the movement is propelled by a bright tarantella rhythm and gurgles along with joyous orchestral by-play. Mr. Leinsdorf really cranked up his musicians for this delightful souffle.

Herald Tribune
NEW YORK
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
JUL 12 1964

Tanglewood: Schubert Excellence by Leinsdorf

By William Bender

LENOX, Mass.

The sun came out over the Berkshires Friday, after a cold, rainy period, and at night there was a break in the musical diet at Tanglewood as well—Schubert instead of Bach and Mozart.

Almost alone among the major conductors of our day, Erich Leinsdorf has devoted himself to Schubert's Great Mass in E Flat, and Friday night he introduced it to the Berkshire Music Festival.

Would that more conductors cared and did something about it. Written in the last days of Schubert's life, it is a glorious manifestation of his powers, showing a compactness of style rare for him as a composer of the ultimate, and lack of diffusiveness. It is, of course, also a surpassing testament to the depth of his humanity and religious feeling.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra also introduced Schubert's boyishly jubilant Third Symphony and the musical sunshine of the one was a perfect foil for the heavenly light of the other.

Schubert's first six symphonies all are boyish works, and conductors usually take them or leave them. Sir Thomas Beecham loved them, for example. But Boston Symphony conductors have usually taken only one to their hearts. Serge Koussevitsky used to like the Fifth, and Charles Munch the Second. It would appear that the Third is Leinsdorf's favorite. His performance on this occasion could have used a little less sculpturing and a little more brio, especially in the first movement, but everywhere there was grace and the most felicitous blending of choirs imaginable.

The mass, which utilized the Berkshire Festival chorus and five soloists, also could have used a little more punch on occasion but there was no denying the effect of Leinsdorf's clear definition of the harmonies that lie between chorus and orchestra, or steady mounting of layers of choral tone in the kyrie or credo, for example. An example of the fine work of the chorus of close to 100 men and women was the crackling articulation of the word "crucifixus," where indeed with the "et incarnatus est" of the soprano and two tenor soloists, the cumulative effect was considerable, and the 4,000 or so in the audience applauded the performance warmly.

The soloists were soprano Sara Mae Endich, contralto Eunice Alberts, tenors Walter Carringer and Seina, and bass Donald Bell. The bulk of the work in the E Flat mass is given to the chorus and orchestra, but the soloists carried out their assignments splendidly.

Last night it was back to Mozart, with pianist Malcolm Frager and soprano Helen Boatwright as soloists. And today the first performance here of the complete music of Richard Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" will take place."

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,063
JUL 13 1964

Weather Cuts Tanglewood Attendance But Music Magnificent In 3 Prelims

The last weekend of preliminary concerts in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood saw attendance moderate because of uncertain weather but enthusiasm high for a refreshing series of programs. All three were conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in the big Music Shed with a chamber-sized Boston Symphony Orchestra with various soloists and choral groups.

On Friday night, a Schubert program opened with a gay and graceful performance of the Symphony No. 3 in D Major. Written when Schubert was only 18, this has the feeling of youth and all the lyrical qualities which make this composer so appealing to succeeding generations. It was played lightly but with the necessary warmth.

Splendid Chorus

The major work of the evening was Mass in E-flat Major, in which the splendid Berkshire Festival Chorus joined. It would be hard to exaggerate the excellence of this performance, for the voices of this student group were marvelously disciplined, soaring in glorious unison as if toward the arched roof of a cathedral. Mr. Leinsdorf knit orchestra and voices into a dynamic emotional event, with fugue patterns clearly etched and strong melodic lines freely presented. The soloists, while given a relatively minor role in this composition, were of the same high order: Saramae Endich, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Walter Carringer, tenor; Jerold Siena, tenor; and Donald Bell, bass.

Magnificent Music

The Schubert Mass was given in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, long the patroness of the Berkshire Festival, and it was most fitting that something bringing together so successfully the orchestra and the student group of the Berkshire Music Center should honor her. It was a performance of high emotional as well as artistic caliber; the ovation that followed it was an overflow of the feelings stirred by this magnificent music.

On Saturday night, Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony presented a Mozart program with young Malcom Frager as piano soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major. This was well received by an audience of more than 7000 people. The program also included Serenade in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, and a collection of Six German Dances with Frager at the piano and Helen Boatwright as soprano soloist.

Great Hit

Sunday afternoon found more than 5000 gathered in discouraging weather for a particularly interesting program of what Mr. Leinsdorf calls festival music. The first half was by Mozart, the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro", and Violin Concerto No. 1, with Joseph Silverstein. Mr. Silverstein's talents are well recognized at Tanglewood, and he always measures up to expectations. But the showpiece of the day was the second half of the program, given over to the music of "Der Burger als Edelmann", by Richard Strauss. Soloists were Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; Donald Bell, Bass; and MacMorgan, bass and narrator. There was also a 12-voice male chorus. This imaginative work had not been performed in toto in this country before. It made a great hit.

There has been some grumbling because Leinsdorf has dropped for this season the all-Bach concerts that were previously curtain-raisers for the Berkshire Festival, but the substitution of music with a little more romantic flavor, including a number of compositions not heard at Tanglewood before, has been a welcome diversion for most listeners. Bach has not been banished from Tanglewood, but it just happens that this is Richard Strauss' year.

Next wekend the full Boston Symphony will launch into the major part of the Festival, which will continue for six weeks, with three major concerts every weekend. By ANABEL B. MURPHY

New England Newsclip Agency, I
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 11 1964

Music Review

Schubert at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A COMPLETE evening of Schubert, all new to Tanglewood, was the program last night in the Shed for the first concert of the second weekend of the Berkshire Festival.

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Third Symphony in D and, after intermission, the Great Mass in E Flat, this last in grateful memory of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, who was the prime moving spirit in the original project of a symphonic festival in this county and who died this past winter at the age of 82.

The symphony is very early Schubert, a naive but inexplicably gifted young man of 18. It is crystal clear and one need listen only to the remarkably placed introduction to notice the unerring ear which would produce such majestic pathos. Carlyle said of Burns, "A genius is an impossibility until it appear." Such a man was Schubert. In the Mass which followed, he was at the peak of his maturity and employed all the devices he had acquired and the details he had learned, but his mastery was already discernible in the delightful little youthful symphony.

* * *

THE ALLEGRETTO is an utterly charming little entity, quite outstanding within the other movements. It might be a nursery rhyme or a bedtime story told a child by her grandmother. Leinsdorf motioned to the four wind soloists to stand at the completion of the symphony, those whose good fortune it had been to play the delicious morsels Schubert had set before them: Clarinet Gino Cioffi, bassoon Sherman Walt, oboe Ralph Gomberg and flute Doriot Dwyer.

There were five vocal soloists for the Mass but they have only a minor part in the hour-long reading. The Festival Chorus, prepared by Iva Dee Hiatt, gets into action after the shortest of introductions on the oboe and scarcely relinquishes the conductor's attention for the rest of the Mass. The part singing is unusually involved and intricate; some entrances occur even without instrumental support and their attacks were clear and decisive.

Schubert gives the orchestra very little important subject matter, but there is an almost consistent fluid accompaniment to the voices. The fugal and contrapuntal choral writing had been competently mastered under Miss Hiatt's training and Leinsdorf's command was under confident control without exception.

* * *

THE FINAL chorus, Dona Nobis, came after a series of stupendous climaxes and the only way it could possibly be made to appear still more effective was by understatement, and Leinsdorf achieved a tremendous effect by restraining the large complement of voices and instruments on stage to an awesome finale.

Soprano Saramae Endich and tenors Walter Carringer and Jerold Siena gave the trio "Incarnatus" ringing sonority. Miss Endich and Mr. Carringer were joined by contralto Eunice Alberts and bass Donald Bell in two vocal quartets for which the audience of more than 4,100 was eager to show them, as well as conductor Leinsdorf and Miss Hiatt, enthusiastic applause.

New England New
Box 2078, Boston 6 •
Sunday Re
SPRINGFIE
Circ.
JUL 12

FRAGER REN
MOZART'S M AT TANGLE

Young Pianist
Percussiveness
Concerto No.

LENOX — Malcolm young prize-winning p lected the glittering p ness at which he is so xave 7252 listeners a wood a warm, friendly lectionate, piano co
Mozart Saturday night
With Symphon
With the Boston Sym chestra conducted
Leinsdorf he played Concerto K413, a wo turned out to accom taska; he made it live tertaining to please audiences, and he ma
ly simple so that adva teurs could play it at a string quartet.
Frager met the f
ment with a measu ness, but the second play of understa gentleness.
He seemed to achi
mon success with zart's instructions:
meter in the left h
while the right st compresses the rhyt
pression.
Picks Up P
The third movemen the pace without los tleness of the sec
the while every note lously in place, even and clean.
Frager appeared be one of the very pianists with a fee zart beyond his ye
Boatwright, soprano ger joined the orche ing the concerto) scena with rondo with piano obbl which Mozart wrot and the only girl whom his wife had jealous, Nancy Stor
It is a tender love, but, alas, as only music can be.
Six German
The concert clos lection called Six es, K509, and ope zart's longest and serenade for win minutes), the sex for 13 wind instru
Leinsdorf had on the stage; t clarinets, two Ba
French horns, tw contra-bassoon bass. The extra either the contra double bass, d how you interpr
er's instructions
There are se during the cours ly all combinat strumen are all of them are but not for 51 m
Second
Boston's wind just a touch of s
the first moveme couple of phras movement loo they played sharpness and rapport.
The sense of gan to feel afte caused partly of tempos. All slow. Only th was jaunty.
Best probab movement, an tive melodies that provided open-air garde of most of the
It is a grea est when hea
time.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUL 12 1964

FRAGER RENDERS MOZART'S MOOD AT TANGLEWOOD

Young Pianist Rejects Percussiveness in Concerto No. 11

LENOX — Malcolm Frager, young prize-winning pianist, rejected the glittering percussiveness at which he is so good and gave 7252 listeners at Tanglewood a warm, friendly, even affectionate, piano concerto by Mozart Saturday night.

With Symphony

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf he played the No. 11 Concerto K413, a work Mozart turned out to accomplish two tasks; he made it lively and entertaining to please one of his audiences, and he made it fairly simple so that advanced amateurs could play it at home with a string quartet.

Frager met the first movement with a measure of coolness, but the second was a display of understanding and gentleness.

He seemed to achieve uncommon success with one of Mozart's instructions: Keep the meter in the left hand steady while the right stretches and compresses the rhythm for expression.

Picks Up Pace

The third movement picked up the pace without losing the gentleness of the second, and all the while every note was meticulously in place, every trill exact and clean.

Frager appeared Saturday to be one of the very few young pianists with a feeling for Mozart beyond his years. Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Frager joined the orchestra (following the concerto) to present a scena with rondo for soprano with piano obbligato, K505, which Mozart wrote for himself and the only girl (probably) of whom his wife had reason to be jealous, Nancy Storace.

It is a tender expression of love, but, alas, as abstract as only music can be.

Six German Dances

The concert closed with a collection called Six German Dances, K509, and opened with Mozart's longest and most serious serenade for wind band (51 minutes), the serenade in B flat for 13 wind instruments, K361.

Leinsdorf had 14 instruments on the stage; two oboes, two clarinets, two Basset horns, four French horns, two bassoons, a contra-bassoon an da double bass. The extra instrument was either the contra-bassoon or the double bass, depending upon how you interpret the composer's instructions.

There are seven movements during the course of which nearly all combinations of the instruments are called for, and all of them are fascinating. . . but not for 51 minutes.

Second Movement

Boston's wind players showed just a touch of shagginess during the first movement and ended a couple of phrases on the second movement loosely. Otherwise they played with knife-like sharpness and with increasing rapport.

The sense of monotony one began to feel after a half hour was caused partly by the similarity of tempos. All were medium to slow. Only the last movement was jaunty.

Best probably was the third movement, an adagio with plaintive melodies full of melancholy that provided contrast to the open-air garden party character of most of the serenade.

It is a great serenade, greatest when heard a little at a time.

MIDWEST NEWSCLIP, INC.
Box 1359, Chicago 90, WEbster 9-5497
Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Massachusetts
Midwestern Edition
Weekly Circ. 62,000
JUL 15 1964

Tanglewood premières

Frager wins acclaim

By Harold Rogers

Lenox, Mass.

There is a certain elegant insouciance about Malcolm Frager's playing. He can shape a Mozartean phrase as one to the manner born. Poise, control, color, rhythm, dynamics—all are blended in a performance enchanting to the ear.

Yet it is plain that these outward effects spring from an inner source: Mr. Frager is blessed by an eminently musical heart. Appearing for a second successive summer at the Berkshire Music Festival, the young pianist communicated his lyrical sense of beauty to the large Saturday night audience. He gave the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413. He had learned the work expressly for this occasion.

Accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf's studied guidance, the concerto came forth with classical grace and radiant tone. The inhibitions to be noted in the concerto were no different from those witnessed in the Serenade in B-flat for 13 Wind Instruments, K. 361, with which Mr. Leinsdorf opened the concert. Nothing truly caught fire.

Thus in the concerto a certain dichotomy was present; Mr. Leinsdorf's cerebral control, however polished it may have been, ran competition with Mr. Frager's heartfelt warmth. Superb it was, if not superlative; the applause was well punctuated by the bravos of excited listeners.

In the Serenade for Winds one again became keenly aware of Mr. Leinsdorf's gains and losses—gains in clarity, balance, tonal beauty; losses in the human element, that stirring sense of music that sets the pulse leaping, the heart singing.

Speaking of song, Helen Boatwright turned in some eloquent singing in Mozart's Scena with Rondo, K. 505. Here Mr. Frager joined her to provide the piano obbligato; and another Mozartean rarity made its Tanglewood debut in an appealing performance.

Miss Boatwright, like Mr. Frager, can spin a phrase to perfection; her soprano is clear and bell-like in the night air; her Italian diction most commendable—"Ch'io mi scordi di te," the scena, followed by "Non temer, amato bene," the rondo.

Large blocks of seats remained unsold for the Sunday afternoon concert. One wondered if this falling off of patronage is now the chronic state of affairs at Tanglewood, or if the problem was acute, owing to the first complete American performance of the Incidental Music to "Der Bürger als Edelmann" by Richard Strauss.

Yet this Austrian version of Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" has many charms to commend it. Though it follows hard on the heels of "Der Rosenkavalier" and often swings its merry way in three-quarter time, it seldom reaches the glorious climaxes of its predecessor. But then it is incidental music and not pure opera.

Yet it makes pleasant listening for a summer afternoon, and its meaning was heightened and underlined by the adroit narration of Mac Morgan. Whether singing or acting, Mr. Morgan has a skilfully witty touch.

The afternoon concert was further improved by the suave musicianship of Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster. Reading from the notes, he tossed off a deft performance of Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1 in B-flat major, K. 207; and this, too, was another Tanglewood première.

Malcolm Frager

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
JUL 13 1964

Those Familiar Old Airs Gone At Tanglewood

By William Bender

LENOX, Mass.

The full flower of the "new" Tanglewood was everywhere to be seen and heard during the second weekend of the season.

There was a time when coming to the Berkshire Music Festival was like visiting old friends in the country. That is, the programming was usually unadventurous and the performances like casual handshakes between old friends.

But all that, of course, has changed under Erich Leinsdorf's regime, now in its second year here. Under Leinsdorf's keen, watchful eye, the accent is definitely on scholarship and new and unfamiliar music. Not that the old frieneds have been ostracized. There will be time for some of them later in the season.

Friday night Mr. Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony and assisting forces gave the first performances here of Schubert's Mass in E Flat and the third Symphony. Saturday night brought the debuts of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 11, K 413, the six German dances K 509, and the Scena ("Ch'io mi scordi di te") with Rondo ("Non temer, amato bene"), K 505, a remarkable resetting and reworking of texts from "Idomeneo."

"The familiar Serenade K 361, opened Saturday night's program. On Sunday Leinsdorf offered the American premiere of the complete incidental music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss and another Tanglewood first, Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207.

The "new" Tanglewood was also in evidence at the theater, where another big crowd (about 700) turned out at 10 a. m. Sunday to hear performances of Bach's Cantatas 42 and 51 by the music center students, who are learning exciting new things about Bach style from Paul Ulanowsky, Seymour Lipkin and Igor Kipnis.

"Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," based on the Moliere comedy, was done with a narration prepared by poet Richard Wilbur and read by bass Mac Morgan. It was more successful than the narration treatment Leinsdorf applied last year to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The text underlined the humor of the familiar excerpts and was essential for the new selections.

Among these was an absolutely charming duet for two sopranos (dialogue between shepherd and shepherdess) sung deliciously by Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni. It should be something of a find to Straussophiles. It recalled some of the best passages in "Ariadne auf Naxos," with which the score was originally intended to be performed.

Malcolm Frager, pianist.

There is also a burlesque-type scene near the end in which Jourdain, the hero, is bamboozled by a masquerading Turkish "mufti." It sounded like fun and recalled some of the wilder moments of "Der Rosenkavalier." Leinsdorf's performance of the work was amiable, courtly, full of rounded sonorities and just a bit stodgy, reflecting Strauss' romanticized conception of the 18th century.

The score cozes with powdered wigs, slow curtsies and stately dances. This is part of the 18th Century, of course, and Strauss never claimed to be recreating that era in a realistic way. But against the brilliance, vigor and life of the works of that period actually performed Saturday and Sunday, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (which Strauss and Hofmannsthal called "Der Burger als Edelmann"), actually sounded more out of date than the older works.

As for the real 18th Century music provided by Mozart, the performances were generally excellent. Miss Boatwright gave a thrilling display of assured vocalism and stylistic know-how in the Scena and Rondo; Malcolm Frager combined grace and incisiveness in the piano concerto, and Joseph Silverstein was dashing, accurate and gorgeous of tone in the violin concerto.

Leinsdorf's accompaniments were neatly tailored to the works at hand—thoughtful and alert for the Scena and Rondo, gentle and reflective for the piano concerto and quick and to the point for the violin concerto.

But the Serenade K361 was a big disappointment. It offered only lethargy and blandness where it should have burst with energy and inflection. The playing of the 13 wind players was splendid, but in a big work like this there should have been more cohesiveness and momentum.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

QUINCY, MASS.
Patriot-Ledger
Eve. Circ. 48,932

JUL 14 1964

The Sound of Music

Strauss And Mozart Fill Tanglewood Bills

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — If one form of genius is the ability to cram big things into little packages, Richard Strauss deserves the title for his incidental music to "Der Buerger als Edelmann."

Strauss, of course, is better known for his attempts to put big things into big packages in his tone poems of olympian sonority and length. But in the music he wrote to accompany the play Hugo von Hofmannsthal adapted from Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Strauss cut down his usually huge orchestra to one of chamber proportions, while not stinting on his overflow of musical ideas.

The result is a thoroughly delightful masterpiece and its performance Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony led by Erich Leinsdorf was a radiant treat for the 5,262 listeners.

The orchestral suite from "Der Buerger," the tale of the efforts of a "would-be gentleman," M. Jourdain, a naive nouveau riche who tries to turn himself into a noble and succeeds only in making himself ridiculous, was offered by Mr. Leinsdorf during the winter season at Symphony Hall.

Sunday's performance at the Berkshire Music Festival, however, comprised the complete incidental music (except for two sections omitted because they require stage action) with narrative and soloists. It marked the first performance in the United States of the complete score. Significantly, it was the Boston Symphony which introduced the shortened orchestral suite to this country in 1921 under the direction of the late Pierre Monteux.

Strauss' suite can stand securely on its own as "pure" music, yet this musical spoof with the skillful narrative portion translated or derived from the German text by Prof. Richard Wilbur of Wesleyan University and expertly spoken by Mac Morgan is even more delectable. Those unfamiliar with the play or suite were spared the exercise of fumbling through their programs for guideposts. Those acquainted with the action gained fresh recognition of how deftly Strauss wedded music to stage action, and the sly commentary on human shortcomings Strauss parlayed into sound.

The whipped cream on this confection was supplied by the soloists — Helen Boatwright, soprano; Helen Vanni, mezzo soprano; Donald Bell, bass, and Mr. Morgan, bass — and a male chorus. The orchestral suite includes neither the amusing duet for the ladies, nor a madrigal trio at the end.

Omitted also from the instrumental suite is a splendid section of broad comedy—the investituture of M. Jourdain as a "mamamouchi" in a fake "Turkish" ceremony. Here, the bass soloist intones nonsense syllables (in "lingua franca") while the chorus strings along with the gag. Mr. Bell made great sport of his part here, with buffo intonation coloring his powerful declamations.

Strauss' miniature score is a many-splendored thing, and Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony have a particular affinity for its beauties. A master of orchestration and instrumental color, Strauss produced music that crackles with wit and burbles with humor. But it takes an expert hand on the helm and virtuose, flexible playing at every desk to make it dance, sing and laugh as it did on Sunday.

Especially effective were the masterful dinner movement with its many musical jokes, the soaring cello solos of Samuel Mayes in that movement and in the minuet, Bernard Zighera's fine piano work and the luscious melodic treatment of the Prelude to Act II and the Entrance of Cleonte, both derived from music of Jean-Baptiste Lully, who composed the ballet score for the original Moliere play.

The concert opened with a sparkling reading of Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," K. 492, and before intermission concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was soloist in Mozart's Violin Concert No. 1 in B flat, K. 207. The orchestra was obviously in top form throughout the afternoon, and its accompaniment for Mr. Silverstein was the kind a soloist dreams about.

The violinist, though, was not at peak form. While his light, sweet tone filtered softly through the fragile adagio, there were less happy moments in the surrounding faster sections, especially in the cadenzas.

Fine weather and an attractive all-Mozart program brought out the season's largest audience, 7,252, for Saturday night's concert. Disappointing in the opening hour, the program was thoroughly redeemed by sensitive musicianship after intermission.

Of the several works Mozart composed for wind ensemble, the Serenade in B flat for 13 Wind Instruments, K. 361, is in a class by itself. It bears the usual evidence of Mozart's genius in the wealth of melodic invention; there is charm and no little wit. But there's even more — the imaginative and quite bold instrumental mixtures Mozart uses in releasing a glorious spectrum of tonal color.

The serenade is scored for two oboes, two clarinets, two basset horns (a plaintive alto clarinet), four horns, two bassoons and contra-bassoon. Mr. Leinsdorf also added a double bass, reinforcing the deep-voiced contra-bassoon.

The blend — with the clear, open tones of the clarinets tempered by the rather reedy sound of the basset horns, the nasal plaint of the oboes, the low, grainy quality of the bassoons and the punctuation of the horns, sometimes mellow, sometimes gruff — makes this serenade a thorough delight in its exploration of textures and color. Within the seven movements, there is the sound of a military band, as in the concluding rondo. The remarkably beautiful adagio and the theme and variations movement held an ethereal quality.

Unfortunately, the Boston Symphony wind players did not do full justice to this marvelous score Saturday night. Much of the playing was simply dull and uninteresting. The clarinets on occasion were dismal, and only the horns and the bassoons were consistently accurate in pitch and style.

While the ensemble did warm up toward the end — the theme and variations section and parts of the rondo went well—the performance was generally stiff, formal, careful. It lacked heart and buoyancy. Why this should be so in an orchestra blessed with a number of gifted wind instrumentalists is surprising. Perhaps they need more work in small groupings, or maybe they just were not warmed up — the Boston Symphony of late has shown a tendency to be "cold" at the opening of its concerts.

After intermission — both orchestra and unruly audience settled down. Malcolm Frager joined the Symphony and Mr. Leinsdorf for a relaxed and reflective rendering of Mozart's early Piano Concerto No. 11 in F, K. 413. Here the instrumental textures were all filigree and lace, with Mr. Frager's graceful touch producing a tone of exquisite delicacy.

The concerto itself is pleasant but far below the composer's later output. It is a salon piece, ending gently with a rondo on a minuet theme, rather wtih the usual Mozartean romp and bursts of solo brilliance. Mr. Frager deserved the prolonged applause for his clean and refined, performance and the suave elegance of his cantabile.

The pianist returned to play the piano obbligato to the Scena with Rondo ("Non temer, amato bene" — "Don't be afraid, my dear"), K. 505, that Mozart wrote to replace an earlier aria in "Idomeneo" for a special performance. Miss Boatwright, the soloist, turned in by far her best solo work of the festival here, shaping her phrases with style and (at last) hitting her pitches squarely. While her troubles in the low register persist, it didn't really matter since she managed the contours of the rondo's soft lyricism with assurance.

For the final work, Mr. Leinsdorf chose a rollicking set of Six German Dances, K. 509, to end the concert on a happy note (an extended one by the flute). Wit and good humor race through these genial dances, and the Symphony played them with a joyous lilt.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

JUL 13 1964

Music Review

Mozart at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

YESTERDAY afternoon's performance of Strauss' incidental music to "Der Buerger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's comedy-ballet, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," was its first complete performance in America. It is a type of music which has rarely been produced at Tanglewood but it proved to be unalloyed fun and pleasure. It is a sophisticated satire on Moliere's poor "Jourdain," the bourgeois, who wants to climb socially to the ranks of the aristocrats.

It requires a small orchestra, a chorus of 12 male voices, 4 soloists, Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni, sopranos, and Donald Bell, bass, and outstanding credit should go to Mac Morgan. He had but one short vocal solo, but he was the narrator and was required to recite and foretell the actions of 15 or more short episodes. His narrations were not only lucid and articulate but tempered with stress or inflection to make every word and phrase more graphic. He was seated on an old Louis XIV chair and rose, when called upon, to a decorative high lectern.

* * *

STRAUSS toyed with the libretto Von Hofmannsthal had furnished him. In no one of even his most pretentious works does his mastery show more clearly, for the wit and moods of the original play are discernible by all the tricks of the trade the composer brought to bear on his subject. This was the first Strauss orchestral work to appear on the season's programs which will concentrate on an observance of the 100th anniversary of his birth.

Lully had written incidental music to his contemporary's play, and Strauss borrowed the style and in some cases the actual lines of his famous predecessor. The argument concerns the means by which the protagonist hopes quickly to learn all the manners of the social scale to which he aspires and so he has both music and dancing lessons, engages a fencing master, employs a tailor and tries to become the chivalrous gallant in 10 easy lessons. Ludicrous mockery shows through every part of Strauss' happy score and Leinsdorf's forces were thoroughful cooperative. Principal cellist Samuel Mayes distinguished himself in his solo. The soprano soloists have but one opportunity, but their dialogue of the shepherd and shepherdess and the basso's ludicrous portraiture of the hero raised to a Turkish ennoblement was kept from farce only by the good dramatic sense of all involved.

Strauss roams over the entire terrain with sure step and happy imagination. His melodies, harmonies and tone colors are a constant joy.

* * *

THE FIRST half of the concert and the entire program on the preceding Saturday night had been devoted to Mozart.

Malcolm Frager

Yesterday the program began with the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," in which Da Ponte had gone to Beaumarchais for Mozart much as Von Hofmannsthal had gone to Moliere for Strauss. Leinsdorf's overture was played with the utmost nicety and with a tempo which gave no hint that it was to be a test of velocity as can too often be the case.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein played the B Flat Violin Concerto (K. 207) and on the preceding evening Malcolm Frager did the F Major Piano Concerto K. 413). Both are of less than epic content but served as vehicles to reveal the superb competence of both soloists. Silverstein's natural refinement fitted his concerto to excellent advantage, and in the first movement there was a solid bite to his bow whenever the moment invited it. The ease with which he plays sometimes obscures his remarkable achievements. Double stops held in restraint do not show how much more difficult they are than boisterous ones and phrases played at the top of the fingerboard with gratifying justness do not betray the hazards of such a choice.

* * *

SATURDAY night Frager, too, did not attempt to give his concerto an inflated stature, yet he played with a degree of poetry, in both the swift and in the lambent larghetto movements, which exposed a complete mastery of the keyboard and the insight of exceptional penetration.

The evening had started with the complete B Flat Serenade (K. 361) for 13 wind instruments, two each of oboes, clarinets, basset horns (alto clarinets), bassoons, contrabassoon and four French horns. Mozart indicates that a string double bass may substititute for the contrabassoon, but Leinsdorf used both, thus making 14 musicians, and adding only debatable density to the register. When the strings were plucked, as in the trio of the second minuet, the effect tends to be irrelevant.

The Largo introduction is a model of tonal lusciousness, and, in Leinsdorf's hands, of balance. Every repeat of the seven movements was taken, but every line is so replete with rewarding nuggets that it is a small penalty to pay to have to listen nearly a full hour to such abundant fare. The tempos were comfortable but what in general was only Mozart's incredibly facile invention Leinsdorf made a trifle récherché. By stressing the amphibrachic accompaniment of the first adagio, the fragile melody was mildly overpowered. Oboist Ralph Gomberg and clarinetist Gino Cioffi were highly deserving of the special recognition Leinsdorf motioned them to acknowledge.

* * *

BEFORE the evening ended with six delightful German dances (K. 509), there was a short but exquisite little Aria and Rondo: "Could I forget you?" and "Do not fear, my dearest," sung by Miss Boatwright with a piano obbligato by Frager. These were little gems that Mozart could dash off on short notice and which here had been supplied to introduce an act of "Idomeneo." Miss Boatwright used her resonant voice to faithfully catch the improvisational nature of the aria of the pseudo-grief-stricken lover and the following torments of the path of true love. Frager again displayed the taste and fluency which had signaled his work in the concerto.

Yesterday's concert marks the completion of the first two weeks of the season after which the larger phalanx of the orchestra, having completed the Esplanade series, will join the chamber-sized group which has played at Tanglewood up to now, for six weeks of repertory similar to the Symphony Hall programs.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435

JUL 12 1964 Sunday Telegram July 12, 1964

Music: Mozart Program at Tanglewood

LENOX — Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra went to the back shelves of their Mozart repertory to find last night's Tanglewood program. So far as applause from an audience of 7,252 indicated, it was a huge success.

The program: serendade in B Flat for 13 wind instrument; piano concerto No. 11 in F Major with Malcolm Frager as solosit; Scene ("Could I Forget You?") with Rondo ("Do Not Fear, My Dearest"), with Helen Boatwright and Frager as solosits, and six German dances.

Thrived on It

Most symphony orchestras would die on the vine with such a program. The Boston Symphony and Leindsdorf thrived on it.

Ordinarily, the nearest thing to cross - section appeal would have been the German dances. Joseph II of Austria commissioned them as "fun music" in 1787. In this age they remain liltingly melodic, but to some seem a mite starchy. These same people, who apparently were in the small minority last night, would also consider the rest of the program as relics from the classic era.

"Grand Partita"

Mozart's serenade or "Grand Partita" for 13 wind instruments reaped a harvest for that segment of the orchestra. It was not approached as "casual" music — even less like a novelty.

The first five movements put emphasis on their parade of charming melodies and studies in combined tonal colors. Contrapuntal lure were no curtailment of vitality, even in the massive shed with its remarkable acoustics.

Only serious criticism with the performances was long pauses Leinsdorf took between movements. It not only broke continuity but encouraged audience murmurring which further lengthened the breaks.

Serenade

There were 14 players on stage to perform the serenade. They were four clarinets (two of them basset horns), two each of oboes, F and B- hours, bassoons. The remaining was shared by contra bassoon and bass viol. Usually, this is performed by one or the other.

After hearing Frager play Prokofieff's First two sizzling piano concertos here last summer, his handling of Mozart's Eleventh left much to be disclosed in terms of finesse and polished craft.

more more

The Mozart Concerto in F Major is by no means the composer's most felicitious work in this category. It follows a strict form, almost rigid, is lightly accompanies, and a somewhat shallow piece for the soloist.

Rewarding Respect

Frager treated it with rewarding respect. His technique was lacy and accurate. Phrasing was adroit and obligingly confirmed by conductor and orchestra. He elicited a singing tone from the instrument. In one respect, he bore little resemblance to the fiery pianist who made grand slams of last summer's contemporary works.

But in the best sense, Frager demonstrated last night that he's a sensitive pianist with a keen sense of tonal beauty and a musician who can concern himself discreetly and wisely to less intimadating scores.

Yesterday morning there was an audience of 2,454 in the music shed for the weekly open rehearsal. Leinsdorf, orchestra and soloists worked on this afternoon's program.

Several changes have been instituted this summer to preserve peace and quiet at these public rehearsals. they are on Saturday mornings beginning at ten o'clock; admission is $1.50 for adults, 50 cents for children.

Moved Back

In past summers, the audience has been seated beginning with the seventh row from the orchestra. They have now been moved back to the 14th row. Those entering the grounds with children are handed a leaflet stating that "the wails, even the gleeful calls of children offer an uncontrollable threat to the peacy, as any parent can testify."

Management and the Boston Symphony "sincerely and urgently suggest" that infants and children under six years are not to go into the shed. Other silence breakers of the past have been visitors from summer camps in the area. Written appeals have also been sent to their supervisors.

Yesterday morning, a three-year-old neighbor of ours was thoroughly disinterested in such concert decorum.

"I Can Play The Violin"

His reaction to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture was one of sheer delight. First he swung his legs vigorously in rhythm. Then he clapped his hands to the music, leaned forward and stretched his ears forward. Finally, he turned to his father and exclaimed: "I can play the violin."

He and father were seen leaving the shed at a musical tempo called "Allegro Vivace."

Also on this afternoon's program is Mozart's violin concerto No. 1 in B Flat Major, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Main feature will be the first complete performance in America of Richard Strauss' incidental music to Moliere's comedy - ballet, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." Mac Morgan is narrator for the latter. Other participants are a small male chorus; Miss Boatwright; Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano; Donald Bell, bass.

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, July 13, 1964

TU AT THE CONCERT
Strauss Honored at Tanglewood

By EDGAR VANOLINDA

Tanglewood—The 100th anniversary of the birth of the contemporary German composer, Richard Strauss was fittingly observed at Tanglewood, yesterday afternoon, in the second weekend series of concerts, traditionally devoted to the works of Bach and Mozart with a generous interlarding of Haydn and Schubert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the dynamic direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

In line with the announced plans of Mr. Leinsdorf before taking over the Bostonians, the "Little Napoleon of the Orchestra World," has, indeed, "explored" many interesting works not previously available to Tanglewood audiences, in many instances, first performance at the Berkshire Music Festival and several American premieres. This was the case Sunday afternoon with a magnificent performance of the incidental music to Strauss' setting of Moliere's text of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The orchestra was assisted by a solo quartet, consisting of Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni, sopranos; Donald Bell and Mac Morgan, basses (with the latter doubling as narrator) and the Festival Male Chorus.

The concert featured the playing of the Mozart Violin Concerto No. 1 by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, a young man who has enhanced the famed quality of the string section, who has and evolved into one of the most promising solo violinists of this generation. The Silverstein technic and tone were in evidence throughout his brilliant performance. The overture to Mozart's comic opera, "The Marriage of Figaro" was the proper apertif to the musical feast of the afternoon.

Friday evening's concert programmed Schubert's Mass in E-flat as a tribute to the memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival, who passed away last November. The work was enthusiastically applauded in contrast to a similar memorial a week earlier for Pierre Monteux which was preceded and followed by impressive periods of reverential silence.

Saturday night's concert segued back to Mozart with the performance of his "Serenade," featuring the superb wind choir of the orchestra. The guest soloist was the sensational young American pianist, Malcolm Frager, who was immediately re-engaged for 1964 after his exciting debut with the Bostonians at Tanglewood, last summer.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

JUL 13 1964

Music: Strauss Tribute

Centennial Celebrated at Tanglewood

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 12— Like most of the musical world, the Berkshire Festival anticipates celebrating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss this summer. This afternoon, in presenting his incidental music for "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," it made its chief contribution to the centennial.

This was the first complete performance in the United States of the incidental music. It proved a major novelty and was perhaps especially surprising to those who know the charming suite the composer drew from the work during his lifetime. For what it showed was that the suite is by no means the whole story.

The music took 70 minutes to play, so one of the surprises was how much of it there was. It is not all instrumental either, for parts are for male chorus, and there are solo voice numbers as well as vocal ensembles. Furthermore, the performance showed that the music must be allowed a place in Strauss's operatic development.

Baron Ochs, of course, is Strauss's most famous portrait of an elderly man who makes a fool of himself through vulgarity and folly. And later, in "The Silent Woman," Strauss depicted another foolish man who was getting on in years. But in the later opera, the attitude is changed.

There is far more sympathy in the mockery there. This afternoon's performance showed that Strauss created a character midway between Ochs and the man who was tricked into marrying the woman he thought was silent.

Strauss did this by seizing on Jourdain, Molière's bourgeois gentilhomme and writing so much music for and about Jourdain, that he stands forth as a latter-day Ochs. But he is seen with such understanding of his foolish illusions, that one ends by seeing the poetry as well as the humor of the man's desires to rise above his station.

What made all this intelligible was the excellent narration that the poet Richard Wilbur made to accompany his English translation of the vocal numbers. This narration, spoken by Mac Morgan, condensed Hoffmansthal's version of Molière's play. The condensation enabled one to understand where each number fitted and how it contributed to the effect of the play.

"Der Bürger Als Edelmann," as it was known in German, was the original first part of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" and was later replaced by the prologue. It makes considerable use of the music Lully wrote for the Molière play when it was new in 1670. And Strauss's scoring for chamber orchestra has made a touching amalgam of his own style and Lully's.

The performance had delicacy and beauty. Donald Bell sang the role of Jourdain. Mr. Morgan, besides speaking, sang the other bass parts. Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni were the shepherdesses and sylphs, and the 15-voice male chorus was drawn from students of the Berkshire Music Center.

Erich Leinsdorf, who planned the Strauss tribute, prefaced the incidental music with two works by a composer Strauss loved. They were the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and the Mozart Violin Concerto in B flat major (K-207), for which Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster was the sweet-toned and graceful soloist.

Last night's program was all Mozart. Following Mr. Leinsdorf's Tanglewood custom, it consisted of little-known works. The Serenade in B flat for 13 wind instruments opened it. It was expertly played by members of the Boston Symphony. Because it took almost an hour, it formed the first part of the program.

Malcolm Frager was the pianist in two of the numbers after the intermission. He was a musicianly if somewhat impersonal soloist in the piano concerto in F major (K.413). But he was an altogether winning piano partner with Miss Boatwright in the duet for piano and soprano that Mozart created in a third setting of one of the "Idomeneo" arias.

This was perhaps the high point of the program, and Miss Boatwright sang it with sympathy, musicianship and a floating beauty of tone. The composer's Six German Dances (K.509) brought the evening to a light-hearted close.

Whitestone
Joseph Silverstein, who played Mozart concerto.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
JUL 13 1964

Music: Strauss, Mozart at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Yesterday afternoon's Tanglewood concert by the Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was distinguished by the first complete performance in America of Richard Strauss' incidental music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

This concluding concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's second weekend was attended by 5,262, bringing the weekend total to 20,597. Balance of the program was Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, and the same composer's Violin Concerto No. 1 in B flat major, K207, with Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

Strauss wrote his incidental music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" in 1912. It accompanied a play by Hugo von Hofmannstal, based on Moliere's comedy-ballet, dated 1670. Portions of the Strauss score have been occasionally performed, and enjoyed moderate success.

Supplemented Action

Yesterday's version supplemented action with commentary, given by Mac Morgan. This made it expedient to include sections that would otherwise have no relationship to the plot or personality "Monsieur Jourdain," newly-rich boor who strives awkwardly to become a "would be gentlemen."

The 15 sections played yesterday were most of the musical score. Two brief passages were omitted. Even with narration they would have been meaningless without stage action.

Yesterday's performance of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" was not a sensation. Neither is it to be dismissed as a modest success. In too many spots (motly extended dance action ushered in with a few words by the narrator) Strauss' sense of humor could not fully encompass the pictorial satire.

Morgan recited the commentary from memory, referring to his text only for cues. His delivery was slowly paced, expressive (particularly in sardonic passages) and consistently interesting. He made stock of Jourdain's absurd speeches. For example, when Jourdain is exposed for the first time to "high class" music his request of his music teacher: "Bring me my dressing gown, so that I may listen better."

The orchestral score was sparkingly played. Leinsdorf conducted it from memory even supplying cues to the narrator. Despite the caricatured sections describing Jourdain's self-imposed relations with leech-like aristocracy, orchestral highlights remained pretty much what they've always been, without benefit of narration.

Exceptions were the "dinner music" in which strauss mimics various warblings for "a little dish of thrushes and larks."

The other was the "Turkish ceremony" during which Jourdain's disguised, prospective but undesirable son-in-law deceives him. He poses as the son of a Turkish mogul and wins the lady's hand by bestowing upon Jourdain the imaginary title of "Mamamouchi."

Fine Voice

Bass soloist Donald Bell gave fine voice to Jourdain's self-eulogy, and the 12 voice male chorus abetted him with a viril sounding ensemble. Those who couldn't recognize the language were not at fault. It was intentionally a "mish-mash."

The hymnal-styled "Madrigal" was nicely sung by Bell, Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Helen Vanni, mezzo-soprano The latter two added a bit of operatic zeal to the dialogue of the shepherd and shepherdess. Silverstein and cellist Samuel Mayes played their respective solos expressively.

Highpoint of atmosphere was reached in the "Sicilienne," instigated by Jourdain's "blue bath to improve his blood by osmosis."

'Entertainment Music'

In writing his first violin concerto at the age of 19, Mozart openly set out to make "entertainment music." Its form is standard procedure, and has an unending stream of melody that keeps the soloist in the spotlight.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra set a healthy pace in the introduction for Silverstein's finely-developed technique. From the outset, it was closely-joined dialogue between soloist and ensemble.

Violinist and orchestra were not always exactly parallel, nor was the soloists intonation unfailingly accurate. The first movement cadenza was clean and had brilliant qualities that didn't extend to the cadenza of the finale. The slow movement had grace of phrase and warmly-expressed sentiment.

The final presto was an outburst of joy, not a care in the world, other than considerable technical problems that Silverstein handled (for the most part) with aplomb.

"Figaro" overture was played at a brisk but unhurried speed, disclosing brilliant work in the strings. Attacks were incisive. Sharply applied accents and wide dynamic range enhanced a soaring melody that remained out front where it belonged. The overture's ebullient spirit remained undampened.

The festival resumes next Friday with Leinsdorf conducting the Boston symphony in a memorial concert to Serge Koussevitzky. The program: Richard Strauss' interludes from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten," and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711
JUL 13 1964

Tanglewood II

'Music for Festival'; Mozart and Strauss

By MARGO MILLER

LENOX — The greener pastures of Erich Leinsdorf are the eight weeks of the Berkshire Festival. Here, surrounded by the Tanglewood Lawns, unscorched as yet this Summer, the Boston Symphony conductor runs to premieres the way neighboring fields run to mustard. Sunday afternoon's program in the 6000-seat Music Shed offered the first U.S. performance of Strauss' Incidental Music to "Der Buerger als Edelman" (Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"). Saturday evening's concert included three works by Mozart all new to the Berkshires.

Leinsdorf also hunts out "Music for Festival." This, he says, is music, which for one reason or another, he can't do in Symphony Hall. Consider Mozart's B-flat Serenade for 13 Winds, with a double bass sitting in on the tuttis.

Serenades were a kind of Musak, decorative stuff to shore up a party's silent moments.

On the Tanglewood Lawns, it could or could not be listened to by courting couples or the blanket brigade following, by transistor radio, the fortunes of the Mets. Inside the Shed, others listened to a careful and dreary performance.

On the other hand, Saturday had the neglected Mozart Piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, K. 413, which could be listened to, every note. Twenty-nine-year-old Malcolm Frager was the persuasive soloist, especially so in the slow movement whose affecting hesitancy he guided so well. Frager also provided the piano obbligato for a Mozart scene and rondo aria sung by Helen Boatwright.

This second revise of "Non temer, amato bene" for his opera "Idomeneo" is a lovely thing. Miss Boatwright's soprano floated through it beautifully, though one might, in the latter portions of the rondo, have wished for more drama. Leinsdorf's orchestral accompaniment in the concerto and rondo was impeccable. The Six German Dances, K. 509, closing Saturday's program, bustled right through the penny-whistle close by the flute section.

Sunday, the observance of the centennial of Strauss' birth, began with the premiere. As curtain-raiser to "The Would-Be-Gentleman," there were a steaming performance of Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the sweet sounds of concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist in the Violin Concerto No. 1.

Boston has heard a Suite from the Strauss this past season. Leinsdorf has now restored the short vocal sections and engaged the services of Richard Wilbur, poet in residence at Wesleyan University, for an English prose narration. The result is a delight. One hopes that a Boston performance is forthcoming.

Attached to Strauss' opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" at one time, then played separately, "Gentleman," in its present, Tanglewood, form, is a "Peter and the Wolf" for grown-ups. The instruments, though the narrator does not identify them, take all the parts of Monsieur Jourdain, the title character, his fleecing friends and the lovers. Should Jourdain wish to learn to dance, the flute keep the measure, while he in the violins stutters through the pace. His fencing master is the catch-tail chissandi of the piano.

His Turkish "visitor" sasses him in the woodwinds. The gala' dinner makes a menu from "Das Rheingold" (salmon), "Don Quixote" (the bleating sheep turned roast mutton), "Der Rosenkavalier" (smal birds). Strauss' compliment to Lully, Moliere's composer, does occasionally suggest the Domestic Symphony; Strauss is not above quoting himself.

Mac Morgan, as the narrator, relished the text and sang nicely the short song for Jourdain. Miss Boatwright and mezzo-soprano Helen Vann were heard in the pastorale for Jourdain's music lesson. And basso Donald Bell, with a choir of 12 male voices, did the roles oft he Turkish Mufti and his priests. All would be welcome in Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 24,059
JUL 14 1964

New Works Presented At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS. — The second week end of concerts at Tanglewood before the start of the major six-week festival with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday completed a series with the music of Schubert, Mozart and a special performance of the Strauss complete music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which received its American premier. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the three concerts and presented again as he did last week a number of selections not previously heard here in the Berkshires.

On Friday and Saturday evenings Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two of the first of the major summer programs which will keep audiences coming here in the thousands for six weeks. On Sunday afternoon Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor with a program to include Beethoven's "Symphony No. 4," music of Elgar and Ravel. The concert Friday night will include performance of Mahler's "Symphony No. 5" in memory of Serge Koussevitzky for so many years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Saturday night the concert will present the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. The music will be Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten" and Debussy's "Three Nocturnes." The concluding selection will be Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," previously done with such success by the Boston at the festival in other years. Three of the selections of the week end will be given their first performances at Tanglewood in keeping with Mr. Leinsdorf's purpose of introducing new selections to the audiences.

The concert Friday night presented Schubert's "Mass in E Flat" in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival at Hanna Farm in 1934, who died last October. She was long one of the moving spirits behind this wonderful summer festival of the best in music.

During the week end of the 24th Cliburn will appear with the orchestra on Saturday evening in the Brahms "Piani Concerto No. 1 in D Minor." Those who heard him at Tanglewood last summer will remember the playing and the ovation. During that week end Eugene Ormandy and William Steinberg will conduct as well as Mr. Leinsdorf.

S M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

JUL 13 1964

Music: Hartt and Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

The third program in the University of Hartford's Summer Chamber Music Festival featured noted New York cellist David Soyenhouse, in a program of diversified concert Sunday night.

In the Bach Sonata No. 3 (with viola da gamba and harpsichord) technical facility was worthy of admiration. Evidently there was few problems in this regard. However, the balance between the cello and piano (Harwood Hanson was the pianist) could have been improved. Also the cellist's tone is big and often overpowering.

DEBUSSY'S Sonata received a smooth performance but I felt Mr. Greenhouse did not bring the sensitive tonal coloration to it that make for a memorable re-creation. The balance between the performers, however, was much better.

After intermission we were again given the opportunity of hearing the first - rate Hartt String Quartet in the wonderfully lyrical "Death and the Maiden" Quartet of Schubert. Renato Bonacini, the first violinist of the ensemble, and his colleagues were in rare form and won a deserved ovation at the end.

Lenox, Mass. — Richard Strauss is the unifying theme of this season's Tanglewood concerts and Sunday afternoon a large audience heard the American premiere of the complete incidental music to the composer's "Der Burger Als Edelmann.

Based on Moliere's comedy-ballet "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," this score calls for chamber orchestra, three soloists, a men's chorus, and a narrator. A great deal of this music is familiar from the orchestral suite, which is heard with a fair amount of frequency.

ERICH LEINSDORF once again demonstrated his skill in evoking a crystalline performance from the performers onstage. The orchestra was on its mettle, producing a texture of the utmost clarity of detail and the three soloists (Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, and Donald Bell) sang with a fine intensity of feeling.

For this performance Mac Morgan acted as narrator, setting the stage for each section of the work. The text in English, which was made by the poet, Richard Wilbur of Wesleyan, is successful in capturing the tongue-in-cheek tone of this delightfully satiric treatment of the Moliere play. Mr. Morgan brought just the right unctuous quality to his reading.

* * *

MOZART'S effervescent "Marriage of Figaro" Overture opened the Sunday program in a performance that could best be described as crisp and clean. The composer's Violin Concerto No. 1 filled out the first half of the afternoon's agenda.

In the Violin Concerto Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, offered a technically adept performance that would have profited from a little more warmth and lyrical spirit. Why is it that performers must push the tempi so hard in the Allegro movements? So much tonal beauty and expressive nuance is lost thereby.

Incidentally, why do we not have the opportunity of hearing a Francescatti, Milstein, or Stern at Tanglewood these days? Pianists galore are heard but the guest string instrumentalist seems to be persona non grata under the new regime.

Tanglewood Featuring New Works

LENOX, MASS. — The second week end of concerts at Tanglewood before the start of the major six-week festival with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday completed a series with the music of Schubert, Mozart and a special performance of the Strauss complete music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which received its American premier. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the three concerts and presented again as he did last week a number of selections not previously heard here in the Berkshires.

On Friday and Saturday evenings Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two of the first of the major summer programs which will keep audiences coming here in the thousands for six weeks On Sunday afternoon Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor with a program to include Beethovens "Symphony No. 4," music of Elgar and Ravel. The concert Friday night will include performance of Mahler's "Symphony No. 5" in memory of Serge Koussevitzky for so many years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Saturday night the concert will present the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. The music will be Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten" and Debussy's "Three Nocturnes." The concluding selection will be Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," previously done with such success by the Boston at the festival in other years. Three of the selections of the week end will be given their first performances at Tanglewood in keeping with Mr. Leinsdorf's purpose of introducing new selections to the audiences.

The concert Friday night presented Schubert's "Mass in E Flat" in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival at Hanna Farm in 1934, who died last October. She was long one of the moving spirits behind this wonderful summer festival of the best in music.

During the week end of the 24th Cliburn will appear with the orchestra on Saturday evening in the Brahms "Piani Concerto No. 1 in D Minor." Those who heard him at Tanglewood last summer will remember the playing and the ovation. During that week end Eugene Ormandy and William Steinberg will conduct as well as Mr. Leinsdorf.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 16 1964

TANGLEWOOD
Friday Evening
By A. C. Sly

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, who was one of the prime movers in the foundation of the Berkshire Festival, would have been pleased with the concert given in her memory at Tanglewood Friday evening. She would have approved the inclusion of Schubert in the chamber orchestra, which for several years has been devoted to works by Bach and Mozart. Schubert, the man, would have pleased her, too, for he was a hearty person and a hard worker.

Appropriately, the concert presented two works which exemplified the composer as a youth and as a mature musician. The Symphony No. 3 in D Major was written at the age of 18. It is a sunny work, filled with Viennese Gemeutlichkeit, and bursting with exuberance. The thematic material is simple and melodious, and Schubert makes no attempt at lengthy development.

The Mass in E-Flat was composed 18 years later, shortly before Schubert's death. It is the sixth setting he made of the liturgical text, and shows his growth in terms of harmonic possibilities and larger formal concepts. Erich Leinsdorf made some judicious cuts in the lengthy score, and chose broad tempos for this reading.

The few solo passages were sung well by Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Walter Carringer, Jerold Siena and Donald Bell. The Festival Chorus was excellent in diction and tone.

Saturday Night
By C. N. D.

The Saturday night concert was devoted entirely to the music of Mozart. The program began with the Serenade in B Flat for 13 wind instruments.

After a somewhat ragged start, the orchestra settled into the seven short movements of the Serenade, which had a strong flavor of Austrian country dances. Leinsdorf interpreted it with just the right mixture of rough country humor and Mozartean elegance that the music called for.

It was the solo performances after the intermission that made the concert memorable. Malcolm Frager played the Concerto No. 11 in F Major for the first time at Tanglewood. His tone was limpid, and his phrasing was that of a great singer. What more could one wish for in this small, lyrical and completely charming work.

Helen Boatwright, soprano, repeated the fine success of a week ago in another Tanglewood first — this time a Scena and Rondo for Soprano, Piano Obbligato and Orchestra. Miss Boatwright was impressive in the elaborate vocal writing; Mr. Frager handled the complicated piano obbligato equally skillfully; and Mr. Leinsdorf led the Boston Orchestra in the operatic accompaniment as only he can do.

Naturally this was another high point in a season, which has only begun, but which has already had several memorable performances.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

Erich Leinsdorf chose the Incidental Music to "Der Burger als Edelmann" for the first of several works by Richard Strauss scheduled for this season at Tanglewood in celebration of the composer's 100th birthday. It was a happy choice, for the score is seldom heard (this was the first complete performance in America) and it is so typical of the composer. It abounds in humor, in waltzes, and in just plain schmalz.

The story is presented by a narrator (Mac Morgan) in a fine English translation by Richard Wilbur. Based on Moliere's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, it tells of the problems faced by M. Jourdain, a simple bourgeois, in learning to live as a rich gentleman. Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni were delightful as shepherd and shepherdess, and later as sylphs. Donald Bell was excellent as the Mufti in a hilarious Turkish Ceremony, and was ably assisted by a small male chorus. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted with obvious relish, and was rewarded with prolonged applause.

The concert began with two works by Mozart, the Overture to The Marriage of Figaro and the Violin Concerto No. 1. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony appeared as soloist in the latter work, and played with great charm and seeming effortlessness.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545
JUL 13 1964

Music: Hartt and Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

The third program in the University of Hartford's Summer Chamber Music Festival featured the noted New York cellist, Bernard Greenhouse, in a pleasantly diversified concert Sunday night.

In the Bach Sonata No. 3 (written for gamba and harpsichord) his technical facility was worthy of admiration. Evidently he has few problems in this respect. However, the balance between the cello and piano (Raymond Hanson was the pianist) could have been improved, for the cellist's tone is big and often overpowering.

* * *

DEBUSSY'S Sonata received a smooth performance but I felt Mr. Greenhouse did not bring the sensitive tonal coloration to it that make for a memorable re-creation. The balance between the performers, however, was much better.

After intermission we were again given the opportunity of hearing the first - rate Hartt String Quartet in the wonderfully lyrical "Death and the Maiden" Quartet of Schubert. Renato Bonacini, the first violinist of the ensemble, and his colleagues were in rare form and won a deserved ovation at the end.

Lenox, Mass. — Richard Strauss is the unifying theme of this season's Tanglewood concerts and Sunday afternoon a large audience heard the American premiere of the complete incidental music to the composer's "Der Burger Als Edelmann.

Based on Moliere's comedy-ballet "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," this score calls for chamber orchestra, three soloists, a men's chorus, and a narrator. A great deal of this music is familiar from the orchestral suite, which is heard with a fair amount of frequency.

* * *

ERICH LEINSDORF once again demonstrated his skill in evoking a crystalline performance from the performers on stage. The orchestra was on its mettle, producing a texture of the utmost clarity of detail and the three soloists (Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, and Donald Bell) sang with a fine intensity of feeling.

For this performance Mac Morgan acted as narrator, setting the stage for each section of the work. The text in English, which was made by the poet, Richard Wilbur of Wesleyan, is successful in capturing the tongue-in-cheek tone of this delightfully satiric treatment of the Moliere play. Mr. Morgan brought just the right unctuous quality to his reading.

* * *

MOZART'S effervescent "Marriage of Figaro" Overture opened the Sunday program in a performance that could best be described as crisp and clean. The composer's Violin Concerto No. 1 filled out the first half of the afternoon's agenda.

In the Violin Concerto Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, offered a technically adept performance that would have profited from a little more warmth and lyrical spirit. Why is it that performers must push the tempi so hard in the Allegro movements? So much tonal beauty and expressive nuance is lost thereby.

Incidentally, why do we not have the opportunity of hearing a Francescatti, Milstein, or Stern at Tanglewood these days? Pianists galore are heard but the guest string instrumentalist seems to be persona non grata under

Waterbury American, Monday, July 13, 1964

Tanglewood Featuring New Works

LENOX, MASS. — The second week end of concerts at Tanglewood before the start of the major six-week festival with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday completed a series with the music of Schubert, Mozart and a special performance of the Strauss complete music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which received its American premier. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the three concerts and presented again as he did last week a number of selections not previously heard here in the Berkshires.

On Friday and Saturday evenings Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two of the first of the major summer programs which will keep audiences coming here in the thousands for six weeks On Sunday afternoon Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor with a program to include Beethovens "Symphony No. 4," music of Elgar and Ravel. The concert Friday night will include performance of Mahler's "Symphony No. 5" in memory of Serge Koussevitzky for so many years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Saturday night the concert will present the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. The music will be Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten" and Debussy's "Three Nocturnes." The concluding selection will be Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," previously done with such success by the Boston at the festival in other years. Three of the selections of the week end will be given their first performances at Tanglewood in keeping with Mr. Leinsdorf's purpose of introducing new selections to the audiences.

The concert Friday night presented Schubert's "Mass in E Flat" in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival at Hanna Farm in 1934 who died last October. She was long one of the moving spirits behind this wonderful summer festival of the best in music.

During the week end of the 24th Cliburn will appear with the orchestra on Saturday evening in the Brahms "Piani Concerto No. 1 in D Minor." Those who heard him at Tanglewood last summer will remember the playing and the ovation. During that week end Eugene Ormandy and William Steinberg will conduct as well as Mr. Leinsdorf.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 16 1964

TANGLEWOOD
Friday Evening
By A. C. Sly

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, who was one of the prime movers in the foundation of the Berkshire Festival, would have been pleased with the concert given in her memory at Tanglewood Friday evening. She would have approved the inclusion of Schubert in the chamber orchestra, which for several years has been devoted to works by Bach and Mozart. Schubert, the man, would have pleased her, too, for he was a hearty person and a hard worker.

Appropriately, the concert presented two works which exemplified the composer as a youth and as a mature musician. The Symphony No. 3 in D Major was written at the age of 18. It is a sunny work, filled with Viennese Gemeutlichkeit, and bursting with exuberance. The thematic material is simple and melodious, and Schubert makes no attempt at lengthy development.

The Mass in E-Flat was composed 18 years later, shortly before Schubert's death. It is the sixth setting he made of the liturgical text, and shows his growth in terms of harmonic possibilities and larger formal concepts. Erich Leinsdorf made some judicious cuts in the lengthy score, and chose broad tempos for this reading.

The few solo passages were sung well by Saramae Endich, Eunice Alberts, Walter Carringer, Jerold Siena and Donald Bell. The Festival Chorus was excellent in diction and tone.

Saturday Night
By C. N. D.

The Saturday night concert was devoted entirely to the music of Mozart. The program began with the Serenade in B Flat for 13 wind instruments.

After a somewhat ragged start, the orchestra settled into the seven short movements of the Serenade, which had a strong flavor of Austrian country dances. Leinsdorf interpreted it with just the right mixture of rough country humor and Mozartean elegance that the music called for.

It was the solo performances after the intermission that made the concert memorable. Malcolm Frager played the Concerto No. 11 in F Major for the first time at Tanglewood. His tone was limpid, and his phrasing was that of a great singer. What more could one wish for in this small, lyrical and completely charming work.

Helen Boatwright, soprano, repeated the fine success of a week ago in another Tanglewood first — this time a Scena and Rondo for Soprano, Piano Obbligato and Orchestra. Miss Boatwright was impressive in the elaborate vocal writing; Mr. Frager handled the complicated piano obbligato equally skillfully; and Mr. Leinsdorf led the Boston Orchestra in the operatic accompaniment as only he can do.

Naturally this was another high point in a season, which has only begun, but which has already had several memorable performances.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

Erich Leinsdorf chose the Incidental Music to "Der Burger als Edelmann" for the first of several works by Richard Strauss scheduled for this season at Tanglewood in celebration of the composer's 100th birthday. It was a happy choice, for the score is seldom heard (this was the first complete performance in America) and it is so typical of the composer. It abounds in humor, in waltzes, and in just plain schmalz.

The story is presented by a narrator (Mac Morgan) in a fine English translation by Richard Wilbur. Based on Moliere's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, it tells of the problems faced by M. Jourdain, a simple bourgeois, in learning to live as a rich gentleman. Helen Boatwright and Helen Vanni were delightful as shepherd and shepherdess, and later as sylphs. Donald Bell was excellent as the Mufti in a hilarious Turkish Ceremony, and was ably assisted by a small male chorus. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted with obvious relish, and was rewarded with prolonged applause.

The concert began with two works by Mozart, the Overture to The Marriage of Figaro and the Violin Concerto No. 1. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony appeared as soloist in the latter work, and played with great charm and seeming effortlessness.

3RD WEEK JULY 13TH – 19TH

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 3-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUL 7 1964

EUGENE ORMANDY, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon, July 19, at 2:30 p.m. in the music shed at Tanglewood. The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Opus 60; Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" and Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Ormandy will also conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday night (July 24) at 8 in the Music Shed.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CHATHAM COURIER
Thursday, July 16, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

VALATIE ROUGH NOTES
Friday, July 17, 1964
VALATIE, N.Y.
ROUGH NOTES
W. 1,500

JUL 17 1964

TANGLEWOOD

Ormandy And Leinsdorf To Conduct BSO

THIS WEEKEND'S concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. will feature Erich Leinsdorf and Eugene Ormandy conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf's program for Saturday, July 18, includes Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; Richard Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten"; Three Nocturnes by Debussy; and "Til Eulenspiegel" by Strauss. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will join the Orchestra for portions of the concert.

THE PHILDELPHIA Conductor will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sunday's, July 19 program consisting of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Symphony No. 4; Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso"; and Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Ormandy has graciously consented to conduct this concert which was scheduled to have been directed by the late Pierre Monteux.

Tanglewood patrons are reminded that all evening performances will begin at 8 p.m.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Monday, July 13, 1964

Tanglewood Schedules Full Boston Symphony

This season's Strauss cycle at the Berkshire Festival Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be continued in concert this weekend.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the full Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 members for the first time this summer at the festival Friday at 8 p.m. in a concert in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's music director from 1924 to 1949. The program will include interludes from the Richard Strauss opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten," and "Mahler's Symphony No. 5."

Open Rehearsal

An open rehearsal will be held Saturday at 10 a.m. The concert at 8 p.m., also conducted by Leinsdorf, will include the Overture and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser,' in which the Radcliffe Choral Society will take part. The opening number will be followed by "Die Tageszeiten" by Strauss with the Harvard Glee Club participating. The Radcliffe society will return to sing with the orchestra Debussy's "Three Nocturnes" and the program will close with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

Eugene Ormandy, guest conductor and music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony at the concert Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The program will include Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and "Symphony No. 4," Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme."

Symposium Opens

Events open to the Friends of the Berkshire Festival this week include a three-day musicological symposium beginning today, chamber music programs tonight and Thursday at 8, a composer's forum program Wednesday at 8 and a Bach program Sunday at 10 a.m.

The Harvard club and Radcliffe society will present the third concert in the season's regular chamber music series tomorrow at 8 p.m. Works by Schutz, Schein, Bach, Poulenc, des Prez, Brahms, Mennin and Carter will be performed.

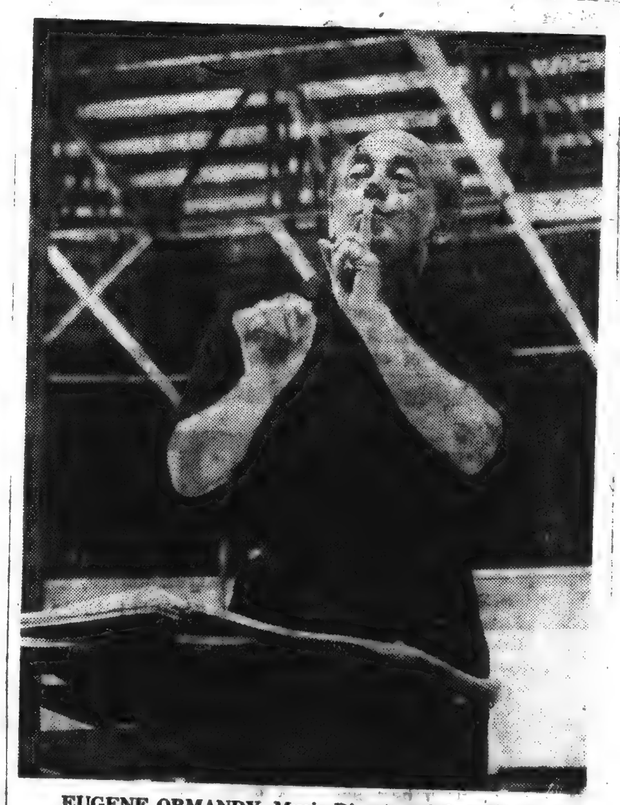
CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN BAY NEWS
Saturday, July 25, 1964

Eugene Ormandy, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon, July 19th, at 2:30 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts.

The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Opus 60; Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" and Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Ormandy will also conduct the Boston symphony Orchestra, on Friday night (July 24th) at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 168,428
JUL 12 1964



EUGENE ORMANDY, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday afternoon (July 19) at 2:30 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Opus 60; Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" and Elgar's Variation son an Original Theme. Mr. Ormandy will also conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday night (July 24) at 8:00 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUL 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
JUL 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUL 12 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200
JUL 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382
JUL 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,063
JUL 11 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
JUL 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUL 12 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923
JUL 15 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422
JUL 18 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075
JUL 18 1964

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 124,391
JUL 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 168,428
JUL 12 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
CAIRO HERALD
July 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 11 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 13 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
JUL 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 16 1964

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W 300
JUL 16 1964

Full Orchestra At Tanglewood Now

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 members for the first time this summer at the Berkshire Festival concert this Friday evening at 8:00 p. m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. This will mark the beginning of six weekends of concerts by the full Orchestra at Tanglewood, as compared with five weekends in the past two years. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct also on Saturday evening, and Eugene Ormandy will make his first guest conducting appearance of the summer on Sunday afternoon. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will be in residence at Tanglewood this week, making two appearances at the conclusion of a four-week North American tour.

This weekend Mr. Leinsdorf will present three works by Richard Strauss, continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864).

The Friday evening concert has been designated by Mr. Leisndorf in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1924 to 1949 and first Director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the program with Interludes from the opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten" by Richard Strauss. Following the intermission he will conduct the Mahler Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor, which the Orchestra recorded this season for the first time.

Sunday morning at 10:00 a. m. the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal will be held in the Music Shed. Tickets for Open Rehearsals are available each Saturday morning at the Tanglewood Box Office beginning at 9:00 a. m., and the net proceeds go to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra for the concert Saturday evening at 8:00 in the Music Shed. The Harvard Glee Club, founded in 1858, is the oldest college chorus in America. The Radcliffe Choral Society was founded in 1889 and the two groups have been under common leadership since 1912. Saturday evening the Radcliffe group will be heard in the opening work, Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Following this the Harvard Glee Club will sing in "Die Tageszeiten," Op. 76, a song cycle for orchestra and men's chorus by Richard Strauss which will be a first Tanglewood performance. The Radcliffe Choral Society will then return to sing in Debussy's 'Three Nocturnes' and Mr. Leinsdorf will close the program with Strauss' 'Till Eulenspiegel,' Op. 28.

The Sunday afternoon concert, originally scheduled to be conducted by the late Pierre Monteux, will be conducted by Eugene Ormandy, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The program will begin with two works by Beethoven, the "Egmont" Overture and the Symphony No. 4 in B-flat, Op. 60. After intermission Mr. Ormandy will conduct Ravel's "Alboranda del gracioso" (Serenade of a Clown). The final work will be Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36.

Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center, are invited to five regular events this week. Members of the Music Center were heard in chamber music programs in the Chamber Music Hall last night and will be heard again on Thursday at 8:00 p. m. and Sunday evening at 8:00. The first Composers Forum of the season will take place in the Chamber Music Hall Wednesday evening at 8:00 p. m. Sunday morning at 10:00 a. m. the Friends of the Music Center will have an opportunity to hear the third program in the series of "Music of J. S. Bach," a special enterprise of the Music Center which is being presented for the first time this season. All the Bach programs on Sunday mornings will take place in the Theatre.

In addition to the five regular Music Center events mentioned above, Friends of the Music Center have been invited this week to six sessions of the three - day Musicological Symposium which is being held in the Chamber Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, July 13-14-15.

One of the highlights of Erich Leinsdorf's plans for the current summer season, the Symposium features lectures and discussions on 18th and 19th century performance practices by fifteen leading musicologists in this country.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200
JUL 13 1964

Tanglewood Featuring New Works

LENOX, MASS. — The second week end of concerts at Tanglewood before the start of the major six-week festival with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday completed a series with the music of Schubert, Mozart and a special performance of the Strauss complete music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which received its American premier. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the three concerts and presented again as he did last week a number of selections not previously heard here in the Berkshires.

On Friday and Saturday evenings Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two of the first of the major summer programs which will keep audiences coming here in the thousands for six weeks On Sunday afternoon Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor with a program to include Beethovens "Symphony No. 4," music of Elgar and Ravel. The concert Friday night will include performance of Mahler's "Symphony No. 5" in memory of Serge Koussevitsky for so many years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Saturday night the concert will present the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. The music will be Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten' and Debussy's "Three Nocturnes." The concluding selection will be Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," previously done with such success by the Boston at the festival in other years. Three of the selections of the week end will be given their first performances at Tanglewood in keeping with Mr. Leinsdorf's purpose of introducing new selections to the audiences.

The concert Friday night presented Schubert's "Mass in E Flat" in memory of Gertrude Robinson Smith, one of the founders of the Berkshire Festival at Hanna Farm in 1934, who died last October. She was long one of the moving spirits behind this wonderful summer festival of the best in music.

During the week end of the 24th Cliburn will appear with the orchestra on Saturday evening in the Brahms "Piani Concerto No. 1 in D Minor." Those who heard him at Tanglewood last summer will remember the playing and the ovation. During that week end Eugene Ormandy and William Steinberg will conduct as well as Mr. Leinsdorf.

S.M.

REVIEWS.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

JUL 18 1964

Full Orchestra Plays Mahler At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—The giant orchestrations of the music of Mahler and Strauss failed to pack the house Friday night at Tanglewood.

No "Name" Stars

There were no "name" stars to perform spectacular solos. There were, in fact, only 4132 listeners to hear Mahler's Fifth Symphony and a 20-minute arrangement of orchestral interludes drawn by Erich Leinsdorf from Strauss' opera "Die Frau Ohne Schattern."

There was, however, a "name" orchestra to perform the spectacular orchestrations, the contingent of Boston Symphony Orchestra players who have been in Boston for the esplanade concerts joined the Mozart-Haydn chamber orchestra (up to 60 players) which has been at Tanglewood the first couple of weeks of the festival.

The orchestra was up to size for the first full-strength performance of the festival and size is what is needed for Mahler.

Kept It Light

Leinsdorf's leadership kept the giant forces from becoming ponderous, the Mahler symphony easily can become a series of muddy lumps from its own cumulative weight, which is considerable, especially during the first and second movements. But he kept it light on its feet. It skipped along nicely in frequent light-hearted passages, and the big passages were infused with propulsive momentum.

Both the funeral march (the first) and the second movements were brilliant. Notable for its smoothness and depth of color was James Stagliano's French horn obbligato during the third movement.

The program didn't need a "name" as the Boston orchestra is a virtuoso instrument, and a demanding score like Mahler's Fifth becomes a revelation in its hands.

Rearranged Sequence

The program opened with orchestral interludes plucked from Strauss' score for his opera about the transformation of a supernatural being into a human, "The Woman Without a Shadow."

Leinsdorf didn't change the score, but he rearranged the sequence of the interludes and produced a tidy little piece with a wide variety of moods and timbres.

The Strauss piece also required a very large orchestra, but although the piece wasn't intended to show the same depth and breadth of the Mahler Symphony, it did show some of its sumptuous sounds.

The program was a demonstration that the music of Mahler as well as Strauss can be played with brilliance and clarity.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580

JUL 18 1964

wrote all I knew about how t

AT TANGLEWOOD

4,132 Hear Full Boston Symphony

by JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is not yet in high gear. Last night's attendance, 4,132 for the first concert of 18 scheduled for the 104-member full Boston Symphony, barely topped last Friday's turnout for the 50-piece chamber orchestra.

With no soloists except in incidental passages, the early 20th century music by Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler had limited box office appeal. There should be a moderate upsurge tonight, when Leinsdorf features the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club with the orchestra in tidbits by Wagner, Richard Strauss and Debussy, and winds up with "Till Eulenspiegel." A real throng may greet Eugene Ormandy tomorrow as he conducts works of Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar.

Gazette Review

Mastery

Leinsdorf demonstrated anew last night his complete mastery of the orchestral forces, and their capacity for clean and spirited playing. He continued to bring out less familiar works of Richard Strauss, this season's central theme, by presenting the first Tanglewood performance of interludes from "The Woman Without a Shadow." The Mahler Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor, more than an hour long, was played in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, who programed it at Boston but never at Tanglewood.

A high point in the interludes was a smooth, thoughtful violin solo by Joseph Silverstein, concert master. The mystical and supernatural aspects of the story held sway in episodes which varied from tenderness to fervent strife. This was modern music without listening problems.

Strong Opening

The elegiac nature of the Mahler was strong in its opening, with Roger Voisin's trumpet leading the tribute. In the Scherzo, James Stagliano's French horn obligatos wove interestingly into the rich tapestry of the orchestra's wind section. The "Adagietto" for strings and two harps was especially lovely.

The stormy opening of the second movement led to a sense of hardwon victory. Later portions of the symphony allowed themselves a little more freedom in occasional use of high spirits.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

JUL 18 1964

Tanglewo'd Hosts Memorial Concert

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

Lenox, Mass. — Erich Leinsdorf chose the Mahler Fifth Symphony Friday night as the principal work for the Koussevitsky Memorial Program and the performance itself was majestic and moving in its eloquence.

Although Leonard Bernstein has programmed this massive symphony at Lincoln Center, it has only now begun to assume the proportions of a reperatory work. And it is deserving of greater currency, for it has an affirmative cost and an emotional urgency that should win new converts to Mahler's cause.

The metaphysical questioning that is so much a part of the composer's make-up is not very evident in this work. From the opening trumpet fanfare to the exultant finale, the mod is optimistic. Although the opening movement is solemn, there is no trace of the overpowering pathos and gloom that are so much a part of "Das Lied v o n der Erde," for instance.

* * *

MR. LEINSDORF underlined the lyrical warmth in his reading Friday night. There was a healthy, extroverted quality to his approach that was eminently suited to the music. Although the work is more than an hour long, there were few, I think, who felt that is was an unduly attentuated symphony, which was a tribute to the conductor's skill and understanding.

In the Adagietto, which is the movement most ofter excerpted from the symphony, he happily avoided the tendency to sentimentalize or prettify. And the finale was carefully wrought, so that the sonoral climax was reached at the end and not beforehand. (I will always recall a Bernstein performance of the composer's "Resurrection" Symphony in which the dynamics were not as carefully controlled and the audience applauded prematurely).

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA, which was at its 104-man strength for the first time in the Shed this Summer, played with the rapturous tone quality that is the hallmark of the Boston Symphony at its best. Special commendations were earned by Roger Voisin for his trumpet work and by the first horn (James Stagliano, I believe). This was easily the best performance we have heard at Tanglewood this Summer.

For his opening work on this Koussevitsky program, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted his own concert version of Interludes from Richard Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten." Taken from all three acts of the opera, they offer a fine kaleidoscopic picture of a score seldom heard in this country. Listening to the music in this form (and Leinsdorf has retained the original Straussian orchestration) it is difficult to believe had nothing more to say after Dr. Rosenkavalier."

The attendance was slightly over 4,000 but enthusiasm ran high for Mr. Leinsdorf and his men. And it was not difficult to visualize old Dr. Koussevitsky smiling benignly in appreciation. This was a memorable evening of music-making.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 23 1964

TANGLEWOOD CONCERTS.

TANGLEWOOD
Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

The concert in memory of Serge Koussevitzky featured two works never before performed at the Berkshire Festival, a series of "interludes" from Richard Strauss' opera, Die Frau ohne Schatten (The Woman Without a Shadow) and the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. A comparatively small audience was rewarded with some of the most ravishing and beautiful music-making this listener has heard at Tanglewood in years.

I had always thought the definitive performance of the Adagietto movement of the symphony was that of Bruno Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic on an old 78 r.p.m. record; not so. Mr. Leinsdorf's rendition of this music, as indeed of the entire symphony, was absolutely breathtaking. It is a long work, taking an hour and ten minutes to perform, but the performance never sagged, one's attention never wandered, and the Rondo Finals was so exciting that the audience burst into cheers.

I know this is common behaviour nowadays, but it was certainly warranted on Friday evening. The symphony as a whole is not at all what one thinks of as Mahleresque. In this work the composer's Weltanschauung was postively sunny, despite the solemnity of the funeral march with which it opens.

The Strauss work is a pastiche arranged by Mr. Leinsdorf. I am told the opera has never been performed in the United States, which is hard to understand; there was plenty of lush, Rosenkavalier melody even in the snippets we heard.

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

It was a night for romantics. A soft breeze moved through the warm, moonlit night while Erich Leinsdorf evoked a flood of luxuriant sound from the orchestra. Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" provided an opulent beginning with the voices of the Radcliffe Choral Society wafting in from outside the shed.

The mood was continued in the song cycle for male voices and orchestra, Die Tageszeiten, composed by Richard Strauss in 1928. This setting of four poems by Eichendorff is rarely heard. One reason may be the enormous vocal range demanded of the tenors. The Harvard Glee Club, augmented by members of the Tanglewood Choir, met the challenge completely.

Debussy's Three Nocturnes provided a refreshing change — a glass of champagne in the midst of a heavy meal. The Radcliffe girls were seated within the orchestra rather than behind it, and this novel approach gave their siren's song a most unearthly effect.

Another Strauss work ended the program; this time it was the familiar Till Eulenspiegel. What a dazzling performance! Mr. Leinsdorf took his time with it, kept the lines transparent, and gave this old war horse a fresh lease on life. One never ceases to be amazed at this conductor's tremendous talents and to be grateful he is in the area each summer.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

Eugene Ormandy led the Boston Symphony in a program that was not of his own choosing. It had been planned by Pierre Monteux before his death on July 1. This perhaps explains the dichotomy of the performance.

The first half of the concert was devoted to two Beethoven works, the Egmont Overture, and the Symphony No. 4. Despite the sincerity of the reading, orchestral balances were not maintained, and a predominance of the lower voices gave a heavy-handed effect. The unbearably suffocating heat undoubtedly had some effect as well, for after the rains descended at intermission, both audience and orchestra were in better shape.

The apparent discomfort of the musicians with Beethoven was absent in the second half of the concert. The music was obviously more congenial to the conductor's exciting bravura approach. There was real sparkle in the reading of Ravel's orchestration of his Alborado del Gracioso from Miroirs.

Complete rapport was also achieved in the Elgar Enigma Variations.

Mr. Ormandy captured the differing flavors of the variations, and the orchestra responded with virtuosic playing. The bombastic coda brought the audience to its feet with a tumult of applause.

REVIEWS.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
JUL 18 1964

Full Orchestra Plays Mahler At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—The giant orchestrations of the music of Mahler and Strauss failed to pack the house Friday night at Tanglewood.

No "Name" Stars

There were no "name" stars to perform spectacular solos. There were, in fact, only 4132 listeners to hear Mahler's Fifth Symphony and a 20-minute arrangement of orchestral interludes drawn by Erich Leinsdorf from Strauss' opera "Die Frau Ohne Schattern."

There was, however, a "name" orchestra to perform the spectacular orchestrations. The contingent of Boston Symphony Orchestra players who have been in Boston for the Esplanade concerts joined the Mozart-Haydn chamber orchestra (up to 60 players) which has been at Tanglewood the first couple of weeks of the festival.

The orchestra was up to size for the first full-strength performance of the festival and size is what is needed for Mahler.

Kept It Light

Leinsdorf's leadership kept the giant forces from becoming ponderous. The Mahler symphony easily can become a series of muddy lumps from its own cumulative weight, which is considerable, especially during the first and second movements. But he kept it light on its feet. It skipped along nicely in frequent light-hearted passages, and the big passages were infused with propulsive momentum.

Both the funeral march (the first) and the second movements were brilliant. Notable for its smoothness and depth of color was James Stagliano's French horn obbligato during the third movement.

The program didn't need a "name" as the Boston orchestra is a virtuoso instrument, and a demanding score like Mahler's Fifth becomes a revelation in its hands.

Rearranged Sequence

The program opened with orchestral interludes plucked from Strauss' score for his opera about the transformation of a supernatural being into a human, "The Woman Without a Shadow."

Leinsdorf didn't change the score, but he rearranged the sequence of the interludes and produced a tidy little piece with a wide variety of moods and timbres.

The Strauss piece also required a very large orchestra, but although the piece wasn't intended to show the same depth and breadth of the Mahler Symphony, it did show some of its sumptuous sounds.

The program was a demonstration that the music of Mahler as well as Strauss can be played with brilliance and clarity.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
JUL 18 1964

wrote all I knew about how I

AT TANGLEWOOD

4,132 Hear Full Boston Symphony

by JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is not yet in high gear. Last night's attendance, 4,132 for the first concert of 14 scheduled for the 104-member full Boston Symphony, barely topped last Friday's turnout for the 50-piece chamber orchestra.

With no soloists except in incidental passages, the early 20th century music by Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler had limited box office appeal. There should be a moderate upsurge tonight, when Leinsdorf features the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club with the orchestra in tidbits by Wagner, Richard Strauss and Debussy and winds up with "Till Eulenspiegel." A real throng may greet Eugene Ormandy tomorrow as he conducts works of Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar.

Gazette Review

Mastery

Leinsdorf demonstrated anew last night his complete mastery of the orchestral forces, and their capacity for clean and spirited playing. He continued to bring out less familiar works of Richard Strauss, this season's central theme, by presenting the first Tanglewood performance of interludes from "The Woman Without a Shadow." The Mahler Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor, more than an hour long, was played in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, who programed it at Boston but never at Tanglewood.

A high point in the interludes was a smooth, thoughtful violin solo by Joseph Silverstein, concert master. The mystical and supernatural aspects of the story held sway in episodes which varied from tenderness to fervent strife. This was modern music without listening problems.

Strong Opening

The elegiac nature of the Mahler was strong in its opening, with Roger Voisin's trumpet leading the tribute. In the Scherzo, James Stagliano's French horn obligatos wove interestingly into the rich tapestry of the orchestra's wind section. The "Adagietto" for strings and two harps was especially lovely.

The stormy opening of the second movement led to a sense of hardwon victory. Later portions of the symphony allowed themselves a little more freedom in occasional use of high spirits.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545
JUL 18 1964

Tanglewood Hosts Memorial Concert

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

Lenox, Mass. — Erich Leinsdorf chose the Mahler Fifth Symphony Friday night as the principal work for the Koussevitsky Memorial Program and the performance itself was majestic and moving in its eloquence.

Although Leonard Bernstein has programmed this massive symphony at Lincoln Center, it has only now begun to assume the proportions of a reperatory work. And it is deserving of greater currency, for it has an affirmative cost and an emotional urgency that should win new converts to Mahler's cause.

The metaphysical questioning that is so much a part of the composer's make-up is not very evident in this work. From the opening trumpet fanfare to the exultant finale, the mod is optimistic. Although the opening movement is solemn, there is no trace of the overpowering pathos and gloom that are so much a part of "Das Lied von der Erde," for instance.

* * *

MR. LEINSDORF underlined the lyrical warmth in his reading Friday night. There was a healthy, extroverted quality to his approach that was eminently suited to the music. Although the work is more than an hour long, there were few, I think, who felt that is was an unduly attentuated symphony, which was a tribute to the conductor's skill and understanding.

In the Adagietto, which is the movement most ofter excerpted from the symphony, he happily avoided the tendency to sentimentalize or prettify. And the finale was carefully wrought, so that the sonoral climax was reached at the end and not beforehand. (I will always recall a Bernstein performance of the composer's "Resurrection" Symphony in which the dynamics were not as carefully controlled and the audience applauded prematurely).

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA, which was at its 104-man strength for the first time in the Shed this Summer, played with the rapturous tone quality that is the hallmark of the Boston Symphony at its best. Special commendations were earned by Roger Voisin for his trumpet work and by the first horn (James Stagliano, I believe). This was easily the best performance we have heard at Tanglewood this Summer.

For his opening work on this Koussevitsky program, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted his own concert version of Interludes from Richard Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten." Taken from all three acts of the opera, they offer a fine kaleidoscopic picture of a score seldom heard in this country. Listening to the music in this form (and Leinsdorf has retained the original Straussian orchestration) it is difficult to believe had nothing more to say after Dr. Rosenkavalier."

The attendance was slightly over 4,000 but enthusiasm ran high for Mr. Leinsdorf and his men. And it was not difficult to visualize old Dr. Koussevitsky smiling benignly in appreciation. This was a memorable evening of music making.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 23 1964

TANGLEWOOD CONCERTS,

TANGLEWOOD
Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

The concert in memory of Serge Koussevitzky featured two works never before performed at the Berkshire Festival, a series of "interludes" from Richard Strauss' opera, Die Frau ohne Schatten (The Woman Without a Shadow) and the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. A comparatively small audience was rewarded with some of the most ravishing and beautiful music-making this listener has heard at Tanglewood in years.

I had always thought the definitive performance of the Adagietto movement of the symphony was that of Bruno Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic on an old 78 r.p.m. record; not so. Mr. Leinsdorf's rendition of this music, as indeed of the entire symphony, was absolutely breathtaking. It is a long work, taking an hour and ten minutes to perform, but the performance never sagged, one's attention never wandered, and the Rondo Finals was so exciting that the audience burst into cheers.

I know this is common behaviour nowadays, but it was certainly warranted on Friday evening. The symphony as a whole is not at all what one thinks of as Mahleresque. In this work the composer's Weltanschauung was postively sunny, despite the solemnity of the funeral march with which it opens.

The Strauss work is a pastiche arranged by Mr. Leinsdorf. I am told the opera has never been performed in the United States, which is hard to understand; there was plenty of lush, Rosenkavalier melody even in the snippets we heard.

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

It was a night for romantics. A soft breeze moved through the warm, moonlit night while Erich Leinsdorf evoked a flood of luxuriant sound from the orchestra. Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" provided an opulent beginning with the voices of the Radcliffe Choral Society wafting in from outside the shed.

The mood was continued in the song cycle for male voices and orchestra, Die Tageszeiten, composed by Richard Strauss in 1928. This setting of four poems by Eichendorff is rarely heard. One reason may be the enormous vocal range demanded of the tenors. The Harvard Glee Club, augmented by members of the Tanglewood Choir, met the challenge completely.

Debussy's Three Nocturnes provided a refreshing change — a glass of champagne in the midst of a heavy meal. The Radcliffe girls were seated, within the orchestra rather than behind it, and this novel approach gave their siren's song a most unearthly effect.

Another Strauss work ended the program; this time it was the familiar Till Eulenspiegel. What a dazzling performance! Mr. Leinsdorf took his time with it, kept the lines transparent, and gave this old war horse a fresh lease on life. One never ceases to be amazed at this conductor's tremendous talents and to be grateful he is in the area each summer.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

Eugene Ormandy led the Boston Symphony in a program that was not of his own choosing. It had been planned by Pierre Monteux before his death on July 1. This perhaps explains the dichotomy of the performance.

The first half of the concert was devoted to two Beethoven works, the Egmont Overture, and the Symphony No. 4. Despite the sincerity of the reading, orchestral balances were not maintained, and a predominance of the lower voices gave a heavy-handed effect. The unbearably suffocating heat undoubtedly had some effect as well, for after the rains descended at intermission, both audience and orchestra were in better shape.

The apparent discomfort of the musicians with Beethoven was absent in the second half of the concert. The music was obviously more congenial to the conductor's exciting bravura approach. There was real sparkle in the reading of Ravel's orchestration of his Alborado del Gracioso from Miroirs.

Complete rapport was also achieved in the Elgar Enigma Variations.

Mr. Ormandy captured the differing flavors of the variations, and the orchestra responded with virtuosic playing. The bombastic coda brought the audience to its feet with a tumult of applause.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 18 1964

63

Music Review

Tribute to Koussevitzky

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIRST concert of the season, at which the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared was used by conductor Erich Leinsdorf to pay homage to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's conductor when it made its Berkshire summer debut in 1936.

Mahler's Fifth Symphony was chosen for this purpose. The orchestral literature does not include a work which could have implied a greater gesture of respect than this giant of Mahler's.

The evening began with Interludes from Richard Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten," a series of episodes, played without a pause, chosen from the opera written only a very few years after Mahler's Fifth. There was good reason to play them both on the same program as they both require huge orchestras. The two men were contemporaries and both friends and rivals.

* * *

THE STRAUSS is essentially a popular composition, full of ingratiating melodies and luscious effects. Strauss resorted to the contrasts he knew so well how to construct. He builds up an involved and tumultuous chaos and then dissolves all the ingredients and lets an exquisite violin solo emerge which concertmaster Joseph Silverstein played with remarkably sustained tone.

Strauss uses 4 flutes and 2 piccolos, 2 oboes and English horn, 4 clarinets, basset horn and bass clarinet, 3 bassoons and contrabassoon, 8 horns, 4 trombones, 4 trumpets, 4 tenor tubas and a bass tuba, an all-inclusive battery of percussion, 2 harps, and, of course, the usual strings. Mahler's demands are only a trifle less gargantuan. But neither man writes for size alone. Each is a master orchestrater who uses his pigments to insert colors and combinations which have magic impact.

* * *

THE INTRODUCTORY trumpet calls played by Roger Voisin lead into an unforgettable Funeral March. This and the sublime Adagietto could have been the special movements devoted to the memory of Koussevitzky. The 65 strings played as that many soloists in this latter poignant slow movement which leads into the Finale. Every man strained to give Leinsdorf his utmost and it was gratifying to notice that this could be done with the conductor apparently simply asking the musicians to do what had been agreed upon in rehearsal, and no last-minute exhortations being exerted on stage.

There does not seem to be any record of any association between Mahler and Rostand yet I have always thought Cyrano could have pressed Christian's entreaties just as well with these pleas of love and fealty as well as by the words the play allots him.

The audience of 4,132 exploded with enthusiasm at the conclusion of the 70-minute symphony and Leinsdorf asked French horn player James Stagliano to come forward and acknowledge the appreciation for his outstanding obbligato in the Scherzo.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 20 1964

At Tanglewood

Musicians in Shirtsleeves Have Struggle With Heat

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

If one finds it necessary to ask whether a beautiful work is indeed beautiful, one can not with any amount of verbiage supply an adequate answer. Unfortunately, however, should the same question be asked of a less than beautiful work, deprecation can, and probably will, spill out in a flood of smug, but nevertheless natural conviction. There was little problem for even the casual listener to find obvious faults in some of Strauss and more of Mahler this weekend at Tanglewood. A plausible theory to the current excruciating criticism of these two composers might ironically lie in the listener's realization that many of their works reach so close to the pinnacle of unblemished success. What makes the listener's frustration seem even worse is that the gross faults are found in the most obvious faults imaginable.

Much Noble, Brilliant

But the full mustered blare of Mahler's interminable 5th Symphony with its redundant and inconsequential passages still has too much that is noble and brilliant in it to be simply tagged as total vulgarity. The first two movements contain more than the sum solemnity of dirges. The moods are variously melodic, dramatic, reflective, as well as tragic. Happily Mr. Leinsdorf's typical handling of most music, which rather exposes a work than displays it, produced a freshness to the scherzo and a simple, less personal, emotion to the adagietto.

If the Interludes from Strauss' opera, "The Woman without a Shadow" or the song cycle Die Tageszeiten, appear guyed, then perhaps they are. One feels much of this rigging in Strauss' tone poems, yet the man's reputation could stand on Til Eulenspiegel or Don Juan alone. Die Tageszeiten and Eulenspiegel were preented Saturday by Mr. Leinsdorf along with Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from Tannahauser, plus Debussy's Three Nocturnes. Eulenspiegel was performed with a deliberate, straight-faced amusement that pleasantly produced more roughish than raucous results.

However, the remainder of this program sagged a bit, perhaps due to the misapprehension that choral timber adequate for symphonic projection may be drawn from college choral groups. Parents of the Radcliffe Chorus members were probably little flustered by their daughters' Saturday night impression of Tannhauser's profane sirens. As seductive provocateurs in Debussy's Sirenes, the girls conjured up a healthy picture of teen-agers flirting over a sea of soft drinks. But Fetes and Nuages were more than respectable in Mr. Leinsdorf's grasp and the boys from Harvard lifted from pure academic impressions by members of the Tanglewood Choir, produced at times a robust reading of Strauss' song cycles.

Strauss and Mahler

Should one argue that such an approach to Strauss and Mahler is a milk-toast rationalization of fact, he would probably find little fight left in those already rationalizing the weekend's heat and humidity. But rationalization of any kind was unnecessary Sunday when Eugene Ormandy took over the podium in a program of Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar. It was still hot, the musicians in their shirtsleeves were struggling to control their slipping instruments; and, true, Elgar's Original Theme for the Enigma Variations is still awkwardly gauche. Mr. Leinsdorf lists Elgar among the composers with whom he doesn't care to truck. Phillip Hale calls the Variations respectable in a middle-class manner, the sort of music that gives a composer a degree of Music Doctorate from an English University. However, Mr. Ormandy pushed through the 14 Variations utilizing every opportunity the peerless BSO could offer to help the music express what the composer could not within the limitations of marks on paper.

Ormandy's talents for infusing music with vigorous life and yet an obvious respect for the composer's intent spelled grandeur and beauty for the once gauche theme in each variation. It also gave Beethoven's Egmont Overture and the Fourth Symphony a rousing performance.

This program had been originally scheduled to be conducted by Pierre Monteux before his failing health and eventual death July 1st. One could have asked for nothing more than its performance in his honor in so grand and noble a manner.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435
JUL 19 1964

Music: 'Tannhauser' At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — It will be difficult for anything in the Berkshire Music Festival to transcend the majesty, sweep and excitement of last nights performance of Wagner's overture and bacchanale from "Tannhauser."

Erich Leipsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Bacchanale was enhanced by 41 members of the Radcliffe Choral Society who were stationed outside, to the rear left of the huge shed. Communication with the podium was done by television with a camera placed over the stage. Also with the singers was a small group of instruments.

Last night's program catered to those who like to combine pictorial stimulation with vivid sound. Plus the Wagner, Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra in Richard Strauss' song cycle.

"Die Tageszeiten," Opus 76, featuring 96 male singers from the Harvard Glee Club (prepared by Elliot Forbes) and Tanglewood Choir (Lorna Cooke De Varon) - Debussy's Three Nocturnes with the Radcliffe women in the sirens section, and Strauss' symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks," Opus 28.

Something Extra Special

Leinsdorf's treatment of the "Tannhauser" music was something extra special. So was the performance by the orchestra. More so than most, "Tannhauser" overture gives an emotional symposis of the entire opera. It unreels themes that are to have later dramatic function, and places each in its own showcase. At least, that was the impression given last night.

This may be as good a time as any to say that during the past two seasons, under Leindsorf's direction, the Boston Symphony has become an even more highly perfected mechanism in tonal production than it had been under Koussevitzky and Munch.

Friday night's performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony displayed the wares in wholesale and quantity. But it was "Tannhauser" that made the gem shine most brightly, though briefly by comparison.

The companion action at the start of the overture made the point - square - cut harmonies of the "Pilgrims' Chorus," beautifully intoned by brasses, against the "Faith Motive" in strings. When these and the "Contrition Theme" had been disposed of, the overtures development soared with a grand sweep.

Rich Adjunct

Most masterful of all was Leinsdorf's control over the crashing entrance of the bacchanale, or vevelries. The seductive strains of the bacchantes were richly voiced by the Radcliffe women. Their tonal blend and adaptability to balance (not an easy thing to accomplish by remote control, as it were) made them a rich adjunct to the ensemble.

Strauss was 64 when he wrote his cycle about times of day. It is sheer sentiment not to admit that he had passed his prime. This festival is observing the 100th anniversary of Strauss' birth in 1864. There is merit in reviving some of his scores that are already catalogued by mediocrity.

"Tageszeiten" is a setting of four poems by Joseph Von Eichendorf. They are sentimentally in the area of "purple prose." The text says that the poet "greets the morning gaily," midday calm is "heavy with heat," "man's joyfulness is stilled" in the evening, and is "covered with cool shadows" at night.

Zealous Singing

Without the zealous singing by the men and conscientious support of the orchestra, last night's performance could have been a regrettable anticlimax. German pronunciation was good and no doubt a help to those who understand the language. A brief English resume was given on the program.

Balance was put out of focus by a few tenors who took it upon themselves to sing like soloists. With Leinsdorf's help they achieved discipline in attacks, phrase endings, shadings, balances and other virtues of attractive vocal ensemble.

The orchestra sounded best in the introduction to "Midday Calm" and sections of "Night."

Unfortuantely, all of this could not make a great work of "Tageszeiten."

Proceeds to Pension Fund

Yesterday morning's public rehearsal was attended by 4,297. Proceeds go to the orchestra's pension fund. This is "big business." Last year alone, $210,000 was paid to 92 Boston Symphony Orchestra pensioners and widows.

Eugene Ormandy rehearsed the orchestra in this afternoon's program.

Although the audience was comparatively small at Friday night's concert (4,132) the big buzz at Tanglewood yesterday was about Leinsdorf's spectacular conducting of Mahler's fifth Symphony.

The unqualified praise came from symphony players as well as audience.

Unique Personality

Leinsdorf is a unique podium personality. He is not an exponent of the "windmill," "crouching," or "emotional disintegrating" schools.

Nor does he emulate the scanty but efficient gesturing of the Late Pierre Monteux.

One fact alone was enough to establish his eminence during the past 30-odd years of Boston Symphony conducting. The cue-missing, completely secure conducting of the Mahler Symphony was an extraordinary accomplishment.

This afternoon, Ormandy conducts the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Fourth Symphony; also Ravel' "Alborrada Del Gracioso," and Elgar's "Ennigmaz Variations.

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
JUL 18 1964

Daring at Tanglewood

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Interludes from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" Strauss; Symphony No. 5 in C Sharp Minor—Mahler.

By Wriston Locklair

LENOX, Mass.

There were just two works on last night's program, opening the third week end of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood. The first half was devoted to interluds from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" of Richard Strauss. Following intermission, Erich Leinsdorf led a performance of Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony, played in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Although a more beautiful day or night in the Berkshires would be hard to imagine, the size of last night's audience must have been something of a disappointment. The shed had acres of sparsely-filled seats, and the lawns-loungers were no more than a few clusters deep.

Mr. Leinsdorf must be credited with a certain amount of daring in his choices last night. While the Mahler score has its admirers, the Strauss opera is little known in the East. Its first hearing in New York came only last winter, when a concert version was offered in Philharmonic Hall. Both pieces were receiving their first Berkshire Festival performances.

"Die Frau Ohne Schatten" is one of those symbolic fairy tales from Hugo von Hofmannsthal that excited Strauss into writing some of his most bombastic music. Here's a sample of the plot:

Two husbands, the one a king, the other a poor dyer, have wives who have no children. A woman without a child is a woman without a shadow. The woman the king has married is half human and half of another world. His falcon pursued her and wounded her when she had the form of a gazelle. If Anna Russel doesn't know about this someone should rush around to the 41st Street Theater and give her the whole story. She wouldn't need to change a line.

Mr. Leinsdorf arranged last night's concert version, a 25-minute melange of stresses and strains from all three acts. A rather perfunctory performance received the most polite applause, hardly enough to bring Mr. Leinsdorf back for a second bow.

But the Mahler, for orchestra and conductor, was another matter. The symphony was given a glowing reading by the Boston in New York during last season, and last nights repetition found Mr. Leinsdorf at the top of his form, whipping up great masses of sound in the finale and searching out all the tenderness and serenity of the adagietto movement. Whistles and cheers greeted him at the end.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUL 20 1964

Tanglewood Honors 2 Former Conductors

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA
Times-Union Staff Writer

Tanglewood — Two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were signally honored during the first of six weekend concerts at Tanglewood, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf which engaged "the full strength of the company," to use an old minstrel show phrase.

The late Serge Koussevitzky was musically memorialized with the use of Mahler's "Fifth" Symphony, Friday evening. The late Pierre Monteux, for the second time this season was honored, by the performance of the French conductor's previously-scheduled July 19th program, presented, intact, by Eugene Ormandy, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, yesterday afternoon.

The Bostonians may be said to approximate an earlier motion picture: "100 Men and a Girl" the girl being Deanna Durbin. In place of the cinematic conductor, Leopold Stokowski, Mr. Leinsdorf, less calesthenically inclined than his motion picture predecessor, presided over 101 men and the three girls: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist; Winifred Winograd, 'cellist and Olivia Luetcke, harpist.

Friday night's concert featured two composers of this century: Richard Strauss and his monumental pot pourri of the music to his opera, "The Lady Without A Shadow" arranged by Mr. Leinsdorf. The story is about a lady whose virtues were encased in a kind of plastic torso, a simulation of the demonstration dummies used in many medical colleges. However, the lady in question was endowed with great intestinal fortitude by "Doctor" Strauss. The Mahler symphony, receiving its first performance at Tanglewood emerged as a both Richard and Johann Strauss, a touch of Beethoven, a suggestion of Wagner, and a considerable spicing of Leinsdorf.

Saturday night's concert reverted to the standard repertory of the orchestra and included excerpts from "Tannhauser," by Wagner; Debussy's "Nocturnes," Richard Strauss' musical caricature, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" with its deluge of harmonic and diatonic water and Till's seriocomic demise. Mr. Leinsdorf's magnificent conception of every nuance, phrase and change of directorial pace met the enthusiastic approbation of the large audience, even from the "Proper Bostonians" in the box section. The orchestra was aided and abetted by the Women's and the Men's Festival choruses, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, a veritable feast for the eyes and the ears, occupying every available foot of space on the elastic stage.

Yesterday afternoon's gala included the "Egmont Overture" by Beethoven and his Symphony, No. 4 in the German composer's most infectious mood; the "Alborada del Gracioso by Ravel whose title best annotates the delightful whimsey of the work, and Sir Edward Elgar's controversial "Enigma Variations" in which the distinguished English composer uses the initials of 14 friends as a kind of crossword puzzle to confound even those to whom the various movements are dedicated. But there was no difference of opinion expressed by the uninhibited members of the audience at the conclusion of the Sunday afternoon concert with its near-California "demonstration" following the conclusion of every programmed work, Mr. Ormandy was accorded an ovation.

Next Wednesday's night's concert, marking the Boston Pop's annual Tanglewood benefit appearance under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, has been completely sold out. The only possible solution to the dilemma is an early arrival at Tanglewood, prior to the 8 o'clock opening and the use of the unreserved seats section and the lawns. Allen Sherman, a regular of the Johnnie Carson "Tonight" program will be the guest artist.

T-U AT THE CONCERT

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
JUL 2 0 1964

Full Boston Orchestra Heard At Tanglewood

The past weekend marked the beginning of six weekend concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Friday evening's concert was given in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, and continued Mr. Leinsdorf's observance of Richard Strauss' 100th birth anniversary, with a first performance of several interludes from the three acts of his opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten." The first of several revisions by Gustav Mahler of his Fifth Symphony in C sharp minor, the only other work on the program achieved the composer's oft-expressed goal of reaching his audience through musical speech and not through a welter of program notes. A small but appreciative audience denoted their pleasure in lengthy applause.

Approaching Saturday's concert with eye and ear tuned to promised thunderstorms, all such concern was immediately dispelled with a magnificent performance, of the opening Overture and Bacchanale (with Women's Chorus) from Tannhauser by Richard Wagner. Leinsdorf, with slower than usually heard tempo, gave the motif-rich work its rightful worth in deliberate drama, marvelously conceived, so often muddled in two fast passages, and repetitious dynamics. Irresistible was the Bacchanale sung by the Radcliffe Choral Society, directed by Elliot Forbes, strategically placed under the box entrance canopy.

Another first performance at the festival concerts and one of two Strauss numbers on the program, was overshadowed by the Wagner overture. A song cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 76, "Die Tageszeiten," is a setting of four poems by Joseph von Eichendorff, begins and ends with solo chorus. The Harvard Glee Club was, assisted by male members of the Berkshire Festival Chorus, the augmented size perhaps accounting for its off-pitch ending, noticeable with the orchestra's entrance after their first unaccompanied song, and a rather general unwieldiness throughout. Considered by many to be a composer unexcelled as an orchestral colorist, Strauss in this work, has written much that is overly sentimental, viscous and rather depressing. The moments of elegant beauty are quite too rare, but eagerly grasped, and Mr. Leinsdorf aimed to clarify and, when neessary, co-ordinate music, chorus and orchesra, with intense concentration. The final solo chorus was the most appealing, musically and technically complete.

Scattered among the members of the orchestra, at the rear of the stage, the Radcliffe group, with excellent effect, joined the orchestra for Debussy's Nocturnes, more specifically, the third section "Sirens." All three, including 'Clouds" and "Festivals" were evoked with controlled impressionist mood and manner. The ever so popular, exuberant and richly orchestrated "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner in Rondo Form" made an infectious ending to an evening enjoyed by 7596 music devotees from far and wide.

Sunday's concert at 2:30 started with Beethoven's Egmont Overture and his Fourth Symphony, Op. 60; the second half including Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" and Elgar's enigmatical Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36. Originally scheduled to be conducted by the late Pierre Monteux, and chosen by him, the concert was conducted by Eugene Ormandy director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in his first appearance at Tanglewood this summer.

Claudio Arrau will give an all Mozart piano sonata recital Tuesday evening, for his third engagement. For the annual Pops concert on Wednesday Arthur Fiedler has invited Allan Sherman to direct his "Variations on 'How Dry I Am'", and with Fiedler and the orchestra will give his version of "Peter and the Commissar" and "The End of a Symphony."

— M. deB. B.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

JUL 19 1964

Music: More Tanglewood Premieres

Works by Strauss and Mahler Are Played

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 17— These days, daggers, as often as not, preface the works listed on the programs of the Berkshire Festival. The daggers indicate that the work is receiving its first performance at these concerts. Ever since Erich Leinsdorf took over last season, there have been enough daggers to fit out the Turkish Army. On Friday night's program were two works—and two daggers.

Mr. Leinsdorf opened the evening with a suite of interludes that he has selected from Richard Strauss's opera "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." It is not an opera that has received a stage performance in New York, though it has elsewhere in the United States and all over Europe.

●

"Die Frau Ohne Schatten" is one of Strauss's many post-"Rosenkavalier" operas (it was finished in 1917); and the post-"Rosenkavalier" operas have been receiving a good deal of attention in the last decade. Before that, music-lovers and critics were inclined to shuck them off as tired or self-derivative or flabby or uninspired.

But in recent years, there has arisen a strong school that maintains that the last Strauss operas are the most important part of his repertory, that they are deep, rich and beautiful, warm in an autumnal way, full of wisdom and beauty.

And it is certain that these operas have been making a strong impact. "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" is typical in its rich, juicy, very Straussian harmonies and melodies. But it is still possible to raise a dissenting voice.

The music is not all that good. It is not that the self-derivations are annoying. As in most late Strauss, there are reminiscences of "Rosenkavalier," "Don Quixote" and "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Strauss repeated himself unconsciously, but the same could be said of many a composer.

More annoying is the frequent lack of inner substance. Despite the gorgeous orchestration and the ever-present mark of a master hand, the music often sounds like make-believe music. It is music that counterfeits emotion—counterfeits it most skillfully, so that one is almost in the presence of the real thing.

Strauss's tricks are too obvious after a while, though.

He continues to serve up the formulas that had served him so well through the years.

Anyway, this seems to be a minority opinion, and the composer's cause was well served by Mr. Leinsdorf. His performance had all the richness and color that could possibly have been desired. Much the same could be said of his performance of the Mahler Fifth, of course a much better known quantity.

The Mahler was programed in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, and the choice was a bit strange, for Koussevitzky and Mahler were never a particularly compatible pair. Obviously, though, Mr. Leinsdorf was going out of his way to do something special in honor of his great predecessor.

This is not the time nor place for a full discussion of the strange Mahler Fifth, which has always struck this writer as one of the composer's more turgid and less successful symphonies. It is true that the Fifth is full of brilliant ideas, and this writer listens to it with a sort of perverse fascination.

●

Mahler was never more of an emotional poseur than he was here. But he was a poseur with an extraordinary mind that every so often sent the Fifth Symphony burning with a searing flash. Then the fire is damped, and there is nothing but desultory smoke.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted from memory and had every note in hand. It was one of his most impressive achievements. And by now he has made the Boston Symphony into a unit that operates with absolutely ferocious efficiency. The orchestra has resumed its former greatness, and hearing its technical accomplishment in almost any kind of music is an esthetic pleasure.

Interludes Culled From 'Frau Ohne Schatten'

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451

Music: Boston Symphony At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The third weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival opened last night with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 members for the first time this summer at Tanglewood.

It was strictly "connoisseur" fare with a number of news angles.

There was an attendance of 4,132.

Strauss and Mahler

The program: Interludes from Richard Strauss' opera "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" (the woman without a shadow), and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor.

Both were first Berkshire Festival performances. The Strauss work continued this summer's Tanglewood observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. The concert was in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949, and first director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Main work was the Mahler symphony — a brow-furrowing, emotion whipping "giant symphony" of great length. Selections from Strauss' "Shadowless Woman" could have had little "raison d'etre" in this company other than to remind the audience that Strauss' mother did, indeed, have a "shadow" on June 11, 1804, and to refurbish the best from an operative production that has been lying in state since 1919.

When Strauss wrote the thing (To a Libretto by Hugo Von Hofmannsthal), he tangled with a complicated yarn to unravel. In this story, the "Woman Without a Shadow" is a queen with a husband who is half human and half of another world.

Symbolic Arguments

The queen buys the "shadow" of a poor dyer's wife, bringing about a long harangue of symbolical arguments over the penalties of such trading. Strauss' opera ends in a happy solution, but the orchestral resume played last night finished on a pensive note.

This is what Strauss set to music, and in so doing somehow managed to acheive muical freshness, with veiled assistance from Wagner, Brahms, Mendelssohn, and Meyerbeer.

The Strauss began with lugubrious chords set upon heavy timpani. From this emerged typically soaring Strauss melodies. There were sections of ladder-wise climax, such as Strauss used with glowing effect in his tone poems. Others were over - powering, without really having that much to say.

Warm, Rich Solo

Concert master Josph Silverstein elicited warmth and richness from his solo. The juxtaposition of materials was bravura and quiet poetry. The playing was vibrant, brilliant and expressive. Other barren areas probably would have been remedied if accompanied by dramatic action.

Mahler's formidable and forbidding Fifth Symphony received a sonorous, sympathetic, stirring performance. In fact, Leinsdorf performed a miracle with it, not the least factor being that he conducted it from memory.

Its five, long, almost unwieldy movements follow Mahler's practice of expounding emotions with frenzy. For example, one movement is marked "stormily agitated; with great vehemence." The entire work took 67 minutes.

Leinsdorf Brilliant

The performance had such audio excellence as to diguise some of the work's commonplace matter. Some of the orchestration is amassed to a bursting point (First, Second and Fifth Movements) or to a degree that the thread is nearly broken.

Leinsdorf worked hard and brilliantly to display the symphony's massive properties beginning with the portentious funeral march. He reached an effective compromise between looming tragedy and languishing sentiment.

The funeral march opened with heavy trumpet fanfares, played by Roger Voisin. Lightning struck several times in the form of brass and timpani blasts. It was unbroken solemnity (excepting romantic outburts) up to the rollicking finale. Heavy drama was never long absent.

Stagliano Shines

Highlight of the entire performance was James Stagliano's horn obbligato.

Mahler's Fifth was received with great enthusiasm. Leinsdorf and the orchestra certainly deserve acclaim. However, some may have felt that no other Mahler symphony will be played during the balance of this festival because there isn't time. After all, it's mid-July.

Tonight's performance will again be by the Boston Symphony and Leinsdorf. The Radcliffe Choral Society will join for Wagner's overture and Bacchanale from "Tanhauser," and De Bussy's three nocturnes. The Harvard Glee Club will be heard in the first Tanglewood performance of Richard Strauss' song cycle, "Die Tageszeiten," Opus 76. The orchestra will end with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Opus 28.

The Kansas City Times
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 337,038
JUL 18 1964

Monteux, Festival Fixture, Gone

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

LENOX, MASS. — The 5-week Tanglewood festival season of the full Boston Symphony orchestra began last night, after the customary two weeks of the reduced orchestra in more intimate programs.

Tanglewood is the same place, with the same quota of music disciples in the great concert shed and on the lawns surrounding it. But there has been a change — Pierre Monteux no longer is part of the festival.

Died This Month

The small, smiling, pudgy, walrus-moustached octogenarian who led such impressive performances here season after season died July 1. He was an inspiring Tanglewood fixture.

Monteux was scheduled to conduct tomorrow afternoon. Taking his place will be Eugene Normandy, conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra.

The concert last night, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the permanent conductor of the orchestra and director of the festival, also offered a tribute to the late Serge Koussevitzky, the chief architect of the Berkshire festival, which is the official name of the summer concerts and the school for advanced students.

The tribute was a performance of the Mahler Symphony No. 5, listed in the program as "In Memory of Serge Koussevitzky." It was a performance that brought the statue of Mahler higher. There was an ovation for Leinsdorf as the symphony, which begins with a funeral march, ended in the triumph of a happy apotheosis.

From Strauss Opera

The symphony was preceeded by a set of interludes from the Richard Strauss opera, "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" ("The Woman Without a Shadow") arranged by the conductor. The compositions of Strauss are being played in Tanglewood this season in commemoration of the 100th birthday anniversary of the composer. Both the Mahler symphony and the Strauss music were first performances in Tanglewood.

Today Leinsdorf will conduct a varied program of Strauss, Debussy, Wagner, with the Radcliffe Choral society participating. Tomorrow afternoon the program will be a panorama of Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar.

The festival will end on August 23.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
JUL 20 1964

Heat Holds Down Tanglewood Crowds; Annual Pops Concert Wednesday Night

A hot, sticky weekend drew modest crowds to Tanglewood for the Berkshire Festival concerts Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternon. The largest group turned out Saturday night —7586, as reported—for the kind of program conductor Erich Leinsdorf is making much of this summer—colorful music and the combination of orchestra and chorus. There were only 4132 on hand for the Friday night concert that opened the full-orchestra part of the Festival; on Sunday a brave 6052 attended in the searing heat and experienced a mid-concert shower.

On Friday evening a novel structure made of interludes from the opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten" was presented for the first time. This was entirely delightful but too brief—a 20-minute flight of fancy with memorable Strauss tonal effects in a relatively gentle mood. It was followed by the long Mahler Symphony No 5, another first at Tanglewood, presented in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Under Leinsdorf's direction, the Boston Symphony played this work with great depth of feeling and artistic force. The instrumental texture was kept clear; the composition was kept full of interest and did not seem long. James Stagliano won recognition for a French horn obbligato in the scherzo.

On Saturday night Leinsdorf was again on the podium, the orchestra joined by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, plus some members of the Tanglewood Choir. Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from Tannhauser opened the program, which followed with 'Die Tageszeiten' for men's chorus and orchestra by Richard Strauss, Three Nocturnes by Debussy, including "Sirenes" with women's wordless voices, and that old Strauss favorite "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Eugene Ormandy was guest conductor on Sunday afternoon, taking the place of the late Pierre Monteux, who had selected most of the program. The Egmont has too much need for i services.

This is the one time a car deserving of a vacation. Give a day or two in the shop. least don't abuse it further b expecting it to go through all th daily chores as if it were prime condition. Often a car wi come back from a trip with som fairly serious trouble which th owner preferred not to have a tended to while on his annua escape from reality. This wi catch up with him if he become so preoccupied with busines that he forgets to schedule in repair job.

The post vacation period is critical one for the car. It ca be an expensive one for it owner.

For Future Reference

When the owner of a four speed manual gearbox notice

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUL 19 1964

RADCLIFFE GROUP ASSISTS PLAYERS IN DEBUSSY WORK

7586 at Tanglewood Also Hear Music by Strauss, Wagner

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Distributed discreetely all through the ranks of players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra after intermission in the Shed at Tanglewood Saturday night were nearly 50 members of the Radcliffe College Choral Society.

Sit Quietly

They sat quietly with their hands folded demurely in their laps while the orchestra around them played the first two sections of Debussy's "Three Nocturnes."

Then in the third section they added their wordless voices. They sang the ethereal tones of the sirens which well up out of the myriad avelets of sound imagined by Debussy as come from the sea.

The pieces, called "sirenes," anticipates the great "Le Mer."

The first two sections of "The Nocturnes," (which stole the show Saturday night) are masterful expressions of early expressionism. The first, "Nauges," is an amorphous recreation of the shadow indefinite motion of whispy clouds on a grey day. The second, "Fetes," is an iridescent portrayal, in Debussy's words, of "special effects of light."

"Luminous Dust"

He referred to it also as "luminous dust," and that is what Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston players made it. The Wagner and Strauss which preceded it; even that lively rouge "Till Eulenspiegel," which followed, as fine as they were, did not reach the standard of interest achieved by "The Nocturnes."

Of the other music on the program, Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten" arroused more anticipation because of its relative rarity, than did Wagner's overture from "Tannhauser" ("Pilgrims chorus" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

"Die Tageszeiten" is a cycle of four songs which opens with a dramatic, unaccompanied declaration by the men's chorus (Harvard Glee Club and men from Tanglewood Chorus) and then never again achieves the interest of that beginning.

After its auspicious start, the first song, "Morning," went dead. "Midday Calm", the second, started with a wonderful tranquility and gradually became filled with foreboding. "The Evening", the third, was characterized by an uneventful security that was without much excitement.

"The Night," probably the most satisfying of the four, was restless and unsettled for a long time, then, at the end, became cooly calm, contented and soothing.

Both the Wagner overture and Strauss's "Till" were offered with Boston's usual clarity and sonority, but, to repeat, it was Debussy who won the brass ring from 7586 listeners Saturday night.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 20 1964

Glorious Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE WEATHER for the final concert of the third weekend at Tanglewood was a considerable hazard yesterday afternoon. Mild booms of thunder rumbled far in the distance during the vigorous minuet and finale of the Beethoven Fourth Symphony and rain fell at intermission. But the air cleared for the last half so that the crowd of 6,052 was able to listen undisturbed and depart, after an all-out demonstration, under fair skies.

Eugene Ormandy was the guest conductor, replacing the late Pierre Monteux, and the program remained, in the main, without change, the Beethoven Symphony and the Elgar "Variations on an Original Theme."

* * *

ORMANDY ADDED curtain raisers to both halves of the program: the Beethoven Egmont Overture and Ravel's "Alborado del gracioso." Ormandy has been invited to Tanglewood for the last few seasons. He has a summer home nearby in the county, but, of course, has been Philadelphia musical director since 1938.

The Boston orchestra seemed never to have produced more beautiful pure sound than in its two concerts on Saturday evening under its own conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, and yesterday under Ormandy. In the "Nimrod" variation of Elgar, also known as the "Enigma Variations," the orchestra reached a sonority not surpassed on many occasions.

* * *

ELGAR GIVES every section and many soloists within the orchestra salient opportunities, notably violist Joseph de Pasquale in "Dorabella" and cellist Samuel Mayes in "B.G.N."

Bassoonist Sherman Walt was signaled to rise at the conclusion of the exciting "Alborado" in which Ravel's flights of ecstasy were brilliantly realized, but there are several points at which the music seems to come to a natural ending, beyond which only fustian was added.

Ormandy's Beethoven was clear and forceful. The introduction was tense, but the orchestra, in the lusty areas, differentiated in their execution between his uniformly vigorous accents.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT Leinsdorf's Overture and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser" was stunning and awesome. The Salvation and Repentance themes are of never-tiring musical magnificence, and when they lead to the Venusberg music the evidence of Wagner's consistent genius was renewed. To enhance still more the beauty of the performance the voices of the Radcliffe Choral Society, of which Elliott Forbes is the director, added luminous warmth to the already rich experience by joining the orchestra from their station far to the rear of the Shed, supported by a single harp. This was an ethereal effect. For pure tonal splendor, breadth of scope, and architectural planning, this performance will stand unsurpassed in many minds.

The same women's chorus was used when Leinsdorf played all three of the Debussy Nocturnes after intermission. The "Sirenes," the only one in which they participate, were placed on the stage this time, interspersed among the musicians. Debussy uses them as instruments, allowing them a long melodic line around which the orchestra weaves a lacy pattern.

He undoubtedly had painters in mind when he wrote this. The "Nuages" are deliberately colorless and languorous. Debussy succeeds in giving them a mythical spirit and Leinsdorf adorned them with a poetic patina. There has been only a modest exhibit of French music so far this season, and, except for two more examples this coming Friday evening, this will be the sum total. By compensation, to be sure, we have been led happily into other waters which in bygone years have been more or less still.

* * *

LEINSDORF introduced another Strauss work new to Tanglewood after the Tannhauser music: "Tageszeiten," a song cycle of four poems by Joseph von Eichendorff for men's chorus and orchestra. In this the Harvard Glee Club was assisted by members of the Tanglewood choir, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon.

After the spell cast by the tremendous Wagner, we found the first poem, "Der Morgen," an intrusion. Strauss wrote here a chaotic mundane experience which disrupted the mood the previous music had established. At best we were prepared for a song of a more sedative nature, such as the second one, "Mittagsruh, heimlich und leise."

* * *

LEINSDORF last played Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" in this vicinity when he conducted the Rochester Orchestra in Williamstown in 1948. If ever there was a virtuoso piece, this is it. The crowd of 7,500 went somewhat wild at the completion of the tone poem, and Leinsdorf beckoned to the various performers whose work has shone.

Whitestone

CLOSED CIRCUIT TV was used by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Saturday night as small groups were scattered over the area in the presentation of the Overture and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser." This group is under canopy. Among them were Doriot Anthony, flute, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Louis Speyer, English horn, Pasquale Cardillo, clarinet, James Stagliano, horn, and Roger Voisin, trumpet.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JUL 20 1964

At Tanglewood

Ormandy Conducts Monteux Program

By MARGO MILLER

LENOX — Pierre Monteux was to have conucted Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood. First illness, then death July 1 at 89, prevented his return. A Berkshire Festival neighbor, Philadelphia Orchestra conductor Eugene Ormandy, who Summers in Monterey, assumed Sunday's engagement; the young Japanese conductor, Seiji Ozawa, is the replacement for Aug. 16. Ormandy kept virtually intact, as will Ozawa, the programs Monteux had planned. Boston's last visit with Monteux was, in fact, to include Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. That was in December; Sunday's concert added the "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven and Ravel's "Alborado del gracioso."

Monteux's conducting of the Beethoven Fourth was a supple performance, not without drama, but more understanding than Ormandy's driving reading. Monteux was the quiet center in a serene symphony. Ormandy, as insistent as his still red hair, is a general rather than a persuader. Both conductors know, of course, the good humor of Elgar in writing his musical portraits. To each of the 15 variations is attached token identification of the sitters — initials or a nom d'amitie — but each variation, as pure music, would reveal, anyway, a personality, whether we knew the names or not. Ormandy's was a broad performance, just the thing to take the mind off the heat outside the Music Shed.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted Friday's and Saturday's programs, music, with one exception, all heard this past season in Symphony Hall. In one of his few excursions, so far in his tenure as Boston Symphony music director, into the French repertoire, he led the Three Nocturnes of Debussy. His version of the landscape—Nuages, Fetes and Sirenes—is that of an etcher. At first one might consider the approach rather spooky but the mystery is soon replaced by really nothing at all except a careful trodding, single-file, it seemed, of Debussy's wildly colorful domain.

Whatever else they were, the Nocturnes come under Leinsdorf's category of "Music for Festival." On the deep Tanglewood stage, he was able to deploy the Radcliffe Choral Society in groups of eight among the orchestra. They had been well prepared and the spacious sound of their vocalise as the Sirenes was effective, though their youth casts them more as Sea Scouts than beckoning ladies.

The girls also sang in the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." Here again the great areas of the Shed add what Symphony Hall corridors cannot. A television camera watched Leinsdorf, sending his cues by remote control to assistant conductors. The off-stage band and the women's voices had the real quality of airy distance. Doubtless, Wagner never thought these passages would be accompanied by yet another sound, the rustle of 6000 people stretching to see where the music came from.

"Music for Festival" continues this week, when Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Serenade for Four Orchestras on Saturday's program. Van Cliburn will be soloist that evening in the Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1. The concert is sold out. The week-end's concerts will include the return of Ormandy on Friday and William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Orchestra on Sunday.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
JUL 20 1964

Music Vies With Weather At Tanglewood Concert

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Some well-known music by Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar had to compete with the weather for the attention of 6052 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

As the concert approached, the intense heat of the sun sent the lawn dwellers under the trees for shade. Then, as guest conductor Eugene Ormandy led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the third movement of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the kettle drums were assisted by thunder.

Rain at Intermission

It rained during intermission, cooled the air and stopped. The skies were still gray and the grass wet at concert's end.

The music had been pleasant, uneventful and, although performed superbly, mostly bland.

Except for the opening "Egmont" overture by Beethoven, the program had been chosen by Pierre Monteux, who died July 1. His planned appearance as guest conductor Sunday was filled by Eugene Ormandy.

Before Intermission

The two Beethoven works were played before intermission, Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Elgar's "Enigma" variations followed.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony is a gay and joyful work which otherwise does not have a special, distinctive element to attract attention, and it has never achieved the stature of some of the other Beethoven symphonies.

Sunday afternoon Ormandy gave it and the "Egmont" overture a gracefulness which, coupled with the Boston Orchestra's habitual precision, supported the belief that this happy symphony has been somewhat neglected.

Doesn't Match Weather

The short work by Ravel which immediately followed the intermission was the only work on the program that was too lively for a hot day; and Ormandy asked the orchestra to increase its excentricities sometimes almost to grotesque proportions.

On another occasion, perhaps, it might have seemed like virtuosic fireworks. Sunday it was too much.

The long Elgar variations which ended the program returned the mood to placidity.

14 Variations

Elgar wrote 14 variations of a simple melody, each intended to portray an aspect of the character of one of his friends. They are friendly portrayals, sometimes whimsical, sometimes quick and sometimes sentimental.

All of the variations are polite, not only to Elgar's friends, but also to the traditions of music and the listeners. Not a single note was intended to startle or disturb the listener. The orchestra Sunday didn't disagree with the instructions.

Tanglewood This Week

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, has announced the complete program for the Pops concert at Tanglewood next Wednesday night at 8. The celebrated Pops maestro's annual appearance at Tanglewood will be for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. For this concert, Fiedler has invited the folk parodist Allan Sherman to be his guest.

Wednesday's concert will begin with Strauss' Radetzky March, followed by the overture to "La Belle Helene" by Offenbach. Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra then will be joined by Allan Sherman of "Hello Muddah, Hello Faddah" fame for the comic's arrangement of "Peter and the Commissar" with apologies to S. Prokofiev, L. V. Beethoven, J. L. F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, J. Strauss, 2d, P. I. Tchaikovsky and G. Verdi.

After intermission, Fiedler will conduct selections from "The Sound of Music." Allan Sherman then will take the podium to conduct his arrangement of Variations on the Theme "How Dry I Am" and then be heard with the orchestra in a performance of a Sherman arrangement of "The End of a Symphony." The program will close with two well-known Fiedler favorites, "Hello, Dolly" by Herman, and Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

* * *

Henry Portnoi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again will give a series of lectures in advance of each of the concerts by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The lectures will begin at 7 p. m., one hour before the beginning of the concert, and will be held in the Chamber Music Hall of Tanglewood. Using examples from the music programmed for the Music Center Orchestra's concerts, Portnoi is making a pioneer effort to develop in the listener an appreciation for music and its performance. These lectures attracted wide interest last season, and they are designed primarily for older teen-age and adult audiences.

This week's concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be given on Thursday in the theater. Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Music Center, will conduct a program consisting of music by Mozart, Strauss, Schuller, and Stravinsky. The remaining Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concerts will be conducted by Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, on Aug. 6, and Richard Burgin on Aug. 22.

The lectures preceding each of these concerts are another in the series of events open to the members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who contribute to the support of the Music Center's activities and scholarship funds. Contributions to the Friends may be made by mail or in person at the Friends Office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 603,574
JUL 20 1964

Music: Ormandy at Tanglewood Shed

Conducts in Place of Late Pierre Monteux

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 19—Erich Leinsdorf started the Berkshire Music Festival weekend, and Eugene Ormandy closed it. This afternoon's concert had been scheduled for Pierre Monteux. Mr. Ormandy stepped in to conduct the same program that the late French conductor would have led.

It consisted of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso" and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. To these pieces, Mr. Ormandy added Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

Last evening's program was Mr. Leinsdorf's, and he led the Boston Symphony through the Overture and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten" and "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Three Debussy Nocturnes. This summer has, of course, seen a heavy emphasis on strauss in commeroration of the 100th anniversary of his birth.

●

Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Ormandy make a most interesting comparison. Mr. Leinsdorf treats the orchestra like a precision instrument, where Mr. Ormandy treats it as a virtuoso instrument. Mr. Leinsdorf is interested-in-detail, as he did in sections of "Till eulenspiege." At those moments, one could admire the clarity, but the line suffered.

With Mr. Ormandy, there seldom is a break in the line, even though details may suffer. Since he favors a much more opulent sound than Mr. Leinsdorf does, it is inevitable that precision sometimes is sagrificed for effect. Thus, in the last movement of the Beethoven Fourth, his tempo and the weight or orchestral tone were not commensurate with clear articulation. The effect was there, unmistakably so, but the full complement of Boston Symphony strings was too much for the fast-moving bass line.

For the Saturday concert, Mr. Leinsdorf had a chorus on hand—the Radcliffe Chorale Society for the Wagner and the "sirenes" of the Debussy Nocturnes; the Harvard Glee Club and members of the Tanglewood Choir for Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten."

The Strauss work, composed in 1928, is a setting of four Eichendorf pomes — "Morning," "Midday Calm," "Evening" and "Night." Unfortunately, this 20-minute work is, on the whole, dull and pallid.

For the last movement of the Debussy, Mr. Leinsdorf had the girls placed all over the orchestra rather than en mass in the rear. Thus the "Sirènes" had a more unearthly sound than is usually heard, welling from the body of the orchestra. The effect was enchanting. Conversely, in the Wagner Bacchanale, the girls sang from the side of the Tanglewood Shed—offstage, as the score directs.

As in the Friday concert, Mr. Leinsdorf was in top form, conducting music entirely congenial to him. And this afternoon's program was very much an Ormandy program.

●

It had two orchestral showpieces—the Ravel and the Elgar—and two others that he has led many times. If the Shed has ever heard a louder climax than Mr. Ormandy evoked in the tub-thumping Elgar finale, it remains unknown to this listener. It was nice to hear the Elgar work again, finale and all, and Mr. Ormany led it in a broad, exciting manner.

The weather was nasty but considerate in its nastiness. Thunder boomed during the first half of the concert. At intermission it started to pour, and those on the grass were invited into the Shed. By the end of the concert, the rain had stopped. That is what is known as cooperation.

Eugene Ormandy

Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar Works Given

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK PARK EAST
Thursday, July 23, 1964

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, and Eugene Ormandy, conductors. Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Saturday, July 18, and Sunday, July 19.

To one who has not heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two years, the concert of Saturday evening, July 18, was shimmering, brilliant, exciting. Reality, in this case surpassed memory. The additional ingredient — excitement — was supplied by Maestro Leinsdorf, who combines passion and clarity.

Opening with the Overture and Bacchanale — including the Women's Chorus — from Tannhäuser, Mr. Leinsdorf's operatic experience was put to good advantage. The familiar music glowed. With the sound pouring all around, Mr. Leinsdorf seemed like the eye in the center of a controlled hurricane.

As part of the Richard Strauss centenary celebration, a relatively unfamiliar work was heard, Die Tageszeiten song cycle for men's chorus and orchestra, Op. 76. An effective composition effectively played.

The rest of the program was devoted to familiar compositions: Debussy's Three Nocturnes, Nuages, Fetes and Sirenes (With Women's Chorus); and the Strauss tone-poem, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks. In both cases, the music sounded fresh and luminous.

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisted by the Tanglewood Choir sang the difficult music in a professional and musicianly style. In Sirenes particularly, the woomen's voices had a pure and velvet quality which matched the smoothness of the orchestra.

On Sunday afternoon, Eugene Ormandy conducted the program originally scheduled to be conducted by the late Pierre Monteux. After a slow start in Beethoven's Egmont Overture (Op. 84), Mr. Ormandy took command. He led the orchestra in an authoritative, leisurely paced performance of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. Rousing readings of Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso and Elgar's Enigma Variations made up the second half of the concert.

Leila R. Seigel

Miss Seigel, formerly a Park East music critic, is the paper's correspondent in Geneva, where she makes her home. She currently is vacationing in the U.S.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

JUL 20 1964

Ormandy at Tanglewood With Monteux in Shadow

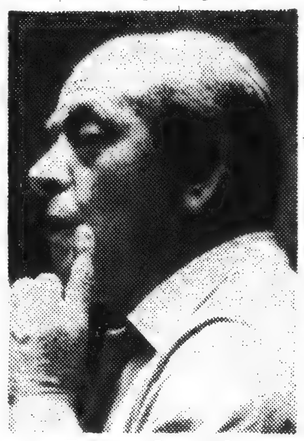
LENOX, Mass.

Eugene Ormandy was on the podium at Tanglewood yesterday to close the third weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts with a familiar program of Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar.

This was the afternoon Pierre Monteux would have led the Boston Symphony. His death on July 1, poignantly noted by Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra on July 3 as the season opened, was brought strongly to mind again yesterday when Mr. Ormandy decided to leave intact Mr. Monteux's original selections—the Overture to "Egmont" and Fourth Symphony of Beethoven, Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Elgar's "Enigma" ariations.

Many in yesterday's audience recalled other Tanglewood summers when the beloved Monteux appeared in this magnificent setting in the Berkshires Hills. It was impossible to hear Mr. Ormandy's sympathetic, deeply felt treatment of Beethoven and Ravel without seeing, in the mind's eye, the familiar Monteux figure, bending gently, modestly, while blending so memorably the colors and textures of these old favorites of his.

Mr. Ormandy's readings



Eugene Ormandy

could in no way be characterized as sentimental. The Beethoven had real verve and propulsion in contrast to Ravel's exotic, intoxicating impressions.

A sudden summer shower scattered all the lawn-listners at intermission, but most of the shed audience remained for the Elgar "Enigma" Variations.

It was worth the wait, for Mr. Ormandy created some spectacular effects. His tempos were all on the brisk side, and he drew some dazzling climaxes from a work that, somehow, did not sound nearly so drab and dated as its critics would have us believe.

On Saturday night Mr. Leinsdorf included two Richard Strauss works, introducing still another of that composer's scores to Festival audiences. "Die Tagszeiten," a setting for men's chorus and orchestra of four poems by Joseph von Eichendorff, dates from 1928 when a sizable portion of the musical fraternity had decided that Strauss, at age 60, was well beyond any provocative or noteworthy ideas

They were partly correct, for there are some lovely pages in this work that describes "Morning," "Midday Calm," "The Evening," and "The Night." The Harvard Glee Club was assisted by members of the Tanglewood Choir, singing most expressively under Mr. Leinsdorf's dedicated direction.

Also assisting in Saturday night's program was the Radcliffe Choral Society, singing the off-stage music that followed the overture and bacchanale of Wagner's "Tannhouser." And supplying some gorgeous sounds in the Sirene's section of Debussy's "Three Nocturnes." A robust "Till Eulenspiegel" rounded out the evening.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

JUL 20 1964

TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL

Memories in Music

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 20.—Two memorial concerts at the Berkshire Festival charged the atmosphere with memories last weekend.

Friday night brought the annual tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, for whom Tanglewood was created.

Yesterday afternoon found Eugene Ormandy playing the program originally drawn up by Pierre Monteux, thereby making the occasion his tribute to the late maestro.

This was Mr. Ormandy's first of three appearances in his third season here. The program he took over consisted of Beethoven's fourth symphony, Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Elgar's "Enigma" variations. He added Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

★

WITH THE HALO meaning of friendships attached to the Elgar, its inclusion added an emotional inflection to thoughts about Monteux.

He would not have given it quite the virtuoso treatment in which Mr. Ormandy indulged, but he would have highlighted the affection with which Elgar sketched the musical portraits of his friends.

Virtuoso conducting is Mr. Ormandy's forte. Audience enthusiasm indicated approval.

He did make the Boston Symphony sound warmer in tone than it has of late as he injected his enthusiasm for performance into the music. The romantic approach dominated, of course.

In some ways the musicians responded too eagerly to him. Some of the Ravel and Elgar came out far too loud. Some of the final cadences were almost wallops. Some of the playing lost clarity because certain tempos were too fast.

On the other hand, the pianissimos paid tribute to his tonal sensitivity, and the singing strings had a melting quality quite devastating at times.

★

THE THEATRICAL element in "Egmont" made a fine beginning. Mr. Ormandy had the assistance of a passing thunderstorm to add tympani rolls to the Beethoven performance. Nature timed some of them acutely in the adagio.

Tempo problems arose in the finale and throughout the remainder of the program. He persuaded the Bostonians to make some gorgeous sounds, especially in the Elgar.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Koussevitzky Memorial. Somewhat characteristically it consisted of interludes from Strauss' opera "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" and Mahler's Fifth Symphony, both played here for the first time.

As a "promoter" of new music, Koussevitzky would have been most pleased with this program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451

JUL 20 1964

Music: Ormandy on Tanglewood Podium

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The third weekend of concerts at Tanglewood ended yesterday afternoon with Eugene Ormandy as the first guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at this summer's Berkshire Music Festival. The previous eight concerts were conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Attendance yesterday was 6,052, bringing the weekend total to 23,001.

No 'Sensationalism'

There were no "super - spectaculars" on Ormandy's program. Unlike some guest conductors who seek sensationalism in high - pressured demonstrations, Ormandy dealt with material that rests its case on sound judgment and musicianship.

The program was Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Opus 84, and Symphony No. 4 in B Flat Major, Opus 60; also Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," and Elgar's "Enigma" variations, Opus 36.

One of the most conspicuous features of Ormandy's accomplishments with the orchestra was the true "pianissimo" that he sought and achieved. Every work had it. This wasn't merely a quiet tone by contrast. But a new dynamic that hasn't frequently been heard at previous concerts.

Strict discipline was exercised in the "Egmont" overture. With constant vigilance over volume and balances, solo fragments were brought more to the fore than customary. This may sound merely like a podium accomplishment, but it was responsible for the overture's rare vitality.

Winds Excellent

Excellent work was done by winds in the quiet, exposed passages. Strings were fully synchronized and brilliant.

While it may be a matter of personal opinion, the introduction to the Beethoven Fourth dawdled at such a slow tempo it sounded extended and laborious. The main body of the first movement moved with purpose and unflagging spirit.

In the slow movement, Ormandy's preoccupation was with singing melody that achieved richness in every part. Outstanding moments with the expressive flute solo by Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Arthur Press' handling of the tympani.

The scherzo was unhurried. Instead, Ormandy laid out the plan clearly, with fine continuity. The finale was seemingly played at ultimate speed. It takes an orchestra like the Boston to apply such pressure without leaving frayed phrases and unplayed notes.

Ravel's "Alborada" a parts of the Elgar variatio gave the orchestra opportuni to play as a virtuoso instr ment.

Bravura Performance

Ormandy conducted "A borada" with tremendous ene gy. He clearly set out to giv a bravura performance, i every sense. Sherman Walt bassoon solo was gorgeousl toned.

There was dazzling soun from strings and deep - se ryhthms.

The conductor was just a much in his element with quie romantic interludes and granc ioso passages. The result wa that each enhanced the othe

At first, Elgar's "Enigma" variations sounded pale an sheephisly bucolic after the in strumental richness of the Rav el. In short time, Ormandy raised it in stature.

A coming extra attractio will be the Boston Pops and Arthur Fiedler's annual apearance at Tanglewood to benefit the Berkshire Music Center. It will be Wednesday, of this week. Comedian Allan Sherman will be guest performer.

The Berkshire Music Festival resumes Friday when Ormandy conducts the Boston Symphony in Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Iberia," and the second "Daphnis and Chloe Suite by Ravel.

4TH WEEK JULY 20TH - 26TH '64

odium

n Pops and Ar-nual apearance to, benefit the Center. It will of this week.
Sherman will ner."
Music Festival
when Orman-
Boston Sym-ard Strauss'
Fifth Sym-
"Iberia," and nis and Chloe

S BUREAU

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009

JUL 20 1964

Five Programs Listed At Berkshire Festival

Five major programs this week at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will begin with an all-Mozart sonata recital by pianist Claudio Arrau tomorrow at 8 p.m.

The annual Boston Pops concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund will take place Wednesday at 8 p.m. Conductor Frank Fiedler has invited Allan Sherman, folk singer, to be the guest artist. With the orchestra, Sherman will present "Peter and the Commissar" and "The End of a Symphony." As a conductor he will direct the Boston Pops in "Variations on How Dry I Am."

Ormandy Slated

Eugene Ormandy will conduct the Boston Symphony Friday at 8:30 p.m. in a program including Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," Siberius' "Symphony No. 5," Debussy's "Iberia" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony will present Saturday at 8:30 p.m. the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's "Nocturne for Four Orchestra, K. 286." This performance will require the use of a closed circuit television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the Music Shed.

Van Cliburn to Play

Also on Saturday's program will be Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Van Cliburn as soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold.

Making the first of two guest appearances this summer, William Steinberg will conduct the Boston Symphony Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 4," Beethaven's "Symphony No. 5" and Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death" from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung."

Other events this week include a Tanglewood Choir program tonight at 8, one by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Thursday at 8 p.m. and a chamber music program Friday at 3:30 p.m. and a Bach program Sunday at 10 a.m. These will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Festival.

There will be a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony, open to the public, Saturday at 10 a.m.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

JUL 23 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
COMPILED IN NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE

Van Cliburn At Tanglewood For Concert

Erich Leinsdorf will open Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras today at 8 p.m. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge music shed.

Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by Piano Concerto No. 1 by Brahms.

For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At tomorrow's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

HUGE CROWDS at Tanglewood last weekend, at major concerts Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon, totaled more than 30,0[illegible] and contributed to the largest tourist weekend of the season in [illegible]shire Hills. Hotels, motels and tourist homes throughout the area were filled.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JUL 21 1964

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283.236 SUN. 296.860

JUL 25 1964

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present former Buffalo conductor William Steinberg as guest maestro tomorrow afternoon in the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, works of Wagner and Mendelssohn. Mr. Steinberg also will conduct Friday evening, in a program including the Brahms Symphony No. 1, Strauss "Don Quixote" and Toccata of Walter Piston.

Cuyahoga Course

The Pittsburgh Orchestra's William Steinberg will direct the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood in music of Piston, Strauss and Brahms.

Steinberg and Ormandy Guest Conductors of BSO at Tanglewood

At next weekend's Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf has again invited William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy to be guest conductors. Mr. Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will conduct on Friday evening, July 31, 8 p.m. Mr. Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct Saturday evening, Aug. 1, at 8 p.m. and Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concert of Sunday afternoon, Aug. 2 at 2:30 p.m. Three first-desk members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soloists during the weekend.

This coming Tuesday evening, July 28, the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will make an appearance at Tanglewood, for the fifth Chamber Music Concert of the season in the Theatre at 8 p.m. The Trio, which consists of Menahem Pressler, pianist; Daniel Guilet, violinist, and Bernard Greenhouse, 'cellist, will begin the program with Mozart's Trio in B-flat, K. 254. They will continue with Ravel's Trio in A minor and conclude with the Dvorak Trio in E minor, Op. 90 ("Dumky"). The net proceeds from the eight Tuesday evening Chamber Music Concerts benefit the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund of the Berkshire Music Center.

William Steinberg will begin Friday evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, July 31, with Walter Piston's Toccata, which will be a first performance at Tanglewood. He will then conduct Richard Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Quixote," Op. 35. Joseph de Pasquale, first viola, will play the viola solo and Samuel Mayes, first cello, will be heard in the cello solo. Mr. Steinberg will close the program with Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

The orchestra will hold its regular Saturday morning open rehearsal on July 31 at 10 a.m. Tickets are available at the box office beginning 9 a.m. and the proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Eugene Ormandy will open the Saturday evening program, Aug. 1, with the Overture to "Leonore", No. 1, of Beethoven, a first performance at the Berkshire Festival concerts. He will then conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21. The program will conclude with the Mahler Symphony No. 1 in D major.

Sunday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium and will open the program with the Dvorak Symphony No. 6 in D major, Op. 60. After the intermission he will conduct Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster, as soloist. This will be a first performance at Tanglewood. The program will close with Richard Strauss' Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier," Op. 59.

The works by Richard Strauss on the Friday and Sunday programs are presented in keeping with Mr. Leinsdorf's intention to perform the major orchestral works of Strauss this summer in recognition of anniversary (June 11, 1864). the composer's 100th birthday

This Saturday evening, July 25, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Serenade for Four Orchestras, K. 286; Strauss' Tone Poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra"; and the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Van Cliburn, soloist. All reserved tickets for this concert have been sold. General Admission to the lawns will be available at 5 p.m.

At Sunday afternoon's concert, July 26, at 2:30 p.m. William Steinberg will conduct Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A major, Op. 90, "Italian"; the Rhine Journey and Funeral March from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung"; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

LOWELL, MASS.
Sun
Eve. Circ. 44,966

JUL 25 1964

Music

Many Guest Soloists At Lenox Festival

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL — This week-end at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, will not only offer a wide variety of instrumental gems, but an imposing list of guest artists.

Dr. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct this evening's concert of Mozart, Strauss and Brahms and his guest soloist will be Van Cliburn, who will be heard in the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor."

Erich Leinsdorf

Tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock, William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Symphony orchestra will conduct a program of Mendelssohn, Wagner and Beethoven. The Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony; Rhine Journey and Funeral March from Wagner's "Gotterddammerung" and the Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven will be featured.

The music pavilion at the Southern Vermont Art center, Manchester, Vt., is enjoying a wonderful season. This marks the 35th anniversary of one of New England's most attractive art and culture centers.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 23 1964

Van Cliburn at Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday evening with Van Cliburn as soloist. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra and a summer resident of the Berkshires, and William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, to conduct the concerts on Friday, July 24, and Sunday, July 26.

For Friday's Berkshire Festival concert Mr. Ormandy has chosen to begin the program with Richard Strauss' tone poem Don Juan, Op. 20. He will also conduct the Boston Symphony in performances of the Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Op. 82 by Sibelius and Debussy's Iberia. The program will conclude with Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite, No. 2.

The regular Saturday morning Open Rehearsal will be at 10 a.m. in the Music Shed.

Erich Leinsdorf will open Saturday's, July 25, concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system, since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge Music Shed. Continuing his observance of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra, which will be followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 15 by Brahms. For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At Sunday's July 26 concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's Gotterdammerrung and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

JUL 25 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075

JUL 25 1964

Van Cliburn At Tanglewood For Concert

Erich Leinsdorf will open Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras today at 8 p.m. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge music shed.

Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by Piano Concerto No. 1 by Brahms.

For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At tomorrow's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

BENNINGTON, VT.
Banner
Eve. Circ. 5,191

JUL 29 1964

Music Review

Erich Leinsdorf Gives Tanglewood 'A New Sense of Musical Direction'

By LISA TATE

LENOX, Mass. — Good things, new things, are going on at Tanglewood this summer. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here in full measure presenting three concerts each week, each featuring at least one unusual or seldom-heard work; the education of some 250 young pre-professional musicians goes on apace at the Berkshire Music Center; chamber - music forms the weekday diet; in addition to a symposium (now past) on the performance of 18th and 19th century music, there is a forthcoming (Aug. 9-13) Festival of Contemporary American Music with 10 young composers present.

This concentrated summer dosage of music is under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The public thinks of him as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (his second season, at present) but in fact and in truth, his title is music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf is effectively giving Tanglewood a new sense of musical direction, in the programming of the orchestra's performances, in stressing the importance of the educational aspect of Tanglewood, where the would-be musicians studying at the Berkshire Music Center are concentrating on chamber music because "it makes the greatest demands on their technique and musicianship," and in recognizing the importance of contemporary music. Tanglewood has not been this lively in a long time.

The weekend concert-goer gets only a small but usually very satisfying taste of this rich and varied musical offering. Ideally one should spend more time there, hearing rehearsals, getting to some of the student performances, being present at a sequence of concerts rather at just a single one. Unfortunately I have not been able to do this this season, but the samplings I have had make me wish for more.

Leinsdorf has devoted a good deal of his programs for this summr to the symphonic music of Richard Strauss, who was born just 100 years ago this June. Last weekend I heard the full orchestra perform in a most fiery way the tone-poem inspired by Nietzsche's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The sonority of the orchestra was superb, the orchestration itself calling for full forces which included organ, harps, tympani and percussion, plus a tidal wave of strings supported by winds and brass. Leinsdorf conducted the ebb and flow of this monumental work to great climaxes, without a score but with full and careful control. He was virtually waltzing on the podium as he conducted the section known as The Dance Song, as moving and luxurious a passage of music as one could hope to hear.

This Friday night William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra will conduct another Strauss tone-poem, Don Quixote, and Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon will conduct the Prelude and Waltz from the opera "Der Rosenkavalier."

The other monumental offering on last Saturday night's program came in the form of Van Cliburn, who performed the exceedingly romantic and exceedingly difficult First Piano Concerto by Brahms. Written early in his career, Brahms apparently did not feel ready to write a symphony and had thought of this work originally as one for two pianos; but his piano - playing friends persuaded him to put it in concerto form since it far exceeded the range of two pianos.

I mention this because it has audible complexities for the pianist and the orchestra. But Van Cliburn was up to it, investing the work with the romantic verve that first brought him to the Russians' attention, though he sometimes muddied the faster cascading passages in order to meet necessities of the score. The audience raved, bringing him back time after time for one modest bow after another.

The concert started with an experiment in spatial music, Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestra, K. 286. The four orchestras (small ones, of perhaps a dozen strings and a few brass) were placed in different parts of the huge shed at Tanglewood, the fourth outside.

Leinsdorf coordinated the whole, but as a composition it was so dull as to be hardly worth all that effort. The real interest was acoustical — because of the time lag before the distant sounds arrived at the eager ear.

There is no absolute guarantee that the BSO (as the orchestra is called) can please all the people all the time, but it pleases thousands every weekend, thanks to good programming and fine musical polish.

Tanglewood is worth the trip, if even for just that one work which appeals to your musical taste — and the mechanics of getting there and back are much smoother than they used to be.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
LOWELL, MASS.
Sun
Eve. Circ. 44,966
JUL 25 1964

Music

Ma... Soloists At L...ox ...tival

By ...ed Burke

LOWELL — This week-end at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, will not only offer a wide variety of instrumental gems, but an imposing list of guest artists.

Dr. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct this evening's concert of Mozart, Strauss and Brahms and his guest soloist will be Van Cliburn, who will be heard in the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor."

Tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock, William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Symphony orchestra will conduct a program of Mendelssohn, Wagner and Beethoven. The Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony; Rhine Journey and Funeral March from Wagner's "Gotterddammerung" and the Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven will be featured.

Erich Leinsdorf

The music pavilion at the Southern Vermont Art center, Manchester, Vt., is enjoying a wonderful season. This marks the 35th anniversary of one of New England's most attractive art and culture centers.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 29 ...

Van Cliburn at Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday evening with Van Cliburn as soloist. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra and a summer resident of the Berkshires, and William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, to conduct the concerts on Friday, July 24, and Sunday, July 26.

For Friday's Berkshire Festival concert Mr. Ormandy has chosen to begin the program with Richard Strauss' tone poem Don Juan, Op. 20. He will also conduct the Boston Symphony in performances of the Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Op. 82 by Sibelius and Debussy's Iberia. The program will conclude with Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite, No. 2.

The regular Saturday morning Open Rehearsal will be at 10 a.m. in the Music Shed.

Erich Leinsdorf will open Saturday's, July 25, concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system, since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge Music Shed. Continuing his observance of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra, which will be followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 15 by Brahms. For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At Sunday's July 26 concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's Gotterdammerrung and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422
JUL 25 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075
JUL 25 1964

Van Cliburn At Tanglewood For Concert

Erich Leinsdorf will open Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras today at 8 p.m. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge music shed.

Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by Piano Concerto No. 1 by Brahms.

For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At tomorrow's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5,

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BENNINGTON, VT.
Banner
Eve. Circ. 5,191
JUL 29 1964

Music Review

Erich Leinsdorf Gives Tanglewood 'A New Sense of Musical Direction'

By LISA TATE

LENOX, Mass. — Good things, new things, are going on at Tanglewood this summer. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here in full measure presenting three concerts each week, each featuring at least one unusual or seldom-heard work; the education of some 250 young pre-professional musicians goes on apace at the Berkshire Music Center; chamber music forms the weekday diet; in addition to a symposium (now past) on the performance of 18th and 19th century music, there is a forthcoming (Aug. 9-13) Festival of Contemporary American Music with 10 young composers present.

This concentrated summer dosage of music is under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The public thinks of him as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (his second season, at present) but in fact and in truth, his title is music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf is effectively giving Tanglewood a new sense of musical direction, in the programming of the orchestra's performances, in stressing the importance of the educational aspect of Tanglewood, where the would-be musicians studying at the Berkshire Music Center are concentrating on chamber music because "it makes the greatest demands on their technique and musicianship," and in recognizing the importance of contemporary music. Tanglewood has not been this lively in a long time.

The weekend concert-goer gets only a small but usually very satisfying taste of this rich and varied musical offering. Ideally one should spend more time there, hearing rehearsals, getting to some of the student performances, being present at a sequence of concerts rather at just a single one. Unfortunately I have not been able to do this this season, but the samplings I have had make me wish for more.

Leinsdorf has devoted a good deal of his programs for this summr to the symphonic music of Richard Strauss, who was born just 100 years ago this June. Last weekend I heard the full orchestra perform in a most fiery way the tone-poem inspired by Nietzsche's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The sonority of the orchestra was superb, the orchestration itself calling for full forces which included organ, harps, tympani and percussion, plus a tidal wave of strings supported by winds and brass. Leinsdorf conducted the ebb and flow of this monumental work to great climaxes, without a score but with full and careful control. He was virtually waltzing on the podium as he conducted the section known as The Dance Song, as moving and luxurious a passage of music as one could hope to hear.

This Friday night William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra will conduct another Strauss tone-poem, Don Quixote, and Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon will conduct the Prelude and Waltz from the opera "Der Rosenkavalier."

The other monumental offering on last Saturday night's program came in the form of Van Cliburn, who performed the exceedingly romantic and exceedingly difficult First Piano Concerto by Brahms. Written early in his career, Brahms apparently did not feel ready to write a symphony and had thought of this work originally as one for two pianos, but his piano - playing friends persuaded him to put it in concerto form since it far exceeded the range of two pianos.

I mention this because it has audible complexities for the pianist and the orchestra. But Van Cliburn was up to it, investing the work with the romantic verve that first brought him to the Russians' attention, though he sometimes muddied the faster cascading passages in order to meet necessities of the score. The audience raved, bringing him back time after time for one modest bow after another.

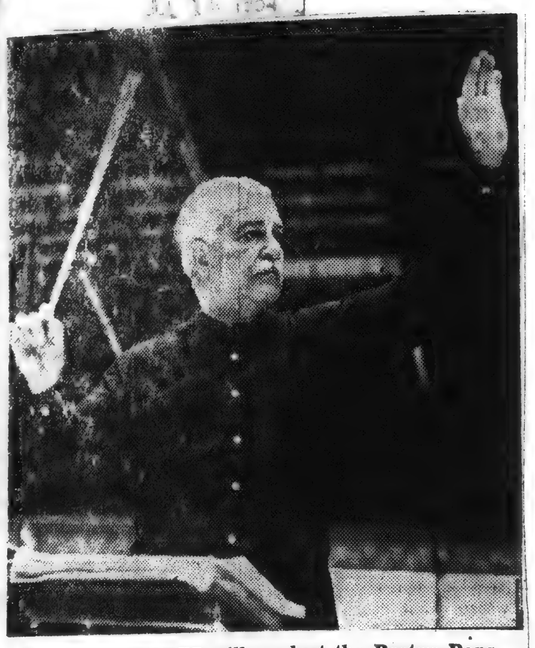
The concert started with an experiment in spatial music, Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The four orchestras (small ones, of perhaps a dozen strings and a few brass) were placed in different parts of the huge shed at Tanglewood, the fourth outside.

Leinsdorf coordinated the whole, but as a composition it was so dull as to be hardly worth all that effort. The real interest was acoustical — because of the time lag before the distant sounds arrived at the eager ear.

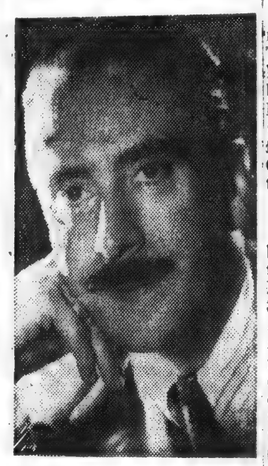
There is no absolute guarantee that the BSO (as the orchestra is called) can please all the people all the time, but it pleases thousands every weekend, thanks to good programming and fine musical polish.

Tanglewood is worth the trip, if even for just that one work which appeals to your musical taste — and the mechanics of getting there and back are much smoother than they used to be.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 109,204
JUL 19 1964



ARTHUR FIELDER will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood for the 11th consecutive season Wednesday at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed.



CLAUDIO ARRAU, pianist, will present a Mozart sonata recital at the Berkshire Festival's Chamber Music Concert at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the Tanglewood Theater in Lenox.

Erich Leinsdorf will have the assistance of two guest conductors in the coming regular three weekend concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival. Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct the program on Friday (8 p.m.). Next Sunday's concert (2:30 p.m.) will have the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, William Steinberg, on the podium. Leinsdorf will conduct his Boston musicians in the concert on Saturday (8 p.m.).

Friday's program lists the following: "Don Juan" — Strauss; Symphony No. 5 in E flat — Sibelius; "Iberia" — Debussy; Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2 — Ravel.

Saturday's concert will highlight the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras. The performance will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system since three of the orchestras will be spread around the Music Shed. "Also sprach Zarathustra", by Strauss, and the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1, with Van Cliburn as soloist, are to be the other offerings.

Steinberg will conduct the following works in Sunday's concert: Symphony No. 4 ("Italian") — Mendelssohn; Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung"; Symphony No. 5 — Beethoven.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the annual concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra on Wednesday evening with the popular comic singer and performer, Allan Sherman, as the guest artist. Sherman's offerings are to include his "Peter and the Commissar" and "End of a Symphony." A highlight of the program should be Sherman's conducting of his own "Variations on How Dry I Am."

Claudio Arrau will give a recital of Mozart sonatas on Tuesday evening as the regular weekly event in the Chamber Music Series. His program lists the Sonatas in G major (K. 283), A minor (K. 310), B flat (K. 570), D major (K. 576), C minor (K. 457), and the Fantasie (K. 475).

* * *

It is hoped that there will be a large turnout for the testimonial program for Curtis M. Saulsbury, to be held next Sunday at 5 p.m. in the Bethel A.M.E. Zion Church. Both as a soloist and choir director for many years here, the venerable musician has made a distinctive and meritorious contribution to the musical life of the community. We shall have more details about the program next Sunday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUL 19 1964

Berkshire Concerts

Guest artists at Tanglewood this week will include three conductors, two pianists and a comic. The Berkshire Festival, Summer operation of the Boston Symphony, will be in its fourth week of concerts in Lenox.

The annual Boston Pops for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund will take place in the Music Shed on Wednesday. For this concert Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler has invited Allan Sherman to be guest artist. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening with Van Cliburn as soloist. Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra and a Summer resident of the Berkshires, and William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the concerts on Friday and Sunday.

For Friday's Berkshire Festival concert Ormandy has chosen to begin the program with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan", Op. 20. He will also conduct the Boston Symphony in performances of the Symphony No 5 in E flat, Op. 82 by Sibelius and Debussy's "Iberia." The program will conclude with Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe Suite, No. 2.

The regular Saturday morning Open Rehearsal will be held at 10 a.m. in the Music Shed.

Erich Leinsdorf will open Saturday's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge Music Shed. Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 15 by Brahms, with Van Cliburn as soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At Sunday's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this Summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. He will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gottehdammering" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will journey from his guest appearances in San Francisco to Tanglewood on Wednesday for the Boston Pops at Tanglewood program. The well-known comic singer and performer Allen Sherman will make his first appearance at Tanglewood at this concert. He will join Arthur Fiedler and the orchestra in performances of his "Peter and the Commissar" and "End of a Symphony." Mr. Sherman will conduct his own "Variations on How Dry I Am."

The fourth concert, July 21, of the Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Series will feature Claudio Arrau in a piano recital of Mozart sonatas. Arrau's program will include the Sonatas in G major, K. 283; A minor, K. 310; B-flat, K. 570; D major, K. 576; and Fantasie and Sonata in C minor, K. 475 and 457. Proceeds from these chamber music concerts benefit the Berkshire Music Center's Revolving Scholarship Fund.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
JUL 23 1964

Leinsdorf Directs, Van Cliburn Soloist

PAGE ONE

Ormandy and Steinberg To Be Guest Conductors

Music Director of Boston Symphony Will Lead First Tanglewood Performance of Mozart's Nocturne For Four Orchestras.—Young Pianist to Play Brahms' Concerto No. 1.

Three conductors will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this week end's concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will direct Saturday evening's program with Van Cliburn as soloist. He has asked Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra and a summer resident of the Berkshires, and William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, to conduct concerts on Friday and Sunday, respectively.

For Friday's Berkshire Festival concert Mr. Ormandy has chosen to begin the program with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan", Op. 20. He will also conduct the Boston Symphony in performances of the Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Op. 82 by Sibelius and Debussy's "Iberia." The program will conclude with Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe Suite, No. 2.

The regular Saturday morning open rehearsal will be held at 10:00 in the Music Shed.

Mr. Leinsdorf will open Saturday's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system, since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge Music Shed.

Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 15 by Brahms. For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn, young pianist, to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At Sunday's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra this evening. The program will include works by Mozart, Strauss, Schuller, and music from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella", with solo vocies drawn from the Music Center's vocal department.

Berkshire Music Center chamber music concerts will be given at 3:30 p. m. on Friday and on Sunday evening at 8:00. The fourth in the new and increasingly popular music of J. S. Bach programs will be given in the Tanglewood Theatre on Sunday at 10:00 a. m. All Berkshire Music Center performances are open to the members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The Friends are those who contribute to the support of the Music Center's scholarship funds and thereby aid the members of the center in two ways: providing financial assistance and making up the audiences for the many Music Center performances.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, July 23, 1964

Soloists at Tanglewood

VAN CLIBURN

For Friday's Berkshire Festival concert Mr. Ormandy has chosen to begin the program with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan", Op. 20. He will also conduct the Boston Symphony in performances of the Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Op. 82 by Sibelius and Debussy's "Iberia." The program will conclude with Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe Suite, No. 2.

The regular Saturday morning Open Rehearsal will be held at 10:00 a. m. in the Music Shed.

Erich Leinsdorf will open Saturday's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge Music Shed. Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 15 by Brahms. For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the Great Lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At Sunday's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, William Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" Symphony. Mr. William Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterhammerrung" and Beethoven Symphony No. 5, Op. 67.

The members of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music will be heard in four performances this week. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra on Thursday evening. The program will include works by Mozart, Strauss, Schuller, and music from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinelle", with solo voices drawn from the Music Center's Vocal Department.

Berkshire Music Center chamber music concerts will be given at 3:30 p. m. on Friday and on Sunday evening at 8:00 p. m. The fourth in the new and increasingly popular Music of J. S. Bach programs will be given in the Tanglewood Theatre on Sunday at 10:00 a. m. All Berkshire Music Center performances are open to the members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal Record
AMHERST, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,205
JUL 16 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
JUL 16 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
JUL 18 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
JUL 17 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 18 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 168,428
JUL 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 18 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript-Telegram
Eve. Circ. 26,427
JUL 22 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUL 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382
JUL 16 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-420
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
JUL 20 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
JUL 19 1964

TANGLEWOOD'S BUSIEST WEEK OF SEASON

Conductor

EUGENE ORMANDY

Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at 2.30 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat Major, Op. 60; Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" and Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme.

Ormandy to Conduct BSO This Afternoon

Pops Program Wednesday Will Feature Allan Sherman as Fiedler's Guest

LENOX—This will be the busiest week of the 1964 Berkshire Festival to date with six major concerts scheduled for Tanglewood.

The Philadelphia conductor Eugene Ormandy will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in today's program consisting of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Symphony No. 4; Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso"; and Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Ormandy has graciously consented to conduct this concert which was scheduled to have been directed by the late Pierre Monteux.

Third Engagement

Claudio Arrau returns for his third engagement of the season Tuesday evening for an all-Mozart sonata recital. The annual Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund will take place in the Music Shed Wednesday. For this concert pops conductor Arthur Fiedler has invited Allan Sherman to be guest artist. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening with Van Cliburn as soloist. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Mr. Ormandy, a summer resident of the Berkshires, and William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, to conduct the concerts on Friday and next Sunday.

For Friday's Berkshire Festival concert Mr. Ormandy has chosen to begin the program with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," Op. 20. He will also conduct the Boston Symphony in performances of the Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Op. 82 by Sibelius and Debussy's "Iberia." The program will conclude with Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe Suite, No. 2.

The regular Saturday morning open rehearsal will be held at 10 in the Music Shed.

First Performance

Mr. Leinsdorf will open Saturday's concert with the first Tanglewood performance of Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286. The performance of this work will require the use of an intricate closed circuit television and communications system since the three orchestras not on the stage will be widely spread about the huge Music Shed. Continuing his observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the philosophical poem "Also sprach Zarathustra" which will be followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 15 by Brahms. For this performance Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Van Cliburn to be soloist. All reserved seats for this concert have been sold. Admission to the great lawns at Tanglewood will be on sale at noon for this concert only.

At next Sunday's concert, the first of two guest appearances at Tanglewood this summer, Mr. Steinberg will begin the program with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, Op. 90, commonly designated as the "Italian" symphony. Mr. Steinberg will also conduct performances of Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerrung" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Op. 67.

Pops Program

Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will journey from his guest appearances in San Francisco to Tanglewood on Wednesday for the Boston Pops at Tanglewood program. The well-known comic singer and performer Allan Sherman will make his first appearance at Tanglewood at this concert. He will join Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra in performances of his "Peter and the Commissar" and "End of a Symphony." Mr. Sherman will conduct his own "Variations on How Dry I am." Reserved seats are available. General admission tickets will be on sale Wednesday at 4 p. m. at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

The fourth concert of the Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Series will feature Claudio Arrau in a piano recital of Mozart sonatas. Mr. Arrau's program will include the Sonatas in G Major, K. 283; A minor, K. 310; B-flat, K. 570; D Major, K. 576; and Fantasie and Sonata in C minor, K. 475 and 457. Proceeds from these chamber music concerts benefit the Berkshire Music Center's Revolving Scholarship Fund.

Five Performances

The members of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will be heard in five performances this week. The Tanglewood Choir, under the direction of faculty and student conductors, will give its first concert of the season on Monday. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra on Thursday evening. The program will include works by Mozart, Strauss, Schuller and music from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella," with solo voices drawn from the Music Center's Vocal Department. Berkshire Music Center chamber music concerts will be given at 3.30 p. m. Friday and next Sunday evening at 8 p. m.

The fourth in the new and increasingly popular music of J. S. Bach programs will be given in the Tanglewood Theater next Sunday at 10 a. m. All Berkshire Music Center performances are open to the members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The Friends are those who contribute to the support of the Music Center's scholarship funds and thereby aid the members of the Center in two ways: providing financial assistance and making up the audiences for the many Music Center performances.

Recitalist

CLAUDIO ARRAU

Claudio Arrau, pianist, will present a Mozart sonata recital at the Berkshire Festival's Chamber Music Concert Tuesday at 8 p. m. in the Tanglewood Theater. His program will consist of the Sonata in G Major, K. 283; the Sonata in A minor, K. 310; the Fantaisie and Sonata in D Major, K. 475; the Sonata in B-flat, K. 570; and the Sonata in D Major, K. 576.

Soloist

VAN CLIBURN

Van Cliburn, pianist, will perform the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, conducting, on Saturday at 8 p. m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Beginning the program will be Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras (Serenade), K. 286; and Strauss' Tone Poem "Also sprach Zarathustra."

Guest

ALLAN SHERMAN

Allan Sherman, famous for his satirical and comical recordings, will make his debut Wednesday evening. He will appear with Arthur Fieldler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in the annual pop program in Lenox. Sherman will conduct his own "Variations on How Dry I Am." The internationally-famous comic follows Danny Kaye to the pops podium. year's event.

REVIEWS

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2070, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744
JUL 25 1964

Music: Strauss' 'Don Juan' At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — To open the fourth weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Eugene Ormandy guest-conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in choice items from his repertory. In spite of a cloudy, rain-threatening day there was an audience of 5,094.

The program was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," Opus 20 (observing the centenary of the composer's birth), Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E flat major, Opus 82, Debussy's orchestral pictures, "Iberia," and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel.

All of this (particularly the slow movement of the Sibelius) was challenging matter even for the Boston Symphony, and levied heavy responsibility on the conductor to control with signals and persuasion.

Don Personality

Ormandy's concept of "Don Juan" had many of the same brush-strokes as his conducting of it here four summers ago. It was a striking merging of gallantry and bleak resignation — a true concept of Strauss' Don personality.

The two opening themes were dashed off swiftly, making way for Strauss' tonal likeness of the hero. Strings and harp made a gorgeous spectacle of the Don's first lover. His second woman was a beauteous creature in the voice of Ralph Gomberg's Oboe.

While the performance didn't give the impression of catalogued events or fingerprinted personalities, it had dramatic continuity. This was no twin to Mozart's rakehelly operative portrayal of the Don, but a heroic yet pathetic personality. Highlights were the resplendent tone from strings depicting the "Lady of Refinement," freedom given Gomberg by Ormandy for the oboe solo, unusual prominence of harp and brilliant playing by horns.

Mysterious Coda

At the huge climax when it sounds as if the work were finished, Ormandy held the baton high and tensely to prevent applause before the final, mysterious coda.

Ormandy's interpretation of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony was an event of moment because of his personal contacts with the late composer and affinity for his music. This did not, however, turn the symphony into a great work.

Impressions of the Fifth last night were strength and valor. Following the bucolic calm that opens the first movement (with clear, impressive sounds from woodwinds) it grew into turmoil and emotional oratory.

Builds Stringent Climax

Ormandy wasn't satisfied with letting the dance-like second movement cavort cheerily but built it into a stringent climax. The real test, however, was the slow movement which can sound trivial. This was prevented with clean technique and intonation especially in the thin woodwind solos against pizzicato in full string section.

Epic Grandeur

There was dazzling work from violas at the start of the finale and it grew to epic grandeur. The concluding harsh, violent and separated chords couldn't have been more together if shot from the same cannon.

Orchestra and conductor cast spells with the Debussy and Ravel scores. Tangy Spanish flavoring permeated "Iberia's" opening, "In the Streets and Byways." Thereafter, rhythms were solid as rock, over which intriguing melodies soared. The percussion contributed much color, horns were brilliant, and the work's fragmentary construction were held together with drama aimed at focal points.

If one considers that Tanglewood's chief importance lies in its services to music and young musicians, rather than audiences, this week's most significant event was Thursday night when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Come From All Lands

Its membership of 70 players, compared to last summer's 100, indicates a raised standard. The center is the educational project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These 70 young men and women had not played before as an ensemble. They come from all parts of the country and several foreign nations. Their first rehearsal for Thursday's concert had been on Tuesday.

Leinsdorf said that the program had been designed for their benefit, rather than to comply to audience standards. The theater concert hall overflowed with an audience of 1,500 contributing friends of the center.

Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D Major ("Haffner") held engrossing interest. Leinsdorf made no compromises for age or amount of experience.

Composer's Symphony

Only reason we can see for playing interludes from Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," Opus 72 was a contribution to Tanglewood's current observance of the composer's birth centenary. It is common place and (in spots) ugly music.

In the "Wanderlust" scene, the orchestra managed to bring order and articulation to geysers of notes. The piano prevailed at the start of the waltz section. Borrowed passages from "Rosekavalier" sounded well, but the thin ending was shaky. A measure of warmth and emotion seeped through the concluding "Reverei."

Center faculty member Gunther Schuller was present to accept credit or blame for his symphonic study (1947). He was treated most cordially. The work had a brief, brace, and loud recess from its generally high registered, ambiguous chordaldoldrums.

Excerpts From Stravinsky

Excerpts from Stravinsky's ballet with song, "Pulcinella," were smartly played, and well sung. There was evidence of the Ergolesi (early Italian) style after which Stravinsky fashioned his score. Neat interplay existed between the solo string quintet and full ensemble.

Vocal solos had understanding and musicianship as handled by soprano Grace DiBattista of Elnora, N.Y., tenor John Neal, Wilmington, N.C., and Francis Hester of Dorchester.

Tonight the festival continues with Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K286, Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and Van Cliburn as soloist in Brahms' First Piano Concerto.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 603,438 SUN. 983,643
JUL 25 1964

At Berkshire

Ormandy Leads Boston Players In Color Splash

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

LENO , Mass., July 24 — Eugene Ormandy pulled on another cloak Friday when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his second appearance at the Berkshire Music Festival.

His cloak Friday was that of the virtuoso orchestral colorist. He chose a program from music he had played often and lavishly at the Academy of Music but rarely has he grouped so many pure color pieces in one evening.

EARLY 20TH CENTURY

The music he chose came from the two decades at the beginning of the century when massive orchestras were the sign of the composers' maturity. His composers were Strauss, Siberlius, Debussy and Ravel, a man who painted with the broadest brushes, and Ormandy used the razor-sharp Boston Symphony as his means of spreading that color the way Jackson Pollack approached his canvas.

For a listener accustomed to hearing the conductor with his own orchestra in the Academy, there were some striking differences in his performance. The orchestra's tradition and the Music Shed favor the brass.

The brillance of the trumpets and the trombones lend a feverish brightness to the French music and to the "Don Juan" that he used to open his virtuoso performance.

STRINGS ARE ASSERTIVE

The strings, too, are brighter, more assertive than the Philadelphia group but without the velvet richness heard at the Academy.

Instead of reshaping the orchestra at hand into the sound he enjoys at home, he exploited its differences, holding the Strauss tone poem into concepts different from those heard at the Academy last Spring. The inner string lines and the stunning brass formed a frame on which Ormandy built a reading full of freshness and fury.

Having achieved a pitch of excitement in the Strauss, he held it through the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 and built on it in the two French works, "Iberia" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2.

MELLOW SOUNDS

Ormandy reveled in the mellow sounds of Sibelius, and he dwelt on the symphony affectionately, making the colors he developed disguise the thinness of the musical fabric that clothes thsi symphony.

The work offers great rewards to a precise strin gsection, and Ormandy exploited the bright, violent sound, the varied string effect, and the wind ensemble to the fullest.

The performance held the audience tightly, and the conductor could enjoy toying with it in the last widely-spaced chord.

BUSMAN'S HOLIDAY

The conductor was clearly having a busman's holiday, enjoying the brilliance, the torrents of sound he drew effortlessly from the orchestra.

"Iberia" was tightly controlled, cunningly developed as the conductor enriched his palette.

The Ravel work swelled and subsided, shimmered and burst in flashing brass and percussion, arousing an audience of 5100 cheering acclaim at the end.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2070, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WATERBURY, CONN.
Republican
Morn. Circ. 24,059
JUL 21 1964

Tanglewood Offers Varied Music Week

LENOX, MASS.— Weather in the Berkshires during the past week end played a perfect accompaniment to the excellent performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presenting three concerts that included selections not previously heard here. All were under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf who this week end will step aside twice for guest conductors. Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor on Friday evening with a program of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy and Ravel. Sunday afternoon William Steinberg will conduct Mendelssohn, Wagner, and Beethoven. Mr. Leinsdorf himself will conduct Saturday night when Van Cliburn will appear as piano soloist in the Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor.

The program Saturday night included the Tanglewood Choir with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting. Strauss' "Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra" with some 95 male voices received its first Tanglewood performance. There were also Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser" with a women's chorus and three Nocturnes by Debussy played with beauty and perfect control. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" was this reviewer's favorite of the evening and the orchestra seemed to be enjoying itself in depicting the escapades of the rogue. The 7,586 who made up the evening audience applauded with warmth. There were times though when we were certain that some of the music was not getting out to some of those seated on the lawns. We know because we tested it. Mr. Leinsdorf sometimes seems to think he is conducting for a large, intimate chamber group rather than for thousands who are not even seated in the Shed. Perhaps some one will have to tell him before the season is over. They may also have to inform him, judging by some of the admittance records this season, that his concerted effort to educate the listening public with the inclusion of music previously unplayed here may be having a deleterious effect upon the box-office. For Friday night's concert there were only 4,132 in the audience for music of Strauss and Mahler, and both were works previously not heard at Tanglewood.

This week will be a busy one at the Festival. This evening Claudio Arrau will be heard in an all-Mozart program in the theater which seats some 1,200. Tomorrow night will bring Arthur Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Pops at Tanglewood with a varied program for the benefit of the pension fund. Included on the program will be Alan Sherman with some of his folk - songs. The major programs of the week end beginning on Friday night will present the three conductors, Ormandy, Leinsdorf, and Steinberg, and Van Cliburn as soloist on Saturday. All in all it presages a rich and full series of musical experiences for the thousands who will make their way to Tanglewood.

S.M.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2070, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
JUL 25 1964

Ormandy Leads Strauss, Sibelius At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Eugene Ormandy chose two works of brilliant color with which to open his second appearance this summer as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at Tanglewood, Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5.

Like Thunderbolts

With music such as this, Ormandy is not one to neglect opportunities for drama. At the famous finish of the Sibelius, for instance, he stood solidly on the podium like a compact but allpowerful little Thor and hurled the six final, giant chords to the ground like thunderbolts.

The audience exploded with applause.

Leading up to that climax had been about an hour of blinding orchestral color. It was so bright it sometimes overstepped the bounds of comfort and became harsh, almost noisy. This was especially apparent during the latter sections of "Don Juan."

Muscular Extrovert

The Don that Strauss had in mind when he composed this piece was a philosophical Don, a man in never-ending, always failing quest for the perfect woman.

The Don heard at Tanglewood Friaday was a muscular extrovert.

Some of the edginess of "Don Juan" continued into the sound of the Sibelius symphony, but it soon developed into a strong, sharply etched clarity quite helpful to the rich sonorities of Sibelius.

Said Similar

Debussy's "Iberia" from his "Images" for Orchestra No. 2 and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet Suite No. 2 which came after intermission seemed surprisingly similar to the Strauss and Sibelius in mood and instrumentation.

They were, however, more satisfying in performance, perhaps because they seemed much less concerned with a need to be bright and sparkly.

The lively instrumentation of "Iberia" was approached with gentle assurance and amiability and although the piece is much less substantial than Sibelius's symphony, it seemed to come across with more warmth.

Becomes More Mellow

So, also, with Ravel's ballet suite, which received a luminous and glistening performance.

The temperature was about 60, and most of the 5094 listeners were in sweaters, topcoats and blankets.

Perhaps it was the orchestra, but more likely it was this listener who took so long to warm up to the music. In any case the music seemed to become more and more mellow phrase by phrase and each work more satisfying than its predecessor.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 28 1964

Our Berkshires

Tanglewood Magic

By Katharine H. Annin

RICHMOND.

TANGLEWOOD is a place of enchantment. I have always found it so, but I felt its spell especially last Friday night, from the moment I took my seat in the Shed. Dusk gathered between us and the rim of darkening pines outside, while the muffled din of 6,000 voices in conversation, blending with the rumble of 100 instruments tuning up, engulfed us like the roar of the ocean on a beach. All consciousness of the routine of daily living slipped away and I was caught up in the magic of the place, the sights and the sounds.

* * *

HIGH ABOVE the platform light glinted in patterns through the triangular planes suspended below the ceiling, and shone brightly on the white jackets of the orchestra below; it was reflected from the golden frames of the two tall harps and the polished wood of the cellos, and made white streaks of the violinists' uplifted bows.

The startling, headlong opening of "Don Juan" took me back years to my first hearing of it in New York, when Strauss was a subject of controversy and his radically new style of music was listened to with skepticism. A lot of dissonance has flowed over the strings since then, and there is nothing difficult to take about "Don Juan" today. The rest of the program continued in the Romantic tradition, all of it composed within 25 years, around the turn of the century. I found this uniformity satisfying and, in spite of the rich orchestration and the excitement of mounting climaxes, in a way restful, since it required no sudden readjustments on the part of the audience.

I was not in a mood for mental exertion or for trying in my feeble way to analyze what I heard; instead, I felt like sinking into the music and letting it engulf me. This I have heard called, scathingly, the Turkish-bath approach to music, but it can leave you refreshed and stimulated even if not mentally exercised.

* * *

IT WAS GOOD to see the familiar faces of the musicians, though some of them are here this season for the last time. Guest conductor was Eugene Ormandy, businesslike in his brisk entrance and brief intermissions. He was magnificently in command, and as I watched I kept thinking that the role of conductor must be one of the most gratifying opportunities to exert power that anyone can find. With all those players before you, surely widely divergent as individuals in a hundred ways, how tremendous to be able to rule and control and mold them into one whole to produce the most glorious forms of art — how much more satisfying than to be a general leading an army on a mission of destruction!

Then my attention was diverted to the percussionists, standing high at the back, so immobile during their long inactivity and so instantly alert when their contribution was called for. With breathtaking precision, tense pauses followed by crashing chords brought the Sibelius to a close.

Intermission — slow-moving throngs crowding the aisles, unexpected encounters evoking ecstatic greetings. Snatches of conversation reached my ears: "What they write now isn't real music," and "The traffic is a lot improved this year." Then a view of the crowds on the lawn — and what a boon aluminum chairs are; vacated during intermission, they stood in rows and groups, gay with their green, yellow or red webbing, so numerous that perhaps we should say, what a boon Tanglewood must be to the manufacturers of aluminum chairs! There were also the hair-dos and the costumes to observe, and the strolling people bundled in lap robes, typically. I may add, since it seems to me that over the years I have been too cold oftener than too hot at Tanglewood.

* * *

THE GONG and lowered lights sent me back to my seat for Debussy, who is always Debussy, and Ravel who, I feel tempted to say, is always "Bolero." This time it was Daphnis and Chloe, which builds up toward the end to the same sort of climax as it sweeps on to the last crashing chords. Then the final ovation and the shouted bravos and a loud "Viva Ormandy!" from the row just behind me.

There was no letdown even on the drive home over the mountain, for my headlights picked up the white birches against the woods on either side and made a fairyland of the road as it climbs and bends and descends into the Richmond valley. Let us hope no one ever gets a notion to widen and straighten this most enchanting Berkshire byway.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 25 1964

Music Review

Ormandy's Second Visit

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

ERICH LEINSDORF, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited two conductors to share the podium with him for the fourth weekend of the Berkshire Festival. Sunday afternoon William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will make his Tanglewood debut. Last night Eugene Ormandy, director of the Philadelphia Symphony, was back for his second visit this season.

His program was a kaleidoscopic carnival: Strauss' "Don Juan," Sibelius' 5th Symphony, Debussy's "Iberia" and Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis et Chloe." Ormandy made them all exciting. Indeed, the unrelenting brilliance finally blurred our auditory capacities, and it would not have been unwelcome to hear some portion a little less ecstatic and to see how the Philadelphia conductor treats the other side of the musical sphere.

* * *

"DON JUAN" was Strauss' big tone-poem. He continued to compose for the ensuing 60 years, but this astonishing work has not ebbed from the mark it reached in its early impact. Strauss did not use Byron's "Don," nor Da Ponte's, but that of Nicolaus Lenau, a young Viennese poet who forsook cosmopolitan Vienna of the early 19th century at about the same time De Tocqueville was leaving Paris, to come see the young American state.

Strauss did not yet require the huge orchestra he later demanded. His hero struts onstage at the very introduction, irresistible to women. The contrasting and lovely feminine themes which then alternate, including a demure reticence which he assigns to the solo violin and which Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein realized so poignantly, make a wonderfully romantic musical story.

Strauss told the Boston Symphony in rehearsal when he was here many years ago, "Gentlemen, I must confess, I did not intend this passage to be so beautiful. She was a common hussy, you know."

THE SIBELIUS speaks more of nature and the elements. The second movement has even a characteristic placid mood which we have come to agree is appropriate for music of a Finland. For some reason we seem to believe that the temperature of passion in music cools as it recedes geographically from the equator and thus "Don" is a torrid-zone character while Sibelius' subjects repose in temperate latitudes.

When Sibelius came through Lenox 50 years ago this summer, he was in the midst of writing his 5th Symphony. It does not have morbid paroxysms like Tschaikowsky nor the earthy passions of Wagner, but it has a nobility and dignity which is both chivalrous and elevating.

* * *

IT HAS BEEN facetiously said that the best Spanish music has been written by Frenchmen and Russians. Spaniards do not agree, but Debussy's "Iberia" is not Spanish because he employs castanets and tambourines. It's Spanish because it senses the streets and paths of Iberia, because the strumming of a guitar conveys the perfumes of the evening, and the soft velvety airs and holiday bells help visualize the glittering sounds and rhythms.

The "Daphnis et Chloe" suite is an intoxicating orgy of sensuous harmonies and rhythms. Ormandy's whole program was picked from the two decades which straddled the turn of the last century. Indeed, he avoided anything which even remotely hinted of classicism and thus the ovation he received from an audience of 5,094 was not only expected but was a repetition of the reception he has received here in very recent years for the same works.

After "Don Juan," Ormandy brought oboist Ralph Gomberg to the front to receive the credit due for his outstanding solos and for the same reason after the "Daphnis" flutist Doriot Anthony was singled out for distinction.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

JUL 27 1964

Tanglewood 1

Ormandy Leads Noisy, Coarse-grained Concert

The ARTS

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

The first chord of Debussy's "Iberia" reveals all about a conductor. It is short, sharply accented, played by strings, about half the woodwinds, the horns and trumpets, most of the percussion, and it is marked "forte." Its force is in its bite rather than its weight. There must be air and space around it. One of its functions is to provide a proper springboard for the chattering triplets of the bassoons and castagnettes in the rest of the measure, and for the string pizzicatos of the next.

What is needed, then, is a propulsive rhythmic whipcrack. If, however, the conductor's baton goes slash across a three-foot arc and the players are encouraged to whack at the chord for all they are worth, then the opening of "Iberia" becomes a ponderous thud, dulling sonority, blotting out rhythm, destroying atmosphere. And, you can be sure, nothing else in the performance will be worth listening to.

And that is what happened when Eugene Ormandy conducted "Iberia" at Tanglewood on Friday evening. Actually, "Iberia" had been preceded by Strauss' "Don Juan" and by the Sibelius Fifth Symphony, and by then proof was really no longer needed of Mr. Ormandy's lack of musical sensibility. Nor did the performance of the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" do anything toward altering the impression of interpretive brutality.

Throughout the evening, everything was tense and driven, over-phrased in detail, but neither intelligently nor intelligibly articulated into larger units. The first real disaster warning came about five minutes into "Don Juan" at the second of the three feminine themes. Here Strauss has written a beautiful sighing figure for the flute, coming in always just after the beat. Ormandy slammed through these pages so breathlessly that the pathetic little laments from the flute were practically forced onto the beat.

One must view with some skepticism Sibelius' claim that he wrote music in opposition to the prevailing lushness and grand rhetoric of his period. His symphonies have more in common with the expressive traditions of late Romanticism than he was willing to acknowledge. Still, it is not necessary to make the Fifth Symphony sound quite as much like the score of "Kismet" as did Mr. Ormandy.

Above all, the music all evening was terribly loud. Everything from mezzo-piano on approached forte, and many a passage of mezzo-forte was allowed — no, encouraged — to swell uncontrolled to fortissimo. It was the coarse dynamics above all that killed the sunrise magic of "Daphnis and Chloe" that Koussevitsky and Munch used with such effect. The rhythm stifled even Mrs. Dwyer's normally so fin playing of the flute solo in the Pantomine.

Ormandy lacks the ability to tell the difference between one piece and another. Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy, Ravel—all of them came out sounding amazingly alike, gaudy as Philadelphian transcriptions of Bach organ toccatas. I do not deny Ormandy's ability to make the Boston Symphony play the way he wants it to. There is more to music than brilliant noise, though, and there was to me only utter futility in Friday night's mindless orgy.

Knickerbocker News
July 27 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.

At the Concert

The Special Touch of Ormandy and Steinberg

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

Eugene Ormandy's guest [illegible] with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, over the weekend, was in direct contrast to that offered by William Steinberg. As conductors of the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Symphonies, respectively, the men are a state apart in location and a world apart in programming and approach to orchestral literature.

Ormandy's program was one of lush sounds and sensational orchestration. Beginning with the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," Ormandy illustrated that he had done no more than transfer his concept of orchestral playing from the "City of Brotherly Love," to the Berkshires. The Boston Strings were made to sing in a more warm and lyrical manner than is their custom, and the winds and brass were put through their paces with a determined lack of pity.

"Don Juan" roared from the orchestra with new vigor and roguishness. The Sibelius "Symphony No. 5" was given the same treatment, though it must be said that, like the Strauss work and the Debussy "Iberia" and Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2" which completed the program, the Sibelius begs for such a tonally brilliant rendering.

★ ★ ★

THE FULL forces of the orchestra were employed for each work and the hall reverberated with the exotic sounds coming from the ensemble.

This was a concert keyed to large orchestral sounds. Ormandy is a recognized interpreter of the composers chosen for show, which served to reaffirm his command over the material. After the program, Ormandy got a surprise when William Steinberg, an old friend, showed up back stage to compliment him on his performance.

Yesterday was Steinberg's turn before the Boston Symphony and a complete change of ideas was the order of the day. An all-German program had the Boston Symphony musicians turning their other face, as compared to the night with Ormandy.

The Mendelssohn "Italian Symphony" received a finely wrought and tightly controlled interpretation at the hands of Steinberg. His tiny, almost imperceptible beat, was enough to call forceful passages from the group at a second's notice.

★ ★ ★

IN MANY WAYS, the orchestra had been prepared for the Steinberg touch by its permanent conductor, Erich Leinsdorf. The two conductors have many of the same concepts.

It is not the beat that is required so much from either of these men, for they have rehearsed the orchestra well. Rather the left hand, which gives the interpretative and dynamic levels was made more prominent, giving a unique and rare treat to the audience of 13,000 people, because of the shadings obtained.

Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Siegfried's Death from Gotterdammerung" are usually played uninterrupted. The crowd demanded a temporary halt at the midpoint to show its appreciation for the splendid readings being given by Steinberg and the Boston Symphony. Tempos were altered to bring a more dramatic impact to the work. New insights were gained in the process.

THE CONCLUSION of the show was Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," probably the best known work in the entire symphonic repertoire, and one with which it is almost impossible to become bored, though repeated playings would nearly promise to accomplish that very thing. It is a classic of construction and melody. The sparse lines allow the listener to create within the framework of the piece.

Steinberg has his task cut out for him in trying to say anything new while conducting the work. But the seven curtain calls after the conclusion showed that he had succeeded in adding to the understanding of the work.

A cleanliness of attack and the making prominent of certain voices which are normally buried in the body of the composition, were part of the reason for the immense success of the playing. German music, and particularly Beethoven, are Steinberg's daily bread. There are few conductors who can handle them better. Yesterday's concert was ample evidence of that.

ON THE BEAT—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, led the Boston Orchestra in a highly inspired concert at the Tanglewood music shed yesterday.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WATERBURY, CONN.
American
Eve. Circ. 41,200

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
JUL 27 1964

T-U AT THE CONCERT

Boston Symphony In 'Brilliant' Form

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

The halfway mark of the eight-week's season of weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood was brilliantly reached yesterday afternoon with William Steinberg, musical directoro ft he Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra as guest conductor.

The program of music by Mendelssoon, Wagner and Beethoven was well adapted to Mr. Steinberg's excellent musicianship and interpretative artistry.

Shakespeare to the contrary here IS tremendous value in a name when it is born by the young pianistic genius, Van Cliburn, who entranced a record Saturday nigfht audience of 14,500.

Some 1,200 more attended than did the Boston Pops benefit concert on Wednesday evening.

Van Cliburn's conception of the 1st piano concerto by Brahms was received enthusiastically by the audience, which insisted on calling him back to the podium for five recalls.

This young American genius is rapidly developing an emotional side to his playing, thus balancing his tremendous technical ability.

Friday night's concert, conducted by Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra was progfram music of a very fascinating quality.

Mr. Ormandy used a great variety of musical pigment with the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan;" Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2", and Debussy's exciting Spanish musical canvas, "Iberia."

On a more austere note there was the inclusion of Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius. This man of the North knows the exciting effect of oriental repitition in phrase and rhythm for the erection of an imposing musical structure. Mr. Ormandy sensed the tremendous potential of the granite-like complex of sound and fury.

In retrospect the high point of the week was Saturday night's concert, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. In addition to the counter attraction of Van Cliburn, was the permanent conductor's inclusion of Mozart's "Serenade for Four Orchestras," receiving its first Tanglewood performance. Much curiosity was manifested by the reserved seat holders in the three chamber music groups, placed in strategic positions to the left and right of the stage. Since each music rack had the imprint; "B.S.O. in large letters, it was presumed that it had something to do with the Tanglewood orchestra.

The theme of the serenade was given out by the major group on stage, and reprised in echo from by the musical sateleites in the offing. This unique and delightful exposition of Mozart's genius, pointed up the fact that stereophonic music is not the province of the 20th century exclusively, but was imagined and consummated by the 18th century "wunderkind" of Salzburg. The 200-year hiatus was beautiful bridged by Mr Leinsdorf and enthusiastically acknowledged by the capacity audience.

JUL 20 1964

Busy Week Slated At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS.— Weather in the Berkshires during the past week end played a perfect accompaniment to the excellent performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presenting three concerts that included selections not previously heard here. All were under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf who this week end will step aside twice for guest conductors. Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor on Friday evening with a program of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy and Ravel. Sunday afternoon William Steinberg will conduct Mendelssohn, Wagner, and Beethoven. Mr. Leinsdorf himself will conduct Saturday night when Van Cliburn will appear as piano soloist in the Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor. Many days ago announcement was made that all seats in the Shed were sold out for the Cliburn concert as happened last year. But that still leaves thousands of admissions available for those who lie on blankets on the grass or sit in their own folding beach chairs. If last year's audience is any criterion one may expect some 14,000 or more to be present to hear this young man.

The program Saturday night included the Tanglewood Choir with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting. Strauss' "Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra" with some 95 male voices received its first Tanglewood performance. There were also Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser" with a women's chorus and three Nocturnes by Debussy played with beauty and perfect control. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" was this reviewer's favorite of the evening and the orchestra seemed to be enjoying itself in depicting the escapades of the rogue. The 7,586 who made up the evening audience applauded with warmth. There were times though when we were certain that some of the music was not getting out to some of those seated on the lawns. We know because we tested it. Mr. Leinsdorf sometimes seems to think he is conducting for a large, intimate chamber group rather than for thousands who are not even seated in the Shed. Perhaps some one will have to tell him before the season is over. They may also have to inform him, judging by some of the admittance records this season, that his concerted effort to educate the listening public with the inclusion of music previously unplayed here may be having a deleterious effect upon the box-office. For Friday night's concert there were only 4,132 in the audience for music of Strauss and Mahler, and both were works previously not heard at Tanglewood.

This week will be a busy one at the Festival. Tomorrow evening Claudio Arrau will be heard in an all-Mozart program in the theater which seats some 1,200. Wednesday night will bring Arthur Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Pops at Tanglewood with a varied program for the benefit of the pension fund. Included on the program will be Alan Sherman with some of his folk - songs. The major programs of the week end beginning on Friday night will present the three conductors, Ormandy, Leinsdorf, and Steinberg, and Van Cliburn as soloist on Saturday. All in all it presages a rich and full series of musical experiences for the thousands who will make their way to Tanglewood.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 30 1964

TANGLEWOOD

Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

A curious concert: German, Finnish and French, with nothing prior to 1889. One came away feeling somehow both undernourished and overfed.

The program began with Strauss's Don Juan, which contains some genuinely beautiful music, as well as long stretches of fustian and posturing. Then came the Sibelius Fifth Symphony. In the Koussevitzky era Sibelius used to appear regularly on the Festival programs. This has not been the case for many years, and I for one was grateful for the opportunity of hearing the symphony again.

Like nature, of which one is so happily aware at Tanglewood, there is a certain organic inevitability about Sibelius, and the beauty of nature is there, too.

I suppose that both Mr. Ormandy and the BSO have been through the Second Suite from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe so many times that they feel something new must be attempted at any cost. The result Friday was a ragged opening (what would Dr. Muench have said?) and a General Dance so distorted, so loud, so exaggerated that the only word one could think of was "vulgar" — and this is a word one does not associate with Ravel, who is surely one of the most aristocratic of composers. It is too bad.

The audience, it is perhaps only fair to say, loved it.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 27, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.

AT THE CONCERT

The Special Touch of Ormandy and Steinberg

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

Eugene Ormandy's guest stint with the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the weekend, was in direct contrast to that offered by William Steinberg. As conductors of the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Symphonies, respectively, the men are a state apart in location and a world apart in programming and approach to orchestral literature.

Ormandy's program was one of lush sounds and sensational orchestration. Beginning with the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," Ormandy illustrated that he had done no more than transfer his concept of orchestral playing from the "City of Brotherly Love," to the Berkshires. The Boston Strings were made to sing in a more warm and lyrical manner than is their custom, and the winds and brass were put through their paces with a determined lack of pity.

"Don Juan" roared from the orchestra with new vigor and roguishness. The Sibelius "Symphony No. 5" was given the same treatment, though it must be said that, like the Strauss work and the Debussy "Iberia" and Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2" which completed the program, the Sibelius begs for such a tonally brilliant rendering.

★ ★ ★

THE FULL forces of the orchestra were employed for each work and the hall reverberated with the exotic sounds coming from the ensemble.

This was a concert keyed to large orchestral sounds. Ormandy is a recognized interpreter of the composers chosen for show, which served to reaffirm his command over the material. After the program, Ormandy got a surprise when William Steinberg, an old friend, showed up back stage to compliment him on his performance.

Yesterday was Steinberg's turn before the Boston Symphony and a complete change of ideas was the order of the day. An all-German program had the Boston Symphony musicians turning their other face, as compared to the night with Ormandy.

The Mendelssohn "Italian Symphony" received a finely wrought and tightly controlled interpretation at the hands of Steinberg. His tiny, almost imperceptible beat, was enough to call forceful passages from the group at a second's notice.

★ ★ ★

IN MANY WAYS, the orchestra had been prepared for the Steinberg touch by its permanent conductor, Erich Leinsdorf. The two conductors have many of the same concepts.

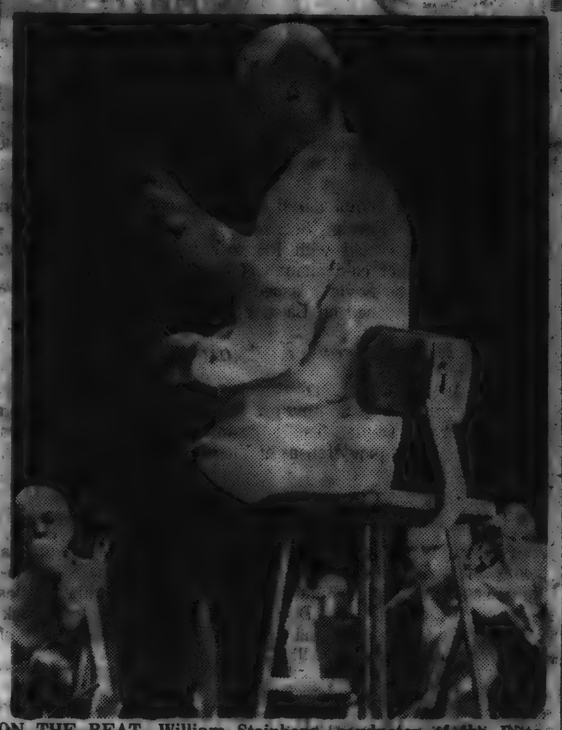
It is not the beat that is required so much from either of these men, for they have rehearsed the orchestra well. Rather the left hand, which gives the interpretative and dynamic levels was made more prominent, giving a unique and rare treat to the audience of 13,000 people, because of the shadings obtained.

Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Siegfried's Death from Gotterdammerung" are usually played uninterrupted. The crowd demanded a temporary halt at the midpoint to show its appreciation for the splendid readings being given by Steinberg and the Boston Symphony. Tempos were altered to bring a more dramatic impact to the work. New insights were gained in the process.

THE CONCLUSION of the show was Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," probably the best known work in the entire symphonic repertoire, and one with which it is almost impossible to become bored, though repeated playings would nearly promise to accomplish that very thing. It is a classic of construction and melody. The sparse lines allow the listener to create within the framework of the piece.

Steinberg has his task cut out for him in trying to say anything new while conducting the work. But the seven curtain calls after the conclusion showed that he had succeeded in adding to the understanding of the work.

A cleanliness of attack and the making prominent of certain voices which are normally buried in the body of the composition, were part of the reason for the immense success of the playing. German music, and particularly Beethoven, are Steinberg's daily bread. There are few conductors who can handle them better. Yesterday's concert was ample evidence of that.



ON THE BEAT—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, led the Boston Orchestra in a highly inspired concert at the Tanglewood music shed yesterday.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
JUL 27 1964

T-U AT THE CONCERT

Boston Symphony In 'Brilliant' Form

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

The halfway mark of the eight-week's season of weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood was brilliantly reached yesterday afternoon with William Steinberg, musical directoro ft he Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra as guest conductor.

The program of music by Mendelssohn, Wagner and Beethoven was well adapted to Mr. Steinberg's excellent musicianship and interpretative artistry.

Shakespeare to the contrary there IS tremendous value in a name when it is born by the young pianistic genius, Van Cliburn, who entranced a record Saturday nigfht audience of 14,500.

Some 1,200 more attended than did the Boston Pops benefit concert on Wednesday evening.

Van Cliburn's conception of the 1st piano concerto by Brahms was received enthusiastically by the audience, which insisted on calling him back to the podium for five recalls.

This young American genius is rapidly developing an emotional side to his playing, thus balancing his tremendous technical ability.

Friday night's concert, conducted by Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra was program music of a very fascinating quality.

Mr. Ormandy used a great variety of musical pigment with the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan;" Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2", and Debussy's exciting Spanish musical canvas, "Iberia."

On a more austere note there was the inclusion of Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius. This man of the North knows the exciting effect of orientral repitition in phrase and rhythm for the erection of an imposing musical structure. Mr. Ormandy sensed the tremendous potential of the granite-like complex of sound and fury.

In retrospect the high point of the week was Saturday night's concert, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. In addition to the counter attraction of Van Cliburn, was the permanent conductor's inclusion of Mozart's "Serenade for Four Orchestras," receiving its first Tanglewood performance. Much curiosity was manifested by the reserved seat holders in the three chamber music groups, placed in strategic positions to the left and right of the stage. Since each music rack had the imprint; "B.S.O. in large letters, it was presumed that it had something to do with the Tanglewood orchestra.

The theme of the serenade was given out by the major group on stage, and reprised in echo from by the musical sateleites in the offing. This unique and delightful exposition of Mozart's genius pointed up the fact that stereophonic music is not the province of the 20th century exclusively, but was imagined and consummated by the 18th century "wunderkind" of Salzburg. The 200-year hiatus was beautiful bridged by Mr. Loinsdorf and enthusiastically acknowledged by the capacity audience.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-0208
WATERBURY, CONN.
American
Eve. Circ. 41,200
JUL 20 1964

Busy Week Slated At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS.— Weather in the Berkshires during the past week end played a perfect accompaniment to the excellent performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presenting five concerts that included several not, previously heard here. All were under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf who this week end will step aside twice for guest conductors. Eugene Ormandy will be guest conductor on Friday evening with a program of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy and Ravel. Sunday afternoon William Steinberg will conduct Mendelssohn, Wagner, and Beethoven. Mr. Leinsdorf himself will conduct Saturday night when Van Cliburn will appear as piano soloist in the Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor. Many days ago announcement was made that all seats in the Shed were sold out for the Cliburn concert as happened last year. But that still leaves thousands of admissions available for those who lie on blankets on the grass or sit in their own folding beach chairs. If last year's audience is any criterion one may expect some 14,000 or more to be present to hear this young man.

The program Saturday night included the Tanglewood Choir with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting. Stranss' "Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra" with some 95 male voices received its first Tanglewood performance. There were also Wagner's "Overture and Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser" with a women's chorus and three Nocturnes by Debussy played with beauty and perfect control. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" was this reviewer's favorite of the evening and the orchestra seemed to be enjoying itself in depicting the escapades of the rogue. The 7,586 who made up the evening audience applauded with warmth. There were times though when we were certain that some of the music was not getting out to some of those seated on the lawns. We know because we tested it. Mr. Leinsdorf sometimes seems to think he is conducting for a large, intimate chamber group rather than for thousands who are not even seated in the Shed. Perhaps some one will have to tell him before the season is over. They may also have to inform him, judging by some of the admittance records this season, that his concerted effort to educate the listening public with the inclusion of music previously unplayed here may be having a deleterious effect upon the box-office. For Friday night's concert there were only 4,132 in the audience for music of Strauss and Mahler, and both were works previously not heard at Tanglewood.

This week will be a busy one at the Festival. Tomorrow evening Claudio Arrau will be heard in an all-Mozart program in the theater which seats some 1,200. Wednesday night will bring Arthur Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Pops at Tanglewood with a varied program for the benefit of the pension fund. Included on the program will be Alan Sherman with some of his folk-songs. The major programs of the week end beginning on Friday night will present the three conductors, Ormandy, Leinsdorf, and Steinberg, and Van Cliburn as soloist on Saturday. All in all it presages a rich and full series of musical experiences for the thousands who will make their way to Tanglewood.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 30 1964

TANGLEWOOD

Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

A curious concert: German, Finnish and French, with nothing prior to 1889. One came away feeling somehow both undernourished and overfed.

The program began with Strauss's Don Juan, which contains some genuinely beautiful music, as well as long stretches of fustian and posturing. Then came the Sibelius Fifth Symphony. In the Koussevitzky era Sibelius used to appear regularly on the Festival programs. This has not been the case for many years, and I for one was grateful for the opportunity of hearing the symphony again.

Like nature, of which one is so happily aware at Tanglewood, there is a certain organic inevitability about Sibelius, and the beauty of nature is there, too.

I suppose that both Mr. Ormandy and the BSO have been through the Second Suite from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe so many times that they feel something new must be attempted at any cost. The result Friday was a ragged opening (what would Dr. Muench have said?) and a General Dance so distorted, so loud, so exaggerated that the only word one could think of was "vulgar" — and this is a word one does not associate with Ravel, who is surely one of the most aristocratic of composers. It is too bad.

The audience, it is perhaps only fair to say, loved it.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Herald
Sun. Circ. 281,586

JUL 26 1964

Berkshire Festival

Three Conductors In Performances

By McLAREN HARRIS

The fourth weekend at Tanglewood this summer could truly be subtitled conductors' weekend. Not only does a different conductor stand before the symphony for each of the three Berkshire Festival concerts, but the composers represented on the programs are those which one might imagine most congenial to their interpreters.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Last night Erich Leinsdorf took the lead for performances of Mozart, Strauss and Brahms; this afternoon William Steinberg assumes control for orchestral works by Mendelssohn, Wagner and Beethoven. On Friday night the podium belonged to Eugene Ormandy, and for this occasion it was particularly tempting to identify his choices as being among his favorites.

Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy and Ravel all worked in the same general chronological period, though their artistic spirits moved on separate planes.

The four works heard Friday night were created in a span of less than 30 years and tread their respective paths under the continuing glimmer of romanti-

Strauss employs a heavy-laden battery of winds for the compelling seep or register and dynamics in "Don Juan"; Sibelius departs from the opposite pole, keeping with almost classic economy for his Symphony No. 5, yet extracting a harmonic and tonal resplendence worthy of larger forces.

Vibrant Approach

Debussy's "Iberia" takes a singularly romanticized view of the Latin peasant's festive musical life, while Ravel's "Daphnis Et Chloe" (second suite) expands similar compositional materials into a fantasy both orgiastic and mysterious.

In all cases the curves of melody, nuance of phrase and cumulative ingredients of majesty require an approach now tolerant an permissive, now coaxing and occasionally drawing out with almost muscular effort; it is Mr. Ormandy's glory that he possesses the formula to develop lustrous total images where lesser insight could produce only a glittering surface or unresolved internal striving.

Such results presented most eloquently in the Sibelius Symphony, as the ever-more natural association between conductor and composer has solid ground. Simple, unadorned motives are linked and transformed into broad statements of grandeur so that the unifying effects of small elements cannot be mistaken. Developmental devices lend color, not just structure, to a non-programmatic tone painting, as it were, and the foreboding nature of violin tremolos and distant fanfares from the winds pass on toward a full flowering of joy and triumph.

As he moulded meanings for Sibelius, so Mr. Ormandy spelled out success for the program's remainder. The symphony followed his vigorous and meticulous lead with a drive and reserve of energy; oboist Ralph Gomberg and flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer received congratulations for their work in the Strauss and Ravel, respectively.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

JUL 27 1964

Concert Review

Tanglewood Over Halfway Point, Best Crowds Yet

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

Tanglewood's fourth weekend passed the halfway point with the largest attendance of the season thus far. Though approximately 13,000 attended Pops, 15,000 attended Cliburn and added to Friday and Sunday, the total BSO attendance was near 35,000 (with untold thousands for local merchants).

Fabulous Music

The program that brought these crowds, though weighed in favor of Strauss, was still a compelling mixture that ran from Mozart to Ravel. For the listener with a lush romantic ear, there was Sibelius' Fifth, for others with leanings for sound at the orgiastic level there was Mr. Ormandy's reading of Debussy's Iberia or Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe with color running from remote redolence to forthright rhapsody. It is impossible to verbalize this fabulous music. Debussy employed a translator when in 1910 he conducted Iberia in Budapest, but still words did not run deep. He wrote "I tried every means, I sang, made gestures of Italian pantomime etc. . . It was enough to touch the heart of a buffalo."

Any child will readily relate that a cross between an elephant and a jar pf peanut butter will yield either an elephant that sticks to the roof of your mouth or peanut butter that does not forget. Sage elders, however, realize that the 1864 cross between Mozart and Wagner produced R. Strauss. Ormandy's performance of Don Juan may perhaps never be forgotten, but Leinsdorf's reading of Zarathustra may ever stick to the wax in one's ear as the pretentious white elephant it has long known to be. It is rather difficult to believe that any rehearing of Zarathustra would enhance the memory of so skilled a musician as Richard Strauss, but one must admit the BSO gave it a magnificent opportunity.

This reviewer found that after changing location from inside to a position outside the shed, Van Cliburn's performance of Brahms Concerto Number 1 was more finely appreciated. Here the tone of the piano better pierced that of the orchestra and suggested the 30-year-old musician had developed a far broader scope to his music than he had exhibited at his last Tanglewood performance. It was only the rondo heard outside, however, and the maestoso and adagio portions seemed ineffectual and by the orchestra rather roughly handled.

Mozart's Nocturne

Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras was repetitious as might be expected but the setting and production was far from predictable. Four orchestras composed of strings and two horns were dispersed about the shed. The left promenade contained a quarter muted group led by bass clarinetist, Rosario Mazzeo; the second in the right promenade was led by English hornist Louis Speyer in the semi-mute; the third was out in left field three quarter muted as echo three and led by violinist Harry Dickson. Mr. Leinsdorf displaying the happy smile o success, conducted the prime or chestra from the stage cuing al echoes through a closed circui TV. What the work lacks i form or durable reason, it mad up in novel and charming humor This is the kind of intricat performance Mr. Leinsdorf like and as usual pulls off quite wel

Mr. Steinberg's concert Sun day included a brilliant perfo mance of Mendelssohn's Italia Symphony as well as a youthf rendition of Beethoven's Fifth shimmer of the orchestra brass. Mr. Steinberg seemed pe haps a little disgruntled with t

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

JUL 28 1964

Three Festival Directors

The Berkshire Festival's fourth weekend, and second of concerts by the full complement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, featured three different directors, each selecting his own program, Eugene Ormandy, Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg, consecutively.

Although Saturday night's soloist Van Cliburn drew 14,592 listeners, and Sunday afternoon saw 10,792 attendants, Friday evening's program was the most satisfying in every way, with only 5,094 fortunate in hearing.

A frequent guest conductor of the BSO, in gesture the most reserved, and infinitely clear of the three directors, but in depth of feeling and intensity of interpretative transmission (one senses rather than sees the surge of sentient artistry), the most profound Ormandy opened Friday's program with the honored Strauss' Tone Poem "Don Juan," after the poet Nikolaus Lenau, Op. 20.

Its fiercely emotional content, marvelously depicted by the orchestra's colorfully brilliant response to Mr. Ormandy's magnetic stimulus, intensified the starkly simple yet eloquently charming fifth symphony with its abrupt endings, and exquisite blending of solo instruments, of Sibelius, completing the first half.

Debussy's "Iberia" from his Images for Orchestra, delicately impressive, and Ravel's Suite No. 2 from his Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe" sensuously evocative, were fascinating as emotionally graphic opposites, bringing the evening to a close with tumultuous applause.

A first performance at Tanglewood, Mozart's Notturno in D for four orchestras, K.286, in three short movements, opened Saturday's concert, not too successfully, with Leinsdorf conducting onstage, two orchestras at right and left of stage, and a fourth under the box canopy entrance directed by Louis Speyer. Even with closed circuit television to rely on for co-ordination, the continuity of the phrase-passing from one uni another, didn't quite come It did intrigue the listener

Again Strauss' 100th bi date was observed, with sonorous and majestic t poem "Thus Spake Zarath tra," wonderfully orchestrat pervaded by the elemental k of C major, the "Tanzleid" effably beautiful, violin a winds speaking back and for as if from a mountain top.

With a technique that times was garbled, and on moments of real complete a tistry, such as the end of t second movement, pianist Va Cliburn played for the secor consecutive summer, at th Festival. This time it was th symphonic first concerto Brahms, with the balance we achieved by Mr. Leinsdorf's a tentive control. But the per formance lacked fire, inspira tioin and genuine depth; th notes were forthcoming, bu Mr. Cliburn lacks a sensitivity to the composer and his instru ment that he may, one hopes, develop with concentrated and prolonged study.

Sunday's concert, conducted by William Steinberg, served to prove that an orchestra, even the incomparable BSO, cannot co-ordinate itself without well-defined assistance from its leader. Mr. Steinberg's beat, whether third or second button level, was practically non-existent; he indicated a line o ra phrase, and musically sound dynamics with the usual gestures, and much head-shaking, but what the underlying pulse should be was most confusing, and certainly to the players; left to guess, each section chose its own, resulting in waves of disordered sound, with a tendency to hurried tempos, no doubt to offset the unrealized stress. Mendelssorn's Italian Symphony, Wagner's immensely moving Rhine Journey and Death of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung," Beethoven's still ex citing Fifth, all suffered from Mr. Steinberg's disregard of metered accent. Nonetheless applause was warm and pro longed.

M.deB.B.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,

JUL 27 1964

SYM
4 Stars
At Tang
McLAREN HARRIS
During the weekend
Tanglewood, a new great audiences of the season as three conduct né Ormandy, Erich d William Steinberg mphony in a fair th nusualy variety of mu classic to the post-as.
Probably the biggest rd was Van Cliburn on ght. This pianist's po al, which has held ce his initial success ems to stem from both al stature, striking yet d his forthright but anism. One is hard p dissenter among the
Mr. Cliburn's victo que, a situation which fferent following his d e Brahms D minor C metimes Obscure
Such moments of brav rious display as about ter movements fell uch dry timber bef iburn's digital attack
m with sufficient em ild a powerful expre
e more poetic passage sition and developme alings here are met tra-sincere devotion; heighten the purpose te, and sometimes th partial obscurity, c incipal materials with ates as accompanime e solo voice. The wood
th vertical, as well ntal, perspective. It id that this is a sig me, his time, and that ok for Mr. Cliburn's rtistic totality remains romising.
Preceding the Brah
Leinsdorf chose "Also

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,483
JUL 27 1964

SYMPHONY

4 Stars Shine Brightly At Tanglewood Weekend

By McLAREN HARRIS

During the weekend just ended Tanglewood saw perhaps its largest audiences of the current season as three conductors—Eugene Ormandy, Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg—led the symphony in a fair though not unusualy variety of music from the classic to the post-romantic eras.

Probably the biggest drawing card was Van Cliburn on Saturday night. This pianist's popular appeal, which has held securely since his initial success in 1957, seems to stem from both his physical stature, striking yet retiring, and his forthright but soulful pianism. One is hard put to find a dissenter among the admirers of Mr. Cliburn's virtuosic technique, a situation which was no different following his delivery of the Brahms D minor Concerto.

Sometimes Obscure

Such moments of bravura and serious display as abound in the outer movements fell like so much dry timber before Mr. Cliburn's digital attack, leaving him with sufficient energy to build a powerful expression for the more poetic passages in exposition and development. His dealings here are marked by extra-sincere devotion; he seeks to heighten the purpose of every note, and sometimes the result is partial obscurity, confusing principal materials with subordinates as accompaniment rules the solo voice. The weakness lies with vertical, as well as horizontal, perspective. It may be said that this is a sign of the time, his time, and that the outlook for Mr. Cliburn's eventual artistic totality remains greatly promising.

Preceding the Brahms Mr. Leinsdorf chose "Also Sprach Zarathustra," kingfish among among Straussian tone poems. I have heard heroism and grandeur exploded into more gigantic dimensions than were apparent Saturday night, but by ascending such bombastic peaks as the sunrise and return to life with steady, less abandoned focus, Mr. Leinsdorf preserved the consistency of an immense, enigmatic musical creation and the credibility of its program.

Saturday's opening was Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286, a neat experiment in conducting by proxy. One orchestra held the stage, three other occupied corners of the Music Shed; two sub-conductors watched Mr. Leinsdorf and the third viewed a television monitor. The piece contains little artistic distinction, but the pleasantries of echo were enjoyed, time lags and all.

Yesterday afternoon was William Steinberg's turn, and traditionalism gained its best foothold here. Mr. Steinberg's handlings are a sort of renewal of faith in what we have set to be standards; that confident, unswerving inhis Beethoven No. 5 rang with dividualism of a progressive mind in a classic world; his "Italian" Symphony moved with buoyant energy and precision, and Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Funeral Music of Wagner unearthed a most noble substance. There were a few surprises, as when a slight accelerando pushed the last bars of the Mendelssohn first movement, and when a resolute tempo in the Rhine Journey left listeners somewhat behind until the horn dispelled the mood of haste.

Members of the Symphony held exceedingly true to their direction on all roads for each program and the audiences hearty congratulations were well earned.

The Program

The Boston Symphony presented the second and third programs of the 4th weekend at this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Saturday's conductor was Eric Leinsdorf; Sunday's conductor was Willem Steinberg. Piano soloist on Saturday night was Van Cliburn.

Saturday:
Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286 ..... Mozart
"Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem, Op. 30 ..... Strauss Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15 ..... Brahms

Sunday:
Symphony No. 4 in A major ("Italian"), Op. 90 ..... Mendelssohn
Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death, from "Gotterdammerung" ..... Wagner Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
WORCESTER, MASS.
Gazette
Eve. Circ. 92,729
JUL 27 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

Van Cliburn Is Heard By 14,592

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Attendance soared during the fourth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. With the 6,000 - seat music shed sold out for Saturda's concert weeks in advance, sunny skies brought more than 8,000 to the lawns, setting one of the Festival's memorably high records with a total of 14,592.

The occasion was the appearance of Van Cliburn in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The evening was also made outstanding by a Mozart Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K. 286, and the Richard Strauss philosophical tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Gazette Review

Audience Appeal

Leinsdorf has a canny sense of audience appeal, as in the mozart novelty, and creates programs with tremendous logic. The evening began with pure music, devoid of any story, then moved into the realm of spacious ideas regarding man's progress from the dim past toward the unfathomable future. The Brahms focussed the dreams and urges into a highly personal realm, and thus the audience felt that increasing sense of interest and tension which moves a program to a climax without loss of momentum.

For the delightful Mozart music, the strings and a few horns were divided into four groups, the largest on-stage, the others stationed at three corners of the shed. Perfect accord was secured by the use of closed-circuit television as well as visual communication. The three subordinate groups acted as echoes, the score requiring exact timing themes sometimes overlapping or following on split - beat sequences.

Tone Poem

The Strauss tone poem continued Leinsdorf's effort to bring this composer's music to the 100th anniversary year. The gorgeous colors and sweeping motifs were very much to the conductor's taste, and he transmitted to the audience the tremendous mixture of human striving and unearthly verities.

Cliburn's tone was superbly alive and intense, ranging from introspection to self-expression and dedication in the first movement, then a sublime statement of faith in the slow second section. The orchestration was typical Brahms, with a blending of mysticism and chromatic changes. The concluding Rondo was a brilliant performance, eliciting many recalls for Cliburn and Leinsdorf.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
WORCESTER, MASS.
Sunday Telegram
Sun. Circ. 102,435
JUL 26 1964

Music: Van Cliburn Plays At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Pianist Van Cliburn played for two enraptured, devout audiences yesterday at Tanglewood.

The first was at the open morning rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attended by 5,646. Last night there was an audience of 14,592 for the regular concert of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Balance of the program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf was Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Opus 15.

An unprecedented feature of the Mozart Nocturne was the placement of three orchestras at separated posts in the huge music shed. Each had twelve players, with the large ensemble of 25 performers on stage. Control from the podium was effected with the use of an intricate closed curcuit television and communications system.

Musicianship

Cliburn's incentives and goals in the Brahm's Concerto were clearly defined at rehearsal and confirmed at the sensational evening performance. First and foremost was musicianship Least of all, sensationalism. The young pianist's ideals were essentially the same that he manifested in last summer's performance here of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra got the First Piano Concerto off to a grand sweep. Cliburn followed with poise in the gentile, lyrical opening piano sequence. Melody was kept foremost, even when surrounded by intricate double trills and bravura statements.

This was the least "dramatized" effort that we have seen in a long time. Playing was finely-cut by soloist and closely allied by Leinsdorf to orchestral matter. A significant instance came during a horn solo when pianist kept his distance as nothing more than a contributing instrument to the ensemble.

In featured passages, Cliburn's technique was clean, incisive and purposeful. There was no keyboard hammering at points of crisis. Oratory, drama and brilliance were shared by soloist and ensemble.

Allowed Soloist Freedom

Leinsdorf allowed the soloist freedom to mold his phrases within limits of structure and established style. The first movement cadenza was a fine illustration of style conformity.

Orchestra set up a platform of rich chordal matter for the slow movements, a beautifully-hued choral. Cliburn confirmed the issue with dominating melody. Extensive keyboard interludes were flexible, unhurried and expressive. It was an emotional conversation, with tasteful restraint, between soloist and orchestra. The long keyboard monologue that closes the Adagio had rare expressiveness, serenely punctuated by orchestra. Herculean impressions emanated from the finale without keyboard pummelling or extravagant volume. In fact, the dynamic range was effected with clear boundaries and comparisons. The movement followed avenues of rich material to the Fugue that leads to a gallant close.

Cliburn's technique was not without flaws, but these were defects in a performance of true interpretive values without machination.

Many a young pianist of such glamorous image as Cliburn's would have used the Brahms First as a vehicle for "hoop la" and dramatic strategy. Instead he placed his trust in the music and truth. His great success yesterday can be attributed to this, and the marvelous support he received from the Boston Symphony and Leinsdorf.

Music of Charm

Rarely has music of such charm been heard at Tanglewood as the Mozart Nocturne (or Serenade) for Four Orchestras. This was written by Mozart at 20, probably as a novelty with the orchestras in adjoining rooms. Last night the off-stage orchestras were conducted by Louis Speyer, English hornist with the Boston Symphony, Rosario Mazzeo, bass clarinet, and Harry Dickson, violinist. The orchestras were stationed in alcoves on both sides of the stage, and to the right rear of the music shed.

True echo effects were given both in timing and volume. Phrases were instituted by the stage orchestra, then echoed in rotary manner by the others, with the final phrases taken by the fourth orchestra. The audience was delighted with this odd experience (despite an abundance of repetition and reiteration) of being literally surrounded by sound. Certainly there's never so much head moving and craning at Tanglewood.

The program's big orchestral work was, of course, Strauss' "Zarathustra," played as part of the composer's birth centenary.

This is the story of the human race, as depicted by Friederich Neitzche in a philosophical prose poem. Strauss denied that he had written philosophical music but merely followed the poet's theme up to the idea of the superman. There was nothing to be gained by trying to associate the music with any philosophy. The playing in itself was too magnificent to bother. Sounds were what counted. Leinsdorf's iron grip over fast-moving changes of style, tonal coloration, and theatrical contrasts was a wonder to watch.

Tonal Power

The performance impressed with enormity of concept and tonal power. The latter was increased by organ, played by Beri Zamgochian.

Start was in subterranean range by basses and timpani, indicating a state of foreboding-splashing chords, pierced by trumpets. Samuel Mayes' cello string broke away from the peg which he adjusted and tuned in a hurry — not an easy matter with the huge tonal melange.

The section, "of the great yearnings" was powerfully strengthened with a grand "magnificat" in organ. A thrilling passage was the Fugue that gets started in part of the cello section and runs like wildfire through the orchestra.

Another highlight was the gay fanciful Waltz that carries on an intrigue between solo violin and trumpet, played respectively by Joseph Silverstain and Roger Voisin. And finally, the marvelous work of Everett Firth with the timpani score, and twelve bell strokes after which the work ebbs away.

William Steinberg will guest conduct the Boston Symphony this afternoon. The program is Mendelssohn's Fourth, "Italian Symphony," Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,904,639

MUSIC

CONDUCTORS

A Choice & an Echo

The great outdoors does things to people. Stuffy board chairmen, foggy professors, bleary barflies are all likely to step out of character under a wide and starry sky. Musicians, too. On the podium of Boston's austere Symphony Hall, Conductor Erich Leinsdorf, for instance, is as musically adventurous as a metronome. But amid the shadowed lawns and towering pinewoods of Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass., where the Berkshire Music Festival has been held for 27 summers, Leinsdorf the precisionist gives way to a gay experimenter.

His latest experiment is a seldom-heard piece by Mozart—who in composing it might have been affected by the breezes of Salzburg's Mirabell Palace gardens. Serenade ("Notturno") for Four Orchestras consists of make-believe echoes, in which a short statement by the first orchestra is repeated in turn by the other three, each abbreviating the phrase until the fourth sounds only a faint fragment of it—just as an echoed shout fades out in the distance.

Timing & Fading. Orchestra Number One was on the stage in the Tanglewood shed under the maestro's baton; Two and Three were on the shed floor at either side of the stage; Four ended up nearly out of sight under a canopy normally used by the audience to walk from the parking lot to the shed. Four's conductor, English Horn Player Louis Speyer, had a closed-circuit TV screen in front of him to show him Conductor Leinsdorf, and earphones, which gave him the beat of the other orchestras.

The first problem was getting the "echoes" to come in on time. If each conductor waited to hear his cue, there would be too much of a time lag and resulting chaos. To make it come out right, the conductors had to learn to get their orchestras going just the right number of beats before they heard their cue. And when that was perfected, there came the problem of achieving the fading effect. Mozart, with probably a small garden in mind, had scored each "orchestra" as a string quartet with two horns. This did not work in Tanglewood's 6,000-seat arena. The problem was finally solved by beefing up Orchestra One to 26 pieces, giving Two 19, Three 9, and Four 13. All strings were muted in Four, three-quarters of them in Three, half in Two. Leinsdorf's orchestra played full strength.

Mapping the Campaign. The Serenade for Four Orchestras played before the biggest crowd of the season—14,592—but the drawing card was Van Cliburn as soloist in the main body of the program. When Serenade's opening statement in the Number One orchestra ended and the echoes began, everybody looked surprised, and there was much craning of necks to locate the elusive Four. In 18 minutes it was over, and the audience gave it a warm round of applause, but no accolade. Said one female Cliburnite to a colleague: "What the hell was that?"

But the orchestra loved it, and so did Leinsdorf. "I was very anxious about the whole thing, really, but it turned out delightfully," he said later in his dressing room. "It was more like mapping out a campaign than conducting an orchestra."

ORCHESTRAS ONE, TWO, THREE . . .

WHITESTONE

. . . AND FOUR

Where was that faint sound coming from?

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200
JUL 27

Van Cliburn In Brilliant Performance

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — Van Cliburn who made his first appearance at Tanglewood last season, returned Saturday night to play the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor" and attracted the largest Festival audience to date. There were 14,592 in the audience for what was a brilliant concert performance by the young artist. The audience was warm in its response and called the soloist back to the platform many times. His performance seemed a better one than that of last season when he performed another Brahms concerto.

Audiences during the coming week will have opportunity to hear three conductors. Friday night it will be William Steinberg conducting music of Piston, Strauss. and Brahms. Eugene Ormandy will conduct Saturday night with music by Beethoven and Mahler. Sunday afternoon Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be back on the podium to conduct music of Bartok, Dvorak, and Strauss. That concert will present Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, in the Bartok "Violin Concerto. No.2."

The open rehearsal Saturday morning drew an audience of 5,646 while the Friday night program with music of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy, and Ravel brought 5,094. During the week the Boston Pops concert with Fiedler conducting drew 13,327.

Saturday night's concert brought a bit of novelty in the performance of Mozart's "Nocturne for Four Orchestras." Mr. Leinsdorf had arranged his musicians in small orchestras at different parts of the Shed and it proved an interesting experiment. Performance of Strauss' tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was a spine-tingling, colorful performance that was brilliant. The orchestra was in fine form and performed with opulence. It was in truth a colorful display of music.

The concert Sunday afternoon presented Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's Rhine Journey of Siegfried and his death from "Gotterdammerung.' Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" completed the weekend program.

Large groups were spread on blankets about the lawns under the full moon on Saturday night and about the grounds Sunday afternoon.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 30 1964

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

REVIEWED

Tanglewood was sold out Saturday evening, but not all the seats were filled until after the intermission. Van Cliburn was the drawing card. He was on hand to play the Brahms Piano Concerto in D Minor and many people decided it was all they wanted to hear.

The work makes great demands on the performer, but so thoroughly integrates the piano and orchestra that the soloist rarely has an opportunity to shine independently. Mr. Cliburn met most of the demands and was particularly effective in the more poetic slow movement.

The program began with a Notturno in D for Four Orchestras by Mozart. Erich Leinsdorf led one group on stage, while three other conductors kept their respective groups going in various areas around the shed via closed-circuit television. Although it was an interesting stereophonic experiment, distances occasioned some ragged responses, and the fourth orchestra (which was near this listener) was nearly inaudible.

It is probably necessary to include the tone poem, Also sprach Zarathustra, in a series celebrating the centennial of the birth of Richard Strauss. Even though it affords a fascinating study in orchestral textures, it is overly long and somber-hued with great expanses of harmonic noodling.

Mr. Leinsdorf kept everything clear and clean, but muted the great crescendos, robbing the work of its greatest asset for the layman: theatricality.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,904,639

AUG 7 1964

MUSIC

ORCHESTRAS ONE, TWO, THREE . . . AND FOUR

Where was that faint sound coming from?

for 37 summers, Leinsdorf the precisionist gives way to a gay experimenter

His latest experiment is a seldom-heard piece by Mozart—who in composing it might have been affected by the breezes of Salzburg's Mirabell Palace gardens. Serenade ("Notturno") for Four Orchestras consists of make-believe echoes, in which a short statement by the first orchestra is repeated in turn by the other three, each abbreviating the phrase until the fourth sounds only a faint fragment of it—just as an echoed shout fades out in the distance.

Timing & Fading. Orchestra Number One was on the stage in the Tanglewood shed under the maestro's baton; Two and Three were on the shed floor at either side of the stage, and Four nearly out of sight under a canopy normally used by the audience to walk from the parking lot to the shed. Four's conductor, English Horn Player Louis Speyer, had a closed-circuit TV screen in front of him to show him Conductor Leinsdorf's cues. Wild earphones, which gave him the sound of the other orchestras, was finally solved by beefing up Orchestra One to 26 pieces, giving Two 19, Three 9, and Four 13. All strings were muted in Four, three-quarters of them in Three, half in Two. Leinsdorf's orchestra played full strength.

Mapping the Campaign. The Serenade for Four Orchestras played before the biggest crowd of the season—592—but the drawing card was Van Cliburn as soloist in the main body of the program. When Serenade's opening statement in the Number One orchestra ended and the echoes began, everybody looked surprised, and there was much craning of necks to locate the elusive Four. In 18 minutes it was over, and the audience gave it a warm round of applause, but no accolade. Said one female Cliburnite to a colleague: "What the hell was that?"

But the orchestra loved it. Leinsdorf: "I was very anxious about the whole thing, really, but it turned out delightfully." He said later in his dressing room: "It was more like mapping out a campaign than conducting an orchestra."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200

JUL 27 1964

Van Cliburn In Brilliant Performance

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — Van Cliburn who made his first appearance at Tanglewood last season, returned Saturday night to play the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor" and attracted the largest Festival audience to date. There were 14,592 in the audience for what was a brilliant concert performance by the young artist. The audience was warm in its response and called the soloist back to the platform many times. His performance seemed a better one than that of last season when he performed another Brahms concerto.

Audiences during the coming week will have opportunity to hear three conductors. Friday night it will be William Steinberg conducting music of Piston, Strauss, and Brahms. Eugene Ormandy will conduct Saturday night with music by Beethoven and Mahler. Sunday afternoon Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be back on the podium to conduct music of Bartok, Dvorak, and Strauss. That concert will present Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, in the Bartok "Violin Concerto No.2."

The open rehearsal Saturday morning drew an audience of 5,646 while the Friday night program with music of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy, and Ravel brought 5,094. During the week the Boston Pops concert with Fiedler conducting drew 13,327.

Saturday night's concert brought a bit of novelty in the performance of Mozart's "Nocturne for Four Orchestras." Mr. Leinsdorf had arranged his musicians in small orchestras at different parts of the Shed and it proved an interesting experiment. Performance of Strauss' tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was a spine-tingling, colorful performance that was brilliant. The orchestra was in fine form and performed with opulence. It was in truth a colorful display of music.

The concert Sunday afternoon presented Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's Rhine Journey of Siegfried and his death from "Gotterdammerung." Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" completed the weekend program.

Large groups were spread on blankets about the lawns under the full moon on Saturday night and about the grounds Sunday afternoon.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 30 1964

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

Tanglewood was sold out Saturday evening, but not all the seats were filled until after the intermission. Van Cliburn was the drawing card. He was on hand to play the Brahms Piano Concerto in D Minor and many people decided it was all they wanted to hear.

The work makes great demands on the performer, but so thoroughly integrates the piano and orchestra that the soloist rarely has an opportunity to shine independently. Mr. Cliburn met most of the demands and was particularly effective in the more poetic slow movement.

The program began with a Notturno in D for Four Orchestras by Mozart. Erich Leinsdorf led one group on stage, while three other conductors kept their respective groups going in various areas around the shed via closed-circuit television. Although it was an interesting stereophonic experiment, distances occasioned some ragged responses, and the fourth orchestra (which was near this listener) was nearly inaudible.

REVIEWED

It is probably necessary to include the tone poem, Also sprach Zarathustra, in a series celebrating the centennial of the birth of Richard Strauss. Even though it affords a fascinating study in orchestral textures, it is overly long and somber-hued with great expanses of harmonic noodling.

Mr. Leinsdorf kept everything clear and clean, but muted the great crescendos, robbing the work of its greatest asset for the layman: theatricality.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2574, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397
JUL 26 1964

14,592 Hear Van Cliburn Perform at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Van Cliburn at the piano is a young man with a very expansive manner. He plays a kind of warm abundance that seems to try to enfold audience, orchestra and music in a vast amiability.

With Great Effect

Saturday night he used this manner to great effect. He played the Brahms First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf in the Great Shed at Tanglewood.

This work does not offer much opportunity for the colorful and muscular bravura fireworks most listeners have to come to expect from Cliburn because of his identification with the music of Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninoff.

But its first and third movements have the open spaciousness of Texas, and he spread the music far across the prairie-like plateau of 14,592 listeners — the largest audience at Tanglewood this year and last.

Cliburn's celebrated technical facility let his large hands leap up and down the keyboard with ease. Whether the score asked for massive chords or rapid runs, he didn't give a hint of straining. His mechanical security was as inalliable.

(Well, maybe there was just one tiny clinker).

His emotional involvement, however, didn't sound as profound as it looked in the second movement when he played slow passages dreamily with his eyes closed and head swaying.

It was an introspective movement, though, and comfortably thoughtful.

Most satisfying, perhaps, was the frisky, lively third movement, or, depending upon the point of view, the strong first, which was full of sinew and bone.

It was the third public collaboration by Cliburn and Leinsdorf with this concerto. They played it in Boston and New York last spring.

Cliburn, however, was not the whole program by a long shot.

There were two works of unusual merit before intermission; one because of its novelty and the other because of its substance and sonic splendor.

The novelty was Mozart's Nocturne for Four Orchestras, K286, which opened the program. Each of the four orchestras had two French horn players and up to 23 string players in four parts.

The largest orchestra was on stage directed by Leinsdorf. The second orchestra was off stage to the listeners' right about 75 feet from the podium; the third was to the left about 100 feet; the fourth was at the far right rear outside the side and back of the Shed about 250 feet from the podium.

The music consisted essentially of simple, garden party tunes played in overlapping echoing sequence by each orchestra in turn.

Their far-flung efforts were coordinated neatly by three nonplaying orchestra members serving as conductors and following Leinsdorf's signals.

The results were fascinating, repetitious and delightful.

This concert opener was followed by Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—a lavish sound spectacular modeled on the impenetrable ideas of Nietzsche.

Follow Leinsdorf's Signals

Space and time force us to deal quickly with this complex piece of music, but we must say that it was given a great performance, more impressive than the concerto to many ears because of its lushness.

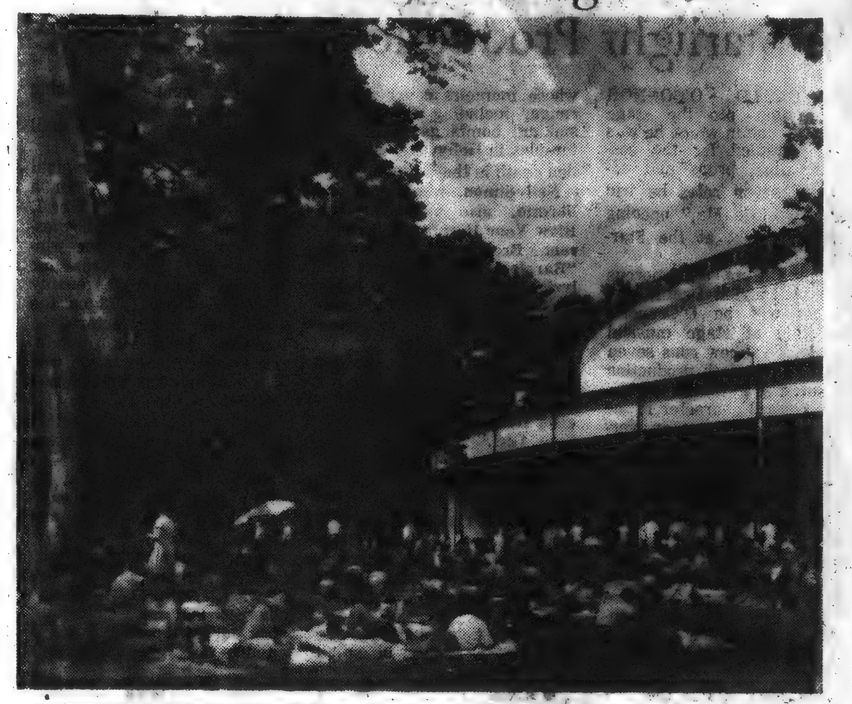
It is a difficult piece requiring a virtuoso orchestra. Leinsdorf conducted it from memory (a virtuosic feat in itself) and paid close attention to shape and continuity.

If the tricky little Mozart nocturne provided the ultimate in stereophonic sound, the luxurious Strauss tone poem about abstruse philosophy provided the ultimate in hi-fi.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
S. 51,673
JUL 27 1964

THE KANSAS CITY STAR, SUNDAY, AUGUST 9, 1964

Cliburn a Hit at Tanglewood



THE MAMMOTH MUSIC SHED at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., is the site of the main concerts at the Berkshire Music festival. Good acoustics permit the concerts to be heard by large crowds on the lawn outside.

By Joseph Kaye.
(The Star's New York Correspondent.)

LENOX, MASS. — In one week of the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood, two concerts, as different from each other as the poles, brought the largest audiences. One, with pianist Van Cliburn, drew 14,592 listeners, and the other by the Boston Pops orchestra, with comedian Allan Sherman in a musical parody as the main attraction, drew 13,327 to the box office.

By contrast, the opening of the Boston Symphony orchestra series had an audience of only 5,000, and the weather was perfect. No one at Tanglewood tries to account for these facts, but there is no evading the basic principle that stars and novelties are audience magnets.

Van Cliburn has not changed much in appearance — except that his hair is shorter — since he returned from the 1958 Russian Tchaikovsky competition as the pianistic hero of his generation.

BUT HE HAS changed artistically. As a pianist he has matured into a sensitive and thoughtful performer, and he is advancing into related fields of music.

Before his concert he chatted with this correspondent.

"I have done some composing," he said. "Long ago I set the 123rd Psalm, and it has been performed at the Riverside church in New York. I do want to continue composing. How I would like to write a piano quartet! It would be wonderful!"

As he said this his eyes looked upward in that entranced expression that sometimes overcomes him at the piano.

Asked about his recent interest in conducting, he said, surprisingly enough, that he wants to conduct principally to better himself as a pianist.

"I conduct now only to educate myself," he said. "It's fantastic how much conducting is related to the piano. The more I learn about conducting the more I become educated as a pianist."

HOWEVER, when he tours the Soviet Union next year he will [illegible] formidable conducting — seemingly far beyond a self-educating project. He says he will conduct Rachmaninov's "The Bells," a choral symphony, and the Prokofiev cantata, "Alexander Nevsky."

Cliburn said that he also anticipates opera conducting:

"When I'm old — say about 25 years from now — and I've gained the knowledge," he said, "I want to conduct Wagner and Strauss; perhaps also Verdi. I would like to conduct 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger,' and 'Elektra' — especially Strauss's 'Elektra.'"

Having said this, Cliburn went backstage to practice some scales and then proceeded to the huge stage of the great Tanglewood music shed, where the main concerts are given, to play the Brahms Concerto No. 1 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

At the Concert

The Special Touch of Ormandy and Steinberg

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

Eugene Ormandy's guest stint with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, over the weekend, was in direct contrast to that offered by William Steinberg. As conductors of the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Symphonies, respectively, the men are a state apart in location and a world apart in programming and approach to orchestral literature.

Ormandy's program was one of lush sounds and sensational orchestration. Beginning with the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," Ormandy illustrated that he had done no more than transfer his concept of orchestral playing from the "City of Brotherly Love," to the Berkshires. The Boston Strings were made to sing in a more warm and lyrical manner than is their custom, and the winds and brass were put through their paces with a determined lack of pity.

"Don Juan" roared from the orchestra with new vigor and roguishness. The Sibelius Symphony No. 2," was given the same [illegible] though it can be said that [illegible] work and the Debussy "Iberia" and Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2" which completed the program, the Sibelius begs for such a tonally brilliant rendering.

★ ★ ★

THE FULL forces of the orchestra were employed for each work and the hall reverberated with the exotic sounds coming from the ensemble.

This was a concert played to large orchestral sounds. Ormandy is a recognized interpreter of the composers chosen for show, which served to reaffirm his command over the material. After the program, Ormandy got a surprise when William Steinberg, an old friend, showed up back stage to compliment him on his performance.

Yesterday was Steinberg's turn before the Boston Symphony and a complete change of ideas was the order of the day. An all-German program had the Boston symphony musicians turning their backs face, as compared to the night with Ormandy.

The Mendelssohn "Italian Symphony" received a finely wrought and tightly controlled [illegible] at the hands of Steinberg. His tiny, almost imperceptible beat, was enough to call forceful passages from the group at a second's notice.

★ ★ ★

IN MANY WAYS, the orchestra had been prepared for the Steinberg touch by its permanent conductor, Erich Leinsdorf. The two conductors have many of the same concepts.

It is not the beat that is [illegible] so much from either of these men, for they have rehearsed the orchestra well. Rather the left hand, which gives the interpretative and dynamic levels was made more prominent, giving a unique and rare treat to the audience of 13,000 people, because of the shadings obtained.

Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Siegfried's Death from Gotterdammerung" are usually played uninterrupted. The crowd demanded a tempo[illegible] halt at the midpoint to show its appreciation for the splendid readings being given by Steinberg and the Boston Symphony. Tempos were altered to bring a more dramatic impact to the work. New insights were gained in the process.

THE CONCLUSION of the show was Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," probably the best known work in the entire symphonic repertoire, and one with which it is almost impossible to become bored, though repeated playings would nearly promise to accomplish that very thing. It is a classic of construction and melody. The sparse lines allow the listener to create within the framework of the piece.

Steinberg has his task cut out for him in trying to say anything new while conducting the work. But the seven curtain calls after the conclusion showed that he had succeeded in adding to the understanding of the work.

A cleanliness of attack and the making prominent of certain voices which are normally buried in the body of the composition, were part of the reason for the immense success of the playing. German music, and particularly Beethoven, are Steinberg's daily bread. There are few conductors who can handle them better. Yesterday's concert was ample evidence of that.

ON THE BEAT—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, led the Boston Orchestra in a highly [illegible] concert at the Tanglewood music shed yesterday.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BRISTOL, CONN.
Press
Eve. Circ. 14,611

JUL 28 1964

Changes Noted

Large Informal Crowds Gather At Tanglewood

By ESTHER WATSTEIN

The willow tree to the left of the shed at Tanglewood is bigger and the crowds are simply huge. In fact, so much has been written about the size of the crowds picnicking and relaxing on the lawns, that one forgets that serious music is still being played at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox.

Much has changed since the days of Koussevitzky and the first concerts in the shed. The crowds are bigger and more informal; it takes about one hour longer to get out of the parking lot, and the Boston Symphony, now under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, has lost some of its brillfiance and verve. But there is still a kind of magic to the music in the Berkshire Hills and Saturday night was most indicative of what has happened to the concerts at Tanglewood through all these years.

"Exercise In Hi-Fi"

The opening effort was a Mozart Nocturne for Four Orchestras K 286. This was a first performance at the Festival concerts and was reminiscent of the excitement in the days of Koussevitzky when each concert seemed to include a first composition by a new composition by a new composer, or a first performance.

This Mozart Nocturne consists literally of four identical orchestras each having a string quartet and two horns, placed in a different part of the shed, and each with its own conductor. The result is instant Hi-Fi! This is really a technical exercise for the ear of the listener as well as for the orchestras.

The piece itself is nothing more than a series of strains each repeated successively three times like an echo by the other three orchestras. With the orchestras surrounding the audience, the sounds as they reached the ear were most interesting. This was obviously great fun for Maestro Leinsdorf and the other three conductors, and was a real feat in proper timing.

One's imagination ran rampant thinking about the reproduction of this Nocturne on Hi-Fi with four different orchestras, four different sounds, four different speakers in different parts of a room, etc., etc., etc. At this point, the piece concluded and the most fun of all was the four conductors racing to the stage from different parts of the shed and heartily congratulating each other.

"Also Sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss followed. This tone poem is based on the epic of Friedrich Nietzsche and as such is duly dramatic. The orchestra now included everything from gongs, harps, chimes, bells, organs, to something that sounded suspiciously like a stove pipe.

Parts of this poem are hauntingly lovely, but the orchestra missed in the dramatics of tonal contrasts. This is an exciting piece but somehow failed to be excitingly performed. The performance seemed indicative of what has happened to the Boston Symphony. It lacks sharpness and understanding of the romantic element behind much of the music performed.

Van Cliburn Soloist

The highlight of the evening was the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor with Van Cliburn as soloist. Mr. Cliburn failed to produce on the level one would expect. His playing was singularly undistinguished and dull; at times downright sloppy. However, it could have been simply a bad night and it is unfair to judge Mr. Cliburn from only one hearing. Disappointment seemed general and the applause, for a Tanglewood soloist, was only a shade more than cordial.

Tanglewood is still one of the most delightful places around to listen to good music seriously and sincerely performed. If you can beat the system in exiting from the parking lot, or at least arrange yourself mentally and emotionally to stand it, you're all set. And then, there is the little display room at the main gate where some of the most interesting and lovely art is on a changing exhibit . . . it makes it all worth while.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744

JUL 27 1964

Music: Steinberg Conducts At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — At least two things were done to prevent yesterday afternoon's Tanglewood concert from becoming an anticlimax to pianist Van Cliburn's highly successful appearance here on Saturday night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was guest-conducted by William Steinberg, regular conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. The program was as "sure fire" as they come: Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A major, Opus 90, "Italian," Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death, Wagner's opera, "Gotterdammerung," Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Opus 67.

Different Type

Yesterday's attendance was 10,742, bringing the week's total to 50,612. This includes 13,327 persons who attended the Boston Pops Concert on Wednesday night.

Steinberg conducted at Tanglewood once before, in August, 1962. So far as this festival is concerned, he was a different type of podium personality, compared to Erich Leinsdorf and Eugene Ormandy.

Here was a completely methodical, systematic, completely practical, emotionally restrained conductor. Any form of flamboyance has no place in Steinberg's style. Excepting for a a bad start of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Steinberg's command over the orchestra was complete and conclusive in matters of instruction.

No Waste of Energy

He is short, muscular, shrewd-eyed, lucid. Yesterday, there was no waste of energy on superfluities, even in the rapid dance movement that ends the Mendelssohn symphony and the epic stretches of Beethoven's Fifth.

In many repeated fragments, Steinberg set style and pace but once no unnecessary exploitation. One cue frequently sufficed in similarly repeated phrases. Nor did Steinberg put on a show with facial expressions, prancing, dancing, crouching, or weaving picturesque patterns in the air.

In short, Steinberg dispensed his effort and energy purely in pursuit of his scores. The meticulous attention he received from the orchestra was the epitome of swelling collaboration.

Paean of Triumph

This does not mean that yesterday's audience heard the "ne plus ultra" of symphony concerts. Disgressions from the norm were matters of personal opinion or the results of human limitation.

All things considered, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was least subject to dispute. It was great performance, conducted in the best sense of "grand manner." For one thing, Steinberg connected the four-note figures of the first movement, instead of severing them. In other words, there were commas instead of periods. Even the slow, short and isolated oboe solo was made to fit the movement's structure and not made to sound like "time out for rest."

The second movement, with its three variations, had true eloquence, achieved without an emotional spree. In fact, Steinberg kept it steadfast with almost metronomic precision. The difficult interlude in cellos and basses (third movement) was dashingly played. It would have been even more effective with less volume from higher strings. The finale was a magnificent paean of triumph.

Neat, But Stilted

Something less concordan must be said of the "Italian" Symphony's first three movements. After the poor start we mentioned, the first movemen did have consistent drive. Dynamic changes and solo fragments were fitted neatly with out break in locomotion. But the effect was somewhat cold — everything so contrived. The slow movement was equally neat in sound, but stilted. Horns were euphonious and on pitch for the tricky trio of the minuet.

The concluding saltarello was spirited without sounding precipitous. Rhythm was welded to the conductor's baton. Steinberg brought all manner of details to the surface. Trumpets sounded out bright and clear. Innerplay was sparkling and precise in woodwinds.

The Wagnerian excerpts are graphic actions from "Gotterdammerung." the Rhine Journey follows Siegried's separation from Brunnhilde. The famous "horn call" leads to sections of the "fire music" and renunciation of love. The "death music" is not lugubrious dirge but a dramatic re-enactment of Siegfried's life and a might orchestral lament over his assassination.

Brilliant Work

"Rhine Journey" opened with quiet, governed tone in cellos. Horn tone was untarnished and warm. The offstage horn calls were meticulously played by Charles Yancich.

Brilliant work was done by cellos and basses in the "death music". Roger Voisin's trumpet cut through the rich orchestral mixture like a lance.

Steinberg and the Boston Symphony resume the festival Friday night. The program: first Tanglewood performance of Walter Piston's Toccata, Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," Opus 35, and Brahms' First Symphony.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

JUL 27 1964

Steinberg Caps Record Week At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The program William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, chose for his guest appearance Sunday afternoon as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood certainly was not adventurous.

Largest Week

Even so, he made it exciting for the 10,742 listeners who helped bring the week's attendance to 50,612 which, in the face of indefinite record-keeping before 1957, is believed by the orchestra's press office to be the largest week in the history of the festival.

There were 1211 for Arrau's recital Tuesday, 13,327 for Fiedler's Pops Wednesday, 5094 for Ormandy's guest appearance Friday, 5595 for the open rehearsal Saturday morning and 14,592 for Van Cliburn's performance Saturday night.

The explanation lies in the popularity of the Pops and Van Cliburn and the tendency of listeners from afar to arrive early for the Saturday morning rehearsal and stay over for the Sunday concert.

Safe, Well-Proven

Those who stayed were not disappointed even though the program admittedly was made up of safe, well-proven elderly music. Steinberg played it as if it were new.

The program was, in order of appearance, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 ("Italian"), Siefried's Rhine Journey and Sieg- "Gotterdammerung" and everyone's favorite symphony — Beethoven's Fifth.

Like Leinsdorf, Steinberg cares deeply about the syntax and structure of music. Sunday he moulded the phrases very carefully, kept them definitely separated and applied musical punctuation with the precision of a pedant.

Wealth of Expression

And he filled the musical phrases with inflection, with continuously changing volumes and speeds, crescendos, and diminuendoes. There was a wealth of expression as well as accuracy.

The Mendelssohn symphony was feathery and light. There were times when it was flying freely—not soaring like an eagle, but dancing and darting like a butterfly and swooping like a swallow.

The Wagner could hardly have been bigger and fuller. It is music that seems laden to overflowing with portentious significance—

And the musicians in the back rows had just better not miss the cues for cymbals, big drums, blaring trumpets and sheer size. They didn't.

Jaunty Fifth

Everyone's favorite symphony was taken with a jaunty briskness that was refreshing. Cool breezes and a jaunty air were breathed into it, and the dust was blown away.

It's not easy to say exactly what makes Steinberg such a satisfying conductor. There is something more than his insistence on ensemble precision and his feeling for subtleties of expression.

Part of the answer may be in his spare, no-nonsense manner on the podium. Part of it may be in his sense of anticipation—the gentle way he has of building to internal climaxes.

Whatever it is, the special impression he made when he brought his own orchestra to Northampton last winter was repeated at Tanglewood Sunday.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

QUINCY, MASS.
Patriot-Ledger
Eve. Circ. 41,032

JUL 28 1964

The Sound of Music

Steinberg, Cliburn Tanglewood Guests

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — After initial weekends of experiment and novelty, the Berkshire Music Festival returned to staple works this weekend.

Nothing could be more staple than Sunday's program by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood — Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A, the "Italian"; excerpts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung;" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Orchestra, took a turn on the Tanglewood podium, and the 10,742 who attended gave him a welcome to match the warm, slightly humid weather.

Steinberg is a large, bulky, bald gentleman with the brisk, cutting gestures of a drill master. His approach to the music was no-nonsense, and the orchestra dug in and played with vigor for him—particularly in the closing movements of the Beethoven in which the zealous bowing of the celli and basses produced a twanging of strings more suited to Sherwood Forest than the dales of the Berkshires.

The melodic Mendelssohn symphony, whose title comes from the inspiration of a journey by the 21-year-old composer to Italy in 1831 rather than from any programmatic content, under Mr. Steinberg's flicking baton, came through as gay and light as a sunbeam. The strings sparkled, and played with a lot of "bite." The sound, perhaps, was more "open" than the Boston Symphony generally produces.

Mr. Steinberg's reading was graceful and precise overall. There were a few dismaying moments — the rushing of the first movement's coda and some carelessness with the time values of melodic notes toward the end of the second movement—but they were minor blemishes in the general excellence of the performance.

The Wagner, however, seemed more frenetic than controlled. The excerpts were Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Siegfried's Death, from the close of the prologue and Act III, respectively, of "Goetterdaemmerung."

Mr. Steinberg seemed to dwell on the neuroses of the music—its overlay of bombast and megalomania, its restless shifting of textures and rhythms, the parade of musical foot-notes known as "leitmotifs" filtering through the instrumental sub-conscious.

The music proceeded from trauma to trauma, each with its shed-rattling climax, a blare of brass and a cataclysm of percussion. Concentrated decibels, however, don't always produce excitement; the string of noisy climaxes interspersed with passages of intense gloom left much unsaid.

Beethoven's familiar Symphony No. 5 in C minor, though, found the conductor with much to say. Mr. Steinberg took the first movement at a good clip, which left the orchestra a bit unprepared at times for vigorous attacks. The brisk tempo gave the movement a good sense of flow and continuity.

The inner movements were the best. The second had a great sense of form and balance, and the orchestral sound was full and rich. The third was properly majestic, and the coarse humor of the trio with its busy work in the lower strings came off well. The final movement, that heroic paean of "victory over fate," had its grandeur, but was also gruff and loud. The audience loved it, but a steady diet would be too much.

An enormous crowd of 14,592, the season's largest so far, packed the lawns (the reserved shed seats were sold out long ago) and bundled themselves against a chilly but clear evening for Saturday night's concert. The attraction was pianist Van Cliburn, who joined Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony for Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Opus 15.

Long after the final decisive chord, the throng applauded the soloist, but the performance was not that successful. There were long stretches in which nothing in particular was happening, and the general effect was tentative and spotty.

The Brahms concerto requires a close interplay between orchestra and soloist, more than in most concerti. Indeed, the work was first conceived as a symphony when the composer began to sketch out the movements in 1853 or 1854. Later, Brahms reworked it into a sonata for two pianos. Not until 1858 did the concerto take on its final form: a kind of symphony in which the piano functions more as participating instrumentalist than as dominating soloist.

There were times when Mr. Cliburn and Mr. Leinsdorf achieved this vital rapport; at others, the element was lacking. The opening maestoso movement which contains the most interesting music of the three, seemed to plod along under the conductor's deliberate tempo. Its declamatory sections and rhapsodic flow were held too much in check.

Although the second movement was also deliberately paced, it was rescued from dullness by the soloist's lyrical playing and clear-toned touch. In the faster closing rondo, the concerto came more to life. There were more interesting variations in tempo and in color, even though the orchestra had some ragged moments.

Mr. Cliburn is noted for his bravura style, power and speed and the ability to project the big melodic line. But Saturday night he was at his best in the quieter moments, in lovely cantabile passages rather than in clangorous octaves and sledge-hammer chords. In the first movement, he dropped more than a few notes, but by the last he was in control of his considerable technique. The basic problem of the tall, slim Texan with the bushy blond hair seemed to be one of overall concept, instead of execution.

The finest item on Saturday night's program was Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra"), another of Mr. Leinsdorf's musical tributes this summer to mark the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

It was a splendid reading, one which came as close as anyone can to hitch the individual portions of this sprawling work together into a unified whole. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's incisive direction, the Straussian attempt to portray in sound the odyssey of a noble soul through the pitfalls of earthly life became almost plausible, and the moments of padding and bombast were barely noticed.

Whether erupting in mighty torrents of sound, or throbbing with rapturous melodies, the orchestra was superb. The strings, in particular, played like furies, but the trumpets deserve special praise, too, for their brilliance. A sidelight was the cool professionalism of principal cellist Samuel Mayes, who deftly restrung a string that snapped out during a quiet passage, retuned and returned to action in less than three minutes.

The program opened with a charming novelty, Mozart's Notturno in D for Four Orchestras, K. 286. This little serenade, composed by Mozart at 21, was as much a technical feat as a musical achievement. Mr. Leinsdorf actually used four separate orchestras — one on stage with the string parts tripled, and three off-stage ensembles widely scattered throughout the shed, each string quartets with two horns.

Since the three off-stage orchestras could not see the conductor on stage, closed-circuit television was employed, and each group had its own conductor picking up the cues on TV. With its echoing of phrases bouncing around the shed, the notturno was amusing and delightful, and the audience stretched and craned to follow this musical game of ping-pong. Mr. Leinsdorf's conducting colleagues for the off-stage orchestras were Hary Ellis Dickson, a violinist; Louis Speyer, English hornist, and Rosario Mazzeo, the orchestra's personnel manager and bass clarinetist.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

JUL 27 1964

Tanglewood II

Steinberg Conducts Boston Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

LENOX—William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday at Tanglewood. His program was as popularly conceived—Symphonies No. 4 ("Italian") by Mendelssohn and No. 5 by Beethoven with Wagner excerpts in between—as it was enthusiastically received.

The orchestra's guest set most of his tempos at a smart clip. While Steinberg doesn't exactly hurry the music neither does he let the motion falter. There have been and will be more relaxed readings of the Mendelssohn Symphony. Steinberg cued the fiddles from time to time with a smile or snapped a finger to them. Nobody needed more urging.

On the other hand, Siegfried's Rhine journey, from "Gotterdammerung," shot the rapids, eliciting applause from the audience. But Steinberg salvaged Siegfried's Death, making through the glorious orchestral sonorities something quite as thrilling as the old funeral rite for heroes.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony received an energetic performance. Again, one might have wished gentler tempos within the movements. One example would be a somewhat slower start to the andante, from which to launch that particularly supple theme which is emotionally such a release.

Saturday evening, Erich Leinsdorf conducted. He had as piano soloist Van Cliburn in the Brahms Concerto No. 1. Quite the nicest part, in a splendid performance, was the latter part of the rondo. Leinsdorf had put a jolly touch to the last recurrence but one of the rondo subject; Cliburn mimicked it perfectly and kept the mood in his cadenza. This close working of soloist and conductor had been true for the whole concerto. The two were recalled so many times that an enterprising camera bug was able to present them with an instant snapshot developed between their stage bows.

The Tanglewood premiere Saturday was Mozart's Nocturn for Four Orchestras, K. 286. This was written in 1776 for some Salzburg function. The Music Shed absorbed the four bands, a seated audience of 6000 and over 8000 on the lawn. Orchestra No. 1 (they were all a double string quartet with two French horns) gave out the musical phrases from the stage; No. 2 on Leinsdorf's right, echoed them nearly complete; No. 3 on his left got a snatch and No. 4 in right field tagged along, biting on the last measure in a breathless fashion. Technically, the whole was managed by closed circuit TV. The stereo effect was fun if the piece ran through its novelty by the middle of the first movement. Leinsdorf took every repeat, which did little to shape Mozart's little pleasantries.

Also on Saturday's program was Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra." It would be nice, sometime, to hear Leinsdorf loose the orchestra in the awesome beginning. The old Koussevitzky shellacks still make dogs howl and little children pale, but our man treats it as a scholarly preface and doesn't really get home free until the great waltz.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 30 1964

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, made his first appearance of this season with the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon. The program was a curious choice, possibly designed to appeal to the throng of "music lovers" which descended on Tanglewood for the weekend.

The concert began with Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. It is a work in the standard repertory of most orchestras, and the members of the BSO could probably play it without the aid of a conductor. That, it appeared to this viewer, was approximately what happened.

Fortunately, all the repeats were observed, so that whatever was missed on the first time through could be corrected on the second attempt.

Two selections from Wagner's Goetterdaemmerung followed: Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death Music. Mr. Steinberg seemed more in command here. Orchestral playing was less ragged, and the conductor gave evidence of a real affinity with this music.

The Beethoven Fifth Symphony was the final selection on the program. The conductor was now in full control, especially in matters of dynamics. The pianissimos were very quiet, and the fortissimos were very loud.

A model of formal construction, this work has enjoyed popular appeal for years. It proved to be tremendously appealing to the large audience, even in this reading of it.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WATERBURY, CONN.
Republican
Morn. Circ. 24,059

JUL 28 1964

Van Cliburn Applauded At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS. — Van Cliburn returned to Tanglewood Saturday night to play the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor."

Van Cliburn, who made his first appearance at Tanglewood last season, attracted the largest Festival audience, 14,592, to date this summer. The brilliant concert performer was enthusiastically called to the platform many times.

Audiences during the coming week will have opportunity to hear three conductors. Friday night it will be William Steinberg conducting music of Piston, Strauss, and Brahms. Eugene Ormandy will conduct Saturday night with music by Beethoven and Mahler. Sunday afternoon Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be back on the podium to conduct music of Bartok, Dvorak, and Strauss. That concert will present Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, in the Bartok "Violin Concerto, No.2."

The open rehearsal Saturday morning drew an audience of 5,646 while the Friday night program with music of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy, and Ravel brought 5,094. During the week the Boston Pops concert with Fiedler conducting drew 13,327.

Saturday night's concert brought a bit of novelty in the performance of Mozart's "Nocturne for Four Orchestras." Mr. Leinsdorf had arranged his musicians in small orchestras at different parts of the Shed and it proved an interesting experiment. Performance of Strauss' tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was a spine-tingling, colorful performance that was brilliant. The orchestra was in fine form and performed with opulence. It was in truth a colorful display of music.

The concert Sunday afternoon presented Mendelssohn's 'Italian" symphony, Wagner's Rhine Journey of Siegfried and his death from "Gotterdammerung.' Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" completed the weekend program.

Large groups were spread on blankets about the lawns under the full moon on Saturday night and about the grounds Sunday afternoon.

S.M.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
QUINCY, MASS.
Patriot-Ledger
Eve. Circ. 48,932
JUL 28 1964

The Sound of Music

Steinberg, Cliburn Tanglewood Guests

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — After initial weekends of experiment and novelty, the Berkshire Music Festival returned to staple works this weekend.

Nothing could be more staple than Sunday's program by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood — Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A, the "Italian"; excerpts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung;" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Orchestra, took a turn on the Tanglewood podium, and the 10,742 who attended gave him a welcome to match the warm, slightly humid weather.

Steinberg is a large, bulky, bald gentleman with the brisk, cutting gestures of a drill master. His approach to the music was no-nonsense, and the orchestra dug in and played with vigor for him—particularly in the closing movements of the Beethoven in which the zealous bowing of the celli and basses produced a twanging of strings more suited to Sherwood Forest than the dales of the Berkshires.

The melodic Mendelssohn symphony, whose title comes from the inspiration of a journey by the 21-year-old composer to Italy in 1831 rather than from any programmatic content, under Mr. Steinberg's flicking baton, came through as gay and light as a sunbeam. The strings sparkled, and played with a lot of "bite." The sound, perhaps, was more "open" than the Boston Symphony generally produces.

Mr. Steinberg's reading was graceful and precise overall. There were a few dismaying moments — the rushing of the first movement's coda and some carelessness with the time values of melodic notes toward the end of the second movement—but they were minor blemishes in the general excellence of the performance.

The Wagner, however, seemed more frenetic than controlled. The excerpts were Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Siegfried's Death, from the close of the prologue and Act III, respectively, of "Goetterdaemmerung."

Mr. Steinberg seemed to dwell on the neuroses of the music—its overlay of bombast and megalomania, its restless shifting of textures and rhythms, the parade of musical foot-notes known as "leitmotifs" filtering through the instrumental sub-conscious.

The music proceeded from trauma to trauma, each with its shed-rattling climax, a blare of brass and a cataclysm of percussion. Concentrated decibels, however, don't always produce excitement; the string of noisy climaxes interspersed with passages of intense gloom left much unsaid.

Beethoven's familiar Symphony No. 5 in C minor, though, found the conductor with much to say. Mr. Steinberg took the first movement at a good clip, which left the orchestra a bit unprepared at times for vigorous attacks. The brisk tempo gave the movement a good sense of flow and continuity.

The inner movements were the best. The second had a great sense of form and balance, and the orchestral sound was full and rich. The third was properly majestic, and the coarse humor of the trio with its busy work in the lower strings came off well. The final movement, that heroic paean of "victory over fate," had its grandeur, but was also gruff and loud. The audience loved it, but a steady diet would be too much.

An enormous crowd of 14,396, the season's largest so far, packed the lawns (the reserved shed seats were sold out long ago) and bundled themselves against a chilly but clear evening for Saturday night's concert. The attraction was pianist Van Cliburn, who joined Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony for Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Opus 15.

Long after the final decisive chord, the throng applauded the soloist, but the performance was not that successful. There were long stretches in which nothing in particular was happening, and the general effect was tentative and spotty.

The Brahms concerto requires a close interplay between orchestra and soloist, more than in most concerti. Indeed, the work was first conceived as a symphony when the composer began to sketch out the movements in 1853 or 1854. Later, Brahms reworked it into a sonata for two pianos. Not until 1858 did the concerto take on its final form: a kind of symphony in which the piano functions more as participating instrumentalist than as dominating soloist.

There were times when Mr. Cliburn and Mr. Leinsdorf achieved this vital rapport; at others, the element was lacking. The opening maestoso movement which contains the most interesting music of the three, seemed to plod along under the conductor's deliberate tempo. Its declamatory sections and rhapsodic flow were held too much in check.

Although the second movement was also deliberately paced, it was rescued from dullness by the soloist's lyrical playing and clear-toned touch. In the faster closing rondo, the concerto came more to life. There were more interesting variations in tempo and in color, even though the orchestra had some ragged moments.

Mr. Cliburn is noted for his bravura style, power and speed and the ability to project the big melodic line. But Saturday night he was at his best in the quieter moments, in lovely cantabile passages rather than in clangorous octaves and sledge-hammer chords. In the first movement, he dropped more than a few notes, but by the last he was in control of his considerable technique. The basic problem of the tall, slim Texan with the bushy blond hair seemed to be one of overall concept, instead of execution.

The finest item on Saturday night's program was Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra"), another of Mr. Leinsdorf's musical tributes this summer to mark the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

It was a splendid reading, one which came as close as anyone can to fitch the individual portions of this sprawling work together into a unified whole. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's incisive direction, the Straussian attempt to portray in sound the odyssey of a noble soul through the pitfalls of earthly life became almost plausible, and the moments of padding and bombast were barely noticed.

Whether erupting in mighty torrents of sound, or throbbing with rapturous melodies, the orchestra was superb. The strings, in particular, played like furies, but the trumpets deserve special praise, too, for their brilliance. A sidelight was the cool professionalism of principal cellist Samuel Mayes, who deftly restrung a string that snapped out, during a quiet passage, retuned and returned to action in less than three minutes.

The program opened with a charming novelty, Mozart's Notturno in D for Four Orchestras, K. 286. This little serenade, composed by Mozart at 21, was as much a technical feat as a musical achievement. Mr. Leinsdorf actually used four separate orchestras — one on stage with the string parts tripled, and three off-stage ensembles widely scattered throughout the shed, each string quartets with two horns.

Since the three off-stage orchestras could not see the conductor on stage, closed-circuit television was employed, and each group had its own conductor picking up the cues on TV. With its echoing of phrases bouncing around the shed, the notturno was amusing and delightful, and the audience stretched and craned to follow this musical game of ping-pong. Mr. Leinsdorf's conducting colleagues for the off-stage orchestras were Hary Ellis Dickson, a violinist; Louis Speyer, English hornist, and Rosario Mazzeo, the orchestra's personnel manager and bass clarinetist.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711
JUL 27 1964

Tanglewood II

Steinberg Conducts Boston Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

LENOX—William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday at Tanglewood. His program was as popularly conceived—Symphonies No. 4 ("Italian") by Mendelssohn and No. 5 by Beethoven with Wagner excerpts in between—as it was enthusiastically received.

The orchestra's guest set most of his tempos at a smart clip. While Steinberg doesn't exactly hurry the music neither does he let the motion falter. There have been and will be more relaxed readings of the Mendelssohn Symphony. Steinberg cued the fiddles from time to time with a smile or snapped a finger to them. Nobody needed more urging.

On the other hand, Siegfried's Rhine journey, from "Gotterdammerung," shot the rapids, eliciting applause from the audience. But Steinberg salvaged Siegfried's Death, making through the glorious orchestral sonorities something quite as thrilling as the old funeral rite for heroes.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony received an energetic performance. Again, one might have wished gentler tempos within the movements. One example would be a somewhat slower start to the andante, from which to launch that particularly supple theme which is emotionally such a release.

Saturday evening, Erich Leinsdorf conducted. He had as piano soloist Van Cliburn in the Brahms Concerto No. 1. Quite the nicest part in a splendid performance was the latter part of the rondo. Leinsdorf had put a jolly touch to the last recurrence but one of the rondo subject; Cliburn mimicked it perfectly and kept the mood in his cadenza. This close working of soloist and conductor had been true for the whole concerto. The two were recalled so many times that an enterprising camera bug was able to present them with an instant snapshot developed between their stage bows.

The Tanglewood premiere Saturday was Mozart's Nocturn for Four Orchestras, K. 286. This was written in 1776 for some Salzburg function. The Music Shed absorbed the four bands, a seated audience of 6000 and over 8000 on the lawn. Orchestra No. 1 (they were all a double string quartet with two French horns) gave out the musical phrases from the stage; No. 2 on Leinsdorf's right, echoed them nearly complete; No. 3 on his left got a snatch and No. 4 in right field tagged along, biting on the last measure in a breathless fashion. Technically, the whole was managed by closed circuit TV. The stereo effect was fun if the piece ran through its novelty by the middle of the first movement. Leinsdorf took every repeat, which did little to shape Mozart's little pleasantries.

Also on Saturday's program was Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra." It would be nice sometime, to hear Leinsdorf loose the orchestra in the awesome beginning. The old Koussevitzky shellacks still make dogs howl and little children pale, but our man treats it as a scholarly preface and doesn't really get home free until the great waltz.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 30 1964

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, made his first appearance of this season with the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon. The program was a curious choice, possibly designed to appeal to the throng of "music lovers" which descended on Tanglewood for the weekend.

The concert began with Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. It is a work in the standard repertory of most orchestras, and the members of the BSO could probably play it without the aid of a conductor. That, it appeared to this viewer, was approximately what happened.

Fortunately, all the repeats were observed, so that whatever was missed on the first time through could be corrected on the second attempt.

Two selections from Wagner's Goetterdaemmerung followed: Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death Music. Mr. Steinberg seemed more in command here. Orchestral playing was less ragged, and the conductor gave evidence of a real affinity with this music.

The Beethoven Fifth Symphony was the final selection on the program. The conductor was now in full control, especially in matters of dynamics. The pianissimos were very quiet, and the fortissimos were very loud.

A model of formal construction, this work has enjoyed popular appeal for years. It proved to be tremendously appealing to the large audience, even in this reading of it.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WATERBURY, CONN.
Republican
Morn. Circ. 24,059
JUL 28 1964

Van Cliburn Applauded At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS. — Van Cliburn returned to Tanglewood Saturday night to play the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor."

Van Cliburn, who made his first appearance at Tanglewood last season, attracted the largest Festival audience, 14,592, to date this summer. The brilliant concert performer was enthusiastically called to the platform many times.

Audiences during the coming week will have opportunity to hear three conductors. Friday night it will be William Steinberg conducting music of Piston, Strauss, and Brahms. Eugene Ormandy will conduct Saturday night with music by Beethoven and Mahler. Sunday afternoon Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be back on the podium to conduct music of Bartok, Dvorak, and Strauss. That concert will present Joseph Silverstein, concert-master, in the Bartok "Violin Concerto No. 2."

The open rehearsal Saturday morning drew an audience of 5,646 while the Friday night program with music of Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy, and Ravel brought 5,094. During the week the Boston Pops concert with Fiedler conducting drew 13,327.

Saturday night's concert brought a bit of novelty in the performance of Mozart's "Nocturne for Four Orchestras." Mr. Leinsdorf had arranged his musicians in small orchestras at different parts of the Shed and it proved an interesting experiment. Performance of Strauss' tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was a spine-tingling, colorful performance that was brilliant. The orchestra was in fine form and performed with opulence. It was in truth a colorful display of music.

The concert Sunday afternoon presented Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Wagner's Rhine Journey of Siegfried and his death from "Gotterdammerung." Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" completed the week-end program.

Large groups were spread on blankets about the lawns under the full moon on Saturday night and about the grounds Sunday afternoon.

S.M.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
JUL 27 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422
JUL 27 1964

Music Review

Pennsylvanians Take Over Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

MASSACHUSETTS yielded to Pennsylvania this weekend at Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited conductors from both ends of the Keystone State, Ormandy from Philadelphia and Steinberg from Pittsburgh, to assist him in the programs which mark the completion of the season's first half.

All three men qualify, in the understatement of the week, as "pros." The Boston Symphony may also be placed in such a category without too much dissent, but three different conductors within 40 hours is a test and, in some ways, an ordeal for all concerned.

* * *

WILLIAM STEINBERG's program was heard by an audience of 10,742; Leinsdorf's program Saturday night, with Van Cliburn as piano soloist, drew 14,592. To all those who ask and expect a statement in terms of a comparison such as General Motors issues at stated intervals, this may be the answer.

William Steinberg

Steinberg played two of the most firmly established symphonies in the literature: the Mendelssohn A Major, the "Italian," and the Beethoven 5th. Within this formidable frame he inserted the Siegfried Rhine Journey and Death from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung."

* * *

TO HAVE a grandstand seat as three such admired conductors pass in serried review it is inevitable that one notice their methods and idiosyncracies. None of them uses scores and all of them subscribe to the practice of being as thrifty with gestures and indications as possible. This is one way of showing the musicians before whom they stand the courtesy of patently conceding that they are mature performers and do not need traffic officers on routes they have traversed innumerable times. Steinberg even allowed some phrases to pass without any motion whatsoever, and he refrained from giving redundant cues to musicians of the capability of the men of the Boston orchestra.

His Mendelssohn was comfortable and easy, sprightly and vivacious without speed, and exceedingly flexible. The transitions were logical and secure. Only in the Saltarello was he properly bouncy and biting. His "Fifth" was stern and domineering. One practically saw Beethoven's scowl. And it was a pleasure to hear the wonderful viola and cello sections of the orchestra sing the andante without contortions from the podium.

* * *

WE CAN HAVE no idea of the musicians' reaction to the various conductors who appear before them over a year, but we would not be surprised if their gratitude to a man like Steinberg is not surpassed for the way he allows the many voices and timbres to emerge in a favorable light. True, Wagner is a strong ally for such a purpose, but Steinberg's Wagner was vivid and pulsing. It requires a nice sense of distinction to distribute the credits equitably between director and performers.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT Leinsdorf made his only appearance of the week before his own orchestra. The mammoth assemblage heard some high-voltage Strauss and some potentially big Brahms. Van Cliburn, the Texas comet, in his second orbit of Tanglewood, played the Brahms First Piano Concerto. He has been the object of some phenomenal publicity because of his Moscow prize-winning event, and he seemed to us to be as desirous of living it down and appearing as a normal human being as a soloist before nearly 15,000 adoring people can be. He has become, willy-nilly, the dilletantes' Beatles. The ovation he received at the end of his concerto was slightly indiscriminating. He played well, but not that well. He has a unifomly ingratiating tone and his sense of theatrical timing, a factor apart and above rhythmic propulsion, was noticeably outstanding. But this Brahms comes out best when attacked with some brutality, or, at least, a tinge of a savage punch. This was not evident in Cliburn's hands.

* * *

BRAHMS HAD trouble in deciding in which vehicle he should place his inspiration for most favorable expression. He tried it first for two pianos, then for orchestra alone and finally for piano solo with orchestra accompaniment. But the orchestra is no submissive partner, but a full-fledged and strong participant. Leinsdorf was not reticent in asserting his share of the message. He had just turned a massively conceived. "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Strauss attempted here to deal on superhuman levels. He came down to terrestrial levels at times during his long life, but his preponderant interest was in subjects such as the legendary "Till," the fictional "Don Quixote" and the would-be universal Zoroaster. Strauss would have liked to erect a pantheon of his own.

Van Cliburn

* * *

LEINSDORF'S disciplined reading cleared many areas which in their more usual tumultuousness are turbid, yet his was not yet the perfect realization of either Nietzsche's thoughts nor Strauss' score. The conductor drained the dance of a delirium it might have entailed and the involved squirmings of the overwhelming score were held in a tighter rein than may have been necessary.

Zarathustra is full of remote contrasts. The early viola melody is not only a lovely simple theme, but is placed in a register of such obvious rightness. The orchestra was at virtuoso luminence under Leinsdorf.

Nothing more antipodal to both the Strauss and Brahms could have been chosen than the Mozart "Nocturne" (K. 286) for Four Orchestras Leinsdorf chose to start the program. These are three simple and charming little movements. Three units of some 12 musicians were placed in the purlieux of the Shed, which, with the somewhat larger one on stage, played the graceful dance tunes Mozart wrote down on some leisurely moment. There was not exact coordination between the four groups, but what's a few beats between friends. The auxiliary conductors were Harry Dickson, Rosario Mazzeo and Louis Speyer.

Steinberg Triumphs In 3 Major Tanglewood Works

By HOWARD HEALY

A guest conductor and a program of contrast worked out very well yesterday afternoon at the Berkshire Tanglewood Festival in Lenox, Mass.

William Steinberg stepped up to the podium to conduct three pieces that demanded assumption of three personalities: Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," excerpts from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung," and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5."

Even more important, Steinberg had to master three differing and contrasting styles. So great was his control in the third work that applause lingered over the rolling green lawns of Tanglewood for nearly 15 minutes. And that came after a standing ovation before the last of Beethoven's last 55 measures in C major were completed.

Consciously or unconsciously Steinberg had formed a program that included nearly opposite poles in style.

Reflecting Mendelssohn's personality—his brilliant wit and social properness — was the "Italian Symphony." Steinberg appeared to enjoy conducting the work—in complete control of the orchestra and the work's formality and correctness. A delightful piece was delivered with ease.

Now and then his eyes would move or a smile break across his face as he gestured with hand or baton for a note or phrase that needed accenting.

He seemed more serious and possessed of more emotional force in the Beethoven work. Effecting a transition from the emotional restraint of the very proper Mendelssohn to the fierce concentration of the ugly and social outcast Beethoven was not an easy task for any conductor. But it was a successful one for Steinberg.

The piece itself is one of contrasts—from tonality to tempi to style. Without undue or prolonged emphasis of the "knock knock" motive in the first movement Steinberg evinced excellent timing in the Beethoven. From the start to the very demolition of the motive the conductor was in control.

When the second movement was given—where two themes are introduced, as was Haydn's liking—Steinberg was there with the timing again—with the first theme in the violas and cellos and the second in the clarinets and basses.

By the time he had reached the third movement, with its famous scherzo and trio—and the horns bringing back the motive—Steinberg was wrapped up in the change of the work, most importantly the change in tonality. Even in the humorous trio Steinberg showed involvement in the work with closed eyes and tight lips.

The emphasis of tonality in the last movement and the grand finale to this piece of contrasting tempi was glorious and, as mentioned before, was rewarded with a standing ovation and seven encores.

Between these two works of contrast was another "different" one. The "endless melody" and transitional ease of Wagner in excerpts from "Flight of the Gods" was a good test of timing in itself. Steinberg threw some "punches" at the brass section to get the loudness demanded by the score and brought the entire program together with them. Mendelssohn would have been appalled at such rudeness and boisterous sound and Beethoven would have gloried in it.

Steinberg gloried in them all.

BLANK PAGE

In 3
Works

ohn to the ion of the ugly
Beethoven task for any was a success-berg.
is one of con-
ity to tempi to ndue or proof the "knock the first move-evinced excelthe Beethoven o the very de-notive the con-ntrol."
nd movement two themes was Haydn's was there with with the first as and cellos the clarinets had reached nt, with its d trio—and g back the was wrapped f the work.

e change in e humerous d involvewith closed nality in the the grand of contrast-ous and, as as reward-vation and s work of er "differs melody" of Wagner ght of the of timing, brew some ss section manded by the entire ith them. have been ness and ethoven

t.

8k

5TH WEEK JULY 27 - AUGUST 2ND

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN DAILY
Monday, June 22, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK NEWS
Wednesday, June 24, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK, N.Y.
ADVOCATE
W. 37,000

JUL 4 1964

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

JUL 9 1964

New York Post
D. 317,237 SUN. 250,207

JUN 18 1964

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

JUL 5 1964

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

JUN 28 1964

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 76,558 SUN. 76,558

JUN 22 1964

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
KINGS COURIER
W. 15,200

JUL 25 1964

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 2,949,646

AUG 2 1964

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 2,949,646

JUL 12 1964

New York Post
D. 317,237 SUN. 250,207

JUL 10 1964

B'klyn Academy to Sponsor Sunday at Tanglewood, Aug. 2

The Brooklyn Academy of Music will sponsor its eighth annual "Sunday at Tanglewood," Aug. 2, a one-day excursion to the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in the Waltz Sequence No. 1 from Richard Strauss' opera, "Der Rosenkavalier" in honor of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 will complete the program. Reservations for the excursion close July 28. For further information call ST 3-6700.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 30 1964

Massachusetts

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL. Tanglewood. 413-367-1600. Boston Symphony Orchestra. July 31: William Steinberg, cond. Works by Piston, Strauss, Brahms, 8 pm. Aug 1: Eugene Ormandy, cond. Works by Beethoven, Mahler, 8 pm. Aug. 2: Erich Leinsdorf, cond. Works by Dvorak, Bartok, Strauss, 2:30 pm.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works by Dvorak, Bartok, and Strauss on Sunday, August 2, at Tanglewood.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

UTICA OBSERVER-DISPATCH

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant
Morn. Circ. 124,441

JUL 29 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

MANCHESTER, N. H.
Union Leader
Eve. Circ. 52,021

JUL 27 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828

JUL 25 1964

Next Week At Tanglewood

William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy will again be guest conductors at next weekend's Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

Mr. Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on Friday evening (July 31 at 8:30) and Mr. Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be the conductor for the concert on Saturday evening. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will direct the Sunday afternoon concert (Aug. 2 at 2:30).

Tuesday evening, the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will appear at Tanglewood for the fifth Chamber Music Concert of the season in the Theatre at 8 p.m. They will perform Mozart's Trio in B-flat, K 254; Ravel's Trio in A minor, and Dvorak's Trio in E minor, Op. 90 ("Dumky"). Net proceeds will benefit the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund of the Berkshire Music Center.

William Steinberg, at the Friday evening concert, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Walter Piston's Toccata, being given its first performance at Tanglewood; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote", Op. 35, with Joseph dePasquale, the orchestra's first viola, playing the viola solo and Samuel Mayes, first cello, heard in the cello solo. The program will close with Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

Eugene Ormandy will open the Saturday evening program with the Overture to "Leonore" No. 1 by Beethoven and will then conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 and the Mahler Symphony No. 1 in D major.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium Sunday afternoon, to open the program with the Dvorak Symphony No. 6 in D major, Op. 60 and will continue with Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, as soloist, in the first performance of the work at Tanglewood; and Richard Strauss' Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier," Op. 59.

The works by Richard Strauss on the Friday and Sunday programs are presented in recognition of the composer's 100th birthday anniversary.

At this evening's concert at 8, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Serenade for Four Orchestras, K. 286; Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra", and the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Van Cliburn soloist. All reserved tickets to this concert have been sold. General admission to the lawns will go on sale at 6 p.m.

William Steinberg will conduct tomorrow afternoon's concert, offering Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A major, Op. 90, "Italian"; the Rhine Journey and Funeral March from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Review
DARIEN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,690

JUL 2

HUDSON, N.Y.
REGISTER STAR
D. 8,700

JUL 28 1964

Ormandy To Conduct At Tanglewood

Eugene Ormandy will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Saturday night's Berkshire Festival concert at the Tanglewood Music Shed at 8 p.m.

The program will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 1; Beethoven's First Symphony, Op. 21; and the Symphony No. 1 by Mahler.

Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's musical director, will be at the podium for Sunday afternoon's program at 2:30. Given will be Dvorak's Symphony No. 6; Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2 with Joseph Silverstein as soloist; and the Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier," by Strauss.

A varied program including orchestral, vocal and piano works is planned for the following weekend, Aug. 7-8-9.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will conduct Friday evening, Aug. 7 in a program to include Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 "Pathetique," and Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Gunther Schuller, a first performance at Tanglewood. Mr. Schuller is currently Acting Head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center. The program will conclude with Debussy's "La Mer."

The concerts on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8 and 9, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, will present works of Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Mr. Leinsdorf has termed "music for festivals."

Saturday's program will open with "The Ruins of Athens," Nachspiel, Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz are both former members of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Curtin will then return to sing "Three Hymns," Op. 71 by Strauss. The program will close with the eastern premiere of Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," with Lili Chookasian, contralto; Mr. Diaz and the Festival Chorus. All the works on this program will be first performances at Tanglewood.

Sunday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemuth, who died last fall. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 20. After intermission Jorge Bolet, pianist, will join the orchestra for the first Tanglewood performance of Strauss' "Parergon," for left hand alone, which has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934. Mr. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's Fantasie on Themes from "Ruins of Athens."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES UNION
JUL 26 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, July 30, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
JUL 25 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240
JUL 25 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
JUL 25 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Herald
Sun. Circ. 281,586
JUL 26 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
JUL 26 1964
ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300
JUL 30 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BRISTOL, CONN.
Press
Eve. Circ. 14,611
JUL 27 1964
GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500
JUL 29 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUL 26 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
JUL 24 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly JUL 30 1964 787

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
JUL 25 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
JUL 30 1964

Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster, and Erich Leinsdorf

Three Conductors At Tanglewood

At next weekend's Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf has once again invited William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy to be guest conductors. Mr. Steinberg, Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will conduct on Friday evening, July 31, 8 p.m. Mr. Ormandy, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct Saturday evening, Aug. 1, 8 p.m., and Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concert of Sunday afternoon, Aug. 2, 2:30 p.m. Three first-desk members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soloists during the weekend.

William Steinberg will begin Friday evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, July 31, with Walter Piston's Toccata which will be a first performance at Tanglewood. He will then conduct Richard Strauss' Tone Poem Don Quixote, Op. 35. Joseph de Pasquale, first viola, will play the viola solo and Samuel Mayes, first cello will be heard in the cello solo. Mr. Steinberg will close the program with Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68.

Eugene Ormandy will open the Saturday evening program (Aug. 1) with the Overture to Leonore, No. 1 of Beethoven, a first performance at the Berkshire Festival concerts. He will then conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Op. 21. The program will conclude with the Mahler Symphony No. 1 in D Major.

Sunday afternoon (Aug. 2) Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium and will open the program with the Dvorak Symphony No. 6 in D Major, Op. 60. After the intermission he will conduct Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster, as soloist. This will be a first performance at Tanglewood. The program will close with Richard Strauss' Prelude and Waltz Sequence from Der Rosenkavalier, Op. 59.

The works by Richard Strauss on the Friday and Sunday programs are presented in keeping with Mr. Leinsdorf's intention to perform the major orchestral works of Strauss this summer in recognition of the composer's 100th birthday anniversary (June 11, 1864).

Tickets went on sale last week for the annual Gala Evening at Tanglewood on August 19. The program will benefit the Berkshire Music Center and will consist of several events beginning in mid-afternoon, which will represent all departments of the Music Center. The highlight of the day will be the evening concert in the Music Shed at 8 p.m., at which the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will combine forces to form an orchestra of 170 mucians, conducted consecutively by Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski. The giant orchestra will also be joined during the concert by a 200-voice chorus.

REVIEWS

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

AUG 3 1964

Boston Symphony Gets Ovation at Tanglewood

William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening in the first of the fifth week of concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., this season. Conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, Steinberg is one of the master conductors of the area.

* * *

THE FRIDAY evening program, drawing an audience of 5,439, opened with the provocative "Toccata" of Walter Piston. The program also included the Strauss' "Don Quixote" variations with Samuel Mayes and Joseph de Pasquale as violoncello and viola soloists and the Brahms "Symphony number 1."

"Bravos" and sustained applause at the close of the program recalled Steinberg four times to receive with the orchestra a richly deserved ovation.

The Piston "Toccata," written for Charles Munch and the Orchestra Nationale de France in 1948, is brilliant writing with the exciting music showing the solid musical craftsmanship of the American composer.

* * *

THE STRAUSS tone poem, composed in 1897, remains as truly bizarre musically as the Cervantes tale on which it is based. The solo cello depicts the erratic knight and the solo viola depicts Sancho Panza with the various episodes in their wanderings portrayed by the orchestra. Whether the music features the bass clarinet, persistant drum beats, muted brass, unaccompanied bassoons or the wind machine, one is listening to a work by a master orchestrator. It is not a merely illustrative work but truly dramatic writing. Played by the Boston Symphony under Steinberg's direction it achieved its full measure of whimsy.

* * *

THE BRAHMS "Symphony number 1" is solid musicianship at its best, standing on its own as music. It needs nothing except the ability of the performers to play its wonderful themes, to bring out its sonorities and to emphasize its intricate structure.

From the pulsing, throbbing timpani effects of the opening bars, through the fury of participation of the first movement and the massive tone structure of its finale the Brahms music holds an audience spellbound. The "Andante" with its soaring melodies evokes dreams of things of long ago, or perhaps of dreams of things that never were, and a whimsy one seldom encounters in Brahms is brought out in the "un poco allegretto e grazioso" movement.

* * *

EUGENE ORMANDY appeared as guest conductor on Saturday evening with Leinsdorf conducting the concert of yesterday afternoon. Beethoven and Mahler made up the program of Saturday night with Dvorak, Bartok and Strauss featured yesterday.

The weekend programs of the Boston Symphony will continue at Tanglewood through Aug. 23, when the 1964 Berkshire Festival season will close.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

AUG 3 1964

Steinberg And Ormandy Direct At Tanglewood

For the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival, at Tanglewood, William Steinberg made his second appearance this summer on Friday evening before an audience of 5,439 music lovers. Mr. Steinberg directed the first performance at Tanglewood of Piston's metallic Toccata, commissioned by Charles Munch in 1948, Strauss' Introduction, Theme and Variations and Finale, Op. 35 from the fanciful "Don Quixote," with Samuel Hayes and Joseph de Pasquale, first cellist and violist as soloists, and Brahms' grandiose first symphony.

Eugene Ormany, also directing his second concert this season, chose to begin Saturday's program with another first at Tanglewood, Beethoven's wonderfully woven Overture No. 1 to Leonore, Op. 138, its heavenly tones soaring into the darkening skies. As night fell, and lights outlined the deeply green trees, Mr. Ormandy led the orchestra in a magnificent reading of Beethoven's appealing first symphony, Op. 21, its first movement reminiscent of Mozart the gay dance tune motive and light inventive development of the second, becoming rather solemn towards the end, rather like a procession, the Minuet's exquisite scherzo, and the last movement, with swift scale passages and key progressions, so like a country fair.

Mahler's youthfully powerful first symphony completed the evening's greatly satisfying program. Named a "Symphonic Poem in two parts" at its first performance, Mahler wrote fanciful titles and program notes, hoping the audience would better understand his emotional, romantic, and dramatic, by its unique orchestration, Mr. Ormandy truly "played his orchestra like an instrument." as one listener remarked. The audience of 9811 applauded with great vigor and appreciation.

Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium on Sunday afternoon, opening the program with Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D major, Op. 60, formerly known as No. 1, which referred only to its publication, in 1882. It is an intriguing work, pervasively melodic and free-flowing, particularly the first movement, which opens with brass and oboe, a lovely Adagio, beginning and ending with a sweeping cello motive, a Scherzo, which is a lively furiant, a variously accented Bohemian dance, and a favorite form with Dvorak, with fascinating play between the winds and brasses in the Trio; the Finale uses a turned figure in endless manner, with fast passages for the cellos, then violas, tossing it back and forth among the other orchestral sections, and ending with the broadening out of the same rhythmic figure. The audience was most enthusiastic with the clearly stated performance.

Another first performance and another enthusiastic reception was given to Bartok's colorful second concerto for violin and orchestra, smoothly and tonally perfected and projected by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster. Although Leinsdorf was directing with great concentration, there was no obvious attention being paid by Silverstein to his motions or cues, and actually no need, the violinist's uncanny sense of timing never failing him. Silverstein's oddly casual manner isn't reflected in the purity of his sensuous tone, fault-free bowing, and securely placed left hand. After the tumultous applause had died down, it rose again to recall Mr. Silverstein and Leinsdorf one more time.

Another tribute to the German composer Richard Strauss brought the afternoon's offering to a close, with a restrained, rather too much, performance of his gracious and popular Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier." It left one still waiting for the inherent kinesthetic lift, but apparently Mr. Leinsdorf wasn't letting the mood get out of bounds with the music.

— M. deP. B.

NewEnglandNewsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451

AUG 1 1964

Music: Steinberg Conducts At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Rare variety and instrumental adventure were contained in the program played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest conducted by William Steinberg to open the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. There was an audience of 5,439.

The program opened with the first Tanglewood performance of Walter Piston's Toccata. Then followed Richard Strauss' palette of brilliant imagery, "Don Quixote," and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Opus 68.

Perhaps the most significant aspect of this concert was the plain fact that the Piston Toccata held its own in this tall company. We're not suggesting that it matches in importance either the Strauss or the Brahms, but the Piston wasn't eclipsed by either.

It was therefore heartening to witness proof that there are American composers who are creating works of substance without resorting to "ists" and laboratorical scrapings.

Expressively Played

Coordination of notes and rhythm was not always unanimous. The slow, lyrical centerpiece was expressively played by woodwinds with string collaboration.

Bouncing bows brought back the original pace and excitement mounted thereafter. The audience responded to the Piston work with enthusiasm.

Strauss' "Don Quixote" was part of the festival's recognition of the composer's 100th birthday anniversary.

Format is an introduction, theme with ten variations, and finale. Subtitle gives additional information, "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character."

At the turn of the century when it was premiered, "Don Quixote" caused consternation and protest with its "wild" use of instruments, even a wind machine to describe the "ride through the air" by the Don and his sidekick, Sancho Panza. The latter was played last night by Thomas Gauger, who looked as if he was operating a stubborn ice-cream freezer. Last night's audience was obviously intrigued with the "Don" but hardly frustrated by these realistic devices.

Vividly Portrayed

The personality of the Don was vividly portrayed in tone and style by Samuel Mayes' solo cello. Pancho was as real and vital through the viola solo played by Joseph de Pasquale.

Anyone who followed the text, by variation, was no doubt mightily entertained with Strauss' wit and the neat order which sequenced Quixote's fanciful experiences. This Strauss - orchestra - Steinberg story telling was a magnificent instrumental performance.

Steinberg envisioned the Brahms symphony as a broad epic that began portentiously, turned to sorrow, brightened with lyricism, and ended in triumph.

This was not accomplished only with faithful tonal reproduction of a printed score, with sound. The sonorous introduction abetted by timpani, predicted a great Brahms first.

Phrases were attacked boldly, without demolishment. Steinberg's tempos were conservative (especially third movement) and so were dynamics. This was a Brahms performance, in dead earnest — not merely a rampant squandering, or "razzle-dazzle" exhibition.

The Boston Symphony will be guest-conducted by Eugene Ormandy in tonight's festival program. It is Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, and First Symphony, and Mahler's First Symphony.

NewEnglandNewsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

AUG 1 1964

Music Review

Steinberg Conducts

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TWO OF THE superb principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took formal leave of their colleagues last night. They will play on through the remaining weeks of the Tanglewood season but they will find no more gratifying opportunity to say farewell than in the roles they were called upon to assume in last night's program.

Cellist Samuel Mayes was "Don Quixote" and violist Joseph de Pasquale "Sancho Panzo" in a thrilling reading of Richard Strauss' famous tone poem which was the central pivot of guest conductor William Steinberg's concert in the Shed.

* * *

MAYES AND De Pasquale will move on next fall to Philadelphia but none of their confreres with whom they have sat for many years, nor any of the audience of 5,439 will forget this memorable performance. Strauss gives every section of the orchestra virtuoso opportunities and everyone discharged his assignment brilliantly, but the vistas which open for the viola and cello were never more spaciously envisioned, nor more eloquently expressed.

The cello had been vibrant in many of the variations but in the finale where Strauss asks for "sehr ruhig" Mayes brought his glowing tone down to a whisper, which carried to the awestruck and unbreathing audience in the far corners of the auditorium with overwhelming poignancy.

Of the viola's solos, none outshone what De Pasquale achieved in the sixth variation. He made Dulcinea as appealing as Juliet or Melisande. The more intricate and speedy sections melted before the ardent command of their instruments by both soloists; but it was of the soulful songs that these ears will retain indelible memories.

* * *

STEINBERG'S whole program was without a weak spot. He had started with Walter Piston's "Toccata," a short, tight essay in the nature of a hoedown with a central section of slower, lyric line. He played the Brahms First Symphony for the second half of the evening, it was a well-thought-out reading, making inflections which divided the progress of each movement into dialogue rather than a plodding, relentless monologue. Especially felicitous were his tempos. The allegretto was truly graceful and the introduction to the finale led so broadly and so logically into the allegro that Steinberg made the opinion, sometimes stated, that this was the "Beethoven tenth" sound justified in this instance.

Herald
D. 282,005 SUN.

AUG 1 19

Steinb
Beaut

By William

LENO

The Berkshire
val at Tanglewood
continued its trib ard Strauss, born ago on June 11, a performance of piece, the symph
"Don Quixote."

The conductor
liam Steinberg, an ists were two Bo
phony first deskm
Samuel Mayes a
Joseph dePasqu
Mayes and dePa sidentally, the something of a fa are joining the P
Orchestra in the f

The concert als
the Brahms First and Walter Piston' a bubbling, extrov enjoyable occasion dates from 1948 was receiving
Tanglewood perfor

The program w
one to demonstrat ceptional nature of berg's conductin
Though both the St
the Brahms are lan
the Romantic litera couldn't be more
The former, in stru of variations, inevit best in the hands ductor who can e straint, keep his ar clear and still not r glow. The Brahms done that way, too, lends itself to more ed treatment, as demonstrated vividl highly individual co

NewEngland Newsclip
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIch

Evening Glo
BOSTON, Ma
Circ. 146,9

AUG 1

Mayes M

By MICHAEL STEIN

LENOX—Friday nigh
liam Steinberg conduc
Tanglewood concert
Boston Symphony Or
The program consi
Walter Piston's
Strauss' Don Quixote,
Brahms First Symph

The Strauss was a remarkable least I would infer having hardly noth performance at tranced was I wit
tiful piece itself.

Steinberg caugh paced it well, and miral degree manag
the orchestra involved it was doing so as to some uncommonly
ing.

The solo cello pa
by Samuel Maye leave Boston for
He is a first rate
the cello, and tha
He is perhaps best interpreter
Strauss. He se cerned with the let himself becom in the music. H beautiful, but always of the s
The wrot re

TORN PAGE

FADED TEXT

Herald Tribune
NEW YORK
SUN. 363 384

Steinberg's 'Quixote'—Beautiful Perspective

By William Bender

LENOX, Mass.

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood last night continued its tribute to Richard Strauss, born a century ago on June 11, 1864, with a performance of his masterpiece, the symphonic poem "Don Quixote."

The conductor was William Steinberg, and the soloists were two Boston Symphony first deskmen, cellist Samuel Mayes and violinist Joseph dePasquale. For Mayes and dePasquale, incidentally, the event was something of a farewell. Both are joining the Philadelphia Orchestra in the fall.

The concert also included the Brahms First Symphony and Walter Piston's Toccata, a bubbling, extroverted and enjoyable occasion piece that dates from 1948 but which was receiving its first Tanglewood performance.

The program was a good one to demonstrate the exceptional nature of Mr. Steinberg's conducting gift. Though both the Strauss and the Brahms are landmarks of the Romantic literature, they couldn't be more different. The former, in structure a set of variations, inevitably works best in the hands of a conductor who can exercise restraint, keep his architecture clear and still not rub off the glow. The Brahms can be done that way, too, but also lends itself to more red-blooded treatment, as Steinberg demonstrated vividly with a highly individual combination of other-worldly dreaminess and heroic thrust.

There are not many conductors who can combine these approaches the way Steinberg did last night. Indeed, few conductors of our time bring such admirable classical instincts to the Romantics and such spirit and color to the classics.

Thus, "Don Quixote" emerged in beautiful perspective. There was a wonderful, round fullness to the opening scene depicting the Don, with nothing in excess. Yet, when the battle with the sheep came, Steinberg wasn't afraid to let the muted brass bleat their loudest. And, in the ride through the air, in which the Don and Sancho Panza are seated on a wooden horse and think they are flying, the howl of the wind machine and the spinning chromaticisms in the orchestra were something to hear. And at the end, there was a wonderful grace and a rainbow hue to convey the peaceful resolution of all the knight's conflicts.

Mayes and dePasquale played with their accustomed aplomb and refinement, although a more colorful and individual cellist than Mayes might have been a better foil for the Steinberg approach.

It was Steinberg's third Tanglewood appearance. The first was two years ago and the second last Sunday. And a crowd of 5,439, biggest Friday night crowd of the season, came out to hear the eminent maestro from Pittsburgh.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,673

AUG 3 1964

At the Concert

Some Ups and Downs With Brahms, Strauss

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra continued to delve into the literature of Richard Strauss when William Steinberg guest conducted at the Tanglewood Festival over the weekend. This performance was of "Don Quixote," a tone poem which tested every resource of the group.

Steinberg is normally a fine interpreter of the Strauss repertoire. Friday night's concert did not demonstrate that mastery, however. The reading was stilted and without real imaginative approach. The theme and variation form of the work was too evident in that there was almost the feeling that the conductor was telling his audience that such and such a place was the start of each new section, rather than allowing for a flow of ideas throughout.

Cellist Samuel Mayes and violist Joseph dePasquale were the interpreters of Quixote and Sancho Panza. They adopted the conductor's outlook. Although their technique could not be questioned, they [illegible] to the tragi-comic basis of the almost literal story-telling line within the composition. Like Steinberg, and partly due to his leadership, they played well but with a lack of spirit.

★ ★ ★

WHEN hearing the "Don Quixote" it is easy to understand how it laid the groundwork for men like Stravinsky to build on. Composed in 1897, it contains many passages which are precursors of the atonal works being created by writers of today. Steinberg brought out the voices of the orchestra well, illustrating clearly the tremendous flair which Strauss had in the use of materials for orchestra. But the playing was too contrived.

The Piston "Toccatta" which opened the program was an orchestral tour-de-force and brought home how well the Steinberg-Boston Symphony Combination can perform together when they are of the mind to do so. The toccata is a complex score, filled with opportunities for displaying the capabilities of a virtuoso ensemble like the Boston Orchestra. Steinberg took every advantage of this and the reading of the short piece was one of the highlights of the concert. It is a three part work in the form of the older compositions in the style, but with the use of modern harmonic principles. Like numerous compositions heard so far this season at the Tanglewood shed, the Piston piece was being given its first performance in the Festival Series.

With the playing of the "First Symphony" of Brahms, the Friday night show took on the finer qualities which have become standard for these concerts. The highly polished skills of orchestra and conductor were used to their best. Steinberg allowed the lovely themes of the work to ride out over the tight-knit harmonic structure of the symphony. There was the feeling that a singular concept, which was missing in the Strauss, was contained in the rendering. The participants were inspired and gave a memorable performance. It more than redeemed the evening for all concerned.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915

Mayes Not at Best in Don Quixote

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—Friday night William Steinberg conducted the Tanglewood concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program consisted of Walter Piston's Toccata, Strauss' Don Quixote, and the Brahms First Symphony.

The Strauss performance was a remarkable one, or at least I would infer so from my having hardly noticed it as a performance at all, so entranced was I with the beautiful piece itself.

Steinberg caught its moods, paced it well, and to an admiral degree managed to get the orchestra involved in what it was doing so as to produce some uncommonly lively playing.

The solo cello part was taken by Samuel Mayes, about to leave Boston for Philadelphia. He is a first rate player upon the cello, and that is not news. He is perhaps not quite the best interpreter of Cervantes-Strauss. He seems too concerned with the instrument to let himself become quite lost in the music. His tone is very beautiful, but the beauty is always of the same kind.

The music that Strauss wrote [illegible] volved and fascinating tone poem.

Special gratitude must be expressed to Joseph de Pasquale for his very fine, and apt, playing of the incidental viola solos.

Maybe if players like Feuermann had not revealed what Don Quixote can be, I would have found Mayes more completely satisfying. Even so, Don Quixote was unusually satisfying. I did feel I was led straight to the music without interference and that is something I by no means take for granted.

Brahm's First Symphony is an extraordinarily difficult piece to conduct. In a letter to the composer written after the first Leipzig performance in 1877, Clara Schumann expressed her feeling that the final climax ::does not seem to grow out of the whole movement, but appears added on as a brilliant finish."

That brilliant finish always makes a big effect in the most vulgar sense, but if it were not for those last and rather dismaying pages, the First Symphony would fall flat in performance almost as often as the third with its quiet close.

As it is, the first almost always gets the audience to cheer, and on this occasion, as so often, the shouting from the crowd began right with the attack on the final C major chord.

That does not alter the fact that Steinberg's interpretation was in general a crude exercise in demagoguery. Ascent fell heavily and more or less all over the place. One would never know that Brahms wanted the big tune in the finale played "poco forte" and it ought to be possible to refine its phrasing to the point where its first two notes sound not quite so much like a healthy belch.

I have heard duller performances of this highly problematic symphony, but not, I think, one more fundamentally unperceptive and brutal.

Piston's Toccata was written for the French Orchestre National's first American tour under Charles Munch, and its represents little more than the thoroughly professional realization of a gracious gesture. It made a lively beginning for a confusingly uneven concert.

TROY RECORD Aug. 1, 1964

Steinberg Outstanding In 3 Major Tanglewood Works

By HOWARD HEALY

A guest conductor and a program of contrast worked out very well yesterday afternoon at the Berkshire Tanglewood Festival in Lenox, Mass.

William Steinberg stepped up to the podium to conduct three pieces that demanded assumption of three personalities: Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," excerpts from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung," and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5".

Even more important, Steinberg had to master three differing and contrasting styles. So great was his control in the third work that applause lingered over the rolling green lawns of Tanglewood for nearly 15 minutes. And that came after a standing ovation before the last of Beethoven's last 55 measures in C major were completed.

Consciously or unconsciously Steinberg had formed a program that included nearly opposite poles in style.

